

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

3 3433 00594179 8

American

SKG
Google

Digitized by

AMERICAN
MASONICK RECORD

AND

ALBANY SATURDAY MAGAZINE.

BEING

A PERIODICAL JOURNAL,

DEVOTED TO MASONRY, ARTS AND SCIENCES, BIOGRAPHY, SKETCHES OF CHARACTER, MANNERS AND CUSTOMS, POPULAR TALES, MISCELLANY, POETRY, LITERARY AND POLITICAL NEWS, &c. &c.

VOLUME III.

ALBANY, N. Y.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED BY E. B. CHILD,

NO. 3, BEAVER-STREET.

.....
1829-30.

THE NEW YORK
PUBLIC LIBRARY
141964
ASTOR, LENOX AND TILDEN FOUNDATIONS
1899.

INDEX.

PROSE.

MASONRY.

Addresses, Orations, and Sermons:—by Rev. Com. Joseph Prentiss, 41, 49; to Gen. La Fayette, 57; of the Freemasons of Monroe county, 65; to the Rev. Joshua Bradley, 177; by Dr. Palmer, 217; by Rev. Br. Paul Dean, 225; by Jonathan A. Allen, 257; by Nahum Capen, 273, 281; by Rev. Stephen Fenn, 297; by the Pastor of a church in Monson, 409.

Anti-masonry unmasked, 169; An appeal, 195; do. 249; do. 265; Anti-masonry—Masonry, 193, 201; Anti-ism in Pennsylvania, 265; Appeal, 313, 401; Anti-masonry, 337, 392, 401; Anti-masonick slander, 345.

Beauties of Anti-masonry, 137.

Chesapeake and Ohio canal, 153; Celebrations, 122, 138, 146, 154, 162, 393; Constitution and regulations of the Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the state of New-York, 1, 9, 17, 25.

Dangers of Masonry, 337; Danger of popular excitements, 121.

Eulogy on De Witt Clinton, 321; Expulsion, 146, 242; Election of officers, 2, 10, 26, 33, 42, 98, 106, 122, 138, 146, 170, 202, 282, 322, 330, 338, 362, 370, 386, 393, 402.

Fashion and Anti-masonry, 153; Freemasonry, 322.

Grand Lodge, 153; Grand Encampment, 153.

Important trial of jurors, 361, 369; Intemperance, 265; Installation, 122.

John Coustos, 137.

Letter to C. D. Colden, 313; Letter to the Genesee consociation, 329.

Magna est veritas, 113; Masonick ceremonies, 234; Masonry, 33; Masonry and Anti-masonry, 73; Morgan reports, 57; Masonick convention, 289.

New device, 137; Notes on Anti-masonry, 233, 241.

Opinions abroad, 265.

Public opinion, 81, 129, 321; Protest of the Masonick institution in the county of Ulster, 89; of Binghampton lodge, 105; of Phœbus lodge, 105; of Utica lodge, 121; Cayuga and Onondaga, 145; Popular excitements, 345, 353, 377, 386, 393.

Renouncing Masons, 97; Review of the Anti-masonic excitement, 305.

Surrender of Charters, 98; Sublime Freemason's calendar, 113.

Tribute of respect, 24, 218; To the publick, 97, 161; The Rev. Joshua Bradley in 1827, 209.

ODD FELLOWS.

Address 50, 58.

Celebration 178.

Election, 10, 98.

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

Acousticks 34; Animated nature 114, 122; American song birds 114; Ancient ink 123; A new poison 123; Aeronauticks 274; Animal heat 314.

Course of the air 58; Colour of the eyes 98; Compound eyes of insects 154; Chloride of lime 194.

Dyspepsia 202; Diet of various nations 282, 290.

Effects of light 2; Encke's comet 50; Eriometre 92; Experiments with prussic acid 154; Electricity 298.

Fabrication of the diamond 2.

Gardenine, &c. 2, 10; Geography of Greece 226.

Herculaneum and Pompeii 116; Health 339, 346.

Insanity 106; Ice mountain 251.

Level of the sea 18.

Medical science 29; Mania a Potu 219; Making tea 250.

New method of making glass 18; New discoveries 58; Nutritious substitute for flour 98; Nature and habits of the honey bee 130; North Carolina black-lead 306; Nautical insanity 330.

Oregon territory 202; On the uvularia grandiflora 330.

Poisoning of vegetables 42; Poisoned wounds 58; Pyrothone 130; Protection from lightning 162; Poisoning by milk 186; Prevention of death 194; Poisonous property of the black cherry tree 242.

Rail-roads, canals 66; Remarkable phenomenon 90; Real toadstone 203; Resuscitation 219; Rice 282; Rules for preserving the sight 393.

Singular case of insanity 146.

The winds 50; The asteroid 162; The Brattleborough Press 170; The botany of the antediluvian world 178; The human ear 242; The Siamese brothers, 258; The unicorn 259; The teeth 290; Tobacco 303; The triumphs of science and art 370.

Use of acids for the teeth 314.

Velocity of sound 82.

Wine from saw-dust 10; Water 354; Wet feet 363.

SKETCH-BOOK AND LEGENDARY.

A young family 124; Adventures of a wooden leg 324.

Bedouin 220.

Convent of St. Bernard 228; Chocorua's curse 308; Constancy 340; Col. Plug 412.

Darby O'Reilly 52; Donagha Dee's two wishes 60.

El Borracho 92.

Fitzmaurice, the magician, 244.

Lewis and Eliza 76; Lorenzo Stark 316.

Mike Fink, the last of the boatmen, 236; Madness 260.

Pyrenean adventure 212.

Story of a pirate 20; St. Patrick and the last of the sarpiants 60; Schinderhannes, the German robber, 221; Stand from under 228; Story of a bull and a parson 388.

The spring root 4; The survivor of Ronces-Valles 12; The haunted ships 28, 36; The fugitive gladiator 44; The undine of Stauffenberg 68; The lover's leap 84; The first and the last dinner 100; The murder hole 108; The Lanauntshee 116; The wedding 124; The Jews of York 132; The tifer's cave 140; The wife of seven husbands 156, 164; The Noyade 172; The Gallyowen hair-cutter 180; The idiot girl 244; Tales of travellers 316; The sea 341; The betrothed 349, 356, 364; The ideot 358; The goblin oak 372; The dead sea 372, 373, 374; The red man 396; The German's story 404.

We'll see about it 380.

BIOGRAPHY, CHARACTER, &c.

Appearance of Rothschild 91.

Bolivar 195.

Campbell the poet 3; Crevelier 132; Col. McLane 405.

Domestick habits of Napoleon 142; Dean Swift 251; Dr. Channing 262; De Witt Clinton 298.

Early Life of Thomas Jefferson 210.

Isabella of Spain 299.

Joseph Bonaparte 76; John Jay 138; John M. Mason 394.

Lord Byron 85; La tour D'Auvergne 123; Last hours of gov. Lincoln 350; Late king of Madagascar 394.

Mr. Canning and his servant 3; Mr. Clay 10; Mr. Rush 11; Mr. Southard 11; Mahomet 51; Mr. Abernethy 69.

Napoleoniana 226.

Paley 42.

Sketch of the life of Kotzebue 4.

The Turks 26; The late Rev. W. Taylor 51; The Essenes 349; The late Judge Washington, 386.

Young Napoleon 222.

MISCELLANEOUS, HISTORICAL, &c.

Abolition in the senses 19; Anecdote of a banker 43; Advantages of a good heart 53; A good fellow, 59; A bachelor's joys 77; Anecdotes of arts 82; Aborigines of Hayti 84; Africa and slavery 92; A woman of parts 107; A chapter on kissing 133; Amusement 133; Anecdotes of a Diana monkey 141; A ramble 157; Affected romance 157; Anecdotes of insanity 189; Aborigines of Van Dieman's land 213; A Kerry creditor 222; Ancient and modern names of plants 235; A dream 252; Animal and vegetable food 277; Attack on Bryant's station 284, 292; Another Masaniello 302; A Roman execution 310; A day in December 337; Attempt to assassinate Napoleon 399; Anecdotes of Napoleon 395; Anecdotes of Russia 403.

Baboons at the cape of Good Hope 75; Bull-fights at Lima 91; Buddhism 109; Bathe your body 141; Brazilian slave-trade 269; Beware of strong waters 405.

Curing a cold 21; Can you keep a secret 27; City and country life 179; Captain Basil Hall 179; Conspiracy of the Sirelitz 187; Chinese morals 197; Confessions of a poet 188; Chinese drama 222; Ciceri and Mr. Maelzel 234; Character 236; Capt. Basil Hall 253; Constantinople and the Turks 307; Colony of beavers 315; Chinese burials 317; Commerce of the Jews 317; Coming out 331.

Dancing 61; Death and the doctors 77; Dutch mail 139; Description of Mekka 143; Directions to hot people 163; Duelling in Germany 165; Declaration of independence 178; Death of little children 203; Dying laconicks 252; Decline of empires 285; Dog story 374; Discovery of America 411; Duelling 413.

Earthquakes 34; Eating and writing 83; Epitome of the Crusades 149; Egyptian caverns 205; Egyptian mummy hunting 213; Excerpts 245, 379; Encounter with a leopard 252; Eighteen year's old fever 389; Elephant hunt 261.

First of the incurables 26; Female beauty 35; Friends 35; Falling in love 157; Friendship 205; French trick on a jeweller 254; Fanti Chu 268; Freedom correctly delineated 365; Fragments of an antediluvian diary 395.

Gleanings on gluttony 60; German schools 99; General Jackson 99; Gaming 158; Geneva 262; German literature 277; Galen's experience 323.

History of sea-serpentism 20; How to bathe 117; Hydrophobia 148; Hints on drinking 261; History of a three days' existence 268; Health 285; Havana 293; Huron or Ouisconsin territory 299; Hand-writing 309; How to be sick 325.

Irving's conquest of Genada 37; Impediments of American literature, 66, 74; Independence 173; Influence of diet on the intellectual system 268; Impudence 269; Intemperance—Insanity 277; Infancy and old age 310; Insects 340; Illustration of some old proverbs 357.

Joe—Joe—Joe 5; John Randolph 43; John Kemble and Miss Owenson 309.

Knapp's lectures 181; Knight's Malta 197.

Leopard hunting 3: Lord Avonmore 37: Life 93: Lady Morgan and Mr. Owen 294.
 Maxims 11: Musick 35: Marriage of Mademoiselle Le Clerc 109: Maxims of John Bullism 170: Model of the inquisition 171: Moral influence of christianity 296: Marriage ceremony 301: Measuring for supper 374: Maternal affection 387: Mustachios 413.
 Nancy's hill 13: Noses 190: Napoleon's passage over the Alps 188: Nicholas I. crowned king of Poland 196: Nuptials of Alexander the Great 275: Napoleon jealous 325.
 On love 35: On good and evil days 229: On premature interment 301: Opium eating 331: On card playing 397.
 Politeness 13: Picture of the court of Charles II. 75: Persian story teller 99: Portuguese literature 125: Public opinion 197: Perseverance 227: Proverbs 228: Pacha of Egypt 238: Posthumous influence of the wise and good 269: Panacea—the prince's cure 323.
 Quid pro quo 11: Quakers 333.
 Religion in Holland 53: Riches 93: Rousseau's death 131: Rob Roy 221: Religious nurses in France 229: Russia and Turkey 286: Reminiscences 293: Roads over the Alps 324: Roman beggars 338: Russian acquisition by the late war 336: Reception of ambassadors in Turkey 406.
 Singular customs at Rouen 3: Slaughter of Swans 14: Sir Walter Scott's ghost story 18: Social philosophy 68: Sleep 77: Sincerity 99: Sneezing among the ancients 107: Superstition of the Moors 117: Singular exhibition 131: South American manners 133: Swiss manners and customs 147: Superstition of the Swiss 154: Sagacity of the dog 155: Sir Herman and Dannischemend 204: Scottish inns 211: South American banditti 222: Self-taught men 266: Solitary confinement made tolerable 286: Soldiers of Gustavus and Napoleon 293: Sketch of Armenia 322: Singular punishment 323: Superstitious cures 331: Sebago pond 332: Sound doctrine 373: Sam Patch 411.
 Travelling in Lapland 19: The Irish bar 27: Tombuctoo 34: The Jesuits 44: The Eastern world 45: The shell 53: The Persian empire 59: The Jews 59: Tribute to the dead 62: The bible 98: The pope 106: Tim Marks and the walking skull 107: The Vine 115: The vision of Valdemaro 117: The lines of a good judge 123: Tailors 155: The Devil in Pisa 166: The misfortunes of the twentieth century 172: The actor 174: The ruins of America 187: The rose 189: The post 196: The money-diggers 204: The last day of grace 210: The discovery of Hudson river 236: The influence of climate on national character 236: The wedding ring 237: The present sultan and the Pacha of Egypt 238: Temperance 243: The Legends of Albany 244: The female officers 245: The Virginia game-cock 253: The chateau D'Olierne 261: The Dardanelles 266: Three animals not in the ark 275: The deformed girl 276: The dinner of the months 276: The province of Texas 278: The last of the Druids 300: The hypochondriack 301: The invisible girl 317: The country girl, 318: The time for writing 323: The broken-hearted 326: The philosophical apple-woman 332: The drama 334: Turkey 339: The Mexican revolution 347, 351, 362, 370: Time for sleep 355: The unicorn 357: The march of intellect 365: The mechanical age 402: The Mahomedan religion 402: The young Swiss and Plutarch 406: The Ascutney 414.

 Unwritten countenances 235: Unanimity of jurors on criminal trials 410.
 Wine-drinking 101: Witches 115: Waiting for the stage 125: Wine 173: Western adventures 190: Water versus ardent spirits 300: Winter 379.
 Yankee enterprize 74.

EDITORIAL, VARIETIES, ITEMS of NEWS and SKETCHES of ANTI-MASONRY in every number.

POETRY.

A letter of advice 32: An every day character 160: A voice is heard 208: Airy castles 216: A sketch 224: A real love song 224: An evening hymn 232: A morning on the Andes 256: A chapter on heathen mythology 256: A visit to the grave of a child 283: Autumn woods 296: A Scots lute sang 344: An old man's story 384: Arab songs 392: A farewell to the year 400: A bunch of for-get-me-nots 400: An exquisite of the year 1929, at breakfast, 400.
 Bridal serenade 144: Birth-days 144: Ballad 216: Bob Fletcher 328.
 Change 16: Change 96: Castara 168: Changes 176: Clouds 232: Childhood and his visitors 296: Chamomile tea 336: Destiny 112: Departed love 168: Domestic happiness 224: Death of the young volunteer 328.
 Elegant leisure 112: Epigram 376.
 From an absentee 48: From the Spanish 56: Forget me not 144: Farewell 192: Fame, an apologue, 264: Faded wild flowers 296: Friendly advice 336.
 Good night 104: Gazul or the lovers' quarrel 304.
 Hebrew—Saul 48: Hope 72, 152: Hobbledehoyes 160: Hymn 200, 256: Hymn of the Calabrian shepherds to the virgin 280: Homeward bound 408.
 I speak not—I trace not 248: In the valley of waters 248: I'd be a parody 352: Invocation 368.
 Julia to her lover 160: Jesus Wept 192: Joy 288: Joe Nicholson's daughter 304: Judith at the tent of Holofernes 312.
 Knowledge 120.
 Love called on me one morning 16: Linda Alhaya 48: Life 104: Long ago 128: Love's seasons 176: Love 237: Love and friendship 372: Love and folly 376.
 Musing hours 8: Morning in spring 32: Mind 72: Memories 128: My gentle lute 144: Melancholy 192: Minstrel ballad 224: Mary 240: Marriage of the deaf and dumb 360: Maria Gray 360.

New-England men 194: Norwegian war song 216: Norwegian love song 216: Now, is'n't a pity 248: Napoleon 288, 296: November 352.
 Opening of the Niebelungenlied 64: Old and new times 208: Old winter is coming 392.
 Pledge to the dying year 152: Parody of "Oh! no, we never mention her," 288: Pilgrims of the world 384: Pilgrim anniversary 416.
 Quid pro quo 192.
 Riddle 176.
 Stanzas 8: Serenade 16: Stanzas to a lady 38: Simple ballad 64: Suliote war song 88: Song 128, 136, 344: Stanzas 184, 216, 248, by Keats 352, 368: Song of Archie Rover 208: Saturday afternoon 328: Season of prayer 344: Singular old sonnet 376.
 Turkish ode 8: The crusader's song 8: The jung frau 8: butterfly 8: the survivor 16: The lunatic 16: The nightingale flower 16: The fancy ball 24: To the past 24: The red bird 24: The old man in winter 32: To a girl thirteen years of age 32: To a lady on the death of her son 40: The ice-ship 40: The spirit of the north 40: The old gentleman 40: The light guitar 48: The music of the reeds 48: To the sea 48: Twenty-eight and twenty-nine 56: The artick dove 56: The coronation of Inez De Castro 64: The good samaritan 64: The separation 72: To my muse 80: The churchyard 80, 96: The old seaport 80: The bark of death 80: The Gitana's song 88: The fisher girl 88: The parted year 88: The lament of one who can get no employ 96: The absent husband 112: The fountain of oblivion 112: To my little sister 112: The vicar 120: The storm painter in his dungeon 120: The shadow 128: The return of spring 128: The iceberg 186: The dead mariner 186: The Indian with his dead child 186: The false knight 186: The recall 144: The mariner's grave 144: The flower of the hamlet 144: The red rover 152: The pine forest of the Cazine near Pisa 152: To spring 152: The sky rocket 160: to the Hudson river 168: The mother's call 168: The sky lark 168: The future 176: The mourner 176: The sea maid 176: The misanthrope and the youth 184: The image of the dead 184: The imprisoned 200: The sailor's grave 200: The beauty 200: The pilgrim maiden to her lover 208: The ruined house 282: To Varro 240: The hunted stag 240: The grave 240: The soldier's death bed 240: They say that hope is happiness 248: The field of Bannockburn 248: The dead 256: The worship of nature 264: To a bride 264: The dead man's moan 264: The nursery tale 264: To a bird 272: To S. E. M. 272: Time 272: The whip-poor-will 272: The village 280: The deluge 280: The miser 280: To — 288: The bugle 304: To a wave 312: The sword song 312: The soldier's grave 312: To a skylark 320: The evening star 320: To a palm leaf 320: The minstrel 320: The good old times 328: The broken heart 336: The river 344: The grave 352: To Ann 352: The torn hat 360: The funeral at sea 360: The epicurean at the feast of Isis 368: The good old times, No. 2, 368: The Savoyard's song 368: The Bechusna boy 376: The standard-bearer 384: The carrier's address 392: Time's festival 400: The soldier's tear 400: 'Twas but a bubble 408: Thy will be done 408: The poet and death 408: The doctors 408: The song of the Charib 416: There go the ships 416: The burial of a sailor 416.
 Virgil's tomb 104.
 Wedding day anniversary 40: Wine 96: Woman 208, 304: What our father's believed 224: War song 224: What I hate 326: Written in a grave yard 360.
 You'll come to our ball 104: Youth vs. Time 200.

AMERICAN MASONICK RECORD

AND ALBANY SATURDAY MAGAZINE.

VOL. III.

ALBANY, N. Y. SATURDAY, JANUARY 31, 1829.

NO. 1.

MASONICK RECORD.

CONSTITUTION

And Regulations of the GRAND ROYAL ARCH CHAPTER of the State of New-York, adopted at the city of Albany, on the 7th day of February, 1805.

We, the several Chapters of Royal Arch Masons, created and established by the authority of the Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the State of New-York, and being within the jurisdiction thereof, duly represented by our respective High Priests, Kings and Scribes, or their Proxies, fully empowered, in Grand Chapter, at the city of Albany, duly convened on the seventh day of February, one thousand eight hundred and five, pursuant to the powers vested in us by the constitution of the General Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the United States of America, for the purpose of ensuring good order, promoting harmony and supporting brotherly union, advancing the interest of pure ancient Masonry, perpetuating and handing down to posterity its beneficial principles, for diffusing Masonick instruction, and inculcating good morals among the Craftsmen; and regulating their labours by one uniform standard, DO ORDAIN and DECLARE the following Articles to be the Constitution of this Grand Chapter, subject to no alteration or amendment, unless altered and amended as herein after described.

ARTICLE I.

Section 1. This Grand Royal Arch Chapter shall consist of a Grand High Priest, a Deputy Grand High Priest, a Grand King, a Grand Scribe, a Grand Secretary, a Grand Treasurer, a Grand Chaplain and Marshal, and the Past Grand High Priests, Past Deputy Grand High Priests, Past Grand Kings, and Past Grand Scribes, together with the High Priests, Kings and Scribes for the time being, of all subordinate Chapters under the jurisdiction of this Grand Chapter, or their Proxies duly empowered, who shall be the only members and voters in this Grand Chapter.

Sect. 2. All Masters and Wardens of Mark Master's Lodges, or their Proxies, within this jurisdiction, and holding warrants under this Grand Chapter, shall be entitled to a seat, and be lawful voters in the same, at all times when opened in the Mark Master's degree, and there to represent their respective Lodges, and to transact any business in their behalf, as fully as the members in the first section hereof named are entitled in any degree, any thing above mentioned notwithstanding.

Sect. 3. The Grand officers aforesaid shall be annually elected by ballot, in open Chapter, and the Companion having the greatest number of votes for any of the offices aforesaid, shall be declared duly elected. The said ballots are to be canvassed by the Secretary and Treasurer, in the presence of the Chapter.

Sect. 4. Each subordinate Chapter shall be entitled to three votes on all questions, and no more, whether represented by one or more companions; each permanent or standing member hereof shall have one vote, and the Grand High Priest two votes, when the number of votes happen to be equal, or otherwise he shall have but one vote; and no Companion or Brother can represent more than one Chapter or Lodge at the same time.

Sect. 5. Every Companion who shall offer himself as a Proxy for any High Priest, King, or

Scribe, of any Chapter, or any Brother who shall offer himself as a Proxy for any Master or Warden of any Mark Master's Lodge, under the jurisdiction of this Grand Chapter, before he or they shall be permitted to take a seat as such, shall produce to the Grand Secretary a warrant in the following form:—

I, A. B., High Priest of _____ Royal Arch Chapter; No. _____ holden in the _____ of _____ county of _____ do, by these presents, constitute and appoint my beloved companion, W. S. my Proxy, to represent me and the Chapter aforesaid, in the Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the State of New-York, at their next meeting in the city of Albany, hereby conferring on my said Proxy all the powers vested in me, by virtue of my said office. Given under my hand, and the seal of the said Chapter, this _____ day of _____ 58 A. B.

Which said warrant shall be sealed with the seal of the Chapter or Lodge whereof the Companion or Brother making the same shall be an officer, and attested by the Secretary of the Chapter or Lodge, in the margin, or on the back of the said warrant, in the form following:—

I certify the seal hereunto affixed to have been made after the name of A. B. was subscribed to this warrant. Z. S., Sec'y.

Sect. 6. In case of the death or absence of any of the said officers, the Chapter or Lodge whereof he was an officer may authorize any Companion or Brother in regular standing, in any Chapter or Lodge within the jurisdiction of this Grand Chapter, to represent them as aforesaid, as fully as such deceased or absent officer might have done were he alive or present, by a resolution of said Chapter or Lodge; which shall be certified by the Secretary thereof, and exemplified with the seal of the same; and he shall also certify the death or absence of such officer upon the back or margin of the same resolution.

Sect. 7. Every Companion or Brother offering himself as a representative of any Chapter or Lodge, as Proxy, or otherwise, before he shall be permitted to act as such, shall produce to the Grand Secretary a certificate of the Secretary of such Chapter or Lodge, in the following form:—

I certify that A. B. was, on the _____ day of _____ last, duly elected High Priest, C. D. King, and E. F. Scribe, of _____ Chapter, No. _____ (or Master and Wardens, as the case may be.) In testimony whereof, I have hereunto annexed the seal of the said Chapter (or Lodge) and subscribed my name officially thereto. J. K. Sec'y.

ARTICLE II.

Section 1. The Grand Chapter shall be holden at the city of Albany, in the state of New-York, on the first Tuesday in February, annually, for the purpose of transacting business; and the Grand High Priest or his Deputy shall have power to convene the members thereof, whenever either of them shall, for any special purpose, deem it necessary, by giving sufficient notice thereof to the Grand Secretary, in writing, whose duty it shall be to give immediate information to all the subordinate Chapters and private members under the jurisdiction thereof, by mail or otherwise, as he may think most sure of giving timely notice.

Sect. 2. It shall be the duty of the Grand Secretary to determine the qualifications of each person presenting credentials for a seat, claiming the right of membership, before the same shall be opened; and if he entertains any doubt, in respect to the propriety or validity of any such document, or if any dispute shall arise between him and any such person touching the same, it shall be the duty of such Secretary to refer the same to the three first officers present, whose determination shall be final, unless the person shall feel himself aggrieved, and petition, either in writing or by some member, for a hearing before this Grand Chapter, who shall, in such case, have power to confirm or reverse the decision aforesaid, or make such order on the subject as they may think proper.

Sect. 3. As the institution of Masonry acknowledges revealed religion, and inculcates the devout worship of the Supreme High Priest, whose creatures we are, and by whose bounty we subsist, and on whose mercy we ought always to depend for present prosperity and future happiness; and being thus dependent, it well becomes us to acknowledge our obligations for his beneficence, to confess our sins, to invoke his blessing, and return our thanks with heartfelt gratitude, in all humility for favours received; therefore, after the opening of this Grand Chapter, and before any business shall be proceeded upon, a suitable address may be made to the Deity by the Grand Chaplain, (if present,) and the same be followed by an appropriate address to the members present, unless dispensed with by order of the Chapter.

Sect. 4. This Grand Chapter shall not have power to proceed to the election of officers, or any other business, on the first day of the session, unless to open and adjourn, except there shall be present the representatives of three regular Chapters, which shall be a sufficient number at all times to form a Grand Chapter: But if that number shall not appear on the second day of the session, within one hour after the time appointed for meeting, those present may proceed to any business as though the whole was represented.

Sect. 5. For the convenience of Mark Master's Lodges, this Grand Chapter shall be opened on the second day of the session, at the meeting thereof, in the Mark degree, and continue open until the whole of the business of that degree shall be completed for that session, unless the election, in case of a deficiency of numbers on the first day, may interfere—in such case the business of the Marks shall immediately follow the elections and installations. All the proceedings in the Mark degree shall be ratified by the Grand Chapter, when opened in the Royal Arch degree, before they shall be considered binding.

Sect. 7. The monies paid into the funds of the Grand Chapter, being to defray the necessary expenses in the administration of its government, and to support the dignity and respectability thereof, and also for charitable purposes, it is therefore declared, that no disbursements shall be made unless by a vote of the Grand Chapter. And it is further declared, that each member of this Grand Chapter shall be entitled to receive from the funds thereof, two dollars per day for his travel in going to and returning from the Grand Chapter, computing forty* miles travel per day, and one* dollar per day for his actual attendance: Provided nevertheless, That each Chapter shall receive pay for the travel and attendance of one member only; and every permanent member shall be entitled to receive the like sum as aforesaid. And provided also, That each member attending from a Chapter over Amendments, Adopted February, 1825.

* That the word forty, in the 14th line of the 6th section of the 5d article of the Constitution be stricken out, and the word thirty inserted; and that the word one, in the same line, be also stricken out, and the word two inserted.

twenty, and under forty miles from the place of meeting of this Grand Chapter, shall be entitled to the like compensation.*

*II. At the close of the 6th section, 2d article, add, Provided also, that no standing member, who shall also represent a Chapter, shall receive pay for travel and attendance as such representative.
(To be continued.)

ELECTION OF OFFICERS.

STATE OF NEW-YORK.

Officers of Skaneateles Royal Arch Chapter, in the village of Skaneateles, in the county of Onondaga:—

James M. Allen, High Priest; Samuel Porter, King; Noadiah Kellogg, Scribe; William Gibbs, Secretary.

Regular communications, first Monday in every month.

At the annual communication of Hudson Royal Arch Chapter, No. 6, held at St. John's Hall, in the city of Hudson, Columbia county, December 9, 1828, the following companions were elected officers for the ensuing year:—

E. C. Thurston, High Priest; R. Carrique, King; Isaiah Griffin, Scribe; Lionel U. Lawrence, Captain of the Host; Cyrus Curtiss, Principal Sojourner; S. B. Jordan, Royal Arch Captain; J. W. Edmonds, John Hunt, and E. Bushnell, Masters of Vails; Elihu Gifford, Treasurer; Charles Gardner, Secretary; Lionel U. Lawrence, Cyrus Curtiss, and Charles Gardner, Charitable Committee; Solomon Shattuck, Sentinel.

Officers of Catskill Royal Arch Chapter, No. 90, in the village of Catskill, Greene county, elected December 18, 1828:—

Ira Du Bois, High Priest; Francis N. Wilson, King; Egbert Bogardus, Scribe; Hiram Comfort, Captain of the Host; John Adams, Principal Sojourner; Julius Austin, Royal Arch Captain; Zeno W. Weed, Aaron Shepherd, and James Davids, Masters of Vails; Benjamin Sherman, Treasurer; Samuel Du Bois, Secretary; Elisha Meiggs, John V. Decker, Stewards; John E. David, Tyler.

Officers of Newry Lodge, No. 438, in the town of Greenville, Greene co., for the ensuing year:—

David Wooster, Master; Richard H. Dawson, Senior Warden; John Foot, Junior Warden; Edward H. Miller, Treasurer; John Smith, Secretary; Sylvester Guild, Senior Deacon; Andrew Lake, Junior Deacon; Ezra Healy, and Darius Allen, Stewards; Reuben Wooster, Tyler.

At the annual meeting of Hudson Lodge, No. 15, held in the city of Hudson, in the county of Columbia, December 1st, 1828, the following officers were elected for the ensuing year:—

Cyrus Curtiss, Master; Samuel Taylor, Senior Warden; S. A. Coffin, Junior Warden; D. S. Colver, Senior Deacon; S. B. Jordan, Junior Deacon; Charles Gardner, Secretary; Elihu Gifford, Treasurer; J. W. Edmonds, Master of Ceremonies; J. W. Jenkins, and J. B. Gage, Stewards; Philip White, J. W. Jenkins, and Charles Gardner, Charitable Committee; Solomon Shattuck, Tyler.

STATE OF OHIO.

The Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the state of Ohio, closed its annual session in Worthington, on the 7th of January, 1828. The following are the officers elected for the present year:—

A. I. McDowell, Grand High Priest; Stephen Fales, Deputy Grand High Priest; R. Puncheon, Grand King; James Gates, Grand Scribe; L. Goodale, Grand Treasurer; B. Latham, Grand Secretary; Joseph Grubb, Grand Marshal; Rev. H. Hulburd, Grand Chaplain.

The Grand Lodge of the state of Ohio closed its annual session in Worthington, on the 6th of January, 1829. The following are the officers elected for the ensuing year:—

John Snow, Grand Master; Timothy Baker, Deputy Grand Master; John H. James, Grand Senior Warden; Hosmer Curtis, Grand Junior Warden; L. Goodale, Grand Treasurer; B. Latham, Grand Secretary; Stephen Fales, Grand Orator; Rev. P. Thurman, Grand Chaplain; J. T. Fracker, Grand Marshal; David S. Davis, Grand Senior Deacon; William B. Thrall, Grand Deacon; William Fielding, Grand Lecturer; William John Grand Tyler.

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

GARDENING, &c.

The celebrated WILLIAM CORBETT published a month or two since, in England, a very useful and practical little volume, under the title of the English Gardener. We give a few extracts below, and recommend them to the attention of our agricultural friends. There is no science, the practice of which is at once more favourable to health, pleasure, and interest, than agriculture; and there is none beyond the suburbs of the city, so poor that he may not till a spot of earth according to his pleasure. We shall, from time to time publish such extracts from new works that may come within our knowledge, as shall appear to us calculated to extend the sphere of agricultural science; and we shall be obliged to those of our friends who are acquainted with the subject, if they will occasionally inform us of the result of their investigations.

SEEDS.

I incline to the opinion, that we should try seeds as our ancestors tried witches; not by fire, but by water; and that, following up their practice, we should reprobate and destroy all that do not readily sink.

MELONS.

It is a received opinion, a thing taken for granted, an axiom in horticulture, that melon seed is the better for being old. Mr. Marshall says that it ought to be "about four years old, though some prefer it much older." And he afterwards observes, that if "new seed only can be had, it ought to be carried a week or two in the breeches pocket, to dry away some of the more watery particles!" If age be a recommendation in rules as well as in melon-seed, this rule has it; for English authors published it, and French authors laughed at it, more than a century past!

SOWING SEEDS.

I do hope that it is unnecessary for me to say, that sowing according to the moon is wholly absurd and ridiculous; and that it arose solely out of the circumstance, that our forefathers, who could not read, had neither almanack nor calendar to guide them, and who counted by moons and festivals, instead of by months, and days of months.

EATING MUSHROOMS.

I once ate about three spoonfuls at table at Mr. Timothy Brown's, at Peckham, which had been cooked, I suppose, in the usual way; but I had not long eaten them, before my whole body, face, hands, and all, was covered with red spots or pimples, and to such a degree, and coming on so fast, that the doctor who attended the family was sent for. He thought nothing of it, gave me a little draught of some sort, and the pimples went away; but I attributed it then to the mushrooms. The next year, I had mushrooms in my own garden at Botley, and I determined to try the experiment whether they would have the same effect again; but not liking to run any risk, I took only a tea-spoonful, or rather a French coffee spoonful, which is larger than a common tea spoon. They had just the same effect, both as to sensation and outward appearance! From that day to this, I have never touched mushrooms, for I conclude that there must be something poisonous in that which will so quickly produce the effects that I have described, and on a healthy and hale body like mine; and, therefore, I do not advise any one to cultivate these things.

PEAS.

The late king, George the Third, reigned so long that his birth-day formed a sort of season with gardeners; and, ever since I became a man, I can recollect that it was always deemed rather a sign of bad gardening if there were not green peas in the garden fit to gather on the fourth of June. It is curious that green peas are to be had as early in Long Island, and in the sea-board part of the state of New-Jersey, as in England, though not sowed there, observe, until very late in April, while ours, to be very early, must be sowed in the month of December or January. It is still more curious, that such is the effect of habit and tradition, that, even when I was last in America, (1819) people talked just as familiarly as in England, about having green peas on the king's birth-day, and were just as ambitious for accomplishing the object; and I remember a gentleman who had been a republican officer during the revolutionary war, who told me that he always got in his garden green peas fit to eat on old Uncle George's birth-day.

THE EFFECTS OF LIGHT

UPON ANIMALS, VEGETABLES, AND MINERALS.

The physical properties of light are extremely curious, as is well known to all those skilled in Opticks; its chymical effects upon most parts of the animal, vegetable, and mineral kingdoms, are not less worthy of observation. Vegetables, flowers, plants, &c. are principally indebted to light, not only for their colour, but also for their taste and fragrance. Many of them seem to follow the course of the sun; and it is remarkable, that plants which are usually kept in the house, appear as it were, solicitous to get at the light; those, again, which are placed entirely in the shade are pale and colourless, and hence some gardeners avail themselves of this fact to render vegetables white and tender. The more plants are exposed to the light, the more brilliant their colours. From this cause, we find that hot climates are the native countries of perfumes, odoriferous fruits, aromatick spices, &c.

The action of light upon the organs of vegetables, causes them to throw out streams of pure air, while they are exposed to the sun; but when, on the contrary, they have been long in the shade, air of a noxious quality is emitted.

Animals who are deprived of light for a long period, generally droop, become sickly, lose the brightness of colour which their coats had previously possessed, and ultimately die. Nor can it be questioned that light is of the utmost importance to the health of human beings. Birds that inhabit the southern, or tropical climates, have a much greater brilliancy of plumage than those of the northern; and the same is equally true with regard to insects.

Another strong proof that light conduces much towards the colours of substances, may be seen in fishes; for we find that those parts of fish which are exposed to the light (such as the back, fins, &c.) are invariably coloured; whereas the belly, which is deprived of light, is white in all of them.

All metallick oxydes, but especially those of mercury, bismuth, lead, silver, and gold, acquire a deeper colour by exposure to the rays of the sun; some of them become perfectly revived, others only partially. The yellow oxyde of Tungsten, if exposed to the light, loses in weight, and turns blue. Again, the green precipitate of iron, when exposed to the solar light, becomes also blue.

Light has likewise a very considerable influence upon the crystallization of salts. Indeed some of them will not crystallize at all, except they be exposed to the light. Camphor, kept in glass bottles, usually chrysalizes in symmetrical figures, upon that side of the phial which has been so exposed.

There are certain bodies which, after exposure to the light, appear to combine therewith, and afterwards to emit it when put in the dark. Several substances of this nature have been prepared by chymists, as the phosphorus of Canton, Baldwin, Homberg, and the Bolognian phosphorus.

Various animals and vegetables appear to have this phosphorick property; among others, the glow-worm is a remarkable instance. Dead fish, rotten sea-weed, putrid bodies, and a vast number of insects, appear to possess this property in greater or less degrees.

FABRICATION OF THE DIAMOND.

The mania of the "Philosopher's Stone" having disappeared, a new sort of fever is beginning to disturb the pulses of the French Savans. It is agreed that one cannot manufacture gold out of lead or copper; but M. Gannal, of the French Academy of Sciences, has discovered a process by which crystals may be obtained of pure carbon, possessing all the properties of the diamond, and in particular that of scratching the hardest bodies.

His method is to separate the sulphur from the carbonate of sulphur, by means of phosphorus, and the pure carbon thus obtained presents itself in a crystalized form. Twenty of the crystals at his last experiment, were large enough to be lifted on the point of a knife; and three were of the size of millet seed. These three were submitted to the inspection of M. Champigny, manager of the jewellery warehouse of M. Petito, and pronounced by him to be real diamonds. Another scientific adventurer has addressed himself to the French Academy of Sciences on this subject. This is M. Cagnart-Delatour, whose process (altogether different from that of M. Gannal,) is in the meantime a secret. His memoir was accompanied with some tubes filled with diamond dust—that is to say, with crystallizations of carbon; one of the particles of which was perfectly diaphanous, and evidently of a pyramidal form. These, however, were only the produce of his first attempts; and he is since experimentalizing on a greater scale, in the hope of being able to exhibit, very speedily, diamonds of much larger dimensions. There is a third gentleman also, as M. Arago, of the French Institute, has communicated, employed on the same pursuit. His method of decomposing the carbonate of sulphur is by means of the Voltaick pile. The importance of this affair, even supposing the success of the experiments to come up to the wildest imaginations of men, is of course greatly exaggerated. We question whether diamonds could not in the meantime be bought much cheaper than manufactured; but even should the improvements of chemistry facilitate their production to an unlimited extent, this would only have the effect of depriving them of the conventional value they at present possess, and of removing the brilliant necklace from the throat of a duchess, to glitter on the plebeian skin of her waiting woman. At the same time, from the nature of the diamond, and in particular its effect on hard bodies, the subject is by no means destitute of interest and importance. It is, at all events sufficiently curious to tempt us to watch the progress of this discovery, and, from time to time, lay the results before our readers.

SKETCHES OF CHARACTER.

The first of the following sketches is from Leigh Hunt's Lord Byron and some of his Contemporaries; and the second from a very amusing and instructive English work, entitled Annual Biography and Obituary, for 1828.

CAMPBELL THE POET.

They who know Mr. Campbell only as the author of "Gertrude of Wyoming," and "The Pleasures of Hope," would not suspect him to be a merry companion, overflowing with humour and anecdote, and any thing but fastidious. These Scotch poets have always something in reserve. It is the only point in which the major part of them resemble their countrymen. The mistaken character which the lady formed of Thomson from his "Seasons," is well known. He let part of the secret out in his "Castle of Indolence;" and the more he let out, the more honour it did to the simplicity and cordiality of the poet's nature, though not always to the elegance of it. Allan Ramsay knew his friends Gay and Somerville as well in their writings, as he did when he came to be personally acquainted with them; but Allan who had bustled up from a barber's shop into a bookseller's, was "a cunning shaver," and nobody would have guessed the author of "The Gentle Shepherd" to be penurious. Let none suppose that any insinuation to that effect is intended against Mr. Campbell. He is one of the few men whom I could at any time walk half-a-dozen miles through the snow to spend an afternoon with; and I could no more do this with a penurious man, than I could with a sulky one. I know of but one fault he has, besides an extreme cautiousness in his writings; and that one is national, a matter of words, and amply overpaid by a stream of conversation, lively, piquant, and liberal, not the less interesting for occasionally an intimacy with pain, and for a high and somewhat strained tone of voice, like a man speaking with suspended breath, and in the habit of subduing his feelings. No man, I should guess, feels more kindly towards his fellow-creatures, or takes less credit for it. When he indulges in doubt and sarcasm, and speaks contemptuously of things in general, he does it, partly, no doubt, out of actual dissatisfaction, but more perhaps than he suspects, out of a fear of being thought weak and sensitive; which is a blind that the best men very commonly practise. Mr. Campbell professes to be hopeless and sarcastic, and takes pains all the while to set up an university.

MR. CANNING AND HIS SERVANT.

When at college, he was attended by a very faithful servant, who, like all surrounding his patron, became much attached to him. Francis, for such was his name, was always distinguished for his blunt honesty, and his familiarity with his master. During Mr. Canning's early political career, Francis continued to live with him. Mr. Canning, whose love of fun was innate, used sometimes to play off his servants bluntness upon his right honourable friends. One of these, whose honours did not sit so easily upon him as upon the late premier, had forgotten Francis, though often indebted to his kind offices at Oxford. Francis complained to Mr. Canning that Mr. W. did not speak to him. "Pooh," said Mr. Canning, "it is all your fault; you should speak first; he thinks you proud. He dines here to-day—go up to him in the drawing-room, and congratulate him upon the post he has just got." Francis was obedient. Surrounded by a splendid ministerial circle, Francis advanced to the astonished statesman, with "How d'ye do, Mr. W. I hope you're very well—I wish you joy of your luck, and hope your place will turn out a good thing." The roar was of course universal. The same Francis afterwards obtained a comfortable birth in the customs through his kind master's interest. He was a staunch Tory. During the queen's trial he met Mr. Canning in the street. "Well, Francis, how are you?" said the statesman, who had just resigned his office, holding out his hand. "It is not well, Mr. Canning," replied Francis, refusing the pledge of friendship; "it is not well, Mr. Canning, that you should say anything in favour of that —." "But, Francis, political differences should not separate old friends—give me your hand." The sturdy politician at length consented to honour the ex-minister with a shake of forgiveness. It is said that Mr. Canning did not forget Francis when he returned to power.

MANNERS AND CUSTOMS.

SINGULAR CUSTOM AT ROUEN.

The chapter of Rouen, (which consists of the archbishop, a dean, fifty canons, and ten perpendaries,) have, ever since the year 1156, enjoyed the annual privilege of pardoning, on Ascension day, some individual confined within the jurisdiction of the city for murder.

On the morning of the Ascension-day, the chapter having heard many examinations and confessions read, proceed to the election of the criminal who is to be pardoned; and, the choice being made, his name is transmitted in writing to the parliament, which assemble on that day at the palace. The parliament then walk in procession to the great chamber, where the prisoner is brought before them in irons, and placed on a stool; he is informed that the choice has fallen upon him, and that he is entitled to the privilege of St. Romain. After this form, he is delivered into the hands of the chaplain, who, accompanied by fifty armed men, conveys him to a chamber, where the chains are taken from his legs and bound about his arms; and in this condition he is conducted to a place named the Old Tower, where he awaits the coming of the procession. After some little time has elapsed, the procession sets out from the cathedral; two of the canons bear the shrine in which the relics of St. Romain are presumed to be preserved. When they have arrived at the Old Tower, the shrine is placed in the chapel, opposite to the criminal, who appears kneeling, with the chains on his arms. Then one of the canons, having made him repeat the confession, says the prayers usual at the time of giving absolution; after which service, the prisoner kneeling still, lifts up the shrine three times, amid the acclamations of the people assembled to behold the ceremony. The procession then returns to the cathedral; followed by the criminal, wearing a chaplet of flowers on his head, and carrying the shrine of the saint. After mass has been performed he has a very serious exhortation addressed to him by a monk; and, lastly, he is conducted to an apartment near the cathedral, and is supplied with refreshments and a bed for that night. In the morning he is dismissed.

THE TRAVELLER.

LEOPARD-HUNTING

The leopard of Southern Africa is known among the Cape colonists by the name of Tiger; but is, in fact, the real leopard, the Felis jubata of naturalists, well known for the beauty of its shape and spotted skin, and the treachery and fierceness of its disposition. The animal called leopard (luipaard) by the Cape Dutch boors, is a species of the panther, and is inferior to the real leopard in size and beauty. Both of them are dreaded in the mountainous districts on account of the ravages which they occasionally commit among the flocks, and on the young cattle and horses in the breeding season.

The South African panther is a cowardly animal, and, like the hyena, flies from the face of man. The leopard also, though his low, half-smothered growl is frequently heard by night, as he prowls like an evil spirit around the cottage or the kraal, will seldom or never attack mankind, (children excepted,) unless previously assailed or exasperated. When hunted, as he usually is with dogs, he instinctively betakes himself to a tree, when he falls an easy prey to the shot of the huntsmen. The leopard, however, though far inferior in strength and intrepidity to the lion, is yet an exceedingly active and furious animal; and when driven to extremity, proves himself occasionally an antagonist not to be trifled with. The colonists relate many instances of arduous and even fatal encounters with the hunted leopard. The following is one of these adventures, which occurred in a frontier district in 1822, as described by one of the two individuals so perilously engaged in it.

Two boors returning from hunting the Hartebeest, (antelope bubalis) fell in with a leopard in a mountain ravine, and immediately gave chase to him. The animal at first endeavoured to escape by clambering up a precipice; but being hotly pressed, and slightly wounded by a musket-ball, he turned upon his pursuers with that frantic ferocity which on such emergencies he frequently displays, and springing upon the man who had fired at him, tore him from his horse to the ground, biting him at the same time very severely in the shoulder, and tearing his face and arms with his talons. The other hunter, seeing the danger of his comrade, (he was, if I mistake not, his brother,) sprung from his horse, and attempted to shoot the leopard through the head; but, whether owing to trepidation, or the fear of wounding his friend, or the sudden motions of the animal, he unfortunately missed.

The leopard abandoning his prostrate enemy, darted with redoubled fury upon this second antagonist; and so fierce and sudden was his onset, that before the boor could stab him with his hunting-knife, he had struck him in the eyes with his claws and torn the scalp over his forehead. In this frightful condition the hunter grappled with the raging beast, and struggling for life, they rolled together down a steep declivity. All this passed so rapidly, that the other boor had scarcely time to recover from the confusion in which his feline foe had left him, to seize his gun, and rush forward to aid his comrade, when he beheld them rolling together down the steep bank in mortal conflict. In a few moments he was at the bottom with them, but too late to save the life of his friend. The leopard had torn open the jugular vein, and so dreadfully mangled the throat of the unfortunate man, that his death was inevitable; and his comrade had only the melancholy satisfaction of completing the destruction of the savage beast, already exhausted with several deep wounds in the breast from the desperate knife of the expiring huntsman.

THE LEGENDARY.

We extract the following legend from a late London Weekly Review, our regular files of which, to a late date, were brought by the Napoleon packet ship, which arrived at New-York on Monday evening last. We shall continue to receive regularly several of the most excellent European publications; and by this means, and a liberal attention to American productions, we shall be able to give this department of our journal both novelty and interest.

THE SPRING-ROOT.

A LEGEND OF RUBEZAHIL.

Rubezahl has his own vegetable garden in the mountain; it is shown upon the declivity of the Aupengrund. The mountain is rich in excellent herbs, which have been employed, from very ancient times, in the preparation of costly essences. Even at this day the inhabitants of Krumhubel gain their livelihood by the preparation of those essences from the herbs which grow in those parts—an art that they may probably have derived from the pupils of the once-celebrated school of Paracelsus at Prague, who were driven by the wars of the Hussites into the more secluded parts of the country; whence it is possible the people of Krumhubel may yet be in possession of many curious and valuable traditions. Among these herbs there is one which has become peculiarly celebrated in legendary lore; it is called the Spring-root, and is found only in Rubezahl's garden. This root is of the most costly species, and possesses virtues to heal the most obstinate and inveterate diseases. But it serves besides as a nourishment to the spirits themselves, and Rubezahl allows none but his particular favourites to gather it.

A lady of high birth once lay dangerously ill at Liegnitz, and promised a peasant from the high mountain a great reward if he could procure her the Spring-root from Rubezahl's garden. Allured by her tempting promises he undertook the task. When he reached the lonely desert country where the garden lies, he seized his spade, and began to dig up the Spring-root, which was not unknown to him. Whilst he was yet stooping at his labour the wind began to howl from one quarter, and he heard loud thundering words which he could not understand. He started up in alarm, in order to satisfy himself whence it came, but he was not able to stand upright against the rush of the wind. He perceived, however, upon the extreme edge of a projecting cliff, a tall gigantic form; a long beard descended over his breast, and a large crooked nose disfigured his countenance. The figure looked upon him with fearfully glowing eyes; his streaming locks, and a large white cloak which he wore, waved in the storm, and in his hand he bore a large knotted club. "What are you doing there?" screamed the apparition to him, and the rough voice was scarcely distinguishable from the howling of the storm. The peasant though a very bold man, was overcome by the terror which now seized him, and replied: "I am seeking the Spring-root for a sick lady, who has promised to pay me well for it." "What you have got you may keep; but return again, and"—screamed the figure; and brandishing his club with threatening gestures, he vanished.

The peasant went down from the mountain, lost in deep thought, and the lady at Liegnitz considered herself extremely fortunate in getting the possession of the potent root to soothe her pains. Her illness visibly diminished, and as she could only expect her complete recovery from the continued use of the root, she desired that the peasant might be again brought into her presence. "Would you venture once more to fetch me the Spring-root?" inquired the lady. "My good lady," answered the peasant, "the first time the Lord of the mountain appeared to me in fearful form, and threatened me so seriously that I dare not venture a second time." But the lady conquered his fear by dint of liberal promises: she offered him a much larger sum than the first time; and the peasant no longer able to withstand the temptation, ventured once again to take a solitary journey into the most inmost recesses of the mountain.

As soon as he began to dig the root there arose a fearful storm in the same quarter as before, and when he looked towards it he beheld the same figure menacing him in a still more threatening posture; the long hair and wide mantle of the spirit seemed to stream on the wind towards him—fire shone in his eyes—the frightful voice, which again screamed "what are you doing!" re-echoed from the barren rocks, and seemed to be shouted with redoubled violence from the hidden abyss. When the peasant again answered: "I seek the spring-root; a sick lady has promised to reward me well for it,"—the wrathful spirit roared out: "Have I not warned you, you madman! And you dare to come back again? But you have it already; so save yourself if you can!" The lightnings of his eyes seemed to strike upon the fainting peasant, and to scorch his countenance;—his mighty club whirled through the air and sunk close beside him deep into a solid rock—the ground trembled—a loud thunder-clap benumbed his senses and he sank down unconscious upon the turf. On recovering from his trance, he felt as if every bone in his body was broken: the club had disappeared, thunder rolled in the distance, and he thought that he could distinguish the threatening voice amid its roar; but the Spring-root remained in his hand, and so he crept about drenched by the rain, surrounded by the thick fog, attacked by flitting spirits hither and thither, the whole night and the following day, without knowing where he was; till a charcoal-burner found him half-starved, and took him to his hut. Here he recovered, and then hastened to Liegnitz.

The lady was delighted when he again stood before her with the Spring-root, and gave him so great a reward that he forgot all his misfortunes and joyfully hastened home. Some time elapsed and the lady seemed almost well, but still she had not thoroughly recovered: "If I could get the Spring-root once more, I feel I could be quite well," she said. So she sent again to the peasant, who refused to go to her; but it was as if he was urged by an evil spirit against his will, and he at last yielded. "Here I am again, lady," said the peasant, "what do you wish of me? I hope it is not to go again for the Spring-root? heaven preserve me from that! The last time I scarcely escaped with my life. I yet shudder when I think of it." Here the lady began to embrace him, and promised him a whole rich farm and great treasures with it, and so dazzled the poor man's imagination, that he resolved to brave all danger and endeavour to steal a third time the Spring-root from the enchanted garden, though he should perish in the attempt. "Hitherto," said the peasant, "the Lord of the mountain has only threatened me; and this shall be the last time, for then I am a rich man and can spend my life in glory and joy."

The peasant dared not go alone this time to the mountain. "Dear boy," said he to his eldest son, who was now beyond childhood, "we shall go to the chapel upon the mountain: you shall accompany me. They proceeded together till the ravines became more and more narrow, and the rocks more rugged and barren. As they passed along the margin of the lakes eternally overshadowed by the steep rocks, the father became silent and thoughtful, and deep horror fell upon his inmost soul; his eyes gleamed so wildly that his son shuddered to look upon them. "What ails you, father?" said he at last; but the father did not answer him, and gazed in silence on the ground. Then they ascended higher and higher up the mountain, till they drew near the garden, when the father thus addressed his son: "Evil spirits have beguiled thy father from his earliest years. I have cared only for riches, and have remained a stranger to the fear of God and of religion. I have led a wild and couchless life, and never set before you a good example. Now Hell calls me, and I must purloin the Spring-root from the Lord of the mountain, for which he will tear me to pieces." At this the son wept sore, and said: "Father, leave it, and turn back with me; heaven is merciful." But in the distraction of despair, the father had already seized the spade and begun to dig. Then arose a fearful hurricane,—a water-spout rushed down and flooded all the brooks into wild torrents—a moaning, heart-wringing lament seemed to rise up from the roots of the garden—all the elements mingled wildly with one another—yawning cliffs opened around, and from above a huge figure, itself like a mountain, descended with a gigantic club, seized the peasant, and flew up with him to the height; then a large rock fell down and shivered into a thousand pieces. The son heard the moaning of his father, farther and still farther in the distance, and for a long time lay on the ground in deep stupor; at last the hurricane ceased to war, the sky cleared up, and the forsaken son, full of terror, sought the mountain-chapel to recommend himself to God's mercy and protection. At the same hour the lady at Liegnitz, who seemed almost recovered, died suddenly.

BIOGRAPHY.

The following biographical sketch of Kotzebue is from the Washington City Chronicle. It was translated from the French by a young lady, the same who produced the sketch of the life of Sand, and some other biographical notices, extracted from the Chronicle and published in the last volume of the Record.

SKETCH OF THE LIFE OF KOTZEBUE.

Augustus Frederick Ferdinand Von Kotzebue, was born on the 3d of May, in the year 1761, at Weimer, where his father was Counsellor of Legation. His poetical disposition was manifested at the age of six years. He commenced his education at the Gymnasium of his native city, which he completed in the academies of Duisbourg and Gena. He was particularly distinguished in the study of law, and it was believed he would make choice of that profession; but it proved otherwise. Kotzebue was a man of letters—he wished to be a man of universal literature; and there was not a branch of knowledge in which he did not make some proficiency. He was twenty years of age when the Count de Goertz, a friend of his father's, and then Minister of Prussia, called him to St. Petersburg. Kotzebue went to this capital, in the capacity of secretary of Gen. M. de Bauer, a man of genius. This General recommended his secretary to the Empress, who eagerly accomplished the last wish of an officer who had served her so faithfully. She appointed Kotzebue Titular Counsellor, and placed him in the administration of Revel, where he became, in 1783, Assessor to the First Tribunal, and afterwards President of the Government, a place which he occupied for ten years, with the rank of lieutenant colonel. Having received his dismissal he retired, in the year 1795, to a little estate which he possessed, about 48 miles from Narva, and which belonged to his wife, (he married in Russia.) In this retreat he devoted himself entirely to dramatick literature, and it was to that that he particularly owed his reputation. In finishing his studies at Gena, he composed, for a society, a piece which obtained great success. From that time he felt his vocation, and he had represented at St. Petersburg several dramatick pieces, which contributed to procure him the kindness of the Empress. Being called, in 1792, to the management of the Theatre of Vienna, Kotzebue quitted Russia, for that city; but he very soon resigned the place, and returned to Weimer. He remained three years in his country, when, strongly solicited by his wife to return to Russia, he yielded to her entreaties, and departed for St. Petersburg, where he had left his two sons, who had been elevated to the corps of the Russian Cadets. Scarcely had he arrived upon the frontiers of the empire when he was arrested, by order of Paul 1st, who suspected him of being the author of some revolutionary pamphlets in which he was personally attacked. Kotzebue was banished to Kurgan, in Siberia. In his work entitled "The Most Remarkable Year of my Life," he gives an account of his journey, of the cruelty of the officers who conducted him to the place of his exile, of the vain attempts which he made to escape, of the numerous dangers which he encountered, and of the various kinds of privations which he had to suffer. It is thought that the active imagination of the dramatist has added much to the real events which he relates. Whatever it may be, one can not resist the interest which it contains. He also relates that Paul 1st, having recalled him, received him very kindly, and made many excuses for his conduct, and conferred upon him the management of the Theatre of St. Petersburg, an employment which he shortly resigned. The desire of again seeing his family and country induced him to ask his dismission, which was not accepted until after the death of Paul 1st. On the 29th April, 1801, Kotzebue departed from St. Petersburg, and arrived very soon after at Weimer. Having had in this city some quarrels with Goethe and the brothers, Schlegel, he went to Paris, where the most distinguished literary men, and the best societies, eagerly received him. He returned their kindness by a base ingratitude. In his work published under the title of "My Recollections of Paris,"—a work filled with false sentences and bold anecdotes he outraged and calumniated the men who had opened their doors to him and admitted him to their friendship. The injustice with which he treated the Italians, in his Recollections of Rome and of Naples, is not less revolting. Towards the end of the year 1803, Kotzebue undertook, in concert with M. Merkel, a Journal entitled The Sincere, (Der Freymuthige), in which Napoleon was attacked with great virulence. Until the year 1813, Kotzebue consecrated by turns his time to literary and political matters; and they attribute to him a number of proclamations and diplomatic pieces which smacked of the cabinet of St. Petersburg. He followed the Czar in the campaign of 1813, as the political writer of the army; was afterwards appointed Consul General of Russia, at Koenigsberg, and called to St. Petersburg in 1816, to be attached to Foreign Affairs. In 1817 the Emperor authorized him to return to his country, and appointed him his literary correspondent in Germany, with a salary of 15,000 rubles, and charged him to render an account of the public spirit of that country. The correspondence of Kotzebue was but a tissue of calumnies and defamations against the Germans who professed liberal ideas, and who were the most illustrious writers of Germany. He tried to disguise their doctrines and to pervert their ideas. Chance having exposed to the publick these bulletins, a general outcry was raised against the insidious servilities of their author. The students of the universities, who had combatted with such noble devotion foreign oppression, were, above all, grossly insulted in these reports of the German writer, now become the enemy of national glory. One of them went to Mannheim, the city in which Kotzebue lived for some time, asked to speak with him, and having been introduced into his cabinet, struck him three blows with his poignard. (See the Biography of Sand.) Kotzebue died immediately, and was interred the next day. He left fourteen children, one of whom was a captain of a vessel in the service of Russia, and enjoyed an honourable reputation. As a dramatick author, Kotzebue has some imagination, and a great knowledge of stage effect; he disposes his situations with art, and knows how to obtain happy results, which spring principally from the opposition of characters. He has given nearly 3000 pieces to the theatre; but all was not the fruit of his invention. It is known that he borrowed a great part of them from the students, and only re-touched them. Besides, Kotzebue, who has sometimes been translated, has often translated from others. Among his pieces there are many which are imitated from the French authors; such, among others, as The Man of Forty Years, a title under which he disguised the Pupil of Fagan; and the Little City of Germany, taken from the Little City of M. Picard. His greatest works are his own. Gustavus Vasa, The Hussites, Octavia, The Priestess of the Sun, the Spaniards in Peru, Hugo Grotius, in all propriety belong to him, as well as the Two Brothers, and Misanthropy and Repentance, dramas, both of which have been naturalized upon our stage. Kotzebue did not devote himself entirely to dramatick literature; he has composed many romances, among others, that entitled "The Misfortunes of the Family of Orthenberg." He wished also to be an historian, and published the History of Ancient Prussia, and the History of the German Empire; but these two works which he impressed with the most revolting partiality, have fallen into discredit. His judgments upon works of art were often as false as those which he made upon men. The character of Kotzebue is stained with many capital faults, as presumption, envy, and cupidity; and these, unfortunately for him, too much influenced his writings. Kotzebue was, above all, a libeller. He made, under an anonymous mask, a war against the most distinguished literary men of Germany. Goethe, whose superiority vexed him, was the object of his bitterest criticism. In spite of the sharpness and injustice of the judgments with which they were filled, the journals which he directed did not become fashionable, and received nothing but dishonour. The prejudices against Kotzebue became so strong in time, that men attributed mean and improper motives to his most honourable actions. Thus, when he wrote in the Bee, and the Journal of the People, in favour of the independence of his country—when he excited the people of Germany to throw off the yoke which France had imposed upon them, they accused him of writing for the interest of the princes who employed and paid him. He was unceasingly in opposition to his own principles. In preaching up independence and equality at the theatre, he wrote secretly in favour of tyranny and servitude. The kings were not ungrateful to this writer. The indignation produced by the perfidious apostacy of Kotzebue, was, in most minds, turned into contempt, but in that of Sand it became fury, and his baseness was punished with assassination.

MISCELLANY.

The following article from The Yankee and Boston Literary Gazette, of last week, should, perhaps, be styled a criticism, though it be not excessively ill-natured. The author will not lack occupation if he render equal justice to all modern jokes and sentiment. As somebody has observed, in substance, a very good memory is a dangerous article.

JOE-JOE-JOE.

One would suppose Joe Miller to be the text book of a great majority of our newspaper-makers. Every day in the year, if you read much, you will meet with some forty-thousand-times repeated, and as many times altered, and newly located joke of poor Joe Miller—a man, by the way, who never made a joke in his life, and who for that very reason—(as the best of all possible jokes) was pitched upon to father a volume or two as ancient as our earth, at a time when he lived at the corner of St. Paul's churchyard, looked as if he had been hereditary grave digger for nobody knows how many ages, and was notorious for never having either uttered or understood a thing to be laughed at, in all his life.

Every body has heard of the slapsm slingum story about a country squire; of poor Goldsmith's miscarriage about green peas; and peradventure of that—the best of all, where a man with the same view, wishing to serve up an old joke for a new one, put his foot in it, as we say here, by mistaking nevertheless for notwithstanding—that was all. They who have watched this old story through all its countless varieties, are ready to enjoy the following, extracted from a late newspaper, and they who have not, may abide a moment while I seek to preface them with a preliminary hint or two.

The slapsm slingum story was the original. A footman entering a room with a plate, on which was laid a bullock's tongue tripped and fell forward in such a way that the tongue slipped off the plate upon the floor. Being sharply reproved, he begged pardon—saying, it was no error of the mind, but a mere lapsus lingue—(a slip o' the tongue). A boisterous laugh succeeded, in which a country squire, who understood nothing of the cause, beyond what he saw—the slipping of the meat on the floor—joined with all his might and main. Afterwards, being about to have a large company at his own house, he determined to play off the same joke as a part of the entertainment, and did so, after all, in such a way, that the footman, who had been rehearsing for a week, brought into the room instead of a tongue, a joint of meat, and when he was reproved by the squire, who was ready to burst with laughter, begged pardon, saying, it was not an error of the mind, but a mere slapsm slingum.

This, to be sure, was a good story: but then, as it was not generally known, there was no great danger in playing it off anew. And so, certain of the waggish fellows who associated with Oliver Goldsmith, gave it a new shape, "a local habitation and a name," and fathered it upon him, with such gravity, that, up to this hour, it passes for an historical truth. Such was the green pea story alluded to above. It ran thus: Poor Goldsmith was represented at a table where green peas were served. They were somewhat yellow. Why do you not send them to Kensington? said a neighbour. And why to Kensington? said the host. Why—that's the way to Turnham-green, (Turn'em green) was the reply. Goldsmith, who never saw a joke in all his life—almost wept with vexation* when this was explained to him, and saying that he would give the world to have been the author of it, persuaded his friends to assist him in letting it off at his own table, for a pop of his own. They did their best, to be sure—but when it came to poor Goldsmith's turn to play into the catastrophe, instead of saying, why that's the way to Turnham-green, he cried out—why that's the way to Brentford! and then fell back into his chair convulsed with laughter.

But such a story was too good to stop here. Version after version succeeded—page after page of authentick narrative was loaded with it—and at last we had it in the following shape. A man going home late, saw somebody lying in the gutter. He went up to him. How came you here, said he. The poor wretch opened his eyes with a hiccup—leered at the other for a moment, and replied, not-with-standing. Whereat the other, being delighted with the drollery of the idea, determined to do it for himself on the first fair opportunity. Not long after, he supped out—retired early, and watching the moment when his companions drew near, lay down in the gutter, and when they lifted him up, and said to him—How came you here? answered—never-the-less!

There—that is enough to show how a story will shift character as it journeys about our earth. A hundred, yea, ten thousand others might be given; but seldom or never do you meet with one, where a good thing is so utterly and irretrievably ruined by the transmutation, as the following. It has travelled the rounds of our newspapers.

ANECDOTE.

The Devil outwitted. A person, we are told, lately went to a dealer in wool to purchase about twenty pounds of that article, carrying, as is usual, a sack to put it in. When the sack was filled, the steel-yards were not at hand to weigh it. The dealer immediately went in pursuit of them. While he was gone, his customer looked with an evil eye upon a lot of fine cheese in the same room with the wool, and hastily put one of the finest, weighing nearly twenty pounds, in his sack, mixing it up with the wool, as the expression was, supposing he had obtained a valuable prize. On his return, the dealer quickly perceived by the weight of the sack that his honest friend had put a cheese there. He said nothing, but quietly weighed it. His customer said nothing, and as quietly paid him fifty cents a pound for his cheese, under the denomination of wool.

A much better heading for the above story would be, How to spoil a Joke. Where is the pith of it? Would any thief be such a fool as to put the cheese into the bag before it was weighed—while the shopkeeper was gone for the steel-yards? In Portsmouth, New-Hampshire, they tell the story, and in this way, of a Mr. Sheafe.

A man had bought a quantity of wool of Mr. S. at a time when it was very high. It had been weighed and paid for, and Mr. S. had gone to the desk to get change for a note. Happening to turn his head while there, he saw in a glass that hung so as to protect the shop, a stout arm reach up and take from the shelf a heavy white oak cheese. Instead of appearing suddenly and rebuking the man for his theft, as another would, thereby losing his custom forever, the crafty old gentleman gave the thief his change as if nothing had happened, and then, under pretence of lifting the bag to lay it on a horse for him, took hold of it; on doing so, it appeared heavier than he expected, and so—said he, why bless me, I must have reckoned the weight wrong. Oh, no, said the other—Oh no: you may be sure o' that, for I counted them with you. Well, well; we wont dispute about the matter—it's easily trying: and so he put the bag into the scale again. There! said he, I told you so!—knew I was right—made a mistake of nearly twenty pounds; however, if you don't want the whole, you needn't have it: I'll take a part of it out. No, no, said the other—staying Mr. S. on his way to the strings of the bag. No, no, I rather guess I'll take the whole. And this he did, paying for skim milk cheese, or trap-rock at the price of wool. So much for that story. Now for another, which is going the rounds of all our papers, and which has been told of a score of individuals by name, within the last five or six years. The other day it was Lord Palmerston—a little before it was a member of parliament who had retired from service abroad. Edmund Burke was the sufferer when the story was new—then Edmund Burke—now Mr. O'Connell.

*You remember—I hope you do, reader—the story about Goldsmith's envy of the ape, and about his tumbling over the chairs and tables, in the spirit of sheer rivalry, on hearing the ape over-praised for similar feats.

O'Connell. Lord B. who sports a ferocious pair of whiskers, meeting Mr. O'Connell in Dublin, the latter said, "When do you mean to place your whiskers on the peace establishment?" "When you place your tongue on the civil list:" was the witty rejoinder.

On the whole, that is one of the oldest Joes extant. You will find it in the first edition, page 4—1693. JOHN NEAL.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, JANUARY 31, 1829.

✂—The paper upon which the Record is printed this week is of a browner colour and a coarser quality than we intended to use. We were not able to procure a better kind for the present number, but have hopes that we shall receive a supply in season for our next.

OURSELVES. To-day we enter upon the duties of another year. It is not necessary that we should renew the explanations heretofore given, of the course intended to be pursued. Our readers are acquainted with us, and we do not like to ask for an increase of their good will towards us, upon the credit of promises. Our general plan will be continued, though we have deemed it best to attempt improvement in some particulars. It will be our aim to combine instruction with amusement; and as we have not thus far been unsuccessful, we doubt not that our future course will be worthy of a fair support.

With respect to certain events growing out of what is commonly called the Morgan Affair, we do not anticipate a year of peace. Prudence has seemed to dictate hitherto, that the subterfuge and calumnies of our enemies should take their course and wreak their pitiful vengeance un molested. But forbearance is no longer a virtue; and however reluctant we may be to contend with men who are destitute of every fair and honourable feeling—with those who make patriotism a jest, religion a by-word, and honesty the butt of ridicule—it has become our duty, as we love truth and respect justice, to speak plainly and fearlessly.

We have made a trifling alteration in our terms. Those who were subscribers for the Record last year, shall receive the paper at the former prices. The terms to others will be, if they receive their papers by the mails, $2.50 in advance, or $3, payable ninety days after the commencement of the volume. To city subscribers, $3 a year. All subscriptions for less than a year must be paid for in advance.

REVOLUTION IN MEXICO. A revolt has taken place in the city of Mexico, which has succeeded so far as to displace Pedrazza, the president recently elected, and it is said, by the people, and place general Guerrero in the executive chair. This is what was predicted before the result of the election was known in this country, and the accounts of the affair leave us little room to believe it will end here. It is impossible to judge whether the revolt will in the end be favourable to the cause of liberty. Pedrazza is said to be the candidate of the old Spanish party; Guerrero is quite popular; and the papers style him "the immortal Guerrero," "the hero of the south," &c. The following particulars of the event are from the Baltimore American; they are contained in a letter from the city of Mexico:

"On the 30th of November, at night, a grito for the usual pretext of expulsion of Spaniards was given, and the regiment of artillery and one or two regiments of militia soldiers. On the first of December an action began in the suburbs, between the revolted and government troops, and night only put a stop to the firing. On the second day, at day break, the fight was renewed, and, after some hot work, the rebels advanced a few squares. All the convent tops were occupied by government. On the third, the rebels lost three or four guns, and were forced back to their old posts. The loss on both sides was about equal—perhaps one or two hundred killed each day. Both sides fought with desperate valour, the action being carried on with cannon in the streets, and with musketry from the convents and house-tops. On the 4th of December, the day was opened by an interchange of messages, and as nothing could be effected by these means, the fighting was renewed with greater violence. At noon, one convent surrendered, through a forged order, purporting to come from the president; (Pedrazza) and the bells being immediately rung, a panic was immediately spread through the government troops. In three hours, the victors (rebels) were in possession of the palace and all the convents, and then the canaille of the town with the victorious soldiers, rushed to the Parian and Portales, and a few other shops, and in two hours, cleared out a property estimated at from three to five millions, and making no distinction between Spaniard and Mexican. The leaders of the insurgents were Garcia, who died of his wounds; Sorata; the three Tolas; two Frenchmen; and another.

Guerrero arrived the third day with fresh troops, and gave an impulse to the action which soon decided the contest. On the fourth and fifth, Guerrero and Zavala took summary measures to stop the pillage, by shooting and cutting down the thieves, and they have since collected much of the property, except what the officers kept for themselves, which would be the chief part. They profess to return the goods to the owners, but as this is impossible, it will go to the officers and troops. They are acting most wisely, and trying to make up the administration nearly as it was before. It consists of the same president and ministers, except Pedrazza; but they cannot get the congress or senate to meet, and the whole affair is still in a state of uncertainty. Their energy and activity, however, can accomplish much. Pedrazza and Filizola, the commander in chief, have left the city with some hundred horse and many officers, and are collecting forces in Puebla. They expect to be joined by Rincon, Calderon, Cortes, Parres, and Maizquiz, who can bring into the field probably 10,000 veterans; and the new government has only two regiments of practiced or disciplined troops. At first was certainly expected an immediate re-action, which would quash the new party, but they seem to be acting with so much prudence and wisdom, that it begins to look doubtful. No doubt some of the states will resist most resolutely, and the country will be divided for a long time; but the usurpers must keep their post in the city and state of Mexico. The conducta is at present safe at Puebla, under Maizquiz, and we believe it will get down safe."

FROM EUROPE. By the ships John Jay and Napoleon, arrived at New-York during the present week, London papers to the 23d, and Liverpool to the 24th have been received. The war in the East is the principal subject of interest. Affairs in that quarter are assuming a character more favourable to the Turks, who have determined to regain Varna, let it cost what it may. The Russians had withdrawn the principal part of their army to the left bank of the Danube. This, [says Bell's Weekly Messenger,] is a woeful termination of the campaign, and an indelible stain upon the reputation of the Russian Generals. The abandonment of Silistria, by a sure consequence, raises the siege of Shumla. The whole province of Bulgaria is thus evacuated, and the Turks are reinstated in their old position in this exhausted district. The Russians, it is said, are not desirous to carry on a winter campaign; but the Turks seem to entertain different sentiments, and snatching under the loss of Varna, are resolved to pursue their late successes to the utmost. Some accounts describe the retreat from Silistria as resembling the retreat of the French from Moscow. Detachments arrive at Jassy in the most forlorn condition, without ammunition, and without baggage.

FRANCE. Accounts had been received of an order of the French government to prohibit the exportation of corn; but it is not known whether the order refers to the whole kingdom, or only to one of those districts into which France is divided for agricultural and commercial purposes. If it should include the whole kingdom, it is evidently a strong indication of alarm concerning the deficiency of the stock of grain. In Paris the price of bread had attained a very high price, namely, a franc, or 10d. sterling, for the 4 lb. loaf; and the government had in consequence brought into consumption a supply of corn from the public granaries, so as to reduce the 4 lb. loaf to 8d. for the poor. About 70,000 individuals, or one-tenth of the population of the capital, were receiving the benefit of this charitable reduction.

PORTUGAL. It is stated in a letter from Lisbon, that nineteen ladies of the nobility have been sent to convents because they were suspected of entertaining sentiment favourable to the Constitutionalists.

ENGLAND. The earl of Liverpool died on the 4th inst. The Liverpool Advertiser states that lord Strangford, who went to Rio Janeiro on a special mission, met with the coldest reception from Don Pedro, who would scarcely see him at all, having previously learned that his object was to prevail on the emperor to resign the crown of Portugal to the usurper Don Miguel. It is said that Don Pedro feels the utmost resentment against his brother.

MORGAN IN SMYRNA. There is more reason to believe than there is to doubt, that the sainted hero of the west, is now snugly quartered in Smyrna—smiling at the gullibility of the good people of the state of New-York. Morgan's arrival in Boston was reported soon after his disappearance from the western part of this state; and it is a fact no longer susceptible of doubt, that there is a person of the name of Morgan, in Smyrna, who arrived at that place from Boston. Whether he arrived at Smyrna two, three, or five years ago, is cavilled at, as a matter of doubt; but his being there is admitted. We have no feeling, nor interest which would induce us to misrepresent any knowledge on this subject which may come into our possession; but it is our firm and honest conviction, that Morgan is still alive, and that those who are goading on "the young lion of the west" are aware of the fact. Their existence as a faction depends upon a denial of it, and upon the encouragement of a belief to the contrary; and they will oppose every attempt to ferret out the villainy which gives them their ephemeral importance. It is a matter of indifference to us whether Morgan be, or be not in Smyrna; if he be not there, he is somewhere among the living, and we shall not easily be cajoled out of our reason so much as to entertain a contrary opinion, until it has something like proof to support it.

The article which appeared in our last from the Boston Courier, has called forth an explanation in the New-York Morning Courier, from which the following paragraph is taken. The writer signs himself an "Officer in the U. S. Navy."

"I was on the station in the early part of eighteen hundred and twenty-seven, and was there well acquainted with the said person—he told me that he was a native of Boston, and had been an inhabitant of Smyrna for nearly five years, which, from Mr. Olney, the American Consul, I found to be true. He came there for the purpose of doing business, but, in consequence of some improper conduct, his property was confiscated: he is now a Renegade, and is supported by the Pacha. That his name is Morgan is true; but that he is the Morgan in question is incorrect."

VERY IMPORTANT!!

The reader is informed that the following is the most particularly important document which has reached us since the arrival of the last Ontario Phenix.

From the New-England Galaxy.

GREAT ANTI-MOUSENICK MEETING,
Held on the Cats-kill Mountains, at the sign of the Mousetrap and Ratsbane.

At a pretty considerable convocation of the most respectable Cats, from the most capacious kitchens, inhabited by more than the most conscientious Cooks in the United States, the following proceedings took place.

Thomas Cat, Esquire, in the chair, who opened the meeting with the following pathetic appeal, (after taking a cup of catnip tea,) which was received with a-clap.

"Most magnani-Mouse Mousers! Toms and Tabbies! Cats and Kittens! I will not say ladies and gentlemen—they are titles of canting courtesy, therefore we will not be ladies and gentlemen—I think it proper to inform you of things which you all know. There has existed, there does exist, and will continue to exist, an existing evil in spite of our teeth, unless they deprive it of existence, an infamously society, composed of Rats and Mice, who lurk in holes and corners—holding secret meetings, in granaries and garrets—to the infamy of many a meritorious Miller, and benevolent biscuit-baker. Each member of this farinaceous fraternity makes his Meal of Flour in the darkness of night, unless the moon happens to shine. The feelings of the sensitive and tender farmer are harrowed up by the dreadful, destructive, devastating depravity of these rogues-in-grain. Many a young and parentless Mite beholds his morsel, perhaps his last, of cheese, torn from his tortuous possession; many a pale and innocently wicked candle-end has been dragged away, never to know the light again. Reflect upon this—if we permit these here wretches to proceed to them—there extremities, there will be a Cat-astrophe! My feline friends, therefore, pause upon it. I see here some patriotically-perfidious and faithfully-traitorous-seceding Rats, who have deserted the ship, which Rat-ifies our notions of its rottenness. The Mouseonick Varment have long been nibbling in their private lodgings; do they want to know my sentiment? We have long since smelt a rat, and I here express the scent-i-meant. If any cat in the presidential contest, has voted for any Rat, that Cat that voted for that Rat shall be considered a Pole-Cat, and deserving of a Cat o' nine tails. A very popular author, whose name I have forgotten, in a celebrated book, which I don't exactly remember, mentions in words which I can't call to mind, an anecdote, which I shall not take up your time by repeating—but we must Mew up this ever-as-long-as-Cats-lap-cream-to-be-execrated, and never-enough while rats-wear-tails-to-be-execrated association—to which end we must devote our talons and our Jaw, for

"Rats and mice and such small gear,
Have been Tom's food for many a year."

Resolved, that we look with superlative, supercilious, and superfluous horror on all secret societies and nightly meetings, however necessary, and with whatever privileges; and consider them offensive nuisances, and injurious to the Constitution.

Resolved, that we consider rat-traps and mouse-traps, whether of wire or wood, to be a violation of our rights, and any recanting Rat, that has been unwarily caught in their toils, we recommend to absolve himself from all connexion with them—and beware of the Abbey of La Trappe.

Resolved, that as the Mouseonicks have let the Cat out of the bag, and their crafty gripes and sighs are now known, we will disinterestedly offer up eight of our nine lives to—share their secret treasures.

Resolved, that all titles are all fudges; we will have no designation but Squire, and no degree but A. S. S.

Resolved, that as we suspect it has been suggested, in a complication of conjectures, that the ~~surmised~~ intentions of such institutions, are evidently enveloped in revealed secrecy, imperceptible palpability, and taciturn loquacity; Therefore, our decision is to hesitate, whether the Cat's-kill mountain will bring forth more than a Mouse.

Resolved, that all our anticipations shall be for the future, and our retrospections for the past; and that we have no doubt but that redoubtable Rat, Corporal Rat-tan, has been hanged, drawn, and quartered, devoured and digested by a conclave

"Of the cannibals, who each other eat."

Resolved, that, as each Rat is a resolver, we resolutely resolve to fix our resolution not to render inseparable resolves resolvable by common sense.

THOMAS CAT, Esquire, Chairman.

PUSSY PURBLIND,
KIT TORTOISESHELL, } Scratchetaries.
GRIZZY GRIMALKIN. }

ITEMS. On Tuesday, Silas Wright, jr. of St. Lawrence county, one of the representatives in congress from the 30th district, was chosen by the legislature, comptroller of this state, in the place of William L. Marcy, appointed judge of the supreme court. At the same time, Greene C. Bronson, of Oneida county, was chosen attorney-general of this state, in the place of S. A. Talcott, resigned.—An Alabama editor begs Pennsylvania to spare one of her thirty candidates for Governor to the state of Alabama. Why did he not apply to New-York? We had a couple that we did not use. Suppose we send Solomon Southwick? The Genesee Register, in allusion to the 16 or 17 anti-masonick voters for the Speaker, calls them their "little Spartan band." Of course, Thurlow Weed's whiskers will be the pass of Thermopylae.—Noah.—Not so fast, Major.—Thurlow does not wear whiskers—he shaves 'em.—A country editor says, "Do, for heaven's sake, divide the state of New-York, and call the west part the State of Morgan." "Call it," says the Ithaca Journal, "the State of Sin and Misery." "No," said a crusty old bachelor, "call it the State of Matrimony, and that includes sin, misery and Morganism." Such a barbarian as this bachelor ought to be driven out of all society.—Noah.—"The Sun," an anti-masonick paper in Salem, Washington county, has sunk below the political horizon—has set.

Contents of the Western Monthly Review No. 7, for December:—Thoughts on the Establishment of a National University (continued); Life. REVIEW of Sismondi's Political Economy (concluded); Chapman's Sermons on the Church; Wood on Intellectual and Moral Culture; Bascom's Inaugural Address; Brazel's Sermon on Christian Unity. Notice of Transylvania Journal of Medicine; Florida Lexingtonian. Southern Review, No IV.—Aboriginal Americans; American Naval History; Life of Ledyard; Views of Nature; Novels.

Contents of the Western Journal of the Medical and Physical Sciences, No. 9, for December:—Essays and Cases—A History of the Malignant Intermittent Billious Fever, which prevailed in and about Indianapolis, the capital of the state of Indiana, in the summer and autumn of 1821; By Dr. Samuel Grant Mitchell. A fatal case of rupture of the bladder, from Urinary Calculi, in an Ox; By Dr. John Cook Bennett. An account of the production of Epilepsy from protracted bathing in a pond; By H. George Doyle, M. D. Remarks by the editor. REVIEWS. Lectures on Anatomy, Surgery, and Pathology; including observations on the nature and treatment of Local Diseases; delivered at St. Bartholomew's Hospital; By John Abernethy, F. R. S.

EPISCOPAL CHURCH. The number of Ministers in the Episcopal Church in the United States is 508, viz: in Maine 5. New Hampshire 8, Massachusetts 29, Vermont 7, Rhode Island 7, Connecticut 56, New-York 122, New Jersey 16, Pennsylvania 70, Delaware 6, Maryland 55, Virginia 47, North Carolina 10, South Carolina 35, Georgia 3, Ohio 14, Mississippi 5, Kentucky 3, Tennessee 2, Missouri, &c. 6.

There are thirteen Diocese and ten Bishops, and one vacancy in the Diocese of Maryland. The Right Rev. and venerable William White, D. D. of Pennsylvania, is President of the House of Bishops, and was consecrated Feb. 4, 1787, in England, by the Archbishop of Canterbury. Nearly one hundred candidates are about to be admitted to Holy Orders. Beside the numerous Missions in progress in the United States, the American Episcopal Church has recently sent one Missionary to Africa, and one to Greece. N. E. Palladium.

VARIETIES.

From Foreign Journals, received at this office.

Diamond of the Mountain. On the Wangleon mountain there is an old tree called the "Diamond of the Mountain," which is really a jewel to the traveller of those wild districts. It is torn up from its root, and the hollow trunk is always found filled with water. As soon as it is emptied, it gradually fills again, to the quantity of about half a hog-head. A traveller conjectures that this phenomenon may be caused by the dripping of water from the trees.

Chinese Epicurism. Dogs are fatted and eaten in China, as a delicious food, and are always found at the tables of the great. A Chinese author relates the following as an instance of prejudice:—"A man by night is helped to the flesh of an ape, and being told it is the flesh of a dog, thinks it good; next morning he is informed what he hath eaten, and falls a vomiting."

Attic Stories.—The Chinese have an abhorrence of lofty houses. Some of the Missionaries, on showing the model of an European house, several stories high, to the Emperor Kang-hi, were asked by that prince, whether in Europe they were straitened for room below, that they were forced thus to take up their lodgings in the air. In the elegiac verses addressed to the Emperor Tai-kang, by his five brothers, upon his being dethroned for his vices, they reproach him among other crimes, with the erection of lofty houses. The date of these verses, according to Chinese chronology, must have been 2159 years before the Christian era, or 288 years before the call of Abraham.

Beards.—Among the Romans, visits of ceremony were made, when a young man first applied the razor to his beard and the precious produce of the operation was usually enclosed in a small gold or silver box, and dedicated to some divinity, but above all to Jupiter Capitolinus.—The Romans did not commence shaving till the year of the city 454, when P. Tectunius imported a cargo of barbers from Sicily. Scipio Africanus first introduced the practice of shaving daily.

Persons who have once become hypochondriacal from the effects of malaria at Rome, experience the greatest aversion for most kinds of perfume. A nosegay of roses or jasmynes introduced into a room of persons so affected, would throw half the party into fits, and put the remainder to flight; while the smell of very rank plants would be perfectly agreeable. From the extreme fondness of the ancient Romans for delicate perfumes and flowers, we may infer with certainty that the "eternal city" was not, in former times, afflicted with malaria.

ANTI-MASONICK.—Notices are published in the anti-masonic papers for a State Convention, to be held in Albany, on the 19th February next, to be composed of as many delegates from the several counties as they are entitled to Members in the House of Assembly. What is the object of this convention? Is it to devise ways and means to ferret out the murderers of Morgan, and bring them to the punishment they so justly deserve?—No. Is it to procure means to assist the poor widow and orphan children of the murdered Morgan? No. What then? Why, to carry the excitement to the east for political purposes, the better to ensure the future success of your Southwicks, your Weeds, your Millers, and your Fairchilds, who are so nobly fighting this political battle, as Southwick says, "under the banner of JESUS CHRIST, and the TESTAMENT of the ETERNAL GOD!" A religious party in politics we have much to fear, and if Governor Southwick is considered same, we say the above sentence from his pen savors strongly of the intent of anti-masons to form such a party.—Morrisville Observer.

MASONICK CALENDAR.

[Regular meetings in the city of Albany, at the Masonick Hall.]

Temple Encampment, 2d Friday in each month.
Temple Chapter, 2d and 4th Tuesday in each month.
Temple Lodge, 1st and 2d Tuesday in each month.
Mount Vernon Lodge, 1st and 3d Thursday in each month.
Masters Lodge, 1st and 3d Wednesday in each month.

ODD FELLOWS' CALENDAR.

[Regular meetings in the city of Albany.]

Hope Lodge, Monday evening in each week, at Montgomery Hall.
Philanthropic Lodge, Wednesday evening in each week, corner of Lodge and State-streets, over Osborn and Gray's.
Clinton Lodge, Friday evening in each week, Masonick Hall.

DIED.

At New Haven, Conn. on Monday evening of the present week, Dr. NATHAN SMITH, Professor in the Medical Institution of Yale College, and one of the most learned and distinguished physicians in the United States.

We announce with feelings of deep regret, the death of Mrs. HELEN MARIA, wife of JOHN KEYES PAIGE, esq. of this city, and daughter of the Hon. Joseph C. Yates. Mrs. P. expired on Sunday afternoon, after a short illness, aged 31 years. Possessing and exercising all the excellent qualities of her sex, greatly endeared to her family, and adorning the society or which she was a valued member, her loss will be widely and severely felt. To her family and connexions it will be irreparable: To her friends and acquaintance, a source of common regret and sorrow. [Argus.]

THIS PAPER

Is published every Saturday, by E. B. CHILD, At the Corner of North Market and Steuben streets, Albany, N. Y.

TERMS.—To subscribers out of the city, $2.50 in advance, or $3, otherwise, a year.
To city subscribers, $3 a year.

Nov. 8, 1838.

REMOVAL.—ALLISON & WEEB have removed from No. 4 Green-st. to 471 South Market-street, opposite James Gould's Coach Maker's shop, where they intend to carry on the SADDLE, HARNESS AND TRUNK making business, in all its various branches. Military Caps and Horse Equipments made according to order, and on the shortest notice. All orders from the country, thankfully received and promptly attended to. Thankful for past favours, they hope to merit a continuance of the same. 41st

PAINTING AND GLAZING.—The subscriber respectfully informs his friends and the public, that he continues the House and Sign Painting and Glazing, at the old stand, No. 299, corner of North Market and Steuben streets, where he will accommodate the public with any article in his line. Paints in pots mixed ready for use, of the first quality, can be had at any time. Personal attention will be paid to all orders. March 9, 1838. JOHN P. PORTER.

POETRY.

From the New-England Weekly Review.

A poem of great beauty was delivered last week by Mr. P. Benjamin, before the Washington College Parthenon, a Society, of which we learn that we are an honorary member. We have begged the following extract.

MUSING HOURS.

How like a bright and living thing,
Shadowed by Twilight's pensive wing,
Yon lone star gleams! Each crimson fold
Of rich sunset, melts away,
And skies of blue and seas of gold
Are flooded with the glorious ray!
But see! now softly falls the shade,
O'er bower and stream and pleasant glade,
And the sweet lake, that sleeps so still,
Mirrors the brow of yonder hill,
O'er which that star with beaming smile,
Seems fairer, as the requiem sound
Comes through the greenwood's leafy aisle,
While every fairy spot around,
And every vale and forest dim
Are sending forth their Evening hymn.

Oh! have I gazed in boyhood's spring
On this loved scene—the same lone star
In that lake oft its glance would fling,
As if from its blue home afar,
Beneath the clear and flashing waves,
'Twere searching out the coral caves,
To know if gems or ruby's light,
As its own smile were half as bright,
And oft 'twould turn away, and then,
Come sweetly peering forth again.

Star of the Evening! I have seen
Thy beauty with a burning thrill
Of wondrous Love, and I have been
All calm and motionless and still,
While thou wast there in Heaven, so mild,
So beautiful—Oh! man should weep,
To think that e'en a sinless child,
Whose pulses move in breathing sleep,
Ere flies the hour that gives it birth:—
The purest thing that lives on earth,
Is not as pure, as fair as thou,
Celestial gem! that on the brow
Of that uplifted mount will gleam,
Till the lost Pleiad smiles once more.
And, picturing in the sunset beam,
Glow's holier, brighter than before.

Oh! these are in the heart,
That bloom awhile, then droop and die;
But the left seeds will oftentimes start
Up into form again, and try,
If gentler breezes waft their balm,
Now that the storm hath sunk to rest,
And rainbow hues with soothing calm,
Are bending o'er the untroubled breast;—
If sorrow's tread hath passed away,
Like footsteps from the vernal snow,
When in the gush of rosy day,
Bright, living streams of glory flow.
Aye—youth hath grief, and tears must hide
Our diamonds' light, though fancies glide
On stary pinions through the air,
That floats around Day's orient, yet,
The o'erhanging clouds will curtain there,
All darkly as at Life's sunset.

Thou blessed scene! thy look of love,
From the sealed fountains of the soul,
Calls sweetest springs:—Like the pure Dove,
Joyless I've wandered, where the roll
Of waves was heard, but from yon sky,
Glancing beneath the lake's blue eye
So blissfully, thou seem'st to be,
Bright thing! an olive branch for me!

From the New-York Morning Courier.

TURKISH ODE.

OF MESMIL.

Hark! from her rosy shrine
I hear the Bulbul pour her melting note,
And where the almond boughs their blossoms twine,
Wild voices float.
Gather, oh man! the musick of thy heart,
Too soon will life's young loveliness depart.

The grove, the hill,
The bright Sultana of the garden bowers,
And bending there to kiss the crystal rill,
Wild forest flowers;

Paraphrased from a prose translation by Sir W. Jones.

Their gloom may gladden o'er thy cold decline,
Laugh in a loveliness less frail than thine.

A dew drop, bright
As sun-light flashing o'er the scymetar,
Sleeps on the balmy breast of lily light,
A mimic star.
Catch the pure night gem ere it melts away,
Too soon will life's young loveliness decay.

And from the rose,
Bright as on maiden's cheek the crimson bloom,
And from the love that in its freshness flows
But to the tomb—
Gather—oh, gather to thy soul the glee,
Ere its cold nothingness is breathed to thee.

Now, like the lance
That drinks the life-blood from the foeman's heart,
O'er wood and vale the burning sunbeams glance,
And flowrets start.
Quick—to the noontide's golden sorcery,
Laugh, for their loveliness but fades from thee.

And now—no more
The grove is gathered in its icy gloom,
Spring breezes wake along the balmy shore,
And pierce the tomb.
Soft in each passionate breath, young Hours sigh,
Sip the deep murmur ere its odours die.

And when the gay
Fling to the golden dome the shout again,
When merry wine-cups steal the soul away,
Oh, turn thee then—
Turn to the bright spring of thy spirit's faith,
Soon life's young loveliness is cold in death.

Heard ye the war,
When winter flung her terrors to the strife?
Then came a mighty monarch from afar,
His step was life.
He robed the red rose in its matin mirth;
Laugh, ere young loveliness has passed from earth.

And oft this strain,
That pours its wild gush from thy summer bower,
Will wake in maiden's memory again,
At such sweet hour.
Then fling the light winged laughter round thy heart,
Too soon must life's young loveliness depart.

NORNA.

A work entitled Literary Remains of Henry Neele, consisting of Lectures on English Poetry, Tales, and other Miscellaneous Pieces in prose and verse, has been published in England. Most of the miscellaneous articles it contains have had a free circulation, and some of our readers, perhaps, have seen the pieces which follow. We have extracted them in memory of their author, whose melancholy fate has been lamented by every one who has a tear for another's sorrow.

THE CRUSADERS' SONG.

BY HENRY NEELE.

"Remember the Holy Sepulchre."

Forget the land which gave ye birth;
Forget the womb that bore ye;
Forget each much-loved spot of earth;
Forget each dream of glory;
Forget the friends that by your side,
Stood firm as rocks unbroken;
Forget the late affianced bride,
And every dear love token;
Forget the hope that in each breast
Glowed like a smouldering ember;
But still, the Holy Sepulchre,
Remember! Oh, remember!

Remember all the vows ye've sworn
At holy Becket's Altar;
Remember all the ills ye've borne,
And scorned to shrink or falter;
Remember every laurelled field,
Which saw the Crescent waving;
Remember when compelled to yield,
Uncounted numbers braving;
Remember these, remember too
The cause ye strive for, ever;
The Cross! the Holy Sepulchre!
Forget,—forget them never!

By Him who in that Sepulchre
Was laid in Death's cold keeping;
By Her who bore, who reared Him, Her
Who by that Cross sat weeping;

By those, whose blood so oft has cried
Revenge for souls unshriven!
By those, whose sacred precepts guide
The path to yonder Heaven!
From youth to age, from morn to eve,
From spring-tide to December;
The Holy Sepulchre of Christ,
Remember! Oh, remember!

STANZAS.

BY HENRY NEELE.

Suns will set, and moons will wane,
Yet they rise and wax again;
Trees, that Winter's storms subdue,
Their leafy livery renew;
Ebb and flow is Ocean's lot;
But Man lies down and rises not:
Heaven and Earth shall pass away,
Ere shall wake his slumbering clay!

Vessels but to havens steer;
Paths denote a resting near;
Rivers flow into the main;
Ice-falls rest upon the plain;
The final end of all is known;
Man to darkness goes alone:
Cloud, and doubt, and mystery,
Hide his future destiny.

Nile, whose waves their boundaries burst,
Slakes the torrid desert's thirst;
Dew, descending on the hills,
Life in nature's veins instills;
Showers, that on the parched meads fall,
Their faded loveliness recall;
Man alone sheds tears of pain,
Weeps, but ever weeps in vain!

The Jung Frau and The Butterfly are from foreign journals received at this office.

THE JUNG FRAU.

BY HENRY MEREDITH PARKER, ESQ.

"Mont Blanc is the monarch of mountains."
But the Jung Frau shares his sway;
If he be the King, then she is the queen—
And their subjects—where are they?
The Farca wild and the Grimaël hoar,
The Righi berg, and a thousand more.

Mont Blanc is the monarch of mountains,
But the Jung Frau holds him near;
With the Seilver berg for her stainless shield,
And the Shriek Horn for her spear;
And thus she stands, as a war queen should,
Looking o'er mountain, and lake, and wood.

And rich, and fair, and beautiful,
Are the Ceintures round her waist;
When the Grindenwald, and the Lanterbrun,
Are as a war-belt braced;
Glad, and golden, and shining free,
With the brightness of Peace and Liberty.

Long may they shine so;—and oh! that she,
Their queen, could guard them, as well
From the spoiler's foot, as she doth her snows,
The Inaccessible.
Or that she had the power to launch
On such her mightiest Avalanche.

THE BUTTERFLY.

The Butterfly was a gentleman,
Of no very good repute;
And he roved in the sunshine all day long,
In his scarlet and purple suit:
And he left his lady-wife at home
In her own secluded tower;
Whilst he, like a bachelor flirted about
With a kiss for every flower.

His lady-wife was a poor glow-worm,
And seldom from home she'd stir;
She loved him better than all the world,
Though little he cared for her.
Unheeded she passed the day—she knew
Her lord was a rover then;
But, when night came on, she lighted her lamp
To guide him over the glen.

One night the wanderer homeward came,
But he saw not the glow-worm's ray:
Some wild-bird saw the neglected one,
And flew with her far away.
Then beware, ye Butterflies all, beware
If to you such a time should come:
Forsaken by wadding lights, you'll wish
You had cherished the lamp at home.

AND ALBANY SATURDAY MAGAZINE.

VOL. III.

ALBANY, N. Y. SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1829.

NO. 2.

MASONICK RECORD.

CONSTITUTION

And Regulations of the GRAND ROYAL ARCH CHAPTER of the State of New-York, adopted at the city of Albany, on the 7th day of February, 1805.

(Continued.)

ARTICLE III.

Section 1. This Grand Chapter being the highest source of legitimate masonick authority, and only subject to the obligations contained in the constitution of the General Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the United States of America, can, and of right ought to have the government and superintendence of all Chapters and Mark Master's Lodges within its jurisdiction: it therefore may grant warrants and dispensations for constituting Royal Arch Chapters, Lodges of Most Excellent Masters, Past Masters, and Mark Masters; and when expedient, revoke and annul the same: it may make laws, pass regulations, and at pleasure repeal, amend, or alter the same: it may censure, suspend, or expel Chapters, Lodges, or members, for violation or disobedience of its laws, regulations or rules.

Sect. 2. All Royal Arch Chapters, or Lodges of Most Excellent Masters, Past Masters, or Mark Master Masons, within the jurisdiction of this Grand Chapter, which have not already acknowledged the authority thereof, and subscribed to its government, shall do the same within two years, or be considered by this Grand Chapter, and all subordinate Chapters and Lodges, as acting contrary to the true principles of Masonry, and working without constitutional authority, & be deprived of all benefit of Masonick intercourse with either this Grand Chapter or any Chapter or Lodge under its jurisdiction, or with individual members of the same; and to carry the same into effect, all Chapters and Lodges as before mentioned, and under this jurisdiction, as well as all members thereof, are hereby strictly charged and forbidden holding any Masonick intercourse with any such offending Chapters, Lodges or members, after the first Tuesday of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seven, under the penalty of forfeiting the rights and privileges of Masonry under this Grand Chapter.

Sect. 3. No warrant shall be granted by the Grand Chapter for the creation of any Royal Arch Chapter, unless upon the petition of at least nine regular Royal Arch Masons, directed to this Grand Chapter, praying that a warrant may issue to authorize the creating a new Chapter, which said petition shall be recommended by the Chapter nearest to the place where the same new Chapter is to be erected, and which said recommendation shall vouch that the petitioners are all Royal Arch Masons, in good standing as such, and that they are men of good morals, and of fair reputations. And the petitioners shall pay, upon the granting of the said warrant, the sum of sixty dollars* for a warrant for the degree of Royal Arch, Most Excellent Masters, Past Masters, and Mark Master Masons.

Sect. 4. No warrant shall issue for the purpose of erecting a Mark Master's Lodge, unless upon the petition of at least five respectable Mark Master Masons, recommended as in the section last aforesaid; and also upon the payment of the sum of fifteen Dollars.

Sect. 5. The Grand High Priest, and Deputy Grand High Priest, during the recess of this Grand Chapter, shall have power and authority to grant dispensations for holding Chapters of Royal Arch Masons, Lodges of Most Excellent Masters, Past Masters and Mark Masters, on a regular application to either of them for that purpose, accompanied with the same number of petitioners and recommended in all cases as would be necessary to obtain a warrant for either of those purposes, and on paying the same sum or sums of money therefor; such dispensation, when thus granted, shall be as valid as a warrant could be, until the next meeting of the Grand Chapter—at which time it shall be the duty of the officer granting the same, to make report, in writing, to the Grand Chapter, of his doing thereon, pay over the money received by him for said dispensation, into the hands of the Secretary, and produce the petition and other documents accompanying the same—whereupon it shall be the duty of the Grand Chapter to confirm the power and authority of such Chapter or Lodge, by granting them a warrant, or annul the same by their special act, in which last case, the said petitioners shall receive back such sum or sums of money which they have heretofore paid, after deducting the sum of five dollars for the expense of granting the dispensation.

For the Government of subordinate Chapters and Lodges under the Jurisdiction of the Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the state of New-York.

ARTICLE IV.

Section 1. A Royal Arch Chapter shall consist of a High Priest, a King, and Scribe, Captain of the Host, a Principal Sojourner, Royal Arch Captain, Three Grand Masters, a Secretary and Treasurer, and as many members as shall be found convenient, not less than nine regular Royal Arch Masons, including the officers; and no Chapter shall be opened in the degree of Royal Arch, without that number, and every Mark Master's Lodge shall consist of a Master, a Senior and Junior Warden, a Secretary and Treasurer, and shall never be opened without the number of five regular Mark Master Masons present; and no Chapter or Lodge can be held under this jurisdiction without a warrant from this Grand Chapter.

Sect. 2. That the election of officers in all Chapters or Lodges under this jurisdiction, shall take place on the regular meeting of such Chapter or Lodge next preceding the festival of St. John the Evangelist, in each year, and be installed in their respective offices at the same meeting, before any other business can take place; to be determined by ballot in manner and form as laid down in article the first, section the third.

Sect. 3. Every Chapter of Royal Arch Masons holding under this Grand Chapter, shall pay into the funds thereof the following sums, viz: for the exaltation of every Companion to the degree of Royal Arch Mason, the sum of two dollars, and for every member thereof the annual sum of fifty cents; and every Mark Master's Lodge shall also pay into the funds of this Grand Chapter, for every Brother advanced to the degree of Mark Master Mason, the sum of fifty cents, and for every member thereof the annual sum of twenty-five cents; which said several sums shall be punctually paid during the session of this Grand Chapter at their next regular annual meeting; and every Chapter or Lodge which shall neglect or refuse to pay the said sums at the times aforesaid, and continue so to refuse or neglect, without good reason shown to the satisfaction of a majority of the members present of this Grand Chapter, until the next regular session thereof, shall be deemed the violators of this Constitution, and unwholesome members of this Grand Body, and shall therefore be punished by forfeiture of their warrant and expulsion from this Grand Chapter, and only restored by paying up all dues, and a sufficient and satisfactory apology for the breach of good rules.*

Sect. 4. And for the better carrying the preceding section into effect, the Grand Secretary shall, on the last day of the session of this Grand Chapter, inform the same what Chapters or Lodges are deficient, and how long they have been so, in the payment of their dues aforesaid, that the Grand Chapter may make such order thereon as the members thereof shall deem right.

Sect. 5. No one can be exalted to the degree of Royal Arch Mason in any Chapter under this jurisdiction, without being regularly proposed in open Chapter, by petition, (which petition shall lie over at least one meeting, that the character of the candidate may be fairly investigated by the members) and paying not less than sixteen dollars into the treasury thereof; and for the degree of Mark Master, whether in a Chapter or a Lodge, not less than four dollars, to be paid into the treasury thereof, and having his character investigated as above.

Sect. 6. Every Chapter and Lodge holden under this Grand Chapter shall have a seal, the device thereof to be made at the pleasure of the persons for whom it shall be made, and shall be engraved, with the name of the Chapter or Lodge aforesaid, and the number thereof in figures or numeral letters; an impression of which said seal shall be deposited with the Grand Secretary, and the device of the same described in writing, in a book to be kept by him for that purpose; and no papers or documents presented to this Grand Chapter, as credentials or evidences from any such Chapter or Lodge, shall be received as such, unless there is a sufficient similarity between the impression thereon and the one deposited as aforesaid, to be determined by the Grand Secretary, or in case of doubt or controversy on the subject, to be determined as is heretofore pointed out for the admission of members, in article second and section second.

Sect. 7. It being the duty of every Chapter and Mark Master's Lodge belonging to this Grand Body, to be represented at an early period of each session thereof, in order to support its respectability, and to become informed of all proceedings and doings, and to aid by their wisdom in the deliberations and counsels, that the general interest may be advanced, good order prevail, and the true state of every branch of this Grand Chapter well understood: it is therefore hereby declared, that an omission of a duty so important to the well being of this institution deserves severe censure; it is therefore hereby strongly enjoined on all such persons to Amendment, adopted February, 1825.

* At the close of the third section of the fourth article, add—And every member of a subordinate Chapter who shall refuse or neglect to pay his quarterly dues for more than one year, and continue so to neglect or refuse without good reason shown to the satisfaction of a majority of the members of such subordinate Chapter, shall be deemed an unwholesome member, and be punished by suspension or expulsion from such Chapter, and be restored by payment of all his back dues, and that such delinquent member shall be prohibited from voting in such Chapter during his delinquency.

Amendment, adopted February, 1828.

* Strike out the word sixty in the fourteenth line of the third section of the third article, and insert the words one hundred.

be prompt in the performance of the duties aforesaid; to be early at the said sessions, with their returns of the officers, members, and dues, of the respective Chapters and Lodges aforesaid.

Sect. 8. If any Companion or Brother of any Chapter or Lodge under this jurisdiction shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, by breaking the rules and regulations thereof, or by betraying the trust reposed in him, the Chapter or Lodge to which such offender may belong (but in case he belong to no Chapter or Lodge, he may be called on by the nearest Chapter or Lodge having cognizance thereof,) shall have full power of punishing the same by reprimand, suspension, or expulsion, as they may deem proper. But if by expulsion, the nature of the offence, with a copy of the proceedings thereon, shall be transmitted to the Grand Secretary without delay, who shall lay the same before the Grand Chapter at their next meeting, who shall ratify or annul the same: Provided always, the person so offending, and being expelled, feeling himself aggrieved thereby, shall have the privilege of an appeal to this Grand Chapter, if in session, and during the recess, to the Grand High Priest or his Deputy, who shall appoint a committee to investigate the facts in the proceedings, and make report at the next meeting thereof; which shall have the power of restoring him to the general privileges of Masonry, but not to membership within the body from which he has been expelled, without their own consent, nor can there be a dispensation in this case; for every Masonick body ought to have the power of determining its own members, for the better maintenance of harmony and good order therein.

(To be continued.)

ELECTION OF OFFICERS.

STATE OF NEW-YORK.

Officers of the Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the state of New-York, for the ensuing year, elected at the annual meeting in the city of Albany, which began on Tuesday, and closed on Wednesday of the present week:—

M. E. Richard Pennell, of New-York, Grand High Priest.

M. E. Ezra S. Cozier, of Utica, Deputy Grand High Priest.

E. Benjamin Enos, of Cortland county, Grand King.

E. Jacob T. B. Van Vechten, of Albany, Grand Scribe.

E. and Rev. Joseph Prentiss, of Catskill, Grand Chaplain.

E. John O. Cole, of Albany, Grand Secretary.

E. Gerrit L. Dox, of Albany, Grand Treasurer.

Officers of Fidelity Royal Arch Chapter, No. 77, in Trumansburg, Tompkins county, for the ensuing year:—

Lyman Strobridge, High Priest; Nathaniel Ayers, King; James M'Lallen, Scribe; Elias J. Ayers, Captain of the Host; Uriel Turner, Principal Sojourner; Abraham G. Updike, Royal Arch Captain; Ephraim Lockhart, Isaac W. Hart, and Samuel Burlew, Masters of Vails; Henry Taylor, Secretary; John Creque, Treasurer; Robert M. Petton and Philemon H. Thompson, Stewards; James Rhodes, Tyler.

Officers of Fidelity Lodge, No. 309, in Ulysses, Tompkins county, for 5829:—

Nicoll Halsey, Master; Elias J. Ayers, Senior Warden; Abraham G. Updike, Junior Warden; James M'Lallen, Secretary; John Creque, Treasurer; Philemon H. Thompson, Senior Deacon; John M'Lallen, 2d, Junior Deacon; Uriel Turner and Isaac W. Hart, Stewards; James Rhodes, Tyler.

ODD FELLOWS' DEPARTMENT.

ELECTION.

Philanthropic Lodge, No. 5 of Independent Odd Fellows, in the city of Albany, installed the following brethren into office, on Wednesday, the 5th instant:—David Bruce, jr., as M. N. G.; Amos Adams, as V. G.; Lawrence Connor, as Secretary; and William Lelashere, as Treasurer.

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

COBBETT ON GARDENING, &c.

HORSE RADISH.

After horse radish has borne seed once or twice, its root becomes hard, brown on the outside, not juicy when it is scraped, and eats more like the little chips than like a garden vegetable; so that at taverns and eating houses, there frequently seems to be a rivalry on the point of toughness between the horse radish and the beef steak; and it would be well if this inconvenient rivalry never discovered itself any where else.

CIDER.

Mr. Platt had a curious mode of making strong cider in America. In the month of January or February, he placed a number of hogsheads of cider upon stands out of doors. The frost turned to ice the upper part of the contents of the hogshead, and a tap drew off from the part which was not frozen. This was the spirituous part, and was as strong as the very strongest of beer that can be made. The frost had no power over this part; but the lighter part which was at the top it froze into ice. This, when thawed, was weak cider. This method of getting strong cider would not do in a country like this, [England,] where the frosts are never sufficiently severe.

KEEPING APPLES.

When there is frost, all that you have to do, is to keep the apples in a state of total darkness until some days after a complete thaw has come. In America they are frequently frozen as hard as stones; but if they thaw in the light, they rot; but if they thaw in darkness, they not only do not rot, but lose very little of their original flavour. This may be new to the English reader; but he may depend upon it that the statement is correct.

TO KEEP CHESTNUTS.

To preserve chestnuts, so as to have them to sow in the spring, or to eat through the winter, you must make them perfectly dry after they come out of their green husk; then put them into a box or barrel mixed with, and covered over by, fine and dry sand, three gallons of sand to one gallon of chestnuts. If there be maggots in any of the chestnuts, they will come out of the chestnuts and work up through the sand to get to the air; and thus you have your chestnuts sweet and sound and fresh.

PLUMS.

The Magnum Bonums are fit for nothing but tarts and sweetmeats. Magnum is right enough; but as to bonum, the word has seldom been so completely misapplied.

BRITISH WINES.

That which we call currant wine, is neither more nor less than red-looking, weak rum, the strength coming from the sugar; and gooseberry wine is a thing of the same character, and, if the fruit were of no other use than this, one might wish them to be extirpated. People deceive themselves. The thing is called wine, but it is rum; that is to say, an extract from sugar.

BIRDS.

The wild pigeons in America live, for about a month, entirely upon the buds of the sugar-maple, and are killed by hundreds of thousands, by persons who erect bough-houses, and remain in a maple wood with guns and powder and shot for that purpose. If we open the craw of one of these little birds, we find in it green stuff of various descriptions, and, generally, more or less of grass, and, therefore, it is a little too much to believe, that, in taking away our buds, they merely relieve us from the insects that would, in time, eat us up. Birds are exceedingly cunning in their generation; but, luckily for us gardeners, they do not know how to distinguish between the report of a gun loaded with powder and shot, and one that is only loaded with powder. Very frequent firing with powder will alarm them so that they will quit the spot, or, at least, be so timid as to become comparatively little mischievous.

WINE MADE FROM SAW-DUST.

A correspondent writes us as follows:—An ingenious engineer at Chenies, Bucks, whose head is ever at work for useful discovery, and to whom many are indebted for his able performances in his own profession, whilst superintending his sawyers cutting up some Quebec fir timber, was forcibly struck with the sweet odour from the fresh saw-dust, and resolved to try whether he could not make an wholesome extract from it, as well as he had from many other ingredients, and as it is extracted from the birch tree, to form a basis for a good homemade wine. After some small difficulty, adopting nearly the usual process of making other wines with the aid of moist sugar, he formed an extract, which, though raw in the first place, was not very unpalatable. He put it by in a stone jar, gently corked down, and by some accident the whole affair slipped the memory of him and his household for two years, when, on recently looking to his other wines and stock of beer, he discovered the long-forgotten bottle, and on tasting it, he was most agreeably surprised at finding it excellent; and putting to defiance the best judges of most wines to guess what it was made from. Even his "gude wife" thought it was raisin wine of her own making, while others thought it tasted like Madeira; and a medical gentleman considered it superiour to mead wine. It was bottled off, and in each bottle was put one glass of brandy. The writer of this has tasted it, and had he not been told, could never have discovered the ingredients from which it was made. It has a slight and rather pleasing taste of the turpentine, and by some who drank it it operated as a gentle diaretick; which induces a belief that whilst it was pleasant to drink it would be beneficial in gravelly complaints. This ingenious engineer is making a more correct and scientific experiment of the same ingredients, and should it answer his expectations he will make it publick. The ingredient is easy to be procured, and cheap, and with sugar and brandy will not reach the retail price of ale. [Canada Herald.]

SKETCHES OF CHARACTER.

We found the following sketches in the Washington City Chronicle, which says they are extracted from a work which appeared in that city about a year ago, under the title of the Wanderer in Washington. They were evidently written by one who was politically friendly to the persons whose characters he attempts to delineate. Of their truth we cannot judge; but we are sure that they are written in a spirit of friendliness which every American should admire, and we therefore publish them.

MR. CLAY.

A tall, thin, but dignified looking man now approached, to whom Marion introduced me. The conversation we had, though brief, enabled me to perceive that I was in the company of no ordinary individual. I remarked that his observations possessed much originality, and depth of thought, and were made in a spirit of freedom and fearlessness that pleased me, because I had not expected it. There was more of dignity than grace in his manner; it wanted that polish and ease which I had often witnessed in European courts; but it was precisely such as I should not only look for, but desire, in a man holding a high office under a republic.

He is just the man I should select to exhibit to the European world, as a fine specimen of the American character—bold, enterprising, independent and persevering; with a genius that shrinks at no impediment, and a mind that quails at the aspect of no danger; emerging from obscurity and indigence, and rising by rapid gradations, to the rank of an orator, legislator, minister, and statesman; the same in all, and in all displaying that versatility and power which are the characteristics of genius. Buffon, I think, has said that genius is observation: but it requires genius to observe. The Secretary of—has been a close and accurate observer of men and things, and has suffered nothing to escape him which could add to the unfailing resources of the mind. His knowledge of men has not been derived from books, but from a long intercourse with the living world, in which he has mingled as much from necessity as choice. The various scenes through which he has passed has enabled him to see and study the diversified character of his species, and to comprehend the influence under which they act, and the motives and principles by which they are governed. Like other men, he has his weaknesses, and may have his follies; but there is generally discoverable in whatever he does a great deal of good sense, sagacity and shrewdness. He is, I admit, actuated to a certain degree by ambition, "that last infirmity of noble minds;" but his ambition has never interfered with his patriotism, or caused him to diverge from his career of usefulness. It has been correctly remarked by a warm friend of his, "that the spread of universal freedom is the first and strongest wish of his heart, and whether she flapped her wings over the Cordilleras of America, or reposed on the classic plains or delicious valleys of Greece, she was sure to meet in him a friend that no casualty could alter, and no personal interest could change." As an orator the Secretary of — stands high in the estimation of his countrymen. His mind, voice, figure, and attitudes, gives to what he says a splendour and power which all admire and which no one can listen to without conviction or delight.

He wielded an almost magic power over a legislative body, and seems to exercise nearly the same fascination over those who come within the range of its influence. It is the ascendancy of genius—the sway of mind, which, like the rarified air, will rise above the denser atmosphere that surrounds it. There are, too, in his manners, so total an absence of all hauteur, so much apparent candour, and such an evidence of openheartedness, that no one can refuse him his confidence and attachment, when he once becomes acquainted with him. He has nothing of aristocracy lurking in his heart, and nothing of that contemptible pride which will not stoop to notice the lowly and the humble, though meritorious and worthy, because they are not surrounded by the trappings of power or the glitter of wealth. He has been placed on "the vantage ground" of politics, and aims at a more elevated point, which, should he attain it, will, I am sure, produce no change in the nature of his feelings or the character of his mind.

MR. RUSH.

Our host, the Secretary of the —, with whom you have expressed yourself so much pleased, is a gentleman of great suavity of manners, and amiableness of disposition; polite, affable, and courteous to all—paying the same attention and manifesting the same respect to a subordinate clerk that he would to the highest officer of government. His countenance, you observe, is mild, and prepossessing, and strongly indicative of the gentle and benevolent qualities of his heart. He is a man of fine taste and cultivated mind, but is perhaps somewhat deficient in firmness and energy of character. To that simplicity which ought always, in my opinion, to characterise a republican, he adds all the ease and urbanity of a gentleman accustomed to the most refined and polished society. He has been abroad, and though he has freely mingled in the most polished circles, he remains still the same, and has neither acquired additional grace, nor lost those traits of republicanism by which he was always distinguished. He is like the Secretary of —, a good speaker, and once filled the first law office under the government.

"The law," said I, "seems to be a favourite profession in this country."

"It is so," replied Marion. "The law, from the nature of our institutions, and the character of our government, opens an almost certain road to distinction in the United States. The man who has acquired the talent of extemporaneous speaking, and possesses a mind of ordinary powers, is almost sure to rise in wealth, or political importance. All the members of the present cabinet have been lawyers, and have distinguished themselves more or less at the bar. The Secretary of the — speaks and writes with great neatness, and sometimes elegance. His official papers, or communications, discover an intimate acquaintance with the subjects on which he treats, and they are composed in a style of great clearness and precision. His mind is, I think, more elegant than solid; more acute than comprehensive, almost always rising above mediocrity, and seldom, if ever, below it. He has filled several important offices under government, and filled them all with credit to himself, and advantage to the nation.

MR. SOUTHARD.

He said he was, like two of the other members of the cabinet, the fabricator of his own fortune; that he had realized the allegory of Appelles, and had risen almost without effort to the rank he now holds. He has received, said Marion, a classical education, and passed through the usual course of collegiate studies with credit, if not with distinction. He was once, I understand, a teacher in a private family, afterwards studied the law, was considered as a man of talents while at the bar, and was finally brought, like most of our countrymen, into political life. He first became a Senator, and subsequently the Secretary of —, during part of two administrations. His present situation is not calculated to develop the talents he possesses, and though he may be respected, and esteemed, I do not think he can be distinguished while he remains where he is. The business of his office is not, certainly, suited to the nature of his former pursuits, studies, or habits; it is a new sphere, to which he must, in a great degree, be a stranger, and in which he cannot revolve with much ease or splendour. He is, moreover, hampered by the peculiar organization of his Department, and must sometimes come in contact with other bodies rolling in the same orb, which he cannot avoid, and with which it would be difficult to unite. There is, however, a good deal of the fortiter in re mixed up with the suaviter in modo, in his composition. His manners are quite republican, and his disposition amiable. We cannot judge of him as a statesman, because he has not yet exhibited anything on which we can predicate a correct opinion. It is said that his speeches evinced talent, and that his political views were generally right, if they were not always the most lucid or extensive. There is nothing, I think, very characteristic about Mr. —; no prominent features or striking traits of mind or disposition are displayed, by which we can distinguish him from other men of talent. In conversation he does not rise above mediocrity, and in his official character there is nothing remarkable or peculiar.

THE GATHERER.

MAXIMS TO LIVE BY.

To have too much forethought is the part of a wretch; to have too little is the part of a fool.

Self-will is so ardent and active that it will break a world to pieces to make a stool to sit on.

Remember always to mix good sense with good things, or they will become disgusting.

Irritability urges us to take a step as much too soon, as sloth does too late.

Say the strongest things you can with candour and kindness to a man's face, and make the best excuse you can for him with truth and justice, behind his back.

Men are to be estimated as Johnson says, by the mass of character. A block of tin may have a grain of silver, but still it is tin; and a block of silver may have an alloy of tin, but still it is silver. Some men's characters are excellent, yet not without alloy. Others base, yet tend to great ends. Bad men are made the same use of as scaffolds; they are employed as means to erect a building, and then are taken down and destroyed.

If a man has a quarrelsome temper, let him alone; the world will soon find him employment. He will soon meet with some one stronger than himself, who will repay him better than you can. A man may fight duels all his life if he is disposed to quarrel.

Some evils are irremediable, they are best neither seen nor heard; by seeing and hearing things that you cannot remove, you will create implacable adversaries; who being guilty aggressors, never forgive.

MAXIMS.

From the second edition of Pelham.

Do not require your dress so much to fit, as to adorn you. Nature is not to be copied, but to be exalted by art. Apelles blamed Protogenes for being too natural.

Never in your dress altogether desert that taste which is general. The world considers eccentricity in great things, genius; in small things, folly.

Remember, that none but those whose courage is unquestionable, can venture to be effeminate. It was only in the field that the Lacedaemonians were accustomed to use perfumes and curl their hair.

Never let the finery of chains and rings seem your own choice; that which naturally belongs to women, should appear only worn for their sake. We dignify foppery, when we invest it with a sentiment.

To win the affection of your mistress, appear negligent in your costume—to preserve it, assiduous: the first is a sign of the passion of love; the second, of its respect.

The most graceful principle of dress is neatness; the most vulgar is preciseness.

Dress contains the two codes of morality—private and publick. Attention is the duty we owe to others—cleanliness that which we owe to ourselves.

Dress so that it may never be said of you "What a well-dressed man!"—but, "What a gentleman-like man!"

Nothing is superficial to a deep observer! It is in trifles that the mind betrays itself. "In what part of that letter," said a king to the wisest of living diplomats, "did you discover irresolution?" "In its ns and ys!" was the answer.

There is an indifference to please in a stocking down at heel—but there may be a malevolence in a diamond ring.

He who esteems trifles for themselves, is a trifler—he who esteems them for the conclusions to be drawn from them, or the advantage to which they can be put, is a philosopher.

QUID PRO QUO.

A canon of the cathedral of Seville, who was very affected in his dress, and particular in his shoes, could not in whole city find a workman to his liking. An unfortunate shoemaker to whom he applied, after quitting many others, having brought him a pair of shoes which did not please his taste, the canon became furious, and seizing one of the tools of the shoemaker, gave him with it so many blows on the head, that the poor shoemaker fell dead on the floor. The unhappy man left a widow, four daughters, and a son of fourteen years of age, the eldest of the indigent family. They made their complaints to the chapter; the canon was prosecuted, and condemned not to appear in the choir for a year.

The young shoemaker, having attained to man's estate, was scarcely able to get a livelihood; and overwhelmed with wretchedness, sat down on the day of a procession at the door of the Cathedral of Seville, in the moment the procession passed by. Among the other canons he perceived the murderer of his father. At the sight of this man, filial affection, rage, and despair got so far the better of his reason, that he fell furiously on the priest, and stabbed him to the heart. The young man was seized, convicted of the crime, and immediately condemned to be quartered alive. Peter, whom we call the cruel, and whom the Spaniards, with more reason, call the lover of justice, was then at Seville. The affair came to his knowledge, and after learning particulars, he determined to be himself the judge of the young shoemaker. When he proceeded to give judgment, he first annulled the sentence just pronounced by the clergy; and after asking the young man of what profession he was, "Iforbid you," said he, "to make shoes for a year to come."

Diogenes once said to Aristippus, "If you could eat cabbages, you would not have to pay your court to the great;" to which Aristippus replied, "If you could pay your court to the great, you would not have to eat cabbages."

THE LEGENDARY.

THE SURVIVOR OF RONCESVALLES.

"Let me die, Sancho, if any thing lucky will befall us to-night," said the renowned Don Quixote, when, on the occasion of his visit to the city of Toboco in quest of the peerless Dulcinea, he met a labourer in the morning, trudging along to the measure of the ballad of Roncesvalles. "Do n't you hear what that peasant is singing?" Sancho, however, was more philosophical in his feelings, and apprehended as little danger from what the peasant was singing, as from any other ballad, "with regard to their good or evil fortunes." There were many Spanish versions of the ballad of the battle of Roncesvalles; and that to which it is supposed Don Quixote alluded begins, according to a very homely translation by Mr. Rodd, lamenting the fate of the twelve French peers who lost their lives in that celebrated battle, thus:

All you fared at Roncesvalles,
Frenchmen, fate your glory crowned;
There your peers in battle perished,
There your king his honour lost.

The remainder of the ballad is confined to the adventures of the celebrated and gallant Guarinos, admiral of France; and being rendered into English prose, runs as follows:

The fight of Roncesvalles—that fatal battle, in which Charlemagne lost the high renown which a series of victories and deeds of noble daring had gained him, and in which his peers lost their lives—was over. The richest trophy which the Moors had won was the person of the gallant Guarinos, the admiral of France, whom they carried away with them as their captive. He had been found on the field, faint with his exertions and the loss of blood; and discovering that he lived only by convulsive breathing, which at intervals broke from his mangled breast. As soon as he was restored to life by the care of the Moorish physicians, the victorious chieftains who had been engaged in the battle begun to prefer each their claim to the possession of the noble prisoner. So loud and various were their claims, that it was soon found to be impossible either to adjust or to satisfy them, and it was at length decided by the king that the claimants should cast lots for the prize which each of them desired to win. The impartiality of this method recommended it to the warriors, and chance gave the custody of the Admiral Guarinos to the Prince Marlot, who immediately began to exercise the rights of a master over the warrior, whom chance had placed in his power.

The prowess and military skill of the admiral had been so often and so dearly felt by the Moors, that Marlot knew it was of the highest importance to the success of the cause in which he was engaged, to secure the aid of so potent and influential an agent. With a view, therefore, to conciliate him, as the first step towards gaining him over, the Moorish chieftain changed his captivity, and took him from the miserable place in which he had been kept since the battle, into his own palace. Kindness and courtesy, and all the blandishments of a refined and studied politeness, were put in practice to overcome the stubborn virtue of Guarinos, who, although he felt grateful for the ease he enjoyed did not yet value it so highly as to barter for it his Christian faith and his knightly honour. In vain did Marlot offer him his two daughters in marriage, with a large train of male and female slaves, a palace, and revenues, which far surpassed the wealth he had possessed in his own land. In vain did he represent to him that power almost unlimited should be placed within his reach if he would renounce the faith of Christ and embrace that of Mahomet. At first a short and earnest, but at the same time courteous, refusal of the honour which the Moor offered, by giving his daughters to be the captive's wives, was the only reply which the Christian warrior gave. When, however, Marlot pressed his request still further, and his entreaties and arguments began to assume the form of commands and threats, Guarinos indignantly rebuked him for having put upon him the affront of believing for a moment that he would so far degrade himself as to renounce his religion. The Moor left his prisoner in such a mood as convinced the latter he had nothing further to hope from his clemency, but every thing to fear from his revenge.

A very short time sufficed to convince Guarinos that his fears were too well founded. Some of the soldiers of Marlot appeared in his chamber, and loading him with manacles, dragged him to the common jail of the city, where he was left in a close and solitary prison. Weeks, months, and years, rolled on without bringing any mitigation of his sufferings; and yet hope and Christian fortitude enabled him to bear up against the evils with which fate had afflicted him. Many a sigh, and sometimes a groan, would escape him, as he looked up through the bars of his miserable dungeon window, and saw the clear blue sky, and thought of the sunny fields of France, and of the companions of his warlike deeds—the glorious twelve, who had fallen through the treachery of the felon Ganelon, in the bloody fight of Roncesvalles. Bitter and burning thoughts flew through his brain, as he contrasted his present forlorn and helpless condition with his former noble state; and his nerves thrilled, and his bosom swelled as though it would burst the ignoble bonds which held him. But patience—that stern virtue, which prisoners learn to perform to practice—calmed, if it could not console him.

The great Moorish festival of the Beiram had arrived, and all the inhabitants of the city were joyously availing themselves of the license which this occasion afforded them to revel and enjoy their sports. Even the Christians and the Jews, who dwelt within the town, although they did not regard the Beiram as a religious ceremony, were not less willing to observe it as an occasion of rejoicing than the Islamites themselves; and the whole city was like one large fair, in which all classes of the people were assembled and engaged in diverting themselves. The shouts of mirth and revelry fell on the ear of Guarinos, as he lay in his lone captivity, and his gall rose at the thought that the cruel paynim who kept him wasting his manhood in so base a bondage were themselves full of mirth and in freedom.

Among the sports of the day was one which was a great favourite with the Moorish people. A gigantic figure was built up of wood, and made so strong that it required great force and dexterity to throw it down. Against this the Moorish horsemen ran with their lances, and although the most distinguished among them essayed their prowess against the tablados, as it was called, it resisted all their efforts. The laughter and jeers of the common people who had assembled to witness this trial of the warriors' skill, rose up in a tumult of derision at each successive failure. Marlot, who had expected that this would be the most effective of the triumphs of the day; and who had been most particularly desirous that the general populace of his city should see, that they might respect, the force of his warriors, was enraged beyond measure at their repeated failures. His anger transported him beyond the bounds of common prudence, and he swore that the jousts should be continued, that none of the cavaliers, nor even of the spectators, should depart from the spot, and that no food should be brought to them. As he had power enough to enforce so senseless an edict, his slavish subjects were compelled to obey; and a strong cordon of his guards was instantly ranged round the lists.

The jocund shouts were now changed to wailing and complaint. The women loudly uttered their anger and discontent, and the men less vehemently swore dark and bitter oaths against the tyrant whom they feared too much openly to rebel against. With a feeling of desperation they prepared to renew their efforts, but either they had exhausted their strength, or the angry emotions to which Marlot's edict gave rise, baffled their attempts. They tried in vain; the tablados seemed to be like a rock, and defied all their efforts. At every failure the people set up a shout of derision and anger against the cavalier who had been unsuccessful, so that at length few persons could be found to try.

Guarino's prison was near the city wall, just beyond which the list had been placed. As he meditated upon his evil destiny, the various shouts of the people had reached him. The changes in their expression latterly had roused his curiosity; he thought that something was going wrong, and although their joy was to him nothing, the disappointment of his enemies excited his desire to know what had caused it. He called to the jailer, who was on the battlement above his cell, to know the reason of the mournful shouts. A long acquaintance with him had softened the heart of this man, who was not the worst of his race, and he told the captive shortly of Marlot's edict, and the despair of the jousts.

"Mother of Heaven!" cried Guarinos, "had I but the steel and the weapons that were mine when treachery delivered me into the paynim's hands, I would beat down this tablados at one blow."

The jailer laughed aloud. "Braggarts you Christians are ever," he cried; "and neither pain, nor prison, nor stripes, nor starvations, can drive the practice of boasting out of you. Here have you been lying for seven years in this jail, with no other exercise for your arms than to brush away the summer flies that disturb your siesta, and yet you persuade yourself that you can do that which the nervous and well trained strength of our best chieftains can not."

"Put me to the proof," exclaimed Guarinos, "and if I fail deal me the doom of a vain coward."

"Nay, an it rested with me thou shouldst try—an it were only to cure thee of vaunting," said the jailer.

"Why, then," rejoined Guarinos, "for the love of Heaven—or, if that moves thee not, by your hopes of Alla's blessing, and your Prophet's intercession—bear me a message to your Lord Marlot. Say to him thus—"Guarinos, France's admiral, greets you as he may, and craves you will let be given to him the armour, and the lance, and the axe, he wore on the day he first became your prisoner. Order that his steel shall once more be his, and he engages to throw down at one blow the tablados, which scorns the prowess of your Moorish warrior. If he shall fail, he is willing at once to devote himself to death, and to acquit his captors of all stain in dooming him."

"By the Prophet's tomb, then," cried the jailer, "thou shalt have thy way; for though I hate thee not, I am heartily tired of thy vain swaggering."

The jailer hastened to the place in which Marlot was, and told his errand to one of the nobles in attendance on his person. It immediately occurred to this satrap that an opportunity now offered of diverting the king's rage, and of giving him an object with which he might glut it. He instantly admitted the jailer, and bade him do his errand.

Marlot heard it, and his fury was excited tenfold. Almost choking with passion, he ordered the horse and armour to be brought, and Guarinos to be brought before him. The armour was soon found, for it had been laid up in the public arsenal, where it was exhibited as a sort of trophy; but as it had been untouched during the whole period of Guarinos' captivity, it was covered with the rust and dirt it had collected during so many years. The horse was discovered with greater difficulty. When first taken it had been intended to make him useful as a war-horse; but every attempt to mount him was made in vain. He plunged, kicked, and bit at every one who approached him; and after all efforts had been made to tame him, he was sent to draw a lime cart in the fortification. This drudgery he submitted to, but never from the moment of his entering the Moorish city had any human being been able to mount him. Now, however, he was released from his laborious work, and was brought into the court-yard of the palace. At the same time Guarinos was led from his prison before the king.

The iron hand of captivity had wrought strange changes in the person of the noble paladin. His uncombed hair hung in matted locks over his forehead; his beard, grizzled and untrimmed, stood out from his chin, with each particular hair curling with ire. His face pale with the long absence he had endured from the wholesome light of day, and his eyes lighted up with a lustre that had as much of wildness as of fire—his limbs were thin, and spare diet had reduced some of the roundness of his muscular form—and yet, as he strode into Marlot's presence, with firm gate and erect head, there was a nobleness in his appearance which bespoke his conscious superiority over the crouching slaves by whom he was surrounded. Marlotès felt the influence of his presence, but veiling, under an affected scorn, the fear and hatred which he experienced at the sight of his ill-used captive, he repeated to him the message which the jailer had delivered, and asked Guarinos if he was content to abide by the proposition which had been made in his name.

"I have said it," replied Guarinos, who was determined to give no outward indication but by his silence, of the contempt in which he beheld the Moors.

Marlotès then bidding the headsman prepare his axe and block for the execution of Guarinos, which he took to be certain, he bade the guards lead him forth to the court-yard, where his steed and his armour awaited him.

When Guarinos saw the noble animal who had so often borne him in the chase and in the battle, and whose courage and strength had never failed, now standing before him lean and jaded, his ribs standing out, and the marks of stripes on his hide, he felt an emotion which his own sufferings had seldom been able to excite. The tears started to his eyes, but with an instant exertion they were dried away. He called to the horse, and at his well-known voice the beast neighed, pricked up his ears, and came towards him delightedly. The change in the animal's appearance was instantaneous. His head was raised, his eyes lively, his nostrils dilated, and his bound firm and light as an antelope's. Guarinos motioned for his armour, which, being brought, he put on—not however without some difficulty, from the rivets being rusted, and the straps having stiffened with long disuse. At length he mounted; and, with his lance in his hand, his good axe at his saddle bow, and with the helm from which his faded plume streamed to the wind on his head, turned towards the city gate. He was followed by an immense crowd of people. Marlotès and his court rode slowly after; and the public executioner, with his assistants, closed the rear.

Arrived at the ground, the lists were cleared, and the Moorish herald made proclamation of the terms on which the trial had been granted to Guarinos. A shout of derision was set up by the spectators at the sight of the paladin and his miserable equipage; and yet the more experienced soldiers whispered to each other that he held his lance and sate his steed like a man who knew the usages of war. The tablados was then pointed out to him, the distance of the course marked out, and the trumpets sounded for the charge. Guarinos crossed himself devoutly like a Christian knight; and, uttering a short prayer to the Virgin, he gave his charger the reins and the spurs; at the same moment grasping firmly his lance, he directed his whole force against the Moorish trophy. The noise of the blow sounded like the discharge of a culverin; the lance broke into uncountable shivers; but the tablados, rocking upon its base, fell, and in its fall crushed several of the Moors, who had impudently stationed themselves behind it, in the firm conviction that the Christian's charge must be in vain.

A murmur of anger and surprise burst from the crowd. Marlotès raised himself in his stirrups to give command to his guard to seize upon Guarinos; but, ere he could utter the words, one bound of his noble steed had brought the paladin before him. Guarinos' uplifted axe descended on his turban, and the Saracen's cleft head was immediately afterwards rolling on the ground. Before the multitude had recovered from the astonishment which this exploit begat, the paladin rode at the nearest entrance to the lists, smiting the guards who pressed around him, and dealing death and destruction wherever his blows lighted. In an incredibly short space of time he had passed the bounds; the river was before him, and, without pause, his steed dashed into the waters, and had reached the opposite side before his pursuers could come up to the brink. The river was more than a bowshot over, and Guarinos stood, for a moment, to cast defiance to the teeth of the Moors. For a minute he alighted; and, after girthing his horse tighter, he again vaulted into the saddle, and was in a few moments out of sight.

He rode without stint or stay until he reached the French territories. Having taken the necessary repose for himself and his charger, he proceeded more gently, but still rapidly, to the French king's court, where he presented himself in the same garb as he had worn in his captivity, and covered with his rusty armour, as the SURVIVOR OF RONCESVALLES.

MISCELLANY.

NANCY'S HILL.

A few miles below the Notch of the White Mountains, in New Hampshire, now celebrated by the painter and the poet, in the bosom of the valley through which the Saco winds, rises a little eminence, which was pointed out to me as Nancy's Hill. Nash was a celebrated hunter; the storms of winter, terrible as they were amid the desert of mountains which was his home, and the tempests of the sultry summer, equally terrible and more appalling, were alike indifferent to him. In one of his numerous excursions, he did more for the benefit of the country than all the philosophers before or since his time—for he first explored the wonderful passage, which opened an easy intercourse between the inhabitants east and west of the Gap. Yet he wrote no book on the subject, and never claimed the honour of the discovery. Many people thought he loved hunting merely for the hardships he encountered; for he never grew rich, and often gave away what he had gained by weeks of toil; but he had only himself to provide for, and without a wife or children, and with no object of peculiar interest to engage his attention, he cared little whether he spent the night on the highest peak of Mount Washington, or in one of the valleys, seven or eight thousand feet below it. There was nobody to be anxious about him, or to count the live long hours while he was away, and he often boasted that his home was every where.

But this could not last always—for Nash was yet but a stripling, and it was not surprising that among his wanderings he should find a girl pretty enough to think it were well for a hunter to have a home. He told strange stories to Nancy, (for that was her name) of what dreadful precipices he had scaled, what chasms he had leaped, what fierce and blood thirsty animals he had encountered, and she listened, till, like Desdemona, she lost her heart.

She was the gentlest of human beings, and though only a domestic, had a heart as tender, and a complexion as fair, as any born gentlewoman. It almost overwhelmed her to think of the hardships poor Nash endured, while she enjoyed the comforts of an old fashioned kitchen corner, with a forest of logs blazing in the chimney, and the privilege of sitting at the table with the conscientious Puritan family, who would have thought it a sin to make a difference on earth, when the Supreme Being made none in heaven. It is not wonderful that when Nash proposed marrying Nancy, and promised to run no more "hair breath 'scapes," she should listen to him and consent to become his lawful wife. But it was necessary that he should make another hunting excursion before they were married—he said he must go once more through his favourite gap of the mountains, and bring back subsistence for the winter. It was in vain that Nancy assured him she would want nothing—Nash knew better, and after many a kind embrace set off, promising to be back in a very short time. Nancy's idea of time and his did not agree—weeks passed away, and the winter came on with its usual threatening aspect—at length she heard accidentally, that the hunter was about forty miles distant. The strange idea entered her head to go to him—it was wonderful that such a timid, gentle being should have thought of such a thing—but she knew that next to herself, Nash loved the chase, and she feared that perhaps he might content himself with hunting bears and wolves all winter. The family tried hard to dissuade her from the wild scheme, but she determined to go—and as poor Nancy belonged to nobody, nobody had a right to controul her. She wrapped herself in her cloak, and set off to follow her lover through the gap.

The snow was already deep, and there was not a house for many a long mile. Storm after storm came on—the family with which she had lived became anxious about her; they said, "it was distraction in her to go; it was tempting of Providence, and she must take the consequences." In the mean time, Nash was unusually successful, and began his course homeward, laden with riches. It was just one week after Nancy's departure that he reached the little hill before mentioned. It was late at night; the whole earth was covered with crusted snow—you might walk on the hill tops without making any impression. The trees were hung with icicles, and glittered in the moonlight like diamonds. Nash ascended the little hill, when he came into the valley through which the Saco runs,—he loved such scenes and such evenings; he thought of Nancy, and wished she was there—he knew he could wrap her in his large moose-skin and keep her warm. He was not apt to be imaginative, and yet all at once he thought he perceived his mistress standing opposite to him and leaning her head against a tree. He strained his eye-balls to look at the object. "Moonlight," said he, "makes strange work of things—my head is always full of her," and he looked another way—but when he turned she still stood there. He approached nearer; the moon never shone brighter, and not an object intercepted its beams—they fell upon the pale unearthly countenance of the maiden—her eyes were closed as if asleep—he took her hand; it was cold and hard like marble. Weary and benumbed, she had reclined against the tree—it was sweet to rest there and dream of her lover! She slept, and awoke no more! Her form was slightly inclined forward, and the glittering branches bent over her, and her winding sheet was a robe of ice! Such is the tradition of Nancy's Hill.

POLITENESS.

"I'm glad to see you,"—Mr. Editor—Never was language employed in telling a lie, more than as expressed in the little words above. You espied at a distance one approaching you, who you knew had in his pocket a demand against you—let me turn about said you, and having traversed full two squares upon turning the corner near your house, behold! your creditor had changed his mind and changed his course, and here you are full butt—then "how d'ye do" say you; "I'm glad to see you."—Oh! what a whapper.

The mistress is in the back room seeing to the cutting up of pork, with greasy apron—Lady Somebody and daughters call with Mr. —, the door is open and they walk in—"O, how d'ye do? I'm glad to see you." There is another whapper!

Miss —, is sitting on the sofa in tete a tete with her intended lord. A rap is heard, the servant says "Miss Curious has called"—"confound Miss Curious, I wish she'd quit coming here." Enter Miss Curious, "O, how d'ye do? I'm glad to see you." Oh! what a whapper this.

Madam has pickles or sausages to make, and is up to her ears in pots and kettles, when Mrs. Somebody enters with her six little ones, all dressed off as neat as if they'd just been freed from six months imprisonment in a bandbox. "Bless me! I'm extremely glad to see you!" It's a thumper; it's a downright lie; in her heart she wishes her and all her brood to —. I'd liked to have said it.

When I hear a person say—"do call again and see me," it sounds very much like "John, show the gentleman out."

If I hear a man say he is sorry for the losses of his dear friend, I generally translate it, "hold fast is a good maxim."

There is no such thing, as sincere politeness; to be what the fashionable world terms polite, we must, necessarily, be hypocritical. The list of lies that have been couched in the words, "I'm glad to see you," would swell a volume. But as it is late, I must close and go to bed, and to-morrow, if you, Mr. Editor, can spare time, I shall be "glad to see you."

If there is any person to whom you feel a dislike, that is the person of whom you ought never to speak.

THE TRAVELLER.

SLAUGHTER OF SWANS.

Extract from "a Journey up the Mississippi," by J. J. Audubon, author of "The Birds of America."

On the second morning after our arrival, I heard a movement in the Indian camp, and having hastily risen and dressed myself, I discovered that a canoe containing half a dozen squaws and as many hunters, was about to leave the Illinois for the Tennessee side of the river. I learned also that their object was to proceed to a large lake opposite, to which immense flocks of swans resorted every morning. These flocks are so numerous and strong, that it is, however incredible it may at first seem, a well known fact, that they keep the lakes which they frequent free from ice, merely by swimming upon them night and day. Having obtained permission to join the party, I seated myself in the canoe, well supplied with ammunition and a bottle of whiskey—in a few moments the paddles were at work, and we swiftly crossed to the opposite shore. I was not much astonished, during our passage, to see all the labour of paddling performed by the squaws; for this feature of Indian manners was not new to me; but I was surprised to see that upon entering the canoe, the hunters laid down, and positively slept during the whole passage. On landing, the squaws, after securing the boat, proceeded to search for nuts, whilst the gentlemen hunters made the best of their way, through the "thick and thin," to the lake.

Those who have never seen any thing of what I call "thick and thin," may perhaps think I allude to something like the furze which cover some of the moors of Scotland—but they must imagine the shores of the Ohio, at its junction with the great muddy river called the Mississippi, to be fairly overgrown with a kind of thick-set cotton-trees, that rise as closely from the muddy soil of the bank as can well be conceived—they are not to be beaten down; you must slide yourself between them—and in summer you have a pretty task to keep off the musquitos that abound amongst them. After these thickets there are small nasty lagoons, which you must either swim across, jump over, or leap into and be drowned, according to your taste or capability; but when the task of reaching the lake is accomplished—what a feast for a sportsman! There they lie, by hundreds, of a white or rich cream colour—either dipping their black bills in the water, or leaning backwards, and gently resting with one leg expanded, floating along and basking in the sunshine. The moment that these beautiful birds saw our videttes, they started up in immediate apprehension; but the plan of our Indians drove the poor swans the nearer to their fate, the farther they retreated from either shore. Men were placed behind the trees, who knew how to take a dead aim, and every shot told. Being divided, three on one side, and four on the other, the moment that one party had driven the swans towards the other, the former hid themselves; and when the birds flew from the fire of the latter, they alighted within good distance of those who had first alarmed them. What would those English sportsmen—who, after walking a whole day, and exploding a pound of powder, march home in great glee, holding a partridge by the legs, with a smile on their lips and a very empty stomach—say to this day's devastation among the swans! I saw these beautiful birds floating on the water their backs downwards, their heads under the surface, and their legs in the air, struggling in the last agonies of life, to the number of 50—their beautiful skins all intended for the ladies of Europe.

The sport was now over—the sun was nearly even with the tops of the trees; a conch was sounded, and after a while the squaws appeared, dragging the canoe and moving about in quest of the dead game. It was at last all transported to the river's edge, and we landed on the Illinois bank again before dark. The fires were lighted—each man eat his mess of pecan nuts and bear's fat, and then stretched himself out, with his feet close to the small heap of coal intended for the night. The females then began their work; it was their duty to skin the birds. I observed them for some time, and then retired to rest; very well satisfied with the sports of this day—the 25th of December.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1839.

GIDDINS' TESTIMONY. The reader will find in another column an article from the Ontario Messenger, in which the propriety of admitting the testimony of Giddins on the late trials at Canandaigua, is treated in a manner calculated to settle all doubts on the subject. The argument is so plain and conclusive, that we think any one who reads it, will, if he be honest, acquiesce in the decision of the court.

ALBANY IRISH ASSOCIATION. The spirited address of the friends of Ireland in this city, which we publish to-day, is worthy the serious attention of the reader. It develops a loftiness of sentiment and independence of feeling which do great honour to its authors. It is natural for Americans to sympathize with the oppressed: they have tasted of liberty and know its worth: and they will not, surely, permit an appeal to their love of justice and their benevolent feelings to go unanswered. Associations, auxiliary to one in Dublin, are formed in Boston, New-York, and other cities to the south; and among their members are to be found some of the first men in the country. The long suffering of Ireland has aroused the indignant feelings of her friends, and they are slowly but surely promoting her emancipation.

SUNDAY MAILS. We did intend to publish this week the report of the committee of the senate of the United States, on the petitions presented to congress for a discontinuance of the transportation of the mails on Sunday, but its length has compelled us to postpone it another week. Our readers would see it, perhaps, if we should not publish it. But it is a document which should be read by every man, woman, and child in the country, and read in such a manner that it will be remembered. Many honest men have lent their influence to promote the object of the petitioners; but we think they will change their views upon a perusal of the report. A connexion with politics cannot benefit religion; and we are confident that the true friends of Christianity will depend rather upon an active exercise of the virtues which their profession inculcates, than upon any temporary influence which the perverted authority of public men may at any time bestow upon them.

ANTI-MASONICK NEWSPAPERS. One of the most powerful proofs yet discovered in favour of the excessive patriotism of the anti-masonicks, is the great desire they manifest to create avenues through which they may pour forth their disinterested libations. The little squad of Morganites in Boston have a very excellent way of gratifying any desires of this kind which they may be so full of "divine horror" [vide patriot Phelps] as to entertain. With the labour which is ordinarily bestowed upon a single sheet of less than common pretensions, they have the faculty of producing half a dozen bantlings. First, there is the "Free Press" which will never be accused of a slavish devotion to any commendable principle; then there is the Anti-Masonick Christian Herald, printed with the same type and containing the same matter as the Free Press, and it is just as much like a christian publication as a beetle is like a hand saw; then there is the Baptist Herald, another emblem of piety and christian forbearance, manufactured in the same way; then there is a 7 by 9 adventurer, got up in the same disinterested manner (by making use of the types set up for the Free Press,) and y'cleped The Anti-Freemason. Now, reader, have you the hardihood to think that any of the patriotick souls who are engaged in fanning the embers of antimasonry wish to put money in their purses? Oh, no. The anti-masons are all pure and holy men, from Hascall, Miller, and Weed, down to the dregs of the land of steady habits.

RUSSIAN SOLDIERS. They have a curious and arbitrary method of making soldiers in the Russian military colonies. In each house is placed a soldier of the line with authority to dispose its male inmates so as to prepare them for the field of battle. About 12,000 men, of all classes, are in this way taught the mysteries of military discipline, and made to undergo the most rigorous cruelty. It appears, from a work by M. Niellon Gibling, recently published in Paris, that the Russian troops of the line amount to 384,000; to which may be added the imperial guard, amounting to 90,000; colonized troops, 120,000; garrison regiments, 60,000; irregular cavalry, 50,000; and the Polish army, 60,000; making a force of 764,000, either in actual service, or liable to be called out at a short notice. M. Gilbert states that upwards of 300,000 men were ready to pass the Pruth at the commencement of the present campaign; and a perfect understanding having been effected between the Russian and Prussian courts, there is no longer any necessity for a Russian force on the frontiers of the latter kingdom; and hence an army of more than 100,000 men, which was stationed there, is placed at the emperor's disposal.

GREEK SCHOOLS. A commission appointed by M. Capo d'Istria, (president of the government) to enquire into the state of education in the Greek Isles, has reported, (after having examined seventeen of them) that on the 1st of May last, those seventeen islands possessed ninety-two schools, comprehending 2,333 scholars, from five to thirty years of age. Twenty-three schools, containing 969 scholars, followed the Lancasterian method of teaching. Thirteen of the ninety-two schools were established under the dominion of the Turks. Reading, writing, ancient and modern Greek, arithmetick, geography, and the ancient history of Greece, are taught in all the schools. French, Italian, and English are taught in some; and Latin and geometry in a few others. Theology, metaphysics, natural philosophy, and chymistry are taught in a great number.

GERMAN BEDS. The Germans consider it not healthy to lie warm at night, and consequently their beds are constructed upon a plan not much admired by travellers. A Mr. Best, an English scribbler, has published a volume of memoirs, in which he complains bitterly of having to lie with his feet bare, of having no covering to "tuck under," and of being compelled to practice the stillness of the grave to prevent the pique from tumblinn off. Mr. Best did not much approve of this usage, so he damned them for being protestants, and went his way.

FRENCH MINERAL SPRINGS. The French government has appointed a distinguished chymist to make an analysis on the spot of the different mineral springs of France. The mineral waters in the southern departments are said to possess extraordinary powers. Even the mud near the town of Dax is of such efficacy, that the soldiers who are quartered there, when afflicted with rheumatism, find a speedy relief by covering the part affected with mud, which they remove when dry.

THE IRISH SHIELD and Monthly Milesian, is a Historical, Literary, and Dramatick journal, edited by George Pepper, and published in the city of New-York. We have little knowledge of Mr. Pepper as a writer, but judging from such of his productions as we have read, we should say that he is capable of conducting The Irish Shield in such a manner as not only to interest his readers, but likewise to do essential service to the interests of his native country. A friendly feeling towards Ireland is awakening throughout this country, and associations for the relief of her suffering inhabitants are forming in the principal cities of the union. The Irish Shield is intended to be such an advocate of her character and rights as the state of affairs calls for, and as such we would recommend it to the attention of the publick. It is published by Caleb Bartlett, at No. 76, Bowery, New-York, at $3.50 per annum, in advance. The following is the table of contents of the January number—Address to the Publick: Introduction to the History of Ireland; Ancient Mode of celebrating Christmas in Ireland; Irish Vindicator: Baltimore Republican; New Year's Day; Grecian Females; Literary and Biographical Notices of Irish Authors and Artists, No. IV.; The Pleasures of Home; Brian Boroihme's Harp; Desultory Thoughts on Poetry, Music, and Eloquence, No. I.; Irish Topography; Descriptive Sketches of the Ecclesiastical Edifices of Dublin; The Ruined Castle of Dalky; Kathleen O'Neil, a Play; Original Patch Work; Selected Shreds; Questions arising from the Drama; The Drama; Occasional Prologue, for Mr. Pepper's historical Irish Drama of Ireland Redeemed.

AN ADDRESS TO THE CITIZENS OF ALBANY, AND ITS VICINITY. The Friends of Ireland, in the city of Albany, feeling a deep sympathy for the oppressions of their fellow men, and desirous to promote the cause of "universal emancipation," are induced to appeal to the liberality and patriotism of an independent publick, in behalf of seven millions of Irishmen, who are now labouring under the most severe disqualifications on account of their religious tenets. They hope that a free community will come forward to aid the Society now organized in this city, the object of which is to act in concert with similar associations formed in many parts of this Union and in Canada. These different Societies are composed of the liberal of every nation and of every creed, and are influenced by the sole motive of cheering and adding energy to the successful efforts, which this oppressed people are making to extricate themselves from the persecutions of an aristocratical ascendancy, which, to secure to its hirelings all places of profit and honour, has recourse to those intolerant and degrading measures, by which Irishmen are deprived of their freedom of conscience, and that participation of equal rights, the benign influence of which is happily experienced, in an eminent degree, by every American citizen.

No country has suffered so much on account of religion as Ireland; for no country would have endured such indignities. Seven millions of her inhabitants are disqualified for office, they have no voice in the councils of the nation; they take no part in framing those laws which govern them, but are compelled to support, in extravagant affluence, a set of men of another creed, who are chiefly instrumental in excluding from civil and military honours, this vast majority of the nation. No matter how distinguished their talents may be, they remain unpatronised, or are forced to emigrate to a foreign country, where, by a free concession, they may enjoy those privileges denied them in the land of their nativity.

It would be intruding on the intelligence of Americans, to give even a brief sketch of the sanguinary code, which has long distracted the peace of Ireland, or to detail the restrictions which government has placed on the industry and commerce of that fertile country—A country abounding in all that could make a nation happy, were her sons encouraged by the Republican motto, "that all men are born free and equal."

The Association in Dublin, to which the one in this is an auxiliary, only claims, in a constitutional manner, the repeal of those odious laws which have given to a few nobles the power to lord it over their fellow men. It does not intend that Ireland should be separated from England; but it demands an equal share in the privileges of the British Constitution. To obtain this, it is necessary that Ireland should be fairly represented in parliament—that the feelings and interests of the representative should be closely identified with those of his constituents, and that the freeholder should have the unrestrained privilege of going to the polls to vote for the man of his choice, and not to be led like the victim to the altar, there to sacrifice his birth-right, and the freedom of his native home.

Most of the freeholders, on account of their indigent and dependent situation, are entirely under the controul of the rich land holders, and the contributions now making in Ireland, and in this country, are intended to indemnify the independent voter for the manly stand he takes against the overbearing landlord, who would urge him to enslave his beloved country.

The influence of the Association in Ireland has been advantageously felt over the whole kingdom. It has awakened the powerful spirit of the nation to assert her rights, and it has instructed Irishmen how to combine in harmony, without regard to sectarian feeling, and to exercise for the benefit of the entire nation, those energies, which in the cabinet and in the field have added laurels to the brow of an ungrateful monarch. Even the Association has, within the past year, exerted its salutary influence, to repeal the "TAX ACT," by which the dissenter is exonerated from his former grievances; and through its agency men have already been elected to Parliament, who pledge themselves to advocate the just rights of the Irish nation.

The friends of Ireland in this city, then appeal to Americans to countenance this struggle for the rights of man.—They have a just and lively sense of their own inestimable privileges, and it is confidently hoped, that men who are themselves free, will cheerfully lend their support in procuring the civil and religious liberty of a nation, whose sons have fought and bled in the glorious contest for American freedom.

The sum limited for membership in the Society, is One Dollar; which may be handed to the Treasurer (Mr. John Duffau). The publick may rest assured, that all the moneys which may be collected, will be gratefully acknowledged, and in due time shall be transmitted to the Association in Dublin, there to be devoted to the cause of humanity—the Emancipation of Ireland.

JOHN CASSIDY,
JAMES MAHER,
M. MALONE,
MICH'L CAGGER,
WM. O'DONNELL, } Committee.

THE MORGAN AFFAIR—TESTIMONY OF GIDDINS.—The exclusion of this individual from testifying in the case of Eli Bruce and others, has been a subject of much animadversion by the anti-masonick papers throughout the state. The decision of the court has been boldly arraigned and suspicion attempted to be cast upon its purity and impartiality. To men of intelligence, and who are acquainted with the character of the very respectable members of our common pleas bench, and especially of the learned judge, who for so many years, and with such distinguished ability, uprightness, and impartiality, has presided over that court, an attempt to vindicate the correctness of that decision, and repel the imputations cast upon the character of the Court, may appear gratuitous and unnecessary; but the prevalence of a belief among a portion of the community, that the decision in the question was in violation of the law and of the constitution of the state, requires that an effort be made to disabuse them of their erroneous, though honest prejudices on this subject.

In order to exhibit the reason of the exclusion of Giddins' testimony, it will be proper to advert for a moment to the nature of an oath. An oath is an appeal to God, as the moral Governor of the world, to witness the sincerity of what is about to be testified, and an imprecation of his vengeance upon the witness, if he does not testify truly. If therefore, the witness denies the existence of the Supreme Being, or does not believe that He will punish perjury, he cannot with any propriety be sworn. As an appeal to Heaven, an oath, in the case of the individual supposed, is but solemn mockery; the Being whose notice of the act is invoked and whose vengeance upon perjury is imprecated, either does not exist, or is indifferent to the truth or falsity of what is to be testified. Whether under this view of the subject, Mr. Giddins should have been sworn, will appear from the testimony produced on the trial. As here we shall pass over that portion of it which was verbal, and direct the attention of the reader to the higher, and more satisfactory evidence furnished by Giddins himself, in a written declaration of his opinions, deliberately penned in the confidence of a private correspondence with an intimate friend. In a letter to David Morrison, dated the 10th of April, 1827, of great length, and as its whole scope and tenor indicates, written for the express purpose of giving a formal statement of the writer's religious creed, are the following, among many other coincident passages: "God has the same care of man as of an insect, of an insect as of a tree, of a tree as of a stone: With him there can be no difference or distinction between beauty and deformity, virtue and vice, perfection and imperfection. Prayers are but mockery to His name, and ought not to be encouraged." "All men can do can not change Him; He is not susceptible of persuasion, and as relates to man, he is incapable of love or hatred." "This is my notion of virtue and vice; that they do not refer to any future time, but relate altogether to man in his present state." "My views are not in accordance with the Bible, for that book represents the Deity as vindictive, revengeful, and inconsistent."

Such were the views of Mr. Giddins but a few months previous to the abduction of William Morgan. By the testimony of Mr. Griffin and Mr. Weed, a declaration of his last May, was proved, that "his religious opinions were fixed, and that he had not changed them for years." It was upon the evidence of this letter, that the court came to the unanimous decision, not to admit Mr. Giddins to his oath. Now if the competency of a witness requires a belief of the Divine cognizance of the acts of his creatures, and that he will punish false swearing, (a point which we suppose established, by unnumbered decisions, and the uniform and immemorial practice of courts in every civilised country,) then there can be no question but Edward Giddins was properly and legally rejected. The only question for the court to decide was, what is the law of the state as applicable to that case; with the policy or impolicy, the propriety or impropriety of the laws, they had nothing to do. If the principle, in any of its tendencies or applications, should be found prejudicial to individual rights, or subversive of the ends of justice, then it is incumbent on the legislature to provide a remedy. It is the province of courts of justice, not to enact or change laws, but to declare and execute them as they actually exist. It is, however, deserving of serious consideration, whether the abrogation of this rule and the indiscriminate admission of witnesses denying moral responsibility, and insensible of the religious sanction of an oath, would not lead to consequences more dangerous than any which can result from the operations of the law as it now stands. It is only a sense of moral obligation and future retribution, which can make an oath what it has been fitly termed, "the adamantine chain which binds the soul of man to the throne of eternal justice."

But it is said that by the rejection of this witness, the perpetrators of a flagrant outrage are to escape the punishment due to their crime. So, too, it might happen that an individual convicted on record of larceny or perjury, might be the sole witness of a robbery or murder, and that if admitted to his oath, he would testify truly; and yet as the law disallows the testimony of such a person, the highway robber or murderer must in that case go unpunished.

Many encomiums have been lavished upon the character of Mr. Giddins, who is held up to the publick as a paragon of integrity and moral worth. But what, upon his own showing, are his claims to such a distinction? He has proclaimed to the world the fact, that he was concerned in one of the most nefarious outrages that was ever perpetrated in a civilized community. The liberty and life of an injured fellow being were placed in his hands. Day after day he held the ill-fated Morgan confined in a dreary prison house, and heard unmoved the supplicating cries of his prisoner, for sympathy and deliverance. By simply turning a key he might have sent him forth to liberty and life. He might have had recourse to the civil authority, but he did not do it; the murderous tragedy is consummated, and long afterwards, when an outraged community come to make inquiry for the blood of their fellow, and an honest indignation is enkindled against the atrocious transaction, then, forsooth, this Mr. Giddins becomes the champion of a virtuous excitement! Instead of humbling himself "in sackcloth and ashes" before that community whose most sacred rights he had outraged, he sets up for the leader of a party, and does not hesitate even to trumpet through almanacks and newspapers, the story of his own infamy, that he may speculate upon publick curiosity and excitement. The impropriety and injustice of thus giving publicity to the particulars of a transaction in reference to which he then expected to be a witness against his associates in a crime, thereby inflaming the feelings of the publick against the accused, and leading them to prejudice the cause upon ex parte statements, must be obvious to every one, and the conduct of Mr. Giddins, whether considered in reference to the sordid motives which actuate it, or the relation in which he stands to all the parties, deserves unmixed and most decided reprobation. [Ont. Messenger.]

The venerable Col. PICKERING died at Salem, Mass. on the 29th ult. aged 84 years. The following brief sketch of his character and life, is from the Boston Patriot.

He was born in Salem in 1746; was graduated at Harvard University in 1768; in 1774 he wrote the celebrated address to Gov. Gage, on the subject of the Boston port bill; in 1776, in common with the other distinguished patriots of those days, he took up arms in defence of his country's rights; in the same year he was appointed a judge of the court of common pleas for Essex, and sole judge of the maritime court, for the middle district, including Boston, Salem, and other ports of Essex, which offices he held till he was appointed in 1776 to the command of a regiment of 700 men from Essex, in the continental army; in 1777, he was appointed by Washington Adjutant General of the army; in 1780, he was elected by congress Quartermaster General during the rest of the war. From 1790 to 1794, Col. Pickering was charged by Washington with negotiations with the Indians. In 1791, he was appointed Postmaster General; in 1794, Secretary of War; and in 1795, Secretary of State, which office he filled till 1800, when he was removed by the late President Adams. In 1803, he was appointed by the legislature of Massachusetts a senator in congress, where he remained till 1811. In 1814, he was elected a representative in congress, and held his seat till 1817. From that period he lived a private life, enjoying the society of his friends, and devoting a large portion of his attention to his favourite agricultural pursuits. All who came in contact with him, as a citizen and member of society, could not hesitate to admire his many sterling excellencies of character. Even when compelled to dissent from his opinions, it was impossible to refrain from respecting the purity of his motives. His age and his great experience in the publick service always commanded, as they merited, the respect of his opponents. To the following concluding remarks of an obituary of Colonel Pickering, in the Salem Gazette, from which the foregoing facts are condensed, we readily yield our concurrence.

"Of his private virtues there is no difference of opinion. All men of all parties speak of them with rapture and acknowledge them with admiration. This voluntary homage has been paid to his character amid all the vicissitudes of party. In all the private relations of life he was honest, faithful and humane. No man ever impeached his integrity with any colour of justice. Love of truth, and integrity that could not be shaken, were his characteristics. "Where truth led the way, he did not fear to follow." His manners were plain and simple; his morals pure and unblemished; and his belief and profession of the christian religion through a long life, accompanied with practice and conduct in accordance with its divine precepts."

POETRY.

If we judge rightly, the following lines are from the pen of J. G. WHITTIER, a young and elegant writer, into whose hands the American Manufacturer, a Boston hebdomadal, has recently passed. They are taken from the Manufacturer of last week, and are "founded on a tradition that exists among the natives of an island in the Pacific, that a crew of white men were once cast upon their shores, and that some of them lived to a great age."

THE SURVIVOR.

I am the last—I am the last—
A lone forgotten wanderer now.
Yon tree, which groans to every blast
With bending trunk and leafless bough,
Alone, where once a forest threw
Its gorgeous colourings to the day,
Surviving all that round it grew,
Is but the type of my decay.

I am the last—I am the last—
My kindred and my race are gone;
These old and withered hands have cast
The earth upon them one by one—
I loved them all—and I have wept
Full sadly at their memory's shrine—
But years have passed—long years, since crept
A tear adown these cheeks of mine.

Ah! once I wept—my heart was not
So desolate—so seared as now:
And I could weep, till I had sought
In vain for one familiar brow,
All—all were gone—the hunter stood
Alone before me, dark and grim,
My heart had not his savage mood—
It had no fellowship with him.

His gloomy spirit ne'er had known
The linkings of affection's chain—
He cursed my grief, he mocked my groan,
Till madness rushed on heart and brain.
I could not weep—I could not weep—
The fountain of my heart was dry—
'T was seared when in his last, long sleep
I saw my latest kinsman lie.

I watched beside the sufferer's bed
At dead of night—the torch was dim,
And blended with the moonbeams, shed
A faint and ghastly light on him.
I watched the pale and changeful glow,
Along his moveless features flit
And wiped the damps from off his brow
Where death his fearful seal had set.

The grey morn broke, and still I gazed
On the wan features of the dead,
The morning passed and noontide blazed
Its searching radiance round my head.
A weary day!—and yet I kept
My watchings where the sleeper lay,
Till night with wing of darkness swept
The lingering western light away.

Ah! why should memory conjure up
Those visions of departed things!
A thousand times I've drained that cup
Of wild and dark remembrings.
That dreary night, his grave I made,
Yon lone and blighted tree beneath,
I smoothed the green turf o'er his head,
And left him to the calm of death.

Our native land! our own loved shore!
Oh, none to thee our fate shall tell,
For memory wakens there no more,
Our last and sorrowful farewell.
The hands we clasped in friendship true,
The hearts that throbbed with ours are still,
And all who waved the long adieu
Are silent as the graves they fill.

Yes, all are gone—but tears were shed
When the cold earth was o'er them pressed,
And love and friendship softly tread
Around their hallowed place of rest.
But who, when nature's strife is passed,
Shall watch beside my dying bed—
Shall close my beamless eyes, and cast
Earth's mantle o'er my sleeping head!

Father and God! I murmur not Against thy high and holy will,
Though lonely—by the world forgot,
Thine eye is on thy creature still.
And though no earthly friend be nigh,
When fades the light which now is dim,
Thy presence shall the void supply,
And smooth the bed of death for him!

From the Boston Statesman.

THE LUNATICK.

She leaned from the balcony then, and sung
With a sweet and lute-like tone,
And the gentle wind her black tresses flung,
As she lingered there alone;
And her pensive song—'twas of early love,
A crystal from memory's stream;
And she turned her eyes to the stars above
And watched their varying gleam.

Her song was hushed for a moment then,
Whilst the musick of stirring leaves
Came faintly up from the elmy glen,
And she looked as one that grieves;
Sung she—oh, where is my dark-haired boy,
That went to the heaving sea,
That went away as a sweet-toned wind
From his pleasant home and me?

Have I not sought him in the vale
In the depths of the shadowy glen,
And over the waves where the sea-birds wail
And out in the midst of men?
I have sought him out in the midst of men,
My love of the haughty brow—
He went away—but he told me then
He would be with me but now.

He is not come! I have watched the sun
A thousand times arise,
And a thousand times, when his work was done,
I have seen him leave the skies;
I have looked away to the ragged hill
That over-frowns the sea,
And called to the wave his name—but still
He comes not home to me.

Will I not go from my prison walls,
And look on the holy sun,
And gather the crimson coronals,
On the rock where the sea-waves run?
Sweetly the waters dwell this eve,
Along in their sunlit caves;
Why should my love so lonely grieve?
And she fell beneath the waves.

The Nightingale Flower is from A New Year's Eve, and other Poems, by Bernard Barton, published in England at the close of the last year. The work is distinguished for the same pure and lofty feeling which characterises all the productions of its author.

THE NIGHTINGALE FLOWER.

Fair flower of silent night!
Unto thy bard an emblem thou shouldst be:
His fount of song, in hours of garish light,
Is closed like thee.

But, with the vesper hour,
Silence and solitude its depths unseal:
Its hidden springs, like thy unfolding flower,
Their life reveal.

Were it not sweeter still
To give imagination holier scope,
And deem that thus the future may fulfil
A loftier hope?

That, as thy lovely bloom
Sheds round its perfume at the close of day,
With beauty sweeter from surrounding gloom,
A star-like ray:—

So in life's dark decline,
When the grave's shadows are around me cast,
My spirit's hopes may, like thy blossoms shine
Bright at the last;

And as the grateful scent
Of thy meek flower, the memory of my name!
Oh! who could wish for prouder monument,
Or purer fame?

The darkness of the grave
Would wear no gloom appalling to the sight,
Might Hope's fair blossom, like thy flowret, brave
Death's wintry night.

Knowing the dawn drew nigh,
Of an eternal, though a sunless day,
Whose glorious flowers must bloom immortally,
Nor fear decay.

CHANGE.

BY MISS L. E. LONDON.

The wind is sweeping o'er the hill;
It hath a mournful sound,
As if it felt the difference
Its weary wing hath found.

A little while that wandering wind
Swept over life and flower;
For there was green on every tree,
And bloom for every hour.

It wandered through the pleasant wood,
And caught the dove's lone song;
And by the garden bed, and bore
The rose's breath along.
But hoarse and sullenly it sweeps;
No rose is opening now—
No musick, for the wood-dove's nest
Is vacant on the bough.

Oh, human heart and wandering wind,
Go look upon the past;
The likeness is the same with each—
Their summer did not last.
Each mourns above the things it loved—
One o'er a flower and leaf;
The other over hopes and joys,
Whose beauty was as brief.

We hope the reader will be pleased with the following lines, as every lover of theatrical fun has reason to admire their author.

From the Providence Evening Gazette.

SERENADE.

BY G. F. HYATT, OF THE TREMONT THEATRE.

The moon is up—her radiant beam
Is dancing in the woodland stream;
Up, lady, up! to the blissful bower,
While heavenly brightness lights the hour;
Then come with me, yon gallant steed,
Shall bear us safely o'er the mead;
Where by my sword and buckler true,
I'll live for love, or die for you—
Away, away, away!

The moon is up, and o'er the brake—
The queen of night is on the lake—
Each limpid ripple sparkles anew,
And heav'n smiles on the glittering dew;
Then come my dear, the night creeps on,
Come, my love, ere the moon is gone;
On Zephyr's wings we'll speed away,
To Cupid's bower, by break of day—
Away, away, away!

The moon is up—above yon hill—
The moon is in each bubbling rill—
No more delay, while youth and bliss
Invite thee forth in a night like this;
Then come, ere Phoebe decks the lawn—
Come, come away, ere peep of dawn—
Hymen and Cupid choose the hour,
Then let's away to the moonlit bower.
Away, away, away!!!

We take the following pretty song from an English paper. It is said to be quite popular in the London theatres.

LOVE CALLED ON ME ONE MORNING.

BY RICHARD RYAN.

Love called on me one morning,
And sought my smile to win;
But forward boys then scorning,
I would not let him in:
I thought that Love would weep
To be by me forsaken,
But I took but one sly peep,
And found myself mistaken.

I'll search through all the city,
And hunt the field and grove,
And ask the young and pretty
If they have seen young Love.
Love flies fast as the wind,
For wings he has about him,
And to my cost I find
I cannot live without him.

Says Tom "Your lass looked like a winters day,
When last I saw her with the Misses Flirty."
"Indeed, you're merry; but tell me, pray?"
"Why then," quoth Tom, "she was both short and dirty."

THIS PAPER

Is published every Saturday, by E. B. CHILD.

AT THE CORNER OF NORTH MARKET AND STEUBEN STREETS, ALBANY, N. Y.

TERMS—To city subscribers, Three Dollars a year. To subscribers who receive their papers by mail, Two Dollars and Fifty Cents, IN ADVANCE—otherwise, Three Dollars. JOB PRINTING neatly executed at this office.

AND ALBANY SATURDAY MAGAZINE.

VOL. III.

ALBANY, N. Y. SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1829.

NO. 3

MASONICK RECORD.

CONSTITUTION

And Regulations of the GRAND ROYAL ARCH CHAPTER of the State of New-York, adopted at the city of Albany, on the 7th day of February, 1805.

(Continued.)

Sect. 9. That no candidate residing in or near any city or town where a Chapter of Royal Arch Masons or Mark Master Masons is holden under this jurisdiction shall be exalted or advanced in any Chapter or Lodge in any other place, without a recommendation from the Chapter or Lodge nearest the place where said candidate may reside.

Sect. 10. That no candidate whose application may be rejected in any Chapter or Lodge under this jurisdiction, shall be exalted or advanced in any other Chapter or Lodge which shall have received official notice of such rejection, without an appeal to the Grand Chapter.

Sect. 11. That no Royal Arch Mason shall be admitted as a member or visiter, in any Royal Arch Chapter under this jurisdiction, unless he shall have regularly received the several degrees of Entered Apprentice, Fellow Craft, Master Mason, Mark Master Mason, Past Master, Most Excellent Master, and Royal Arch Mason.

Sect. 12. That whenever a warrant shall be issued to authorize the holding a Chapter, and in the same to hold a Lodge of Most Excellent Masters, Past Masters, and Mark Master Masons, the High Priest, King and Scribe of such Chapter shall ex-officio, be the Master and Wardens of said Lodge.

Sect. 13. It shall be the duty of the Grand Secretary, at the expense of this Grand Chapter, to cause to be printed a sufficient number of blank warrants and certificates, agreeable to the form in this constitution, and also devise a suitable form for annual returns; cause blanks to be printed, and from time to time, as need may be, to transmit them to the several Chapters and Lodges belonging to this Grand Body.

Sect. 14. The Grand High Priest, or his Deputy, may annually appoint one or more discreet and well informed Royal Arch Masons, Grand Visitors, whose duty it shall be, if required by any Chapter or Lodge belonging to this Grand Body, to visit such Chapter or Lodge, and instruct them in the lectures of the degrees which they have taken, and the mode of work; and such Chapter or Lodge shall pay such visiter a reasonable compensation for the same.

Sect. 15. No Chapter shall be removed without the knowledge of the High Priest, nor any motion made for that purpose in his absence; but if the High Priest be present, and a motion is made and seconded for removing the Chapter to some more convenient place, (within the limits prescribed in the warrant) the High Priest shall immediately cause notifications to be issued to all the members, informing them of the motion of removal, and the time and place when the question is to be determined, which shall be issued at least ten days previous to the appointed meeting; but if the High Priest, after motion duly made as aforesaid, should refuse or neglect to cause the notices to be issued as aforesaid, the officer next in rank who may be present at the next regular meeting following, upon a motion duly made for that purpose, may in like manner issue the said notice.

Sect. 16. All Mark Master's Lodges, in case of removal, shall be governed by the same rules as prescribed in the foregoing section.

Sect. 17. Whenever a warrant shall issue to authorize the holding a new Chapter, the same shall be installed by the Grand High Priest, or the Deputy Grand High Priest, unless where the distance is such that they, or either of them, cannot conveniently attend; in which case, they, or either of them, may appoint some capable High Priest or Past High Priest of a Chapter, by a dispensation under their hands and seals, or the hand and seal of either of them, to perform the services aforesaid; and the installation of Mark Master Lodges shall be done in the same manner, excepting a dispensation may be granted to any Master or Past Master of a Mark Lodge, although a High Priest or Past High Priest is to be preferred; and the form of installation in those cases shall be agreeable to that directed by the General Grand Constitution.

Sect. 18. No person shall be permitted to sit in this Grand Chapter as a visiter, without the unanimous consent of all the members present.

Sect. 19. Every Chapter or Lodge under this jurisdiction ought to assemble at least once in three months, for the purpose of perfecting themselves in working in their respective degrees; and such as shall not meet for the space of one year, shall forfeit all their privileges under this Grand Chapter, and the name of their warrant shall be struck from the record of the same, unless some sufficient reason be offered to induce a forbearance.

Sect. 20. Whenever it shall be deemed necessary to alter or amend this Constitution, the same shall be done in the manner following. The Grand Chapter in session may propose any alterations or amendments, reduce them to form, the consideration of which shall lie over until the next session of the Grand Chapter, and if then voted by two-thirds of the members present, they shall become a part of this Constitution.

RULES OF ORDER.

1. Every member of this Grand Chapter must, previous to taking his seat as such at the communications, clothe himself with the badges appertaining to his situation.

2. No member shall speak more than twice upon one subject, without permission from the presiding officer for the time being.

3. The mode of appointing committees shall be as follows, viz: in case of a committee of three, the presiding officer for the time being shall have the sole appointment, but larger committees shall be appointed by the Grand Chapter; and it is hereby made the duty of the Grand Secretary to furnish a correct list of the members of this Grand Chapter for the benefit of the same.

4. All resolutions shall be reduced to writing, the member making the same shall read it in his place, and present it to the presiding officer.

5. In case of the expulsion of any member of this Grand Chapter, or any Chapter or Lodge under this jurisdiction, it shall require two thirds of the members present.

6. No member shall interrupt the presiding officer, or any other member, while speaking.

7. Every member shall stand when he speaks, and shall at all times address himself to the presiding officer for the time being.

8. No member or visiter shall retire during the communication of the Chapter without permission of the presiding officer.

9. If any member of this Grand Royal Arch

Chapter shall be guilty of disorderly behaviour, he shall, for the first offence, be called to order; for the second, reprimanded by the presiding officer, and for the third, he shall be suspended from a seat in this Grand Chapter during the pleasure of the same; and all questions of order are to be decided by the presiding Grand Officers.

10. Whereas it is of essential importance that the mode of working in the several Chapters and Lodges under this jurisdiction should be uniformly the same; therefore, the better to accomplish this desirable object, it shall be the duty of the Grand High Priest, or presiding officer for the time being, to give, or cause to be given, the Royal Arch and Mark Master's lectures at least once at every general communication of this Grand Chapter, so that the officers of the several Chapters and Lodges may become acquainted with the same, and disperse a knowledge of them in a uniform and regular manner in their several Chapters and Lodges.

OF CONSTITUTING NEW CHAPTERS,

As prescribed in the Fourth Article of the Constitution of the General Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the United States of America.

"Sect. I. When a warrant of Constitution is granted by either of the Grand Chapters, for constituting a new Chapter of Royal Arch Masons, agreeable to the 9th section, 2d article of this Constitution, the Grand or Deputy Grand High Priest, shall appoint a day and hour for constituting the same, and installing the new Officers: On the day and hour appointed, the Grand or D. G. High Priest, with his Officers, meet in a convenient room, near to the place where the new Chapter is to be constituted. The Officers of the new Chapter are to be examined by the Deputy Grand High Priest, or some Companion appointed for that purpose; after they are approved, they are to return to the Hall, and prepare for the reception of the Grand Chapter. When notice is given by the Grand Marshal, that they are prepared, the Grand Chapter walks in procession to the Hall, when the Officers appointed for the new Chapter, resign their seats to the Grand Officers, and take their several stations on the left; the necessary cautions are then given from the chair, and the ceremony commences by performing an Anthem or Ode, adapted to the occasion. The Officers and Members of the new Chapter then form in front of the Grand High Priest.

"The Deputy Grand High Priest then informs the Grand High Priest, that 'A number of Companions duly instructed in the sublime mysteries, being desirous of promoting the honour of the Art, have applied to the Grand Chapter for a warrant to constitute a new Chapter of Royal Arch Masons, which having obtained, they are now assembled for the purpose of being constituted, and having their Officers installed in due and ancient form.'

"The Grand High Priest then directs the Grand Secretary to read the warrant, which being done, he asks the members of the new Chapter if they still approve of the Officers nominated therein; this being signified accordingly, the Grand High Priest rises and says,

"By virtue of the high powers in me vested, I do form you, my worthy Companions, into a regular Chapter of Royal Arch Masons; from henceforth you are authorised and empowered to open and hold a Lodge of Mark Masters, Past Masters and Most Excellent Masters, and a Chapter of Royal Arch Masons; and to do and perform all such things as thereunto appertain; conforming in all your doings to the Constitution of the General Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the United States, and the general regulations of the State Grand Chapter; and may the God of your fathers be with you, guide and direct you, in all your doings."

"Grand Honors.—The furniture, jewels, implements, utensils, &c. belonging to the Chapter (having previously been placed in due form, covered, in the centre) are then uncovered, and the new Chapter is dedicated, in ancient manner and form, as is well described in the Most Excellent Master's degree. The Deputy Grand High Priest then presents the first Officer of the new Chapter to the Grand High Priest, saying,

"Most Excellent Grand High Priest,—I present you my worthy Companion _____, nominated in the warrant, to be installed High Priest of this new Chapter; I find him to be skilful in the Royal Art, and attentive to the moral precepts of our forefathers, and have therefore no doubt but he will discharge the duties of his Office with fidelity."

"The Grand High Priest then addresses him as follows:

"Most Excellent Companion,—I feel much satisfaction in performing my duty on the present occasion, by installing you into the Office of High Priest of this new Chapter. It is an Office highly honourable to all those who diligently perform the important duties annexed to it; your reputed Masonick knowledge, however, precludes the necessity of a particular enumeration of those duties; I shall therefore only observe, that by a frequent recurrence to the Constitution, and general regulations, and a constant practice of the several sublime lectures and charges, you will be best able to fulfil them; and I am confident, that the Companions who are chosen to preside with you, will give strength to your endeavours, and support your exertions. I shall now propose certain questions to you, relative to the duties of your Office, and to which I must request your unequivocal answer.

"1. Do you solemnly promise that you will redouble your endeavours to correct the vices, refine the morals, and promote the happiness of those of your Brethren who have attained this sublime degree.

"2. That you will never suffer your Chapter to be opened, unless there be present nine regular Royal Arch Masons.

"3. That you will never suffer either more or less than three Brethren to be exalted in your Chapter at one and the same time.

"4. That you will not exalt any one to this degree, who has not shown a charitable and humane disposition; or who has not made a considerable proficiency in the foregoing degrees.

"5. That you will promote the general good of our order, and on all proper occasions be ready to give and receive instructions, and particularly from the General and State Grand Officers.

"6. That to the utmost of your power you will preserve the solemnities of our ceremonies, and behave in open Chapter, with the most profound respect and reverence, as an example to your Companions.

"7. That you will not acknowledge or have intercourse with any Chapter that does not work under a Constitutional warrant or dispensation.

"8. That you will not admit any visiter into your Chapter who has not been exalted in a Chapter legally constituted, without being first formally healed.

"9. That you will observe and support such By-laws as may be made by your Chapter, in conformity to the Constitution and general regulations of the Grand Chapter.

"10. That you will pay due respect and obedience to the instructions of the General and State Grand Officers, particularly relating to the several lectures and charges, and will resign the chair to them, severally, when they may visit your Chapter.

"11. That you will support and observe the Royal Arch Constitution, and the general regulations of the Grand Royal Arch Chapter under whose authority you act.

"Do you submit to all these things, and do you promise to observe and practise them faithfully?"

"These questions being answered in the affirmative, the Companions all kneel in due form, and the Grand High Priest or Grand Chaplain repeats the following, or some other suitable prayer.

"Most Holy and Glorious Lord God, the Great High Priest of Heaven and Earth.

"We approach thee with reverence, and implore thy blessing on the Companion appointed to preside over this new assembly, and now prostrate before thee; fill his heart with thy fear, that his tongue and actions may pronounce thy glory. Make him steadfast in thy service; give him firmness of mind; animate his heart, and strengthen his endeavours; may he teach thy judgements and thy laws; and may the incense he shall put before thee, upon thine altar, prove an acceptable sacrifice unto thee. Bless him, O Lord, and bless the work of his hands. Accept us in mercy; hear thou from Heaven, thy dwelling place, and forgive our transgressions.

"Glory be to God the Father; as it was in the beginning," &c. Response, "so mote it be."

"All the Companions, except High Priests and Past High Priests, are then desired to withdraw, while the new High Priest is solemnly bound to the performance of his duties; and after the performance of other necessary ceremonies, not proper to be written, they are permitted to return.

"The Grand High Priest then addresses the new High Priest as follows:

"Most Excellent Companion,—In consequence of your cheerful acquiescence with the charges and regulations just recited, I now declare you duly installed and anointed High Priest of this new Chapter; not doubting your determination to support the reputation and honour of our sublime Order. I now cheerfully deliver unto you the Warrant under which you are to work; and I doubt not you will govern with such good order and regularity, as will convince your Companions that their partiality has not been improperly placed."

"The Grand High Priest then clothes and invests the new High Priest with the various implements and insignia of the Order, with suitable charges to each of them.

"The Grand High Priest then installs the several subordinate Officers in turn; and points out to them the duties appertaining to their respective offices; after which he pronounces a suitable address to the new Chapter, and closes the ceremony with the following benediction:

"The Lord be with you all; let brotherly love continue; be not forgetful to entertain strangers—Now the God of peace, our supreme High Priest, making you perfect to do his will.

"Glory be to God on high, and on earth peace, and good will to all men. As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be," &c.

SECT. 2. At the institution of all Lodges of Mark Master Masons, under this jurisdiction, the same ceremonies as are prescribed in the foregoing section, are to be observed, as far as they will apply to that degree.

SECT. 3. Whenever it shall be inconvenient for the Grand or Deputy Grand High Priests, respectively, to attend in person, to constitute a new Chapter or Lodge, and install the Officers, they shall severally have power and authority to appoint some worthy High Priest, or Past High Priest, to perform the necessary ceremonies.

We, the Officers and Members of the Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the State of New-York, do certify, that the foregoing is a true copy of the Constitution and Regulations of the Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the said State, as revised, amended and ratified at a meeting of the Grand Chapter, holden at Albany, in the aforesaid State, on the Seventh day of February, A. D. 1809—A. L. 5809.

A gentleman seeing a miserable looking beggar sitting on a step, tying his ragged clothes together, and commiserating his situation, gave him some money, the same time telling him he was sorry to see him so poor. "Poor!" cried the fellow, affecting a look of surprise: "don't you see I am collecting my rents?"

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

LEVEL OF THE SEA.

There is, perhaps, nothing which illustrates in a more striking manner the exact accordance of nature's phenomenon with the few general expressions or laws which describe them all, than the perfect level of the ocean as a qualified surface. The sea never rises or falls in any place, even one inch, but in obedience to fixed laws, and, therefore, changes may be generally foreseen and allowed for. For instance, the eastern trade winds and other causes force the water of the ocean towards the African coast, so as to keep the Red Sea about twenty feet above the general ocean level; and the Mediterranean Sea is a little below the level, because the evaporation from it is greater than the supply of its rivers—causing it to receive an additional supply by the Strait of Gibraltar; but in all such cases the effect is as constant as the disturbing cause, and, therefore, can be calculated upon with confidence. Were it not for this perfect exactness, in what a precarious state would the inhabitants exist on the seashore, and the banks of low rivers!

Few of the inhabitants of London, perhaps, reflect, when standing close by the side of their noble river, and gazing on the rapid flood tide pouring inland through the bridges, that, although sixty miles from the sea, they are placed as low as persons sailing upon its face, where, perhaps, there may be tossing waves, covered with wrecks and the drowning. In Holland, which is a low flat, formed chiefly by the mud and sand brought down by the Rhine and neighbouring rivers, much of the country is really below the level of the common spring-tides, and is only protected from daily inundations by artificial dykes or ramparts, of great strength.

What awful uncertainty would hang over the Dutch, if the level of the sea were subject to change; for while we know the water of the ocean to be seventeen miles higher at the equator than at the Poles, owing to the centrifugal force of the earth's rotation; where the level is now established, from any cause to be suddenly changed but ten feet, millions of human beings would be the victims. [Edinburg Scoteman.]

NEW METHOD OF MAKING GLASS.

It is a little singular that we are indebted to some of the most trivial circumstances in life, for inventions of the greatest importance and value. Newton was indebted to the fall of an apple for his theory of gravity, and George to a dream for his celebrated mode of making superior shot.

An occurrence, perhaps equally fortuitous, has happened in this city within a few weeks. Mr. Abraham Collins was warming some ointment one evening, and his servant accidentally threw some sand upon the fire: part of it fell into the vessel containing the uncton, and when Mr. C. went to make use of it, he found that the medicinal properties had disappeared, and that by the amalgamation of the two substances, combined with caloric, glass had been formed, precisely as if produced by a crucible. The thoughts of Mr. C. having been directed to the circumstance, he went through a series of experiments, and has at length, after a considerable labour, ingenuity, and expense, succeeded in producing glass of a superior quality. We were yesterday enabled to view the specimens which have been manufactured, and are certainly disposed to admit its excellence, as clear, free from spots, and of peculiar brightness.

[N. Y. Journal of Commerce.]

THE REPOSITORY.

SIR WALTER SCOTT'S GHOST STORY.

There is in the Keepsake, a story of supernatural terror, under the title of the "Tapestried Chamber," which the author of Waverley relates on the authority of the late Miss Seward, who told it to him herself, he says, and always affirmed that she derived her information from an authentick source. Here is a sketch of it:—An English Officer of rank, called General Brown, had just returned from the revolutionary war in America. In a beautiful part of the West of England he met with an old friend and school fellow Lord Woodville, (the names alone are given as fictitious,) who resided in a castle as old as the wars of York and Lancaster. The General was invited to stay a week or two with the associate of his youth. He readily consented; and on the first night was shown in due time to a comfortable but old fashioned and gloomy tapestried chamber, in which he went to bed in good health and spirits. In the morning, being asked how he slept; General Brown related the following tale of horror:—"I undressed and went to bed; but the wood in the chimney, which nearly fronted my bed, blazed brightly and cheerfully, and aided by a hundred exciting recollections of my childhood and youth, which had been recalled by the unexpected pleasure of meeting your Lordship, prevented me from falling immediately asleep. While such pleasing reflections were stealing over my mind, and gradually lulling me to slumber, I was suddenly aroused by a sound like that of the rustling of a silk gown and the tapping of a high-heeled pair of shoes, as if a woman were walking in the apartment. Ere I could draw the curtain to see what the matter was, the figure of a little woman passed between the bed and the fire. The back of this form was turned to me, and I could observe from the shoulders and neck, it was that of an old woman whose dress was an old fashioned gown, which I think ladies call a sacque—that is a robe completely loose in the body, but gathered into broad plaits upon the neck and shoulder, which fall down to the ground, and terminate in a species of train. I thought the intrusion singular enough, but never harboured for a moment the idea that what I saw was any thing more than the mortal form of some old woman about the establishment, who had a fancy to dress like her grandmother, and who, having perhaps been dislodged from her chamber for my accommodation, had forgotten the circumstance, and returned by twelve to her old haunt. Under this persuasion I moved myself in bed and coughed a little, to make the intruder sensible of my being in possession of the premises. She turned slowly round; but gracious heaven! my Lord, what a countenance did she display to me! There was no longer any question what she was, or any thought of her being a living being. Upon a face which wore the fixed features of a corpse were imprinted the traces of the vilest and most hideous passions which had animated her while she lived. The body of some atrocious criminal seemed to have been given up from the grave, and the soul restored from the penal fire, in order to form, for a space, an union with the ancient accomplice of its guilt. I started up in bed, and sat upright, supporting myself on my palms, as I gazed on this horrid spectre. The hag made, as it seemed, a single swift stride to the bed where I lay, and squatted herself down upon it, in precisely the same attitude which I had assumed in the extremity of my horror, advancing her diabolical countenance within half a yard of mine, with a grin which seemed to intimate the malice and the derision of an incarnate fiend. In these horrible circumstances, under the eyes, and, as it seemed, almost under the grasp, of an incarnation of an evil spirit, all firmness forsook me, all manhood melted from me like wax in the furnace, and I felt my hairs individually bristle.—The current of my life-blood ceased to flow, and I sank back in a swoon, as very a victim to panick terror as ever was a village girl or a child ten years of age."

The gallant general then goes on to describe the hot and cold fever fits which tormented him during the rest of the night, for he was afraid to move till day-break, when he arose and got out into the open air to refresh his jaded spirits, determining, however, to leave the castle without delay, and ordering his horses for that purpose. His host in vain attempted to prevail upon him to remain—all he effected was, to induce him to prolong his stay for half an hour, during which time they walked together into the picture gallery. "Presently," says the narrator, "Lord Woodville beheld General Brown suddenly start, and assume an attitude of the utmost surprise, not unmixed with fear, as his eyes were caught and suddenly rivetted by a portrait of an old lady in a sacque, the fashionable dress of the end of the seventeenth century. 'There she is!' he exclaimed, 'there she is, in form and features, though inferior in demoniac expression to the accursed hag who visited me last night!'—'If that be the case,' said the young nobleman, 'there can remain no longer any doubt of the horrible reality of your apparition. That is the picture of a wretched ancestress of mine, of whose crimes a black & fearful catalogue is recorded in a family history in my charter chest. The recital of them would be too horrible; it is enough to say, that in your fatal apartment incest and unnatural murder was committed.'" * * * Lord Woodville (adds Sir Walter) never once asked the general if he was sure he did not dream of apparition, or suggested any of the possibilities by which it is fashionable to explain apparitions—wild vagaries of the fancy, or deception of the optick nerves.

ABOLITION IN THE SENSES.

Instance of gradual abolition in all the Senses in succession, the intellectual faculties remaining entire. By M. DE FERMON.—M. C. J. Corsican, allied to the family of Napoleon, of a nervous temperament, rich, a wit, a lover of the fine arts, and a devotee of pleasure, which had been indulged in to excess, was attacked with difficulty of vision, which soon terminated in complete amaurosis. Having suffered in his youth from syphilis, he was put on a course of mercury, without any benefit. Afterwards he tried numerous remedies under the best physicians in France, but to no purpose. Notwithstanding this blindness, he continued to fulfil his functions as financier, and acquired such a tact that he could distinguish engravings on copper from wood-cuts, lithographs, &c. by the finger alone. In short he enjoyed society as nearly as much as ever, and hardly felt the loss of sight.—But in a few years he began to grow deaf of one ear—then of the other, and in a short time, he had to add the total loss of hearing to that of sight!—By means of large moveable types or letters, which his family put together, he was soon able to read with his fingers whatever was wished to be communicated, and by this contrivance he still held free intercourse with the external world. All his intellectual faculties remained unimpaired, and his memory was extremely tenacious. But new misfortunes were in store. Muscular motion and sensibility began to fail, and in a short time, they were completely extinct! He was now, as it were, exiled from the earth, in the midst of his family and friends! He could speak, but no answer, no sign, no impression could be received through any channel of sense! In this deplorable condition, it was accidentally discovered that a small portion of one of his cheeks retained its sensibility, and the active imagination of the sufferer soon took advantage of the discovery. He caused one of his sons to trace letters on his cheeks as he dictated them, and by constant repetition he was soon able to recognise these letters as traced on the sensible part. He made such progress, that, in a few days, his son wrote on his father's cheek the speech of the king of France, on his return in 1815, the whole of which was completely understood! With this sole solace of a dreary death in life, he dragged out some time in a state of the greatest misery that can well be imagined—his intellectual faculties not appearing to suffer the slightest degree of decay. At length the unfortunate patient became enfeebled, the fecal matters escaped involuntarily, and after many years of suffering he succumbed.—No autopsic examination was made.—Bulletin des Sciences Medicales, January, 1828.

THE TRAVELLER.

TRAVELLING IN LAPLAND.

Being desirous of continuing our journey, we begged our host to lend us some reindeer to carry us farther up the country, to which he readily consented; and taking down a horn which hung up in the cottage, went out and blew it. Upon which fourteen or fifteen of those animals came running towards the hut, six of which he immediately yoked to six sledges. In one of them we put our merchandise and provisions; another was assigned to one of our guides who understood the language of the Muscovite Laplanders, and that of the Kilops, dismissing the two other inhabitants of Varanger, after having first paid them in tobacco for their trouble. We then put on our Lapland clothes, and each of us lying down in his sledge, was covered with bear's skin. At the back of the sledge were two girths made of reindeer skin leather, in which we thrust our arms up to the shoulders, to keep ourselves steady; and we had each a stick with a strong ferrule, in order to support the sledge, if it should be in danger of overturning against the stumps of trees, or stones lying in the way.

We were no sooner ready to set out, than our host muttered some words in the ears of the reindeer; and when I afterwards inquired of the guide what he meant by it, he gravely replied, with the utmost simplicity; that it was to tell them whither they should carry us. Custom, however, had made this muttering so familiar to them, that when our host had gone to all the six, they set off with amazing swiftness, and continued their pace over hills and dales without keeping any beaten path, till seven o'clock in the evening, when they brought us to a large village situated between two mountains, on the borders of a great lake. Stopping at the fourth house in the place, and beating the ground with their feet, the master of the house came with some of his servants to take us out of the sledges, and unharness our cattle, one of them bringing out a little juniper can filled with brandy, of which he gave each of us a brimmer out of a large vessel that was also made of juniper wood. This it seems was to revive our spirits, our guide having informed him, that we were frightened at our being drawn so swiftly by these animals, having never been used to that way of travelling.

The reindeer is the colour of the stag, and is not much bigger. The horns of this animal are somewhat higher than those of the stag, but more crooked, hairy, and not so well furnished with branches. Of the milk of the females they make good butter and cheese. These animals, indeed, constitute the greatest, and almost the only riches of the Fin Laplanders. In Finmark, there are vast numbers of them, both wild and tame, and many a man there, has from six or eight hundred to a thousand of these useful creatures, which never come under cover. They follow him wherever he is pleased to ramble, and when they are put to a sledge, transport his goods from one place to another. They provide for themselves, and live chiefly on moss, and on the buds and leaves of trees. They support themselves on very little nourishment, and are neat, clean, and entertaining creatures.

It is remarkable, that when the reindeer sheds his horns, and others rise in their stead, they appear at first covered with a skin; and till they are of a finger's length, are so soft that they may be cut with a knife like a sausage, and are delicate eating, even raw; therefore the huntsmen, when far out in the country, and pinched for want of food, eat them, and find that they satisfy both their hunger and their thirst. When the horn grows bigger, there breeds within the skin a worm which eats away the root. The reindeer has over his eyelids a kind of skin, through which he peeps, when otherwise, in the hard snows, he would be obliged to shut his eyes entirely; a singular instance of the benevolence of the great Creator, in providing for the wants of each creature, according to its destined manner of living.

When we got out of our sledges, our host conducted us into his hut, which, like the rest of the cottages in the place, was very little, low, and covered with the bark of trees, the light entering in at a hole at the top. The people here were clothed much like those of Varanger, their apparel being of the materials and make, but longer. The women were also dressed in the reindeer skins, with the hair outwards.

We gave our host a piece of our roll tobacco, about two inches long, with which he was highly pleased, and in the most hearty manner returned us his thanks. We also gave a piece, not quite so long, to each of the inhabitants of the place, to make them our friends, and the better to secure ourselves against their attempts; for they seemed more uncivilized than those we last dealt with.

[Travels through Lapland.

THE LEGENDARY.

STORY OF A PIRATE.

BY SIR WALTER SCOTT.

The chief of the clan, MacLean of Dhart, in the Isle of Mull, had an intrigue with a beautiful young woman of his own clan, who bore a son to him. In consequence of the child's being, by some accident, born in a barn, he received the name of Allan-a-Sop, or Allan of the Straw, by which he was distinguished from others of his clan. As his father and mother were not married, Allan was of course a bastard or natural son, and had no inheritance to look for, save that which he might win for himself.

But the beauty of the boy's mother having captivated a man of rank in the clan, called MacLean of Torloisk, he married her, and took her to reside with him in the castle of Torloisk, situated on the shores of the Sound, or small strait of the sea, which divides the smaller island of Ulva from that of Mull. Allan-a-Sop paid his mother frequent visits at her new residence, and she was naturally glad to see the poor boy, both from affection, and on account of his personal strength and beauty, which distinguished him above other youths of his age. But she was obliged to confer marks of her attachment on him as privately as she could, for Allan's visits were by no means so acceptable to her husband as to herself. Indeed, Torloisk liked so little to see the lad, that he determined to put some affront on him, which should prevent his returning to the castle for some time. An opportunity for executing his purpose soon occurred.

The lady one morning, looking from the window, saw her son coming wandering down the hill, and hastened to put a girdle cake upon the fire, that he might have hot bread to his breakfast.—Something called her out of the apartment after making this preparation, and her husband entering at the same time, saw at once what she had been about, and determined to give the boy such a reception as should distrust him for the future. He snatched the cake from the girdle, thrust it into his step-son's hands, which he forcibly closed on the scalding bread, saying, "Here, Allan—here is a cake which your mother has got ready for your breakfast." Allan's hands were severely burnt; and, being a sharp-witted and proud boy, he resented this mark of his step-father's ill-will, and came not again to Torloisk.

At this time the western seas were covered with the vessels of pirates, who, not unlike the Sea-kings of Denmark at an early period, sometimes settled and made conquests on the islands. Allan-a-Sop was young, strong, and brave to desperation. He entered as a mariner on board of one of these ships, and in process of time obtained the command, first of one galley, then of a small flotilla, with which he sailed round the seas and collected considerable plunder, until his name became both feared and famous. At length he proposed to himself to pay a visit to his mother, whom he had not seen for many years; and setting sail for this purpose, he anchored one morning in the Sound of Ulva, and in front of the house of Torloisk. His mother was dead, but his step-father, to whom he was now an object of fear as he had been formerly of aversion, hastened to the shore to receive his formidable son-in-law, with great affection of kindness and interest in his prosperity; while Allan-a-Sop, who, though very rough and hasty, does not appear to have been sullen or vindictive, seemed to take his kind reception in good part.

The crafty old man succeeded so well, as he thought, in securing Allan's friendship, and obliterating all recollections of the former affront put on him, that he began to think it possible to employ him in executing his private revenge upon MacKinnon of Ulva, with whom, as was usual between such neighbours, he had some feud. With this purpose, he offered what he called the following good advice to his son-in-law: "My dear Allan, you have now wandered over the seas long enough; it is time you should have some footing upon land, a castle to protect yourself in winter, a village and cattle for your men, and a harbour to lay up your galleys. Now, here is the island of Ulva, near at hand, which lies ready for your occupation, and it will cost you no trouble, save that of putting to death the present proprietor, the Laird of MacKinnon, a useless old carle, who has cumbered the world long enough."

Allan-a-Sop thanked his stepfather for so happy a suggestion, which he declared he would put in execution forthwith. Accordingly, setting sail the next morning, he appeared before MacKinnon's house an hour before noon. The old chief of Ulva was much alarmed at the menacing apparition of so many galleys, and his anxiety was not lessened by the news, that they were commanded by the redoubtable Allan-a-Sop. Having no effectual means of resistance, MacKinnon, who was a man of shrewd sense, saw no alternative save that of receiving the invaders, whatever might be their purpose, with all outward demonstrations of joy and satisfaction. He caused immediate preparations to be made for a banquet as splendid as circumstances admitted, hastened down to the shore to meet the rover, and welcomed him to Ulva with such an appearance of sincerity, that the pirate found it impossible to pick any quarrel which might afford a pretence for executing the violent purpose which he had been led to meditate.

They feasted together the whole day; and in the evening, as Allan-a-Sop was about to retire to his ships, he thanked the Laird of MacKinnon for his entertainment, but remarked, with a sigh, that it had cost him very dear. "How can that be," said MacKinnon, "when I bestowed this entertainment upon you in free good will?" "It is true, my friend," replied the pirate, "but then it has quite disconcerted the purpose for which I came hither; which was to put you to death, my good friend, and seize upon your house and island, and so settle myself in the world. It would have been very convenient, this island, but your friendly reception has rendered it impossible for me to execute my purpose; so that I must be a wanderer on the seas for some time longer." Whatever MacKinnon felt at hearing he had been so near to destruction, he took care to show no emotion, save surprise, and replied to his visitor—"My dear Allan, who was it that put into your mind so unkind a purpose towards your old friend; for I am sure it never arose from your own generous nature? It must have been your father-in-law, old Torloisk, who made such an indifferent husband to your mother, and such an unfriendly step-father to you when you were a helpless boy; but now, when he sees you a bold and powerful leader, he desires to make a quarrel betwixt you and those who were the friends of your youth. If you consider this matter rightly, Allan, you will see that the estate and harbour of Torloisk lie as conveniently for you as those of Ulva, and that, if you are to make a settlement by force, it is much better it should be at the expense of the old churl, who never showed you kindness or countenance, than at that of a friend like me, who always loved and honoured you."

Allan-a-Sop was struck with the justice of this reasoning; and the old offence of his scalded fingers was suddenly recalled to his mind. "It is very true what you say, MacKinnon," he replied, "and besides, I have not forgotten what a hot breakfast my father-in-law treated me to one morning. Farewell for the present; you shall soon hear news of me from the other side of the sound." Having said thus much, the pirate got on board, and commanding his men to unmoor the galleys, sailed back to Torloisk, and prepared to land in arms. His father-in-law hastened to meet him, in expectation to hear of the death of his enemy, MacKinnon. But Allan greeted him in a very different manner from what he expected. "You hoary old traitor," he said, "you instigated my simple good nature to murder a better man than yourself. But have you forgotten how you scorched my fingers twenty years ago, with a burning cake? The day is come that that breakfast must be paid for." So saying, he dashed out his father-in-law's brains with a battle-axe, took possession of his castle and property, and established there a distinguished branch of the clan of MacLean.

He who doth not love tea, says a Chinese proverb, covets wine.

MISCELLANY.

HISTORY OF SEA-SERPENTISM.

BY DR. SAMUEL L. MITCHELL.

The history of sea-serpentism, is a very memorable part of the sayings and doings in this enlightened age and country. For the benefit of the present generation and of posterity, it ought to be written. In proceeding to pen a short sketch of it, I must premise, that I am one of the last persons in existence who would presume to put a limit to creative power. I admit that the Almighty Being could make a watersnake as easily as a fish; and that such an animal might be as big as a Kraken, as easily as of the diminutive size of the Stickleback. Yet, on reviewing these legends of the times, there is found such a propensity towards the strange and the marvellous, that the men of the present day show a credulity very much resembling that of the remote ages, when the terraqueous globe was peopled with gorgons, mermaids, chimeras, hydras, dragons, and all the monsters of fabulous zoology.

The first tale I remember to have considered seriously, relative to it, was this: it had been determined, they said, to put a steam boat in operation at Boston to coast along the shore and to convey passengers. It was foreseen that such a vessel would traverse the current and pass among the islands with an ease and speed unknown to boats moved by oars and sails; and of course, much of the business of transporting passengers would be taken away from the small craft heretofore employed. The large boat would thus destroy the small ones, or, as it was expressed by another word, devour them. Under these forebodings, the steam vessel made a trip with favorable auspices. Some wag, the account proceeds, wrote for one of the Gazettes, an allegorical description of a sea-serpent, that had been described off Nahant and Gloucester, and had probably come there to consume all the small fish in the place. The narrative, given with such grave diction and imposing seriousness, was received by many as an actual and literal occurrence, and credited accordingly.

Long Island Sound puts in a claim for a sea-serpent. On this fiction I am well satisfied of the particulars that follow. An active young fellow, who had been weary of ploughing the land, bought a little sloop of about thirteen tons, which I remember to have seen, and resolved to try his luck by ploughing the waves. He named his vessel the Sea-Serpent. She was mostly employed in carrying country produce to the New-York market, and in bringing manure back, with the advantage of passengers when any offered. This boat was on her way from Mamaroneck harbour or there about towards the city, and was met by a sloop from that place a short distance from City Island. The captain of the latter on arrival at home, was eagerly interrogated by a quidnunc for news; and being a man of some humour and fancy, told his neighbour, the quicrest, he had just seen the sea-serpent. He then described how (alluding to the barrels on deck) he had seen the bunches on his back, how high the head (meaning the bowsprit) was out of water; how the white and black colours (meaning the painted waisi) were variegated; how he saw the lashing of the tail, (meaning the motion of the boom in jibing as she was going along before a fair easterly wind); that the sea-serpent was proceeding with a speed equalling, at least, from five to six knots an hour, which made all white before him, (meaning the foam at the bows.) The good man took the joke in real earnest, went away and told it to a sensible acquaintance. This latter wrote a formal and sensible account of it; which travelling an extensive round in the sheets of intelligence, was finally embodied in the aforesaid book, where it is registered as a part of the evidence.

It was about the period of these transactions that I received from Boston, an ichthyological production, enclosed in a letter, respectfully written, and with postage paid, submitting to me whether that article was not a piece of the sea-serpent's hide! It had been found on the shore of the region which the alarming visiter frequented; and was supposed to have been separated from his body by one of the musket balls which had been fired at him, and washed ashore. To this serious communication I returned for answer, that it was simply a portion of skin, with closely adhering scales, belonging to the boney-scaled pike, (Esox asseus), an inhabitant of the Atlantick Ocean.

So much curiosity and excitement were now raised about the sea-serpent, that he was a prominent topic of conversation. The feeling was more intense, inasmuch as it was confidently declared he had been frequently observed near boats and vessels. It was at length concluded to fit out an expedition, expressly for the purpose of catching him, with a select crew, under the command of Captain Rich. Day after day he cruised over tracts, where the sea-serpent had, according to information, been observed, without discovering any thing like him. At length, a creature was descried, which some of the men on board said they had seen before, and that it was the sea-serpent. The captain pursued the game a considerable time longer, with much vigilance and patience, until it was at a distance near enough to be harpooned. He was taken on board, and found to be a fish of the Mackerel family. I saw the preparation of it in the Greenwood Museum, and satisfied myself that it was an individual of a well known species called Tunny in the Mediterranean, and Atlicore in the Atlantick sea.

After the capture of the fish, the persons who, when they saw him in the water, declared positively that he was a sea-serpent, now changed their minds, and swore that he was not.

At length, the man of successful exertion arrived with his prize, and unexpectedly and unfortunately drew upon him the displeasure of his employers, for attempting to impose upon them a Horse Mackerel (as they called it) for a Sea-Serpent! He told me the story himself.

In this fervor of opinion, it was supposed for a time, that a sea-serpent existed in Lake Ontario. A coasting navigator, somewhere between Kingston and York, had several times during his trips observed among the islands and rocks, something that appeared to be a long animal with vertical flexures of the back, resembling lumps or humps, of variegated black and white hues. He told some of his acquaintances what peculiar appearances had presented themselves to his view; and that he intended the next opportunity to take a more close and correct survey. He did so, shortly after, when the phenomenon ascended into the air! It turned out to be a speckled mother duck, with a numerous brood of young ones. They swam in a line with the parent bird at the head. As they rose and descended on the undulations, gave an appearance so like that ascribed to the sea-serpent, that the captain, though a wary man, would have solemnly declared, until he was undeceived, his belief in the existence of a sea-serpent there.

Lake Erie brought forward pretensions too for a sea-serpent. One of the coasting vessels, navigated by three men, as she was steering eastward from Detroit, discovered something afloat on the hither side of the island called "The Sisters," which, when she arrived at the place of her destination on the southern shore, was reported by the men at the tavern and the printing office, to be the very creature. Mr. Printer wrote a paragraph on the subject, and inserted it in his paper, in which it travelled far and wide. It may be relied on that this alleged inhabitant of that inland sea, has been reduced to genus and species, by a distinguished naturalist, and registered very orderly in zoology. Now let us find what the production really turned out to be. The Sheriff of the county, a sensible man, heard the marvel, and conceiving that he knew as much about the lake as any person whatever, went on board, full of curiosity, to make inquiries about it. He found but one of the people on board, whom he interrogated closely concerning the wonderful sight, with which he and his associates had entertained the neighbourhood. The sailor was soon implicated in contradictions. The querist, aware of the fellow's confusion, asked him if he was not ashamed to propagate such falsehoods! He then said if the sheriff would not be affronted, he would relate the whole story just as it was. At the place aforesaid, they passed a dry tree afloat, and concluding that the butt or root would do for a head, some knots on the trunk for knobs or bunches; and the top for a tail; they would have a little pastime by telling a story of a sea-serpent, which they thought their lake was as much entitled to as any other water. The whole three had agreed to tell the same tale and support it!

When the skin, &c. of the huge basking shark, that had straggled from the Northern Ocean, and had been killed in Raritan Bay, (Squalus Maximus), was exhibited in New-York city, the inhabitants were openly and earnestly invited by words at length displayed in front of the house, to enter and behold the sea-serpent. The conceit took very well.

Now, after all these mistakes, deceptions, and wilful perversions on the subject, every person of consideration may admit that the gambols of porpoises, the slow motions of basking sharks, and the yet different appearance of baleenoptorous whales, all of which have fins on their backs, may have given rise to those parts of the narration not already herein commented upon.

We have often had reason to admire the originality of Dr. GREENE, [of the Berkshire American,] who is one of the best humoured utilitarians in the country. The following is an item of his proceedings against some of the popular notions which too many are fond of calling petty, and considering harmless. The doctor is quite skilful in breaking a lance with the old ladies of his imagination; we should not, however, like to answer for his courage, had he to contend with the substance, instead of the shadow.

CURING A COLD.

"Stuff a cold, and starve a fever."—Old Saying.

As much as we venerate the time honoured sayings and the wise saws of the olden times, we must beg leave to call in question the first clause of the above. It has no more foundation in truth than the divine right of kings. Stuff a cold! and starve a fever—as if a cold was not likewise a fever!

But absurd as the first part of this saying is, it has governed the multitude for ages. When they feel the slightest advances of a cold, they incontinently begin to stuff. The cold, thus fed and encouraged, acquires a strength and decision not its own, pushes on with vigour, blockades the nose, the throat, the lungs, and nearly cuts off all communication with the vital air. But the more the patient is stuffed with the cold, the more he stuffs himself with food. One would suppose they were stuffing on a wager—the cold stuffs up the breathing apparatus, the patient stuffs the alimentary canal! Only imagine for a moment what a war of stuffing! But it so happens, that the stuffing of the stomach only increases the stuffing of the lungs, until the stuffed patient, wheezing and barking, can just speak in a hoarse whisper, and deems it a matter of prudence to call a physician.

The doctor comes. "How do you do, Mr. Pheezer?"

Patient. Ugh! ugh! ugh! I dont know, Doc—ugh! ugh! ugh!—Doctor, I've got a terrible—ugh! ugh! ugh!—a terrible cold.

[Enter Wife.] Dont try to talk, Mr. Pheezer, you're so stopped up. I'll tell you how 'tis, Doctor, Mr. Pheezer put on a damp shirt t'other day, and took cold, and though I've done my best to cure him, he's grown worse and worse, till now, poor man, he can hardly speak above his breath.

Doctor. What have you done for him?

Mrs. Pheezer. Why, besides giving him a sight of yarb drinks, and bathing his feet in warm water, I made him eat as much good victuals as he could any ways stuff down. I han't starved him, depend upon it, Doctor. I've have had a good dozen of turkeys cooked, since he was unwell, poor man—which is only a week come to-morrow—besides three spare ribs and a goose—and as sure as I'm a living sinner, Doctor, he's eat the bigger part on 'em.

Doctor. And he's alive yet!

Mrs. Pheezer. Yes—I desire to be thankful he is; though I think he would'nt ha' lived but a very leetle while, if I had'nt ha' done what I have, dont you, Doctor!

Doctor. No, good woman, I think if you had starved instead of stuffing his cold, he would have been well before now.

Mrs. Pheezer. Lord ha' massy on ye, Doctor! Starve a cold! why I never heerd of sich a thing in all my born days.

Doctor. May be not, Mrs. Pheezer, but I assure you it is the right way to manage a cold, if you mean to get rid of it. For instance, let the patient take a little tea, coffee, or a glass of water, with half a cracker, three times a day—or a little water gruel, if more convenient or agreeable to the taste. By this management a cold may ordinarily be cured in two or three days, while by the stuffing process it would probably be prolonged as many months, unless death should intervene and put an end to the cold and the patient together.

Mrs. Pheezer. Why, Doctor, I'm astonished at ye. I used ter think you knowed something; but now I'm convinced all your skill an't worth the snap o' my thumb. You need'nt come any more, Doctor. [Exit Physician.] Starve a cold! Well, of all the strange doctrine I ever heard of, this is the cap chief. Among all my sins, Lord help me, I hav'nt got this to answer for.

So Mrs. Pheezer pursued her stuffing regimen, her husband's cold became an inflammation of the lungs, and in a week after, Mrs. Pheezer followed him to the grave, consoling herself in the midst of her affliction, that he had not been guilty of the sin of starving his cold.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1829.

DR. BECK'S ADDRESS. Though we are not a doctor, we have perused the address delivered before the medical society of this state by the president, T. Romeyn Beck, with much pleasure. It is a production valuable to the general reader as well as to the lover of scientific investigation. The rare intimacy with science, for which Dr. Beck is distinguished, always renders his productions peculiarly perspicuous, and plain to the attainments of all. The address before us is free from professional technicalities; and we shall therefore present our readers with a few extracts, which will give them a better idea of its merits than any opinion of ours probably would. Dr. Beck commences his address with a notice of the death, within the past year, of an early president of the society; and after also briefly alluding to the sudden removal of the late governor Clinton, he proceeds:

"It is a 'taming thought to human pride,' that although death destroys those whose existence is deemed most necessary to the common welfare, yet the train of events proceeds on with a steady march. It is no less evident that in the present era of advancement in knowledge, no minor obstacle can be found which will permanently impede its course. In all the schemes for the melioration of the condition of man,—for his growth in science—his progress in morality and religion, the loss of one master spirit is early compensated by the acquisition of many ardent votaries. We feel this in our own profession. The general diffusion of information brings numerous labourers into the common harvest—and emulation is excited as well by the examples of the present day, as by a retrospect of the past. There is no branch of medicine—either strictly belonging to its numerous departments, or ministering collaterally to their improvement, which is not industriously and sedulously cultivated."

Dr. Beck surveys the efforts of improvement in medical science with pleasure, and expresses a wish that their value may be generally understood. He apprehends that "the indifference or ignorance manifested by the greater part of mankind" towards this subject, is mainly owing to the negligence of the members of the medical profession; and thinks that "all proper occasions should be embraced to manifest to the community, what is doing to remove the charge of uncertainty in medicine, and to illustrate the discoveries which the talent of the present age is bringing forward." He regards as a great improvement in medicine, "the distrust which is obtaining against general theories." The influence of great names is passing away; "like material monuments, they have slowly crumbled, or been violently overthrown, and we search among the ruins for some precious relic that may have been forgotten in the destruction. Such they all contain. There is no theory ever yet promulgated, which is not based on some portion of positive truth."

* Hon. William Wilson, M. D. of Columbia county, President of the State Medical Society during the year 1813.

The doctor proceeds with some general observations on theories. Though the basis of inquiry has not been, as some are fond of asserting, imaginary, it has frequently been contracted by a natural devotion to a favourite opinion. The promulgation of these theories has been of important advantage. The attacks of opponents, and the enthusiasm of disciples have originated new argument, or detected fallacious objections. "A mass of knowledge has thus been rapidly accumulated, for which otherwise, years of desultory effort would have been necessary." Other sciences have shared this benefit. "In geology, in particular, the promulgation of various theories, and the ardour with which they have been impugned or defended, certainly are among the principal causes of the numerous and most interesting data, of which it now boasts."

The doctor next takes up the subject of fevers; but our limits compel us to pass over this portion of the Address. He enters upon the subject of pathological research with a notice of the illustrious BICHAT, and after briefly enumerating the principal labours of his short but valuable life, he proceeds to urge and explain the importance of pathological anatomy, with his usual clearness and candour. In illustration, he refers to the death of the "beloved and lamented WASHINGTON," which it is supposed was owing to "the disease now styled laryngitis," with the nature of which practitioners were until lately unacquainted. It was not until several years after the death of Washington, that the sudden decease, from the same cause, "of two distinguished physicians in London, led to pathological examination;" the result was, the nature of the disease became evident—"its mortality was rendered less certain—and dangerous as it must ever prove, instances are even multiplying of recovery from its effects." "This disease must have occurred centuries ago, and who can tell how many lives might have been prolonged, had its character been thus specially marked and investigated at an earlier period."

The importance of dissection is naturally brought under notice, and after a few observations on the prejudices "that must be encountered in discussing its necessity," the Address proceeds:

"That an intimate knowledge of the condition of the human system, both in health and in disease, is indispensable to the judicious application of curative means, would seem to be an axiom that requires only to be stated, in order to meet with universal credence. It is no less certain that the community must suffer from consequences of ignorance. The truth of these remarks appears most strikingly in the department of surgery, although they will be no less conspicuous to him who will investigate, in that of medicine. In the language of the report made last summer to the English house of Commons, by a committee of its members not professional (a paper which should be in the hands of every intelligent citizen in our country) 'as the science of anatomy has improved, many operations formerly thought necessary have been altogether dispensed with; most of those retained, have been rendered more simple, and many new ones have been performed, to the saving of the lives of patients, which were formerly thought impossible. To neglect the practice of dissection would lead to the greatest aggravation of human misery; since anatomy, if not learned by that practice, must be learned by mangling the living. Though all classes are deeply interested in affording protection to the study of anatomy, yet the poor and middle classes are most so; they will be the most benefited by promoting it, and the principal sufferers by discouraging it. The rich, when they require professional assistance, can afford to employ those who have acquired the reputation of practising successfully. It is on the poor that the inexperienced commence their practice.'

"But it is not the poor only that are thus to be benefitted by the pursuit of anatomy. There is another class of the community whose condition must excite all the best feelings of our nature—the victims of the elements—at a distance from their home—deprived of the blessings of domestic life, and yet proudly maintaining the honour and glory of their native land. Our gallant soldiers and sailors, in time of war, have no solace when the hour of danger approaches—no hope amidst the storm of battle, that they shall escape from the consequences of dangerous wounds, except in the skill of their medical attendants. The records of the armies and navies of foreign countries, and particularly of England, where the materials for comparison are most copious, attest how much of human life has been thus preserved, and how great has been the diminution of mortality when compared with former years.

"A word or two is necessary in defence of those who pursue these studies. All will grant that they would not have been selected, except from a high sense of duty. It requires some lofty incitement—some moral courage to be thus employed. The mysterious change which death induces, is alone sufficient to startle the most buoyant spirit; but with this, the pathologist must familiarize himself. He proceeds to his high office at the risk of health—often indeed, of existence. I appeal to your reading, in confirmation of the truth of my assertion, that for several years, scarcely a medical journal has been received from abroad, which does not contain an account of some individual, who has either met with irreparable injury to his constitution, or has lost his life from accidents occurring during dissection."

We are obliged to postpone a further notice of this interesting pamphlet until next week, when we shall take pleasure in presenting our readers with Mr. Beck's observations on the nature of vegetable panaceas.

COBB'S ABRIDGEMENT OF WALKER'S DICTIONARY. There is not in the country a more industrious, persevering, and withal capable reformer of orthographical and orthoepical abuses of the English language, than Lyman Cobb, of Ithaca; and we always look with a superiour degree of pleasure upon every extension of his efforts, and consequently, of his influence and usefulness. It has too frequently been the case, that those who have attempted to facilitate education or reform popular methods, have been possessed more of a desire to benefit their personal interests, than of ability to be of any essential service to the publick. Mr. Cobb has made the English language the subject of serious investigation; and he has arrived at his present knowledge of the principles upon which it is founded, after years of arduous devotion to philological inquiry. His abridgement of Walker, which is just published, is certainly the best thing of the kind that has yet appeared; and if its merits shall be properly attended to, it can not fail to take precedence of every other dictionary for the use of schools and families. It is carefully compiled from the London quarto editions of the parent work (published under the inspection of the author) and strictly follows Mr. Walker's principles of orthography and pronunciation. In addition to other improvements, Mr. Cobb has systematically divided each word, and introduced the plurals of nouns, the present tense and preterit of verbs, the participles, and variable adjectives: an appendix contains a numerous class of words "which are in common use in this country, and not found in Walker's Dictionary;" and a character is introduced into the work to direct the application of the secondary accent; which, though the necessity and importance of it has been acknowledged, by all our lexicographers, and even largely written upon, has never before been properly noted. It is published from stereotype plates, the proof sheets of which were carefully examined by the author.

Every one knows that analyzing horn-books and lexicons is not the most pleasant business in the world; and it requires more than common courage and industry to do it honestly. An uncompromising love of truth and learning is all that can induce a man to dwell for years upon the arbitrary meaning of words and the mechanical uses of accents. An author so indefatigable as Mr. Cobb is worthy of every encouragement from parents and guardians.

REVOLUTION IN BUENOS AYRES. By the arrival at Baltimore, of the brig Celeno, after a passage of fifty-one days, Buenos Ayres papers to the 13th December, inclusive, have been received. They contain the particulars of a revolutionary movement which took place on the 1st of December, and resulted in displacing Dorrego (the governor) and his friends. The governor received information of the intended revolt, on the night of the 30th of November, and fled. In the morning General Juan Lavalle, commander of the revolutionists, issued a proclamation, desiring the people to meet in the church of San Roque, to deliberate upon the affairs of the province and appoint officers to direct them. The people met peaceably, and by a unanimous vote elected General Lavalle president. The government now being in the hands of the new authorities, General Lavalle appointed admiral William Brown to the command of the civil and military government of the province, during his (Lavalle's) absence, and went in search of Dorrego, who had collected a force in the country. Lavalle, after an ineffectual attempt to negotiate with Dorrego, attacked him and routed him. Dorrego subsequently fell into Lavalle's power, but no further mention is made of his fate. There was no blood shed except in the battle with Dorrego.

The old government was very unpopular. It is accused of muzzling the press; of devoting the resources of the province to private uses; of violating the charter of the National Bank, and thereby bringing the circulating medium into discredit; in short, of being so utterly regardless of the publick interests, as to neglect every measure of general utility, and make the power, the credit, and the wealth of the province answerable, only to personal caprice and interest. It is even charged with having made use of the dagger to prevent an expose of its conduct.

The revolutionists made use of no unnecessary violence; but expressed a determination to be governed by the will of the people in every vicissitude; and as soon as that will was known they surrendered all power to the legally constituted authorities. It must be confessed that the military eruptions which seem to have become fashionable in the young republics at the south, are in their nature hostile to liberty. If, however, the accounts which have reached this country of the recent one in Buenos Ayres be correct, there can be no doubt that it will have a tendency to reform abuses and purify the institutions of the province.

✂ We publish to-day the report made to the senate of the United States on the subject of Sunday mails. Its length excludes the variety usually given in the space it occupies; but we think the ability displayed in it, and the truths it inculcates, will make the reader ample amends. Since our last paper was published we have seen a letter from the post-master general to a committee of the house of representatives on the same subject, and the report of that committee. The letter of the post-master general is calculated to settle the question, as far as utility with regard to business, and separate from religion, is concerned. By suspending the travel of the mail on the Sabbath, every mail which proceeds from Washington to New-Orleans would be delayed in its passage three days; and the mails in other directions would be delayed in like manner, in proportion to the distance they had to travel. The mails which would be most retarded are those which are of the greatest importance to commercial men. Their detention would create a necessity for private expresses, which would give speculators an unfair advantage over such as should wait the regular course of the mail, and occasion a loss to the government of from fifty to one hundred thousand dollars annually. The P. M. G. is of opinion that the mails could not safely be stopped on the Sabbath, unless all travelling were prohibited; and he closes with suggesting the propriety of repealing that portion of the post-office law which requires a delivery of letters on seven days in the week. The report of the committee of the house is a go-between document, and makes a recommendation of the suggestion of the P. M. G. A motion to print 6000 extra copies met with opposition, and was finally laid on the table, on the ground that if the mails were not to be opened on Sunday, there would exist the same temptation to resort to private expresses as would arise from stopping the mail. "In addition to which, great abuses might take place in consequence of an understanding between post-masters and their particular friends, who might thus be put in possession of important commercial or political intelligence, whilst it was withheld from the rest of the community."

✂ The article respecting the testimony of Giddins, which we republished last week, should have been credited to the Ontario Repository, and not to the Messenger.

In the Senate of the United States, on the 19th ult. Mr. JOHNSON, of Ky. made the following report:

The committee to whom was referred the several petitions on the subject of mails on the sabbath, or 1st day of the week, report:

That some respite is required from the ordinary vocations of life, is an established principle, sanctioned by the usages of all nations, whether Christian or Pagan. One day in seven has also been determined upon as the proportion of time; and in conformity with the wishes of the great majority of citizens of this country, the 1st day of the week, commonly called Sunday, has been set apart for that object. The principle has received the sanction of the national legislature, so far as to admit a suspension of all public business on that day, except in cases of absolute necessity, or of great public utility. This principle, the committee would not wish to disturb. If kept within its legitimate sphere of action, no injury can result from its observance. It should, however be kept in mind, that the project of government is, to protect all persons in the enjoyment of their religious, as well as civil rights; and not to determine for any, whether they shall esteem one day above another, or esteem all days alike holy.

We are aware that a variety of sentiment exists among the good citizens of this nation, on the subject of the sabbath day; and our government is designed for the one, as much as for another. The Jews who, in this country are as free as Christians, and entitled to the same protection from the laws, derive their obligations to keep the sabbath day from the 4th commandment of their decalogue, and in conformity with that injunction, pay religious homage to the seventh day of the week, which we call Saturday. One denomination of Christians among us, justly celebrated for their piety, and certainly as good citizens as any other class, agree with the Jews in the moral obligation of the Sabbath, and observe the same day. There are also many Christians among us, who derive not their obligation to observe the Sabbath from the decalogues, but regard the Jewish Sabbath as abrogated. From the example of the apostles of Christ, they have chosen the first day of the week, instead of that day set apart in the decalogue, for their religious devotions. These have generally regarded the observance of the day as a devotional exercise, and would not more readily enforce it upon others, than they would enforce secret prayer or devout meditations. Urging the fact that neither the Lord nor his disciples, though often censured by their accusers, for a violation of the Sabbath, ever enjoined its observance, they regard it as a subject on which every person should be fully persuaded in his own mind, and not coerce others to act upon his persuasion. Many Christians again differ from these, professing to derive their obligation to observe the Sabbath from the fourth commandment of the Jewish decalogue, and bring the example of the apostles, who appear to have held their public meetings for worship on the first day of the week, as authority for so far changing the decalogue, as to substitute that day for the seventh. The Jewish government was a theocracy, which enforced religious observances: and though the committee would hope that no portion of the citizens of our country could willingly introduce a system of religious coercion in our civil institutions, the example of other nations should admonish us to watch carefully against its earliest indication.

With these different religious views, the committee are of opinion that congress cannot interfere. It is not the legitimate province of the legislature to determine what religion is true, or what false. Our government is a civil and not a religious institution. Our constitution recognizes in every person, the right to choose his own religion, and to enjoy it freely, without molestation. Whatever may be the religious sentiments of citizens, and however variant, they are alike entitled to protection from the government, so long as they do not invade the rights of others.

The transportation of the mail on the first day of the week, it is believed, does not interfere with the rights of conscience. The petitioners for its discontinuance appear to be actuated from a religious zeal, which may be commendable if confined to its proper sphere; but they assume a position better suited to an ecclesiastical than to a civil institution. They appear, in many instances, to lay it down as an axiom, that the practice is a violation of the law of God. Should congress, in their legislative capacity, adopt the sentiment, it would establish the principle, that the legislature is a proper tribunal to determine what are the laws of God. It would involve a legislative decision in a religious controversy; and on a point in which good citizens may honestly differ in opinion, without disturbing the peace of society, or endangering its liberties. If this principle is once introduced, it will be impossible to define its bounds. Among all the religious persecutions with which almost every page of modern history is stained, no victim ever suffered, but for the violation of what government denominated the law of God. To prevent a similar train of evils in this country, the constitution has wisely withheld from our government the power of defining the divine law. It is a right reserved to each citizen, and while he respects the equal rights of others, he cannot be held amenable to any human tribunal for his conclusions.

Extensive religious combinations, to effect a political object, are, in the opinion of the committee, always dangerous. This first effort of the kind calls for the establishment of a principle, which, in the opinion of the committee, would lay the foundation for dangerous innovations upon the spirit of the constitution, and upon the religious rights of the citizens. If admitted, it may be justly apprehended, that the future measures of government will be strongly marked, if not eventually controlled, by the same influence. All religious despotism commences by combination and influence; and when that influence begins to operate upon the political institutions of a country, the civil power soon bends under it; and the catastrophe of other nations furnishes an awful warning of the consequence.

Under the present regulations of the post office department, the rights of conscience are not invaded. Every agent enters voluntarily, and it is presumed conscientiously, into the discharge of his duties, without intermeddling with the conscience of another. Post offices are so regulated, as that but a small portion of the first day of the week is required to be occupied in official business. In the transportation of the mail on that day, no one agent is employed many hours. Religious persons enter into the business without violating their own consciences, or imposing any restraints upon others. Passengers in the mail stages are free to rest during the first day of the week, or to pursue their journeys at their own pleasure. While the mail is transported on Saturday, the Jew and the sabbatarian may abstain from any agency it carrying it, from conscientious scruples. While it is transported on the first day of the week, another class may abstain from the same religious scruples. The obligation of government is the same to both of these classes; and the committee can discover no principle upon which the claims of one should be more respected than those of the other, unless it should be admitted that the consciences of the minority are less sacred than those of the majority.

It is the opinion of the committee, that the subject should be regarded simply as a question of expediency, irrespective of its religious bearing. In this light it has hitherto been considered. Congress have never legislated upon the subject. It rests, as it ever has done, in the legal discretion of the postmaster general, under the repeated refusals of congress to discontinue the sabbath mails. His knowledge and judgment in all the concerns of that department, will not be questioned. His intense labours and assiduity have resulted in the highest improvement of every branch of his department. It is practised only on the great leading mail routes, and such others as are necessary to maintain their connexions. To prevent this, would, in the opinion of the committee, be productive of immense injury, both in its commercial, political, and in its moral bearings.

The various departments of government require, frequently in peace, always in war, the speediest intercourse with the remotest parts of the country; and one important object of the mail establishment is, to furnish the greatest and the most economical facilities for such intercourse. The delay of the mails one day in seven, would require the employment of special expresses, at great expense, and sometimes with great uncertainty.

The commercial, manufacturing and agricultural interests of our country are so intimately connected, as to require a constant and the most expeditious correspondence betwixt all our sea-ports, and betwixt them and the most interior settlements. The delay of the mails during the sabbath, would give occasion to the employment of private expresses, to such an amount, that probably ten riders would be employed where one mail stage is now running on that day; thus diverting the revenue of that department into another channel, and sinking the establishment into a state of pusillanimity incompatible with the dignity of the government of which it is a department.

Passengers in the mail stages, if the mails are not permitted to proceed on Sunday, will be expected to spend that day at a tavern upon the road, generally under circumstances not friendly to devotion, and at an expense which many are but poorly able to encounter. To obviate these difficulties, many will employ extra carriages for their conveyance, and become the bearers of correspondence, as more expeditious than the mail. The stage proprietors will themselves often furnish the travellers with those means of conveyance; so that the effect will ultimately be only to stop the mail, while the vehicle which conveys it will continue, and its passengers become the special messengers for conveying a considerable proportion of what would otherwise constitute the contents of the mail.

Nor can the committee discover where the system could consistently end. If the observance of a holy day becomes incorporated in our institutions, shall we not forbid the movement of an army; prohibit an assault in time of war; and lay an injunction upon our naval officers to lie in the wind while upon the ocean on that day? Consistency would seem to require it. Nor is it certain that we should stop here. If the principle is once established, that religion, or religious observances, shall be interwoven with our legislative acts, we must pursue it to its ultimatum. We shall, if consistent, provide for the erection of edifices for the worship of the Creator, and for the support of Christian ministers, if we believe such measures will promote the interest of Christianity. It is the settled conviction of the committee, that the only method of avoiding these consequences, with their attendant train of evils, is to adhere strictly to the spirit of the Constitution, which regards the general government in no other light than that of a civil institution, wholly destitute of religious authority.

What other nations call religious toleration, we call religious rights. They are not exercised in virtue of governmental indulgence, but as rights, of which government can not deprive any portion of citizens, however small. Despotick power may invade those rights, but justice still confirms them. Let the national legislature once perform an act which involves the decision of religious controversy, and it will have passed its legitimate bounds. The precedent will then be established, and the foundation laid for that usurpation of the Divine prerogative in this country, which has been the desolating scourge to the fairest portions of the world. Our constitution recognises no other power than that of persuasion, for enforcing religious observances. Let the professors of christianity recommend their religion by deeds of benevolence—by christian meekness—by lives of temperance and holiness. Let them combine their efforts to instruct the ignorant—to relieve the widow and the orphan—to promulgate to the world the gospel of their Saviour, recommending its precepts by their habitual example: government will find its legitimate object in protecting them. It cannot oppose them, and they will not need its aid. Their moral influence will do infinitely more to advance the true interest of religion, than any measures which they may call on Congress to enact.

The petitioners do not complain of any infringement upon their own rights. They enjoy all that Christians ought to ask at the hand of any government—protection from all molestation in the exercise of their religious sentiments.

Resolved, That the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

MASONICK CALENDAR.

[Regular meetings in the city of Albany, at the Masonick Hall.]

Temple Encampment, 2d Friday in each month.

Temple Chapter, 2d and 4th Tuesday in each month.

Temple Lodge, 1st and 2d Tuesday in each month.

Mount Vernon Lodge, 1st and 3d Thursday in each month.

Masters Lodge, 1st and 3d Wednesday in each month.

ODD FELLOWS' CALENDAR.

[Regular meetings in the city of Albany.]

Hope Lodge, Monday evening in each week, at Montgomery Hall.

Philanthropick Lodge, Wednesday evening in each week, corner of Lodge and State-streets, over Osborn and Gray's.

Clinton Lodge, Friday evening in each week, Masonick Hall.

FINE CUTLERY, &c.—JAMES DICKSON, Cutler and Surgical Instrument Maker, No. 3 Beaver street, (formerly at No. 98 North Market street) Albany, manufactures and repairs all kinds of instruments in the above branches, with neatness, accuracy and despatch, and warranted equal to any article imported, or manufactured in the United States.

Shears, Scissors, Razors and Penknives, ground and finished on an improved plan, and warranted to excel any other in use in this city or elsewhere.

Currier's Steels constantly on hand, and warranted a superior article.

Blades inserted in knife-handles in the most approved style, and most reasonable terms. Locks repaired.

N. B. Country orders punctually attended to.

Albany, Feb. 14, 1829

31f.

BOOK BINDING. Sign of the Golden Ledger, corner of State and North Market streets, Albany. WILLIAM SEYMOUR, carries on the above business in all its branches; viz: plain, extra, and super-extra—has a first rate ruling machine, and other necessary implements for manufacturing Blank Books of every description, on the most reasonable terms, of the best workmanship.

An assortment on hand. Subscribers to the American Masonick Record can have their volumes handsomely bound in boards, with leather backs and corners, at 23 1/2 cents a volume. Feb. 14.

3m3

PAINTING AND GLAZING.—The subscriber respectfully informs his friends and the public that he continues the House and Sign Painting and Glazing, at the old stand, No. 299, corner of North Market and Steuben streets, where he will accommodate the public with any article in his line. Paints in pots mixed ready for use, of the first quality, can be had at any time. Personal attention will be paid to all orders. March 9, 1828. JOHN F. PORTER.

FRANKLIN LETTER FOUNDRY. The proprietors of this Foundry, offer on liberal terms, the following articles, viz:—

Roman and Italic. Fourteen, Twelve, Ten, Eight, Seven, Six, Five, and Four Lines Pica, plain, Canon, Meridian, Double Great Primer, Double English, Double Small Pica, Great Primer, English, Pica, Small Pica, Long Primer Bourgeois, Brevier, Minion, Nonpareil, Pearl.

Two Line Letter. Minion, and all larger, Nonpareil, Pearl.

Full Face. English and Pica, Small Pica, Long Primer, Bourgeois, Brevier, Minion.

Borders and Flowers of every kind.

Antiques. Ten and Six Lines, Four Lines Pica, Double Great Primer, English and Pica, Long Primer, Brevier, Minion, Nonpareil.

Blacks. Four Lines Pica, Double Great Primer, Double Small Pica, Great Primer, English and Pica, Small Pica, Long Primer.

Open Blacks. Great Primer, Double Great Primer, and Four Lines Pica.

Italians. Seven Lines Pica, Five Lines Pica.

Tuscan. Eight Lines Pica, Four Lines Pica.

Shaded Letter. Eight Lines Pica, Four Lines Pica, Double Great Primer, Two Lines Brevier, Two Lines Nonpareil, Eight Lines Pica, Ornamented, Six Lines Pica, Ornamented.

Leads. Six to pica and thicker, Seven to pica, Eight to pica.

Quotations: Space Rules, from one to eight ems, Long Primer; Astronomical, and other signs; Spanish and French Accents; Fractions; Composing Sticks, from twenty to four inches in length; Cases;

Chases; Slice, Brass, and common Galleys; Iron and Mahogany Furniture; Proust's ink; Skins; parchment; points. Premises also furnished.

Several new founts of letter have been cut; and it has been the aim of the proprietors to combine the beauty of the modern, with the clearness and durability of the ancient style of typography, and to produce types at once handsome, legible, and useful. Specimens of these will be sent to printers. The greatest care has been taken in the composition of the metal with which all their founts of letter are cast.

All orders, either by letter or otherwise, left at their Counting Room, No. 41, State-street, or at their Foundry, Eagle-street, south of State-street, will receive prompt attention.

A. W. KINSLEY & Co.

Albany, Feb. 14, 1829.

3f

POETRY.

We found the epistle of Mr. Brotherton, and its accompaniment, in the keyhole of our office, the other day. We can not say that we much admire the poetical portion of the poetry.

Albany, February 10, 1829.

MR. EDITOR—In looking over the papers of Adrian Kissam, late of the town of Bethlehem, deceased, formerly of the city of New-York, I found the following lines, written by him on a young lady who had been long ill, but was again restored to health. I give it merely as a specimen of his genius, which was obscured from the world by his modesty. If you will give publicity to them, it may assist in eradicating from the mind of the publick the idea that he was an infidel, which impression many have and do entertain, but erroneous. Respectfully yours,

JOHN BROTHERTON.

Thy sickness, dear girl, may teach thee to know
That health far exceeds every blessing below.
Adore then the Source from whence it doth spring,
And morning and evening thy praise to Him sing,
Who so kindly indulgent restores thee again,
And relieves thy body from tormenting pain.

The prayer of thy friend shall incessantly rise,
And crowd in thick clusters at the doors of the skies,
That thy life, unimpaired by disease, may go,
And quietly pass through this valley of wo,
Until life, worn out by incessant decay,
Thy soul, pure and spotless, may then wing its way
To those joys which we are told and believe
It ne'er entered the heart of man to conceive.

THE FANCY BALL.

"A vizor for a vizor! what care I
What curious eye doth quote deformities." [Shakespeare.]

You used to talk, said Miss Mac Call,
Of flowers, and flames, and Cupid;
But now you never talk at all,
You're getting vastly stupid.
You'd better burn your Blackstone, sir,
You never will get through it;
There's a Fancy Ball at Winchester,
Do let us take you to it.

I made that night a solemn vow,
To startle all beholders;
I wore white muslin on my brow,
Green velvet on my shoulders;
My trowsers were supremely wide,
I learned to swear "by Allah,"
I stuck a poignard by my side,
And called myself "Abdallah."

O, a Fancy Ball's a strange affair,
Made up of silks and leathers,
Light heads, light heels, false hearts, false hair,
Pins, paint, and Ostrich feathers:
The dullest Duke in all the town,
To-night may shine a droll one;
And rakes who have not half a crown,
Look royal with a whole one.

Hail, blest confusion! here are met
All tongues, and times, and faces,
The Lancers flirt with Juliet,
The Brahmin talks of races;
And where's your genius, bright Corinne?
And where your brogue, Sir Lucius?
And China Ti, you have not seen
One chapter of Confucius.

Lo! dandies from Kamschatka flirt
With beauties from the Wrekin;
And belles from Ben look very pert
On Mandarins from Pekin;
The Cardinal is here from Rome,
The Commandant from Seville;
And Hamlet's father from the tomb,
And Faustus from the Devil.

What mean those laughing Nuns, I pray,
What mean they, Nun or Fairy?
I guess they told no beads to-day,
And sung no Ave Mary;
From Mass and Matins, Priest and Pix,
Barred door, and window grated,
I wish all pretty Catholics
Were thus emancipated.

Four seasons came to dance quadrilles,
With four well seasoned sailors
And Raleigh talks of rail-road bills,
With Timon, prince of railers;
I find Sir Charles of Aubyn Park
Equipped for a walk to Mecca,
And I run away from Joan of Arc
To romp with sad Rebecca.

Fair Cleopatra's very plain,
Puck halts, and Ariel swaggers,
And Caesar's murdered o'er again,
Though not by Roman daggers:
Great Charlemagne is four feet high,
Sad stuff has Bacon spoken;
Queen Mary's waist is all awry,
And Psyche's nose is broken.

Our happiest bride, how very odd!
Is the mourning Isabella,
And the heaviest foot that ever trod
Is the foot of Cinderella;
Here sad Calista laughs outright,
There Yorick looks most grave sir,
And a Templar waves the cross to-night,
Who never crossed the wave, sir.

And what a Babel is the talk!
"The Giraffe"—"plays the fiddle"
"Macadam's roads"—"I hate this chalk"
"Sweet girl"—"a charming riddle"
"I'm nearly drunk with"—"Epsom salts"
"Yes, separate beds"—"such cronies!"
"Good heaven! who taught that man to valtz?"
"A pair of Shetland ponies."

"Lord D——"—"an enchanting shape"
"Will move for"—"Marachino"
"Pray Julia, how's your mother's ape?"
"He died at Navarino!"
"The gout, by Jove, is—apple-pie"
"Don Miguel"—"Tom the Tinker"
"His Lordship's pedigree's as high
As"—"Whipcord, dam by Clinker."

"Love's shafts are weak"—"my chestnut kicks"
"Heart broken"—"broke the traces"
"What say you now of politics?"
"Change sides, and to your places."
"A five barred gate"—"a precious pearl"
"Grave things may all be punned on!"
"The Whigs, thank God, are"—"out of curl",
"Her age is"—"four by London!"

Thus run the giddy hours away,
Till morning's light is beaming,
And we must go to dream by day
All we to-night are dreaming;
To smile and sigh, to love and change;
Oh! in our heart's recesses,
We dress in fancies quite as strange
As these our fancy dresses.

From the Talieman.

TO THE PAST.

Thou unrelenting Past!
Strong are the barriers round thy dark domain;
And fetters sure and fast
Hold all that enter thy unbreathing reign.

Far in thy realm withdrawn,
Old empires sit in sullenness and gloom,
And glorious ages gone,
Lie deep within the shadow of thy womb.

Childhood, with all its mirth,
Youth, manhood, age, that draws us towards the ground,
And last—Man's life on earth
Glide to thy dim dominions and are bound.

Thou hast my better years:
Thou hast my early friends—the good—the kind—
Yielded to thee with tears—
The venerable form—the exalted mind.

My spirit yearns to bring
The lost ones back—yearns with desire intense;
And struggles hard to bring
Thy bolts apart, and pluck thy captives thence.

In vain—thy gates deny
All passage save to those who hence depart;
Nor to the streaming eye
Thou givest them back—nor to the broken heart.

In thy abysses hide
Beauty and excellence unknown—to thee
Earth's wonder and her pride
Are gathered, as the waters to the sea

Labours of good to man,
Unpublished charity, unbroken faith—

Love, that midst grief began,
And grew with years, and faltered not in death.

Full many a mighty name
Lurks in thy depths, unuttered, unrevered;
With thee are silent fame,
Forgotten arts, and wisdom disappeared.

Thine for a space are they;—
Yet shalt thou yield thy treasures up at last.
Thy gates shall yet give way,
Thy chains shall fall, inexorable Past!

All that of good and fair
Has gone into thy womb, from earliest time,
Shall then come forth, to wear
The glory and the beauty of its prime.

They have not perished—no!
Kind words, remembered voices, once so sweet,
Smiles radiant long ago,
And features, the great soul's apparent seat.

All shall come back—each tie
Of pure affection shall be knit again;
Alone shall Evil die,
And Sorrow dwell a prisoner in thy reign.

And then shall I behold,
Him by whose kind paternal side I sprung;
And her, who, still and cold,
Fills the next grave—the beautiful and young.

THE "RED BIRD,"

Chief of the Winnebagoes—he died in Prison, in 1828.

Sleep was on the warrior's eye,
Stilly laid his fettered hand,
And his spirit, free to fly,
Sought again his native land.
Skies were bright, and breezes came,
Sweet as on the mountain borne,
Swept they o'er his wearied frame,
With a voice of things by-gone.
Half his fettered hand did raise
To the vision o'er him smiling,
Half the lights of other days
Brightened, once again beguiling—
Why that spirit beauty broken—
Why that shadowy bliss forego?
Dark reality has spoken,
And the warrior wakes to wo.

'I hear—I hear wild voices flit
From the shadowy halls where my fathers sit:
They link my name with a kingly band,
And bid me hail to the spirit land.
I come at your bidding, bright shades of the slain,
That met ye by mountain, and forest, and plain,
We mingled in battle, and banquet, and chase,
And I poured to your death-dirge the pride of my race.

Oh, son of the eagle! thy spirit is gone,
The plume of thy war-crest is sullied and torn:
I feel the proud burst of my spirit is vain,
And the white craven laughs as he rivets the chain.
Oh, never the halo of ages gone by
Will return like yon day-beam to gladden the sky.
The soul of the 'Red Bird' is cold in its gloom,
And the home of his hope is the breast of the tomb.

My eye was the brightest—my arrow was true—
And fresh from the pine top it drank the young dew.
Speed! to the deer through the dark forest flying,
But mine was the step to his fleetness replying,
I trod the wild rock where the torrent lies buried,
Fierce o'er my pathway the angry blast hurried,
I heard in the thunder the storm spirit's sigh,
And I loved the red banner he waved in the sky.

I fling to revenge the cold fetter it gave,
And I rush to the dream of the glorious brave.
The torches are flashing, and proud is the call
That beckons me far, to the shadowy hall,
In vain is the shackle—I spring to my home!
Roll on the dark musick! I come! I come!
My fetters are broken, my spirit is free,
And shades of the mighty, I mingle with ye.

NORNA.

THIS PAPER

Is published every Saturday, by E. B. CHILD.

AT THE CORNER OF NORTH MARKET AND STEUBEN
STREETS, ALBANY, N. Y.

TERMS—To city subscribers, Three Dollars a year. To subscribers who receive their papers by mail, Two Dollars
and Fifty Cents, in ADVANCE—otherwise, Three Dollars.
JOB PRINTING neatly executed at this office.

AMERICAN MASONICK RECORD

AND ALBANY SATURDAY MAGAZINE.

VOL. III. ALBANY, N. Y. SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1829. NO. 4.

MASONICK RECORD.

CONSTITUTION,

Regulations, &c. of the GRAND ROYAL ARCH CHAPTER of the state of New-York, adopted at the city of Albany, on the 7th day of February, 1805.

(Concluded.)

The following Resolution was adopted by the Grand Chapter, at its annual meeting in February, 5819.

Resolved, that M. E. Ezra Ames, Jonathan Eights and Ebenezer Wadsworth, be a committee to cause to be re-printed one thousand copies of the Constitution of this Grand Chapter; and also to digest and annex thereto such of the resolutions on record as are necessary for the instruction and government of subordinate Chapters and Mark Lodges, together with the act of the legislature incorporating the Grand Chapter; and that the Grand Secretary distribute three copies thereof to each subordinate Chapter and Mark Lodge under the jurisdiction of this Grand Chapter.

Agreeably to the preceding resolution, the committee have thought proper to annex to the Constitution the following Resolutions, as necessary for the instruction and government of the Chapters and Mark Lodges under the jurisdiction of this Grand Chapter, viz:

February 2, 5802.—Resolved, that every Chapter and Mark Lodge under the jurisdiction of this Grand Chapter, shall, within one year hereafter, provide itself with a seal, and that such Chapter or Mark Lodge send an impression thereof to the Grand Secretary, in order that whenever thereafter they shall send credentials to this Grand Chapter, the seal that shall be affixed thereto shall compare with the impression deposited with the Grand Secretary.

February 8, 5804.—Resolved, that it shall be the duty of the Grand Secretary hereafter, on the first day of the session of this Grand Chapter, to present to the same an account or statement of the items of all receipts and disbursements at the preceding Chapter, or in the subsequent vacation, from whom received, and for what purpose disbursed, and the balance remaining in fund; and it shall also be the duty of the Grand Treasurer to present his account or statement in like manner, and at the same time, that the members may be enabled to judge of the finances of the said Grand Chapter, which said statements shall be kept by the Grand High Priest for the time being, and by him delivered over to his successor in office.

Resolved, that no member of this Grand Chapter shall receive his compensation for attending the same until such time as the dues of the Chapter or Lodge he represents are fully paid up.

February 2, 5808.—Resolved, that the Grand Secretary and Grand Treasurer be, and they are hereby directed to receive hereafter no bank bills for dues to this Grand Chapter, except such as will pass current in the banks of this city.

February 7, 5809.—Resolved, that a Proxy for any Chapter, or for any High Priest, King, or Scribe of any Chapter, shall only be entitled to travelling fees from his actual place of residence, provided the same shall not be at a greater distance from the place of meeting of this Grand Chapter than the Chapter from which he shall derive his appointment; in such case his travelling fees shall be computed from the Chapter he represents.

February 6, 5810.—Resolved, that any Proxy for a standing member of this Grand Chapter shall not hereafter be entitled to receive pay for travel and attendance.

Resolved, that it shall be the duty of the Grand-Visitors to attend the regular meetings of the Grand Chapter, and that they shall receive the like pay for travel and attendance that the members are entitled to receive, provided such Grand Visitor shall not receive pay, as such, if a member of the Grand Chapter for the time being.

February 4, 5812.—Resolved, that the Grand Chapter do recommend, that no dispensation for holding Mark Lodges be granted in future during the recess of this Grand Chapter.

February 7, 5815.—Resolved, that in all cases where the expulsion, suspension, or rejection of a member or candidate shall be approved by this Grand Chapter, that the Grand Secretary shall give notice of the same to each of the subordinate Chapters or Mark Lodges under this jurisdiction, that they may govern themselves accordingly.

February 6, 5816.—Resolved, that whenever any Mark Lodge or Chapter shall cease to work, and constitutionally forfeit their warrants, their funds shall be, and are hereby declared to be the property of this Grand Chapter, and shall be paid and delivered to them accordingly: Provided nevertheless, that whenever a Mark warrant is surrendered, and a Chapter established in its place, that the funds and jewels shall be the property of the said Chapter.

February 6, 5824.—Whereas it is represented to this Grand Chapter, that some subordinate Chapters are in the habit of occasionally holding convocations for labour, and also informal meetings for lecturing, on the Sabbath: And whereas the Supreme Architect of the Universe, after having completed the wonderful work of creation, not only rested from his labour on the seventh day, but afterwards issued his divine injunction, commanding that it should forever hereafter be hallowed as a day of rest: And whereas the Holy Bible is the universal standard for the rule and guide of the conduct and faith of all Chapters of Royal Arch Masons: And whereas the practice above set forth is an infringement of the principles and spirit of the Masonick institution, and has a tendency to injure and degrade it in the eyes of the religious community: Therefore,

Resolved, that no subordinate Chapters under the jurisdiction of this Grand Chapter, be hereafter allowed to hold communications on the Sabbath, either for actual labour or for the purpose of lecturing on any of the degrees.

February 10, 5826.—Whereas, in proceedings against Companions and Brothers charged with offences, it is proper and necessary to adopt a uniform practice, to enable the Grand Chapter to pronounce a final decision thereon: Therefore,

Resolved, that if any Companion or Brother shall be charged with any misdemeanour he shall be summoned to appear before the Chapter or Mark Master's Lodge to which he belongs, or a committee appointed for the purpose of investigating the same: or if he belongs to no Chapter or Mark Lodge within this state, then he shall be summoned to appear before the nearest Chapter to his residence: such summons shall be in writing, designating the time when, and the place where, such Chapter, Lodge, or Committee shall assemble, and, together with a copy of the charges and specifications preferred against him, and the names of the complainants, shall be served personally if the accused can be found, and if not found, shall be left at his last place of residence. All of which shall be duly attested by the Secretary of such Chapter or Lodge—and he shall have reasonable time to prepare for his defence: if he do not appear to the summons, the plea of not guilty shall be made for him by the Secretary, and trial had thereon: otherwise all proceedings upon such charges and specifications shall be deemed irregular and void.

AN ACT

To incorporate the Grand Chapter of the state of New York, passed March 31, 1818.

Whereas, it is represented to the legislature by the Grand Chapter of Freemasons of the state of New-York, that they experience great difficulties in vesting and securing their funds, which are chiefly intended for charitable purposes, and that they wish to purchase and hold a lot of ground for the purpose of erecting thereon a Masonick Hall: Therefore,

I. Be it enacted by the People of the State of New-York, represented in Senate and Assembly, that Ezra Ames, Richard Hatfield, Joseph Enos, junr., John Brush, Ebenezer Wadsworth, and Isaac Hempsted, and their associates, be, and they are hereby declared a body politick and corporate, in fact and in name, by the name of the "Grand Chapter of the State of New-York;" and that by that name they and their successors shall and may have succession, and be capable of suing and being sued, pleading and being impleaded, defending and being defended, in all courts and places whatsoever, in all manner of actions, suits, complaints, matters and causes whatsoever, and that they may have a common seal, and alter the same at pleasure.

II. And be it further enacted, that their elections of officers shall be made annually, at such time and place, and subject to such rules and regulations as the said Grand Chapter shall from time to time direct; and that the four first officers, together with the secretary and treasurer for the time being, shall always be the trustees, and have the management of the concerns of the said Grand Chapter: Provided always, that all appropriations of the funds of the said Chapter shall be made by the trustees aforesaid, by and with the consent of a majority of the members thereof, present at their annual meetings.

III. And be it further enacted, that the trustees aforesaid, and their successors, by the name aforesaid, shall be in law capable of purchasing, holding, selling and conveying any estate, real and personal, for the use and benefit of the said Chapter, not exceeding fifty thousand dollars in value: Provided, that no real estate or lot of ground shall be purchased or held by the said trustees, except for the purpose of building and erecting a Masonick Hall thereon: and that the powers of the said trustees in relation to their personal estate, shall be confined to the vesting and securing of their funds, and the transfer and distribution thereof, for the ordinary and usual purposes of the said Chapter: And provided also, that this act shall in no wise affect any other or subordinate Chapter in this state.

IV. And be it further enacted, that this act shall be taken and deemed to be a publick act, and that it shall and may be lawful for the legislature, at any time hereafter, to alter or repeal the same.

Universi Terrarum Orbis Architectonis per Gloriam Ingenit.

ORDO AB CHAO.

VIRTUS JUNXIT, MORS NON SEPARABIT.

The GRAND COUNCIL OF PRINCES OF JERUSALEM commenced its annual session the 30th day of Sebat, 5587, (2d February, 1829) at the Masonick Hall in this city. All the Grand Lodges of Perfection under the jurisdiction of this Grand Council (except three) were duly represented by their officers and proxies.

The following Princes were unanimously elected to the offices set opposite to their respective names for the ensuing year, to wit:—

James M. Allen, M. D., of Skaneateles, Onondaga county, M. Eq. G. Sovereign.

Hon. Eli Savage, of Oneida county, E. S. G. Sovereign.

John G. Van Deusen, of Palatine, Montgomery county, G. Warden.

Dwight F. Lawton, of Oswego, G. Counsellor.

Giles F. Yates, A. M., of Schenectady, G. Chancellor.

Rev. James Selkrigg, of Amber, Onondaga county, G. Priest.

David S. Van Rensselaer, esq. of Amber, Onondaga county, G. Recorder.

Nathaniel Calkins, of New-Hartford, Oneida county, G. M. of Finances.

Almos Matthews, of Mayfield, Montgomery county, G. M. of Ceremonies.

Daniel D. Benedict, of Saratoga Springs, G. Herald.

Collins Odell, esq. of Mayfield, Montgomery county, G. Guard.

Calendars will soon be prepared and forwarded to all concerned.

TRIBUTE OF RESPECT.

At a stated meeting of Washington Lodge, No. 5, holden in Charleston, South Carolina, on Thursday, October 16, 1829, the following preamble and resolution were unanimously adopted by the lodge:

"Whereas, it is a useful custom among all civilized communities, whenever they meet with bereavements in their valuable members or their officers, to express publicly their sorrows for such misfortunes, and to hold up a recollection of their useful example for the imitation and improvement of their successors—and whereas, we, in common with our fellow citizens of every class, have suffered a serious bereavement in the latter, by the death of our beloved, respected, and worthy brother, the lamented Worshipsful Master of this lodge, RUFUS SOUTHWORTH, esq., in whose decease on the 9th inst. when he had hardly attained his thirty-fourth year,—this lodge has lost an amiable member, and society at large a valuable citizen.

"Be it, therefore, resolved, that as a token of our sincere respect and esteem for the memory of our departed brother, the members of Washington Lodge, No. 5, do wear crape upon the left arm for thirty days—and that the lodge be clothed in mourning until St. John's day next,—27th of December.

"Resolved, that we do sincerely and deeply sympathize with our brother EDWARD SOUTHWORTH, in the heavy loss he has sustained in this dispensation of Divine Providence, and that a copy of these resolutions be left with him.

"Resolved, that we who have been so long and intimately acquainted with him can really sympathize with his distant and aged parents and family, and trusting that it may prove a mournful gratification to them to learn that through his long decline of health and final sickness—although far removed from his native hills, his memory is warmly cherished and his loss deeply lamented—and he was loved, esteemed, and respected, by all who knew him. A true copy from the record,

"M. HOLBROOK, P. M. and Sec'y. p. t.

MANNERS AND CUSTOMS.

THE TURKS.

The Turks have a manly and prepossessing demeanour; being generally of a good stature, and remarkably well formed in their limbs. The men shave their heads, but wear long beards, and are extremely proud of their mustaches, which are usually turned downwards, and which give the other features of the face a cast of peculiar pensiveness. They wear turbans, sometimes white, of an enormous size on their heads, and never remove them but when they go to repose. Their breeches, or drawers, are united with their stockings, and they have slippers, which they never put off but when they enter a mosque, or the house of a great man. Large shirts are worn, and over them is a vest tied with a sash; the outer garment being a sort of loose gown. Every man, in whatever station he is, carries a dagger in his sash. The women's attire much resembles that of the other sex, only they have a cap on their heads, something like a bishop's mitre, instead of a turban. Their hair is beautiful and long, mostly black, but their faces, which are remarkably handsome, are so covered when they walk out, that nothing is to be seen but their eyes. The ladies of the sultan's harem are lovely virgins, either captives taken during war, or presents from the governors of provinces. They are never allowed to stir abroad except when the grand signior removes; and then they are put into close chariots, signals being made at certain distances that no man may approach the road through which the ladies pass, on pain of death. There are a great number of female slaves in the sultan's harem, whose task it is to wait on the ladies, who have, besides, a black eunuch for their superintendent.

There are three colleges in Turkey where the children of distinguished men are educated and fitted for state employments. The children are first approved by the grand signior before they are allowed to enter these seminaries; and none dare come into his majesty's presence who are not handsome and well-made. Silence is first taught them, and a becoming behaviour to their superiors; then they are instructed in the Mahometan faith, the Turkish and Persian languages, and afterwards in the Arabic. At the age of twenty-one they are taught all manner of manly exercises, and above all, the use of arms. As they advance to proficiency in these, and other useful arts, and as government places become vacant, they are preferred; but it is to be observed, that they generally attain the age of forty before they are thought capable of being entrusted with important state affairs.

Those who hold any office under the grand signior are called his slaves; the term slave, in Turkey, signifying the most honourable title a subject can bear. The grand signior is commonly supposed among his own people, to be something more than human; for he is not bound by any laws except that of professing and maintaining the Mahometan religion. A stranger desiring to be admitted into his majesty's presence, is first examined by proper persons, and his arms taken from him; he is then ushered before the royal personage between two strong supporters, but is not even then permitted to approach near enough to kiss the sultan's foot. This custom, which is observed by every sultan, originated in the following manner;—Amurath I. having obtained a great victory over the Christians, was on the field of battle with his officers viewing the dead, when a wounded Christian soldier, rising from among the slain, came staggering towards him. The king, supposing the man intended to beg for his life, ordered the guards to make way for him; but drawing near, he drew a dagger from under his coat, and plunged it into the heart of the great king, who instantly died.

* The ceremony of kissing the foot, as well as the hand, of a sovereign, is yet observed in the east.

In Turkey, no man marries a deformed wife for the sake of a fortune, as with us; beauty and good sense, to their credit be it spoken, are the only inducements to matrimony among the Turks. But they are an indolent people, and are much averse to improving their country by commerce, planting, or building; appearing to take delight in letting their property run to ruin. Alexandria, Tyre, and Sidon, which once commanded the navigation and trade of the whole world, are at present in the Turks' possession, but are only very inconsiderable places. Indeed, observes a judicious author, it is well for us that the Turks are such an indolent people, for their situation and vast extent of empire, would enable them to monopolize the trade of the world if they attended to it. They appear to possess very little genius or inclination for the improvement of arts and sciences, although they live in countries which were once in the possession of the classic Greeks; but seem to prefer a slothful mode of life to an active one, continually sauntering away their time, either among women, or in taking coffee and smoking. Being men of great taciturnity, they very seldom disturb a stranger with questions; and a person may live in their country a dozen years, without having twenty words addressed to him, except on important business. They seldom travel, and have very little wish to be informed of the state of their own, or any other country; when a minister of state is turned out of his place, or strangled, (which is a frequent custom,) they coldly observe that there will be a new one, without inquiring into the reason of the disgrace of the former. The doctrine of predestination prevails, and they therefore think it wicked to endeavour to avoid their fate; frequently entering houses where they know the plague is raging.

All religions are tolerated in Turkey, though none are encouraged but the Mahometan faith.—The Christians have churches, which the Turks not unfrequently convert into mosques for their own use; nor will they suffer any new churches, or temples, to be built, without extorting an exorbitant fine from the poor Christians. The high priest of the Mahometan Religion is called the muf-ti; he is invested with great power, and his seal is necessary to the passing of all acts of state. But any individual, who pleases to take habit, may be priest, and may leave the office when he is weary of it; for there is nothing like ordination among them.

MISCELLANY.

From the New-England Galaxy.

FIRST OF THE INCURABLES.

Non tibi equidem invidio, sed mirror magis.—Virgil

There is not one subject in the crowded vocabulary which the imagination presents, that so completely defies attack as what, for want of a better word, I must denominate Courtship. Talk to one who is but a novice in the business, and who has never been initiated into its mysteries, and you waste words upon him, for before you have finished, his eyes are wandering about in search of some idol before whom he may unveil himself in adoration. Address yourself to one who has taken its several degrees, and has become something of an adept in its ceremonies—he will lend you an attentive ear, promise to leave the shrine where his worship has been unworthily bestowed, and when you are almost sure of your point, and thanking heaven that you have gained a proselyte—you hear through a third person that your expected proselyte has been courting more than a year, and that since your conversation with him, he has engaged himself. This is a sad blow. Turn your speech to a third, to one who, you know, has been courting a long time, and who, you think, judging from yourself, must be sick of it ere this. In him you have a ready listener, he agrees with you that it is all folly to be in love so long a time, and swears by all that is honorable that his courtship shall come to a termination to-morrow night. You of course thank God that you have at last succeeded, and are sure that will be a bold champion in your cause—when, lo! his courtship does indeed end—in marriage! Thus you stand at a distance, and see the dame making its way among the most beautiful of God's creatures, though like old Achilles watching the burning walls of Troy in his ship, you do not fear its approach to you.

But there is yet another class whose monosyllables and iambs almost touch your very heart's blood. These are Enthusiasts in love. Talk to them of the miseries of love, and they will paint woman to you as an angel, they will speak of her languishing, melting eye, her carnation cheeks, and her rosy lips, the sweet, passionate language of her tongue, the beautiful expression of her face, the glorious symmetry and proportion of her limbs, and the godlike something in her presence. They will tell you Plato was a fool, that women are the poetry, and men the prose of earth, and that the page is most splendid in the great book of nature, when the prose and poetry are beautifully mingled together. These are enthusiasts in love. These are the men, who, if you speak against courtship in their presence, will tell you that you know nothing about it, that you cannot judge, but from experience. This answer effectually stops the mouths of many, who constantly go about the business themselves by way of trial; and they, poor fellows, reason in the same way, and go down the current with thousands more, utterly unable to turn and buffet the waves, and thus reach the bourne from which few return. This accounts for the fact, that many daily leave the ranks of those who live in single blessedness. But still there are some who can speak from experience, and I, thanks to my better judgment, can call myself one of these.

I had my Dulcinea once, as well as the best of them. I used to pass my three evenings a week with her, and oh! the preparation necessary for my visits. There was brushing of clothes, suiting of dicky, folding of cravat—the buttoning just so, and the tying just so, and the thousand things just so—combing hair—polishing boots, greasing whisks, sprinkling cologne—hat to put on and hat to put off when put on, turning fifty times to the glass before you can suit yourself, and then thinking of some pretty things to say, and a thousand other little things, in mentioning which, one might with his tongue, give a pretty fair illustration of perpetual motion. Then you must walk two or three miles through mud and mire, go north-east first, then north, then east, and then you feel so cheap knocking at the door, especially if it rains, and you have forgotten your umbrella, the rain meanwhile finding its way between your neck and dicky, while you are endeavoring to recollect an appropriate and set speech, which you were to remember, but cannot for the life of you. Or if it should chance to be a moon-light eve, you are stopping at every mud puddle in the street to adjust your cravat a little, and see how you look, thereby making a perfect mirror of it. When you enter the room you find the sofa occupied by three or four 'young fellows and girls,' who have 'just happened in,' to make a social visit, (and perhaps you think it most too social) and you cannot have a word of private talk with the only one you care much about in the room. After a long conversation, in which you take no interest, some of them retire, and others, knowing not why you are there, determine to stay as long as you do, and so make a joke of it, (which you think a cursed poor one by the way) and you are determined to stay them out, as you have a 'prior right.' Finally, at about twelve, more out of mercy to the eyes than to you, they 'give up the ship,' though not without telling you that they will have a peep into the window, unless you extinguish your 'nocturnal luminary.' After about three hours of private conversation, you take your leave for the night, though not without standing on the door-step half an hour or so, to look at the moon. At last you leave your Dulcinea with many a sigh, and many a hard-drawn breath, so that, after going west and south, you reach home at about three in the morning. I can assure those who are unacquainted with these matters that this is an accurate statement of facts.

This was pretty much my mode of courtship, and no reasonable being will wonder at my growing sick of it: and I did grow thoroughly sick of it.—I became less attentive each week. Instead of going three times, I went but once, and then staid only two or three hours. I was, on the point of asking for a discharge (would to God I had!) when I received one without any solicitation. My Dulcinea, seeing that I was inattentive, and fearing perhaps that I had some one else in my eye, forbade my ever writing again in any other capacity than that of a friend. I accordingly left her, without much ado. I think it my duty, however, to state, that, when I found myself so suddenly deserted, I shed an abundance of tears; so great indeed was the flow of them, that I have not actually shed any since, unless my chimney smoked, and actually forced them out. I then, of course, made a virtue of necessity, and gave way to the impulses of my nature.

The whole course of my courtship embraced one year. After I had received my discharge, and well recovered myself, I thought for the benefit of others, I would make a calculation of the time I had lost in courting. I went, as I said before, regularly three times a week, which, allowing upon an average five hours each night, would make fifteen hours a week, or seven hundred and eighty hours a year—I ought perhaps to have observed before, that Sunday nights are not, as in other matters, to be thrown out of the calculation; they afford no rest to lovers. Now a person can certainly read 30 pages an hour, and do this for five hours together in an evening, especially if he is a studious person, so that he would read 23400 pages a year, making about 78 octavo volumes of 300 pages each. Thus you see what an amount of labor is actually lost by such persons as 'go a courting.' Remember that I do not take into the account here the time spent in thinking about your Dulcinea, and the many sighs that must follow, which draw one's mind from whatever it would fix upon. Neither do I reckon the want of sleep, the pale faces, hollow eyes, and the distracting head-aches that must render both parties more or less miserable, nor the time you must devote to riding and visiting friends, and the oh! dears! and oh! every thing else;—should I take these in, and moralize upon the condition of the parties, they would swell the amount, and make the courting and the courted the means of doing much injury on God's earth.

I think, Messrs Editors, you can bear me out in the conclusion that courting is a very bad, not to say a very injurious piece of business, and that no one should betake himself to it if he can find any thing else to employ himself about; and I sincerely hope our state legislature will not pass a law for taxing bachelors, after the example of our sister state, Ohio; for I fear they would desert our standard, and flock to that of Hymen, rather than have so loud a call made upon their purses. I, for one, will not marry, unless it can be done without courtship. If I should alter my mind, you will probably hear from me.

RIP SNEEZER.

"CAN YOU KEEP A SECRET."

"Dorothy," said Ichabod, pale and trembling, to his wife, "Dorothy, I have a secret, and if I thought you would keep it inviolable, I would not hesitate to reveal it to you; But oh, Dorothy, woman!"

"Why, Ichabod, it must certainly be a secret of great importance, for you are in a woful agitation. You know, husband, you can place implicit confidence in your wife. Have I ever given you occasion to doubt my fidelity?"

"Never, never, Dorothy; but the secret I have to communicate is one that requires more than ordinary faithfulness and prudence to prevent you from divulging it. Oh dear! I shudder when I think on it!"

"Why, husband, do you know how your lips tremble, and your eyes roll!—What is the matter? Ichabod!—you surely can not mistrust the confidence of one who vowed at the altar to be faithful to you. Come, unbosom yourself."

"May I rely on your fidelity?"

"Ichabod, you know you may."

"Well then,—we are both to be ruined!—undone!—I have committed murder!"

"Murder!"

"Yes, murder!—and have buried him at the foot of a tree in the orchard!"

"Oh! awful! Ichabod. Committed murder! Then indeed we are ruined, and our children with us!"

Ichabod left the room, and Dorothy hurried off to her neighbour's. Mrs. Prattle observed a great change in Dorothy's countenance, and in her general appearance; so great as to cause her to inquire into the cause of it.

"Oh! Mrs. Prattle," said Dorothy, "I am the most miserable of women!—I am ruined for ever!"

"Mercy! Dorothy, how gloomy you look!—What has turned up to make you look so dejected? Why how you sigh! woman. Tell me the cause."

"I wish I might, Mrs. Prattle; but the occasion of my unhappiness is a secret which I am not permitted to divulge."

"Oh! you may tell me, Dorothy—I shall never speak of it again."

"Will you promise never to reveal it to any person living?"

"You know, Dorothy, I never tell secrets."

"Well Mrs. Prattle—I scarcely dare say it—my husband has committed murder, and buried him at the foot of a tree in the orchard!—he told me of it, himself. For Heaven's sake don't name it to any one!"

"Murder!—your husband committed murder!—indeed, indeed, Dorothy, you have reason to think yourself ruined!—Poor thing! I pity you from the bottom of my heart!"

Dorothy went home weeping and wringing her hands; and Mrs. Prattle, leaving her dough half kneaded, and her infant crying in the cradle, hastened to hold a tete-a-tete with Mrs. Tellall. Soon after this last confab was ended, the report of Ichabod's having committed murder became general, and the disclosure of the fact was traced to his wife Dorothy. Process was immediately issued against him by a magistrate, before whom, and in the presence of a multitude of anxious spectators, he gave the following explanation.

"My object," said Ichabod, "in the course I have pursued, was to test my wife's capability of keeping a secret—I have committed murder in as much as I killed a toad, and buried it at the foot of a tree in my own orchard. How far my wife is capable of keeping a secret, has been sufficiently proved;—and with respect to the murder, those who feel an interest in it, are at liberty to inspect the body."

[Pittsburg Hesperus.]

THE IRISH BAR.

There was a curious character, a Sergeant Kelly, at the Irish bar. He was, in his day, a man celebrity. Curran gave us some odd sketches of him. The most whimsical peculiarity, however, of this gentleman, and which, as Curran described it, excited a general grin, was an inveterate habit of drawing conclusions directly at variance with his premises. He had acquired the name of Counselor Therefore. Curran said that he was a perfect human personification of a non sequitur. For instance, meeting Curran one Sunday near St. Patrick's, he said to him, "The Archbishop gave us an excellent discourse this morning. It was well written and well delivered; therefore, I shall make a point of being at the Four Courts to-morrow at ten." At another time, observing to a person whom he met in the street, "What a delightful morning this is for walking!" he finished his remark on the weather, by saying, "therefore, I will go home as soon as I can, and stir out no more the whole day."

His speeches in Court were interminable, and his *therefore*s kept him going on, though every one thought that he had done. The whole Court was in a titter when the Sergeant came out with them, whilst he himself was quite unconscious of the cause of it.

"This is so clear a point, gentlemen," he would tell the jury, "that I am convinced you felt it to be so the very moment I stated it. I should pay your understandings but a poor compliment to dwell on it for a minute; therefore, I shall now proceed to explain it to you as minutely as possible." Into such absurdities did his favourite "therefore" betray him

[Clubs of London.]

Pleasures, while they flatter a man, sting him to death. Dancing and drinking have killed many a lad, and many a lass. Plutarch says, the Egyptians, at their feasts frolics, to prevent excesses, set a skeleton before their guests, with this motto—"remember ye must shortly be such."

THE LEGENDARY.

THE HAUNTED SHIPS.

Though my mind's not Hoodwink'd with rustic marvels, I do think
There are more things in the grove, the air, the flood,
Yea, and the charnel'd earth, than what wise man,
Who walks as proud as if his form alone
Fill'd the wide temple of the universe,
Will let a frail maid say. I'd write it the creed
Of the sagest head alive, that fearful fable,
Holy or reprobate, do page men's heels:
That shapes, too horrid for our gaze, stand o'er
The murderer's dust, and for revenge, glare up,
Even till the stars weep fire for very pity.

Along the coast of Solway, there still linger many traditional stories of a maritime nature, most of them connected with superstitions singularly wild and unusual. To the curious these tales afford a rich fund of entertainment, from the many diversities of the same story; some dry and barren, and stripped of all the embellishments of poetry; others dressed out in all the riches of a superstitious belief and haunted imagination. Something like a rude prosaic outline of several of the most noted of the northern ballads, the adventures and depredations of the old ocean kings, still lends life to the evening tale; and, among others, the story of the Haunted Ships is still popular among the maritime peasantry.

One fine harvest evening I went on board the shallop of Richard Faulder, of Allanbay; and, committing ourselves to the waters, we allowed a gentle wind from the east to waft us at its pleasure towards the Scottish coast. We passed the sharp promontory of Siddick; and skirting the land within a stone cast, glided along the shore till we came within sight of the ruined Abbey of Sweetheart. The green mountain of Crieffell ascended beside us; and the bleat of the flocks from its summit, together with the winding of the evening horn of the reapers, came softened into something like musick over land and sea. We pushed our shallop into a deep and wooded bay, and set silently looking on the serene beauty of the place. The moon glimmered in her rising through the tall shafts of the pines of Caerlaverock, and the sky, with scarce a cloud, showered down on wood, and headland, and bay, the twinkling beams of a thousand stars, rendering every object visible. The tide too was coming with that swift and silent swell observable when the wind is gentle; the woody curves along the land were filling with the flood till it touched the green branches of the drooping trees; while in the centre current the roll and the plunge of a thousand pollocks told to the experienced fishermen that salmon were abundant. As we looked, we saw an old man emerging from a path that winded to the shore through a grove of dodered hazel; he carried a halve-net on his back, while behind him came a girl, bearing a small harpoon, with which the fishers were remarkably dexterous in striking their prey. The senior seated himself on a large gray stone which overlooked the bay, laid aside his bonnet, and submitted his bosom and neck to the refreshing sea breeze; and taking his harpoon from his attendant, sat with the gravity and composure of a spirit of the flood, with his ministering nymph behind him. We pushed our shallop to the shore, and soon stood at their side. "This is old Mark Macmoran, the mariner, with his grand daughter Barbara," said Richard Faulder, in a whisper that had something of fear in it; "he knows every creek, and cavern, and quicksand in Solway,—has seen the spectre hound that haunts the Isle of Man; has heard him bark, and at every bark has seen a ship sink; and he has seen, too, the haunted ships in full sail; and, if all tales be true, he has sailed in them himself;—he's an awful person." Though I perceived in the communication of my friend something of the superstition of the sailor, I could not help thinking that common rumour had made a happy choice in singling out old Mark to maintain her intercourse with the invisible world. His hair, which seemed to have refused all intercourse with the comb, hung matted upon his shoulders; a kind of mantle, or rather blanket, pinned with a wooden skewer round his neck, fell mid-leg down, concealing all his nether garments as far as a pair of hose, darned with yarn of all conceivable colours, and a pair of shoes, patched and repaired till nothing of the original structure remained, and clasped on his feet with two massy silver buckles. If the dress of the old man was rude and sordid, that of his grand-daughter was gay, and even rich. She wore a bodice of fine wool, wrought round the bosom with alternate leaf and lily, and a kirtle of the same fabric, which, almost touching her white and delicate ankle, showed her snowy feet so fairy-light and round that they scarcely seemed to touch the grass where she stood. Her hair, a natural ornament which woman seeks much to improve, was a bright glossy brown, and encumbered rather than adorned with a snood, set thick with marine productions, among which the small clear pearl found in the Solway was conspicuous. Nature had not trusted to a handsome shape, and a sylph like air, for young Barbara's influence over the heart of man; but had bestowed a pair of large bright blue eyes, swimming in liquid light, so full of love, and gentleness, and joy, that all the sailors from Annanwater to far Saint Bees acknowledged their power, and sung songs about the bonnie lass of Mark Macmoran. She stood holding a small gaff-hook of polished steel in her hand, and seemed not dissatisfied with the glances I bestowed on her from time to time, and which I held more than requited by a single glance of those eyes which retained so many capricious hearts in subjection.

The tide, though rapidly augmenting, had not yet filled the bay at our feet. The moon now streamed fairly over the tops of Caerlaverock pines, and showed the expanse of ocean dimpling and swelling, on which sloops and shallops came dancing, and displaying at every turn their extent of white sail against the beam of the moon. I looked on old Mark, the mariner, who, seated motionless on his gray stone, kept his eye fixed on the increasing waters with a look of seriousness and sorrow in which I saw little of the calculating spirit of a mere fisherman. Though he looked on the coming tide, his eyes seemed to dwell particularly on the black and decayed hulls of two vessels, which, half immersed in the quicksand, still addressed to every heart a tale of shipwreck and desolation. The tide wheeled and foamed around them; and creeping inch by inch up the side, at last fairly threw its water over the top, and a long and hollow eddy showed the resistance which the liquid element received. The moment they were fairly buried in the water, the old man clasped his hands together, and said, "Blessed be the tide that will break over and bury ye for ever! Sad to mariners, and sorrowful to maids and mothers, has the time been you have choked up this deep and bonnie bay. For evil were you sent, and for evil have you continued. Every season finds from you its song of sorrow and wail, its funeral processions, and its shrouded corpses. Woe to the land where the wood grew that made ye! Cursed be the axe that hewed ye on the mountains, the hands that joined ye together, the bay that ye first swam in, and the wind that wafted ye here! Seven times have ye put my life in peril, three fair sons have ye swept from my side, and two bonnie grand-bairns; and now, even now, your waters foam and flash for my destruction, did I venture my infirm limbs in quest of food in your deadly bay. I see by that ripple and that foam, and hear by the sound and singing of the surge, that ye yearn for another victim, but it shall not be me nor mine." Even as the old mariner addressed himself to the wrecked ships, a young man appeared in the southern extremity of the bay, holding his halve-net in his hand, and hastening into the current. Mark rose, and shouted, and waved him back from a place which, to a person unacquainted with the dangers of the bay, real and superstitious, seemed sufficiently perilous; his grand-daughter too added her voice to his, and waved her white hands; but the more they strove the faster advanced the peasant till he stood to his middle in the water, while the tide increased every moment in depth and strength. "Andrew, Andrew," cried the young woman, in a voice quivering with emotion, "turn, turn, I tell you: O the ships, the haunted ships!" but the appearance of a fine run of fish had more influence with the peasant than the voice of bonnie Barbara, and forward he dashed, net in hand. In a moment he was borne off his feet, and mingled like the foam with the water, and hurried towards the fatal eddies which whirled and roared round the sunken ships. But he was a powerful young man, and an expert swimmer; he seized on one of the projecting ribs of the nearest hulk, and clinging to it with the grasp of despair, uttered yell after yell, sustaining himself against the prodigious rush of the current. From a sheeling of turf and straw, within the pitch of a bar from the spot where we stood, came out an old woman bent with age, and leaning on a crutch. "I hear the voice of that lad Andrew Laminie: can the chield be drowning that he skirls sae uncannilie?" said the old woman, seating herself on the ground, and looking earnestly at the water. "On aye," she continued, "he's doomed, he's doomed; heart and hand can never save him; boats, ropes, and man's strength and wit, all vain! vain! he's doomed, he's doomed!" By this time, I had thrown myself into the shallop, followed reluctantly by Richard Faulder, over whose courage and kindness of heart superstition had great power; and with one push from the shore, and some exertion in skulling, we came within a quoit-cast of the unfortunate fisherman. He stayed not to profit by our aid; for when he perceived us near, he uttered a piercing shriek of joy, and bounded towards us through the agitated element the full length of an oar. I saw him for a second on the surface of the water; but the eddying current sucked him down; and all I ever beheld of him again was his hand held above the flood, and clutching in agony at some imaginary aid. I sat gazing in horror on the vacant sea before us; but a breathing-time before, a human being, full of youth, and strength, and hope, was there: his cries were still ringing in my ears and echoing in the woods; and now nothing was seen or heard save the turbulent expanse of water, and the sound of its chafing on the shores. We pushed back our shallop, and resumed our station on the cliff beside the old mariner and his descendant. "Wherefore sought ye to peril your own lives fruitlessly?" said Mark, "in attempting to save the doomed. Whoso touches these infernal ships never survives to tell the tale. Woe to the man who is found nigh them at midnight when the tide has subsided and they arise in their former beauty, with fore-castle, and deck, and sail, and pennon, and shroud. Then is seen the streaming of lights along the water from their cabin windows, and then is heard the sound of mirth and the clamour of tongues, and the infernal whoop and halloo, and song, ringing far and wide. Woe to the man who comes nigh them!" To all this my Allanbay companion listened with a breathless attention. I felt something touched with a superstition to which I partly believed I had seen one victim offered up; and I inquired of the old mariner, "How and when came these haunted ships there? To me they seem but the melancholy relics of some unhappy voyagers, and much more likely to warn people to shun destruction, than entice and delude them to it." "And so," said the old man with a smile, which had more of sorrow in it than of mirth, "and so, young man, these black and shattered hulks seem to the eye of the multitude. But things are not what they seem: that water, a kind and convenient servant to the wants of man, which seems so smooth, and so dimpling, and so gentle, has swallowed up a human soul even now; and the place where it covers, so fair and so level, is a faithless quicksand, out of which none escape. Things are otherwise than they seem. Had you lived as long as I have had the sorrow to live; and you seen the storms, and braved the perils, and endured the distresses which have befallen me; had you sat gazing out on the dreary ocean at midnight on a haunted coast; had you seen comrade after comrade, brother after brother, and son after son, swept away by the merciless ocean from your very side; had you seen the shapes of friends, doomed to the wave and the quicksand, appearing to you in the dreams and the visions of the night; then would your mind have been prepared for crediting the legends of mariners; and the two haunted ships would have had their terrors for you, as they have for all who sojourn on this coast. Of their destruction I know nothing certain; they have stood as you have seen them for uncounted time; and while all other ships wrecked on this unhappy coast have gone to pieces, and rotted, and sunk away in a few years, these two haunted hulks have neither sunk in the quicksand, nor has a single spar on board been displaced. Legend says, that two ships of Denmark having had permission, for a time, to work deeds of darkness and dolour on the deep, were at last condemned to the whirlpool and the sunken rock, and were wrecked in this bonnie bay, as a sign to seamen to be gentle and devout. The night when they were lost was a harvest evening of uncommon mildness and beauty; the sun had newly set; the moon came brighter and brighter out; and the reapers, laying their sickles at the root of the standing corn, stood on rock and bank, looking at the increasing magnitude of the waters, for sea and land were visible from Saint Bees to Barn-hourie. The sails of two vessels were soon seen bent for the Scottish coast; and, with a speed outrunning the swiftest ship, they approached the dangerous quicksands and headland of Barrenpoint. On the deck of the foremost ship not a living soul was seen, or shape, unless something in darkness and form resembling a human shadow could be called a shape, which flitted from extremity to extremity of the ship, with the appearance of trimming the sails and directing the vessel's course. But the decks of its companion were crowded with human shapes; the captain, and mate, and sailor, and cabin boy, all seemed there; and from them the sound of mirth and minstrelsy echoed over land and water. The coast which they skirted along was one of extreme danger; and the reapers shouted to warn them to beware of sand-bank and rock; but of this friendly counsel no notice was taken, except that a large and famished dog, which sat on the prow, answered every shout with a long, loud, and melancholy howl. The deep sand-bank of Carsethorn was expected to arrest the career of these desperate navigators; but they passed, with the celerity of waterfowl, over an obstruction which had wrecked many ships.

"Old men shook their heads and departed, saying, 'We have seen the fiend sailing in a bottomless ship; let us go home and pray;' but one young and wilful man said, 'Fiend! I'll warrant it's nae fiend, but dooce Janet Withershins, the witch, holding a carouse with some of her Cumberland cummers, and mickle red wine will be spilt atween them. Doo, I would gladly have a toothfu'! I'll warrant it's nae o' your cauld sour slaewater like a bottle of Bailie Skrinkie's port, but right drab-o'-my-heart's-blood stuff that would waken a body out of their last linen. I wonder where the cummers will anchor their craft?' And I'll vow," said another rustick, "the wine they quaff is none of your visionary drink, such as a drouthie body has dished out to his lips in a dream; nor is it shadowy and unsubstantial like the vessels they sail in, which are made out of a cockle shell or a cast-off slipper, or the pairing of a seaman's right thumb-nail. I once got a hansel out of a witch's quagha myself,—auld Marion Mathers of Dustiefoot, whom they tried to bury in the auld kirk-yard of Dun-score, but the cummer raise as fast as they laid her down; and nae where else would she lie but in the bonnie green kirk-yard of Kier, among dooce and sponssible fowk. So I'll vow that the wine of a witch's cup is as fell liquor as ever did a kindly turn to a poor man's heart; and be they fiends or be they witches, if they have red wine asteer, I'll risk a drouket sark for ae glorious tout out." "Silence, ye sinners," said the minister's son of a neighbouring parish, who united in his own person his father's lack of devotion with his mother's love of liquor. "Whist!—speak as if ye had the fear of something holy before ye. Let the vessels run their own way to destruction: who can stay the eastern wind, and the current of the Solway sea? I can find ye scripture warrant for that: so let them try their strength on Blawhooly rocks, and their might on the broad quick-sand. There's a surf running there would knock the ribs together of a galley built by the imps of the pit, and commanded by the Prince of Darkness. Bonnilie and bravely they sail away there; but before the blast blows by they'll be wrecked; and red wine and strong brandy will be as rife as dyke water, and we'll drink the health of bonnie Bell Blackness out of her left-foot slipper." The speech of the young profligate was applauded by several of his companions, and away they flew to the bay of Blawhooly, from whence they never returned.

The two vessels were observed all at once to stop in the bosom of the bay, on the spot where their hulls now appear: the mirth of the minstrelsy waxed louder than ever; and the forms of maidens, with instruments of musick and wine-cups in their hands, thronged the decks. A boat was lowered; and the same shadowy pilot who conducted the ships made it start towards the shore with the rapidity of lightning, and its head knocked against the bank where the four young men stood, who longed for the unblest drink. They leaped in with a laugh, and with a laugh were they welcomed on deck; wine-cups were given to each, and as they raised them to their lips the vessels melted away beneath their feet; and one loud shriek, mingled with laughter still louder, was heard over land and water for many miles. Nothing more was heard or seen till the morning, when the crowd who came to the beach saw with fear and wonder the two Haunted Ships, such as they now seem, masts and tackle gone; nor mark, nor sign, by which their name, country, or destination could be known, was left remaining. Such is the tradition of the mariners; and its truth has been attested by many families whose sons and whose fathers have been drowned in the haunted bay of Blawhooly."

(Continued on our next)

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

MEDICAL SCIENCE.

We continue our extracts from Dr. BECK'S Address, and we think our readers will profit by a careful perusal of them. We recommend to their particular attention the Doctor's observations on the nature of vegetable curatives.

"The first of these, the cinchona or Peruvian bark, has for many years been known as a powerful febrifuge. It was ascertained that there was several species of trees, which furnished it, and experiments soon showed that their qualities were various. From time to time a change took place in the popularity of the different kinds—but the difference in quality of the imported article, and the repeated disappointments experienced in its administration, either from loading the stomach, or causing other results destructive of its anti-febrile power, tended to impair its general reputation, and there was a period, where another remedy, but which all would agree in omitting, if its place could be supplied, was substituted. Chemists however have analyzed the bark, and found, that instead of being homogeneous, it consists of eight or nine ingredients—They have separated the important constituent (the quinine,) and in its distinct form, it is now to be purchased of every druggist. Of its general success in the removal of intermittents, every physician can speak.

"Opium also is a remedy that all unite in commending, when judiciously administered. Its powers in mitigating pain and in soothing the wearied mind and diseased body, entitled it to a high rank among medicinal agents. Yet its operation has occasionally been unkind; and often when we are most desirous of obtaining its anodyne effects, a dread of its attendant consequences has restrained us from recommending it. Substitutes, comparatively inefficient, were necessarily employed. But about twenty years since, the compound nature of opium began to attract the attention of chemists, and from the experiments of Sertuerner, Robiquet, Pelletier and others, it seems now established that it consists of (besides several unimportant ingredients) three principles—morphia—narcotine and meconic acid.—The first of these produces the soothing effects—without the feverish excitement, heat and head ache, which so frequently accompany the employment of the drug, and which from experiments seem referable to the second substance I have mentioned. The third does not appear to produce any effect on the human system. If morphia be united to an acid, its stimulating properties are apparently still further counteracted.

"These are surely important improvements, and the more so, as they allow its use in states of disease, where it must otherwise have been interdicted.

"But it is not only to the investigation of the nature of old remedies, and of which I might continue to adduce numerous examples, that the intellect and labour of the profession are directed. New therapeutick agents are constantly developing. Iodine was unknown in 1811. A manufacturer at Paris observed, that in preparing carbonate of soda from the ashes of sea-weeds, the residual liquor powerfully corroded metallic vessels. He inquired into the cause of the corrosion, and the result was the discovery of this substance—a simple, undecomposable body, so far as our knowledge extends. The next step was to ascertain in what bodies it exists—and among these, sea-weeds, the kelp prepared from them, sponges, and some marine animals, were found to furnish it in the greatest quantity. A physician, recollecting that burnt sponge had acquired some local reputation in the treatment of goitrous affections, embraced the idea, that its virtue might have originated from the iodine it contained. He prescribed it in these diseases, and found its effects so powerful, that it was necessary to alter the form of administration. Yet his success and that of others have been great. Its use has been extended to the diseases of other glands. The result is still under judgement—but all agree, that an agent has been discovered more direct in its operation, than any yet known, on those maladies which minister to the production of our most common and fatal diseases.

"Are these examples which I have adduced satisfactory in showing the exertions of the profession to improve the nature of remedies? Are they sufficiently illustrative of its desire to increase them, so far as sober judgement and prudence will warrant? If so, why should others, who are not of the profession, and who cannot, even in common charity, be supposed to have the necessary preliminary knowledge, either of medicines or of the body, be permitted to employ their supposed curative agents? It has been replied, that the use of vegetable remedies alone are to be permitted, and the usual argument advanced, that if they do no good—they will do no harm. But I would ask, whether the effects and the extent of vegetable and mineral medicines when thus placed in opposition to each other, are sufficiently understood. The supposed deleterious substances of the former class, which are most commonly used, are arsenic and mercury. They have been known for centuries as poisonous substances when given in considerable quantities. The child hears and remembers this; and the man, long before he enters on the practice of medicine, has his mind deeply impressed with the necessity of administering them in small doses, and then only with caution, and after mature reflection—they are so given. Arsenic combined with potash has been used for upwards of forty years, with great success in the treatment of agues and other diseases. But it was not from choice. It was because the bark failed in numerous instances—because its quality was often bad, and its effects even positively injurious. For the reasons already stated, the use of quinine is rapidly diminishing the employment of the mineral.

"As to mercury, I will only say, that if there be a single drug, that in human hands has proved a most distinguished curative means, it is this. That its effects may be occasionally uncertain or injurious, is only to repeat, that there are peculiarities of constitution for which the wisest cannot be prepared—or that there is a malignancy in some diseases which no human effort can counteract. But who will deny its positive utility? Look at the thousands whom, not only in tropical climates, but in our own country, it has saved from that fell destroyer of our race—fever. Look at the numerous inflammations it has checked or dissipated. Look at the tens of thousands whom it has saved from the consequences of vice.

"A similar answer will reply, if we notice the remaining medicines. Their noxious effects, (if any) are known—they are given under the high responsibility of this knowledge, and they are selected, notwithstanding this, because their effects are more certain, and their operation as kind, as those of vegetable substances.

"But it would seem to be intimated that mineral medicines are incongruous to the human system, and a certain mysterious affinity has been imagined between it and vegetable remedies. The latter, it is asserted, are milder in their operation, produce healing effects more certainly, and are not injurious, like calomel, in their consequences. Are these assertions founded in a knowledge of the human body, and do the authors of the first idea know of what it is composed? Have they ever heard that a large proportion of the solid parts of the body are a mineral substance—the phosphate of lime? Do they know that iron enters into the composition of the blood?

"But this is not all. Allow me to throw a rapid glance over these mild vegetable remedies—these substances that any man after a day's reading may administer. I have already enumerated two of them, opium and iodine. Opium has been raised in this state. It may be thus an indigenous product. Iodine may hereafter be extracted from the seaweeds on your coast. Now a grain of narcotine extracted from the first, has killed a dog, and a few grains of the last, taken daily for a short time, has destroyed a human being. Do you know of a substance which indicates its power over life by lessening the action of the heart with great rapidity, which reduces the rapid beat of the consumptive patient to comparative slowness? It is foxglove, a vegetable cultivated in many of our gardens. Are you acquainted with vegetables which will produce raving madness and convulsion—which inflame and destroy the texture of the stomach? The stramonium, cicuta, and wild parsnips will do this. They too are indigenous—they grow in our streets or lanes—or abound in our marshes. There is a substance which in small quantities convulses the palsied arm of the bed-ridden—the limb that has hung dead for years by his side. It is strychnine, a vegetable product. But to crown all this—what is the most concentrated and deadly poison with which we are acquainted—which will destroy all species of life, from the snail up to man, with the rapidity of lightning—which has struck down the suicide in death, before he could finish the fatal draught? It is prussick acid—a vegetable product, that can be distilled from the leaves and kernels of the peach, or from the laurels that abound throughout our state.

"And yet, after this enumeration, we have only gone through a portion of the noxious vegetable substances. Let not this statement startle any of my hearers. It may be laid down as an axiom, generally true, that with the exception of some remedies in the classes of astringents and tonics, a vegetable is valuable as a medicine, in proportion as it is noxious in large quantities. In every botanical work you find the remark, that those which are not possessed of some acid qualities, are inefficient in their operation on the human system.

"The question then presents itself to the mind of every enlightened man, whether those who have received an appropriate education; who have the stores of accumulated knowledge opened to them, are the safest persons to be entrusted with the care of the health of the community, or whether they shall be put on a par with such as claim in instinct—or self-inspiration as their guides. Can these soldiers of Cadmus be expected to bring any useful spoil into the camp? Look at every modern work on the materia medica. We now know the nature of almost every secret remedy—chemistry furnishes us with the means of analysis, and almost without an exception, they are the cast off prescriptions of the older physicians—neglected, because more eligible substitutes have been obtained—or abandoned, because their constituents were found uncertain or dangerous. That man will render a service to the community, who will furnish our public prints with the receipts for compounding these vaunted catholicons.

"I rejoice, that as your representative, I have been permitted to bear my testimony on this subject. I do not feel that the profession are to be the greatest sufferers. It will be the community—the country. The three professions at this day furnish the greatest proportion of educated men. Education is essential to the stability of the republic. Will it then be attempted to break down one of these professions? If so—the young men who now crowd its avenues, will seek other means of support—the old will retire in disgust from the thankless contest. The study of the collateral sciences, which has ministered so largely to the advancement of medicine, and which is beginning to give character to the nation, will cease. The era of improvement in medicine will have passed away, and the encomium of Sir William Temple, quoted, and sanctioned, and applauded by Dr. Warr Clinton, will no longer apply. 'It is certain (says he) that the study of physic is not achieved in any eminent degree, without very great advancement in the sciences, so that whatever the profession is, the professors of it have been generally very much esteemed on that account, as well as of their own art, as the most learned men of their ages.'

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1829.

ANTI-MASONICK STATE CONVENTION. This body met in the assembly room of the capitol in this city on Thursday last, at four o'clock, P. M. It previously attempted to obtain permission to meet in one of the churches in the city, with a view to cast a hue of solemnity over its proceedings, by a pretended connexion with religion; but it failed; and having asked for, obtained leave to occupy the assembly chamber for three successive afternoons. At its convocation William Finn, of Orange county,—whose age is his only consequence, and who was undoubtedly placed at the head of affairs that he might be trumpeted abroad as venerable, &c.—was made president; James Hawks, of Otsego, and Alexander Sheldon of Montgomery, vice presidents; and Nicholas Devereaux of Oneida, and Frederick Whittlesey of Monroe, secretaries. When the officers had taken their seats, governor Southwick jumped up in great haste and read his speech—setting forth in his usual bloody and thundering style some of his wonderful ideas on the subject of freemasonry and Morgan's abduction. When his excellency had finished, and seated himself, John Coxe Morris, of Otsego—who wanted to go to congress last fall, but did not go, because the party to which he said he belonged did not want he should—thought it was best to call the roll, and ascertain whether there were any interlopers. Hereupon governor Southwick assured the convention that he was a bona fide member, and lest they should disbelieve him he referred them to his friend Mr. Hopkins. It was finally agreed not to call the roll; and as they were much in want of members to make a show, Thurlow Weed, of whiskershaving memory, was admitted as the representative of the state "central committee," and all the anti-masons thought of at the moment, made honorary members. When matters were thus settled, Mr. Whittlesey undertook to explain the objects of the convention. There was nothing new in his harangue. He felt chagrined that governor Southwick had made the first speech, and intimated that as his intended offspring had been "cut out" by the bantling of another, much should not be expected from him on the spur of the moment. The honourable secretary is not a very profound man, nor is his appearance calculated to strike terror into an enemy; and we opine that nobody expected a great deal from him.

John Coxe Morris succeeded Mr. Whittlesey, but it would be useless for us to attempt to epitomize his sayings. He endeavoured to be very polite and followed to its utmost latitude that rule of the English language which says that two negatives make an affirmative. He did not know this, and he did not know that; he thought that he thought something, but he was not sure that he did; and seemed to be so poverty stricken on the score of opinion, as scarcely to be acquainted with the meaning of the term. "Words, words, words," he had in abundance; and as he thought the worth of a speech was determined by its length, he did not mean to be guilty of brevity. John Coxe Morris is undoubtedly a "pretty considerable sort of a man," in his own eyes.

The evening's proceedings were closed by adopting sundry resolutions, &c.

Yesterday morning the president announced several committees; among which was one on the subject of an anti-masonick national convention, one on the propriety of memorializing the legislature on the evils of masonry, and one on erecting a monument to the memory of Saint Morgan. In the afternoon Mr. Granger, from the committee on the national convention, reported at some length in favour of the measure, and offered a resolution recommending the holding of a convention at Philadelphia, on the 11th of September, 1830. After the resolution had been read, Mr. Granger thought that as it was the era of speech making, it might not be amiss for him to show off a little; and so he began, with his usual every day ease, to talk about himself. When he became a candidate for lieutenant governor at the last election, he had no idea that he should be elected;—he threw himself up on an altar to which he thought his honour bound him; and he seemed to value himself considerably on his prophetic powers, as he affirmed he had told all who knew him, which way the election was going. He had been frequently told that anti-masonry did not amount to much; and he cherished "the little character he possessed" with too much care to be willingly laid aside with small matters. Last year there were "some eleven members" elected to the assembly on purely anti-masonick grounds; and this year there were "some eighteen" members of assembly, and "some four" senators who had got into office by the same means. In fine, the honourable gentleman was of opinion that anti-masonry would prove to be a pretty good business if well managed; and he therefore hoped the resolution recommending a national convention would be adopted, and seated himself under the influence of a beautiful vision of the vice presidency.

Mr. Seward, of Cayuga, rose to say something, but as he did not himself understand what he would be at, he talked Greek for the space of half an hour, and sat down quite complacently.

Elder Green, of Saratoga, observed that he was an old man and had been prejudiced against the masonick institution for more than forty years; and he thought he had reasons and arguments enough to convince every body that he was on the right side of the question; but as he did not feel disposed to let the convention know what those reasons and arguments were, what he did say was neither very logical nor very pungent.

Bates Cook, the "happy and able-bodied man of Lewiston," next rose. He recounted the wonderful adventures of the Lewiston convention, and the great personal peril to which he subjected himself in endeavouring to procure indictments against his neighbours. The masons, however, were now getting to be more friendly, and asked, what he wanted to do now, since masonry had gone to pot, and there was no hope for it any longer? But he said masonry was not gone to pot, and he was in favour of a national convention, that it might be put "where it would stay put." He was "peculiarly happy" in having it in his power to say, that when he was coming to this convention, the masons abused him in every place where he was known. "He said he was peculiarly happy in being abused, because abuse was the highest encomium that could be bestowed on a man in these days." [What a happy doctrine for masonry!] He thought that Dr. Terry was one of the greatest men in the world, and that "Edward Giddys" was a still greater man than Dr. Terry. He puffed "Giddys" almanack, and hoped the members of the convention would patronise it. Several other matters were touched upon, but we have no time to speak of them to-day.

Mr. Beekman, of Madison county, chairman of a committee appointed to inquire whether any acts have been passed by the legislature of this state calculated to aid the institution of freemasonry, made a report detailing the provisions of the act incorporating the Grand Chapter of the state of New-York, and concluding with a resolution "that it is expedient at this time to memorialize the legislature for a repeal of the acts of incorporation of the masonick institutions in the state of New-York."

The committee appointed to inquire into the propriety of erecting a monument to the memory of Morgan, reported that it would be inexpedient to do it at this time, as probably if they did the masons would pull it down. They think however that Morgan ought to be canonized.

The convention then adjourned, to meet this morning (Saturday), in the Mayor's court room.

ANTI-MASONICK REPORTS. The committees of the senate and assembly to whose consideration was referred that portion of governor Van Buren's message relating to the abduction of Morgan, have, after six weeks' deliberation, reported. The report of the committee of the senate was brought in by Mr. Hayden on Saturday last; that of the committee of the assembly was brought in by Mr. Hazeltine on Monday last: the former we have read; the latter is not yet published. Messrs. Hayden, Hazeltine, and their associates in committee, belong to that class of sages and patriots which is separated from the common human herd by the elegant appellation of "whole hog anti-masons," and as they had been engaged for more than two years in gathering up a phalanx of witnesses against the masonick institution; and as they professed to be particularly well acquainted with every circumstance connected with the abduction of Morgan, and his interesting voyage over Niagara falls, and back again, &c.; it was confidently suspected that not a vestige of masonry would remain on earth ten minutes after the reports were read. We have the pleasure to inform our friends, however, that we are yet among the living, with our usual quantity of masonry on our shoulders, and that we have no well grounded expectation of departing to another region immediately. The anti-masonick state convention has gone into a brown study "on the occasion," and this is the only serious effort which has yet resulted from these reports.

The report of Mr. Hayden is as destitute of honesty and fair-dealing, and as liberal in the use of set phrases and coarse expressions, as political pamphlets, cobbled together to serve the exigencies of excitement, usually are. It contains nothing which has not been published and republished, again and again, in the legion of anti-masonick newspapers which are attempting to run down the common sense of this state. The first paragraph and a few lines which are prefixed to it, "beg leave respectfully to report in part," that the "individuals composing the committee" are very much astonished that Mr. Mosely, the state commissioner, though "a man of reputation and high official standing," did not annihilate the fraternity at the west; and that the "individuals composing the committee" have "long entertained an opinion" that masons generally are not possessed of wax noses, and that therefore they are a set of villainous rascals.

After this display of senatorial dignity and patriotick impartiality, we arrive at paragraph 2, which sets forth, that,

"in the judgement of the committee" no measures should be entered into which might lead to the punishment of those guilty of the outrage upon Morgan; and that some plan of proscription and extermination "ought chiefly at this time to attract the attention of the senate." Paragraphs 3 and 4 state that there has been a great hubbub at the west which would long since have been forgotten had not great pains been taken to keep it up. Paragraphs 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, & 11, disclaim all pretensions to "delicacy" on the part of the committee; inform the senate that there once existed an order called the Jesuits, and that now there exists one called "free and accepted masons,"—and wind off with as petty and contemptible slanders as were ever invented by the devoted and heartless proselytes of a bad cause, in their utmost need.

Paragraph 12 takes up the case of colonel King, and after the usual hypocritical pretensions to impartiality, goes on to state that in 1826 he went to Washington and was appointed sutler to the United States troops in the territory of Arkansas; that Messrs. Garlinghouse and Bates went to Cantonment Towson with authority to arrest him, and that through masonick influence he was kept out of their power, and they consequently came back without him. The committee forget that when Garlinghouse and Bates were at Cantonment Towson, colonel King offered to surrender himself to them, and come peaceably to this state, and that Garlinghouse and Bates refused to accept of this offer, and declared it to be their intention to put him in chains and bring him as a condemned criminal, a distance of four thousand miles, through the most populous portion of our country, to gratify and confirm the prejudices which were to advance the interests of a few political jockies and nose-leaders, almost as honourable in their feelings as Hayden & Co. They forget that it was upon this declaration of Garlinghouse and Bates that colonel King acted, and, as any other man not destitute of personal respect would have done, went to the house of a friend a few miles distant, and remained there till their departure; when he arranged his affairs with all possible despatch, and setting off for this state, rode night and day until he arrived at Youngstown (where his family resides) from whence he proceeded to Lewiston and surrendered himself to the public authorities. They forget that after all this fuss about colonel King, and after the malice of his enemies had been brought into action by every possible inducement, he was indicted merely for a misdemeanor; and that every endeavour of colonel King to procure a trial was for a long time fruitless—he was opposed by the anti-masons, for it is their interest to suppress the truth, and to keep the characters of honest men in an evil light before the eyes of the people. The departure of colonel King for Cantonment Towson in 1826 was no secret, any more than business transactions are usually secret. A constant communication was kept up between him and his family. This the committee knew if they knew any thing. And it is equally a matter of notoriety that previous to the arrival of Garlinghouse and Bates at Cantonment Towson, colonel King had been informed that his name had been connected with the Morgan affair, and that therefore he determined to return to this state, and answer the demands of the law. Before he could arrange his business so as to leave it, Garlinghouse and Bates arrived, and by their brutality rendered necessary the defensive measures pursued on the part of colonel King.

Paragraphs 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19 and 20, state that Morgan was abducted, that he was fifty years old,—talk about the machinations of masonry,—quote from the report of the Lewiston convention and Giddins' Almanack—compliment the Le Roy backsliders—and remould some old newspaper slanders.

Paragraphs 21, 22 and 23 attempt to cut up governor Van Buren for throwing out a hint about "selfish and sinister purposes." Paragraph 24 states that the emperor of Russia is an anti-mason; and that "in Spain the meeting of a lodge to admit, and actually admitting a new member, is made felony of death." And these governments are considered worthy of imitation in a republican country! But are the committee of the senate ignorant of the fact that even in Russia and Spain masonry flourishes among enlightened men? That it is not in the power of tyranny and oppression to destroy it, the history of governmental persecutions places beyond the reach of doubt.

Paragraph 25 says there are 508 lodges, and 100 chapters in this state containing, in all about 30,000 members. Paragraph 26 goes on to imagine what 30,000 men might possibly do under particular circumstances. Paragraphs 27 and 28 state the opinions entertained of masonry by some people at the west. Paragraphs 29, 30, 31 and 32 extol the industry and impartiality of the committee, and hope the legislature will pass "a declaratory and remedial law, by its terms preventing a reputed mason from officiating as a jurymen in any case where either party belongs to the fraternity, while the other is not a member," and also penal laws to prevent the future administration of certain oaths, extracted from Giddins' almanack, and published as an appendix to the report. Paragraphs 33, 34, and 35, which close the report, mention an English statute against secret societies, talk of the immolation of Morgan and the "importance of the subject matter" they have the "honour to submit," ask for "the further direction of the senate" and introduce two resolutions granting them leave to report again, hereafter if they should think proper.

We have thus gone through with Mr. Hayden's report, and paragraph by paragraph, related its substance. We have omitted only its mean and partisan reflections, to which we shall probably render justice before a great while. It will fall to our lot next week to scan the report of Mr. Hazeltine, and we shall then endeavour to act up more strictly to the maxim of "give the devil his due."

RELIGION AND ANTI-MASONRY. The annexed resolutions of the Baptist church in Rome contrast happily with the proceedings of many similar bodies in the western district. They breathe the true spirit of religion—moderate, discriminating and conciliatory. That church has set an example worthy of its christian profession—an example doubly valuable from the contrast which it presents to the distempered spirit that has in the west too frequently polluted the sanctuaries of the Almighty—severed the bonds of religious unity—and arrayed in bitter hostility men who erst assembled, in christian fellowship at the altars of their common faith.

The anti-christian attempt—but too successful in the western district—to connect religion with anti-masonry—to inflame and pervert sectarian feeling to party purposes—and to prostitute the religion of Christ in furtherance of the political schemes of such beings as Southwick, Miller, Wood, & Co.—cannot, if persevered in, have any other effect than that produced by the fanaticism of the Puritans—"to bring all religion for a while into contempt," and render that a theme for levity which should command the solemn homage of all hearts.

But, without further preface, we commend to the special attention of those zealots who have superadded to their political anathemas the ecclesiastical thunders of the church, the resolutions to which we have alluded, especially the third one. Mr. Galusha, whose signature authenticates the proceedings, is, we believe, the son of a venerated governor of Vermont, and a distinguished member of the sect to which he belongs in this state.

[Rochester Republican.]

"Whereas, as there has been and still is much said respecting the system of speculative freemasonry, and we having discovered no good resulting from coercive measures accompanied with an overbearing spirit, do hereby resolve, "1st. That we as a church see fit to lay no other burthen on our brethren who have belonged to that institution, than that they abstain from meeting with masons in their masonick capacity, to the grief of their brethren and sisters of the church.

"2d. Resolved, that we require no more of any person who may present himself to this church for membership relative to this subject, than that he observe the above resolution.

"3d. Resolved, that as the anti-masonick question has assumed a political character, and is agitated in the political debates of the day, we will not interfere with the political opinions or rights of any free citizen at the elections of public officers.

"4th. Resolved that we believe the above resolutions consistent with a republican form of government, and also in accordance with the liberal constitution of the church of Christ and the spirit of the gospel.

"5th. Resolved, that we as a church will abide unreservedly, individually, and collectively by the above resolutions.

"Done by order and behalf of the church.

"MARTIN GALUSHA, CH. Clerk.

"Rome, Jan. 6, 1829."

Now is the winter of my discontent,
Made glorious summer by this vote of York!

Shakespeare improved by Cornelius Higgins.

The bill to pay Cornelius Higgins $250, with interest at 5 per cent since 1795, for building a block house at Salt Point, now Salina, has finally passed both houses of the legislature. Mr. Higgins first applied in 1804. He did not renew the application again till 1816, having during that time, lived at a distance from Albany. In the latter year, he removed to this city, and the subject has been agitated every year since. It has several times passed the assembly, but been rejected in the senate, mainly because it was declared a two thirds bill. Now it was determined to be a majority bill, and has therefore passed, as it ought to have done long ago.

[Albany D. Advertiser.]

MASONICK CALENDAR.

[Regular meetings in the city of Albany, at the Masonick Hall.]

Temple Encampment, 2d Friday in each month.

Temple Chapter, 2d and 4th Tuesday in each month.

Temple Lodge, 1st and 3d Tuesday in each month.

Mount Vernon Lodge, 1st and 3d Thursday in each month.

Masters Lodge, 1st and 3d Wednesday in each month.

ODD FELLOWS' CALENDAR.

[Regular meetings in the city of Albany.]

Hope Lodge, Monday evening in each week, at Montgomery Hall.

Philanthropic Lodge, Wednesday evening in each week, corner of Lodge and State-streets, over Osborn and Gray's.

Clinton Lodge, Friday evening in each week, Masonick Hall.

TO ARCHITECTS. The Grand Lodge of Ancient Freemasons of South Carolina, being about to erect a MASONICK HALL, in the city of Charleston, offer a premium of one hundred dollars for the plan which shall be approved. The lot is about one hundred feet front on Meeting-street, and of sufficient depth from east to west for any required buildings. The front will be to the east, and must present a specimen of the strictest chasteness, simple, but conforming in proportions to the best models. The building must be calculated to contain on the second floor a superb Hall for public purposes, the lower floor for supper rooms, and other conveniences for public parties; the third story must contain a room for the assembly of the Grand Lodge; one or more wings extending from the main building to the west, must contain rooms for the subordinate Lodges, the Chapters, &c. and the lower story to be calculated for kitchen, and other requisite offices. Each plan must be accompanied with an estimate, specifying the value of the materials on which it is founded. To be forwarded to Ed. Hughes, Recording Grand Secretary, on or before the 1st of May next. By order of the Grand Lodge.

REMA. FANFULL MUNT, G. M.

FINE CUTLERY, &c.—JAMES BURKON, Cutler and Surgical Instrument Maker, No. 3 Beaver street, (formerly at No. 98 North Market street) Albany, manufactures and repairs all kinds of instruments in the above branches, with neatness, accuracy and despatch, and warranted equal to any article imported, or manufactured in the United States.

Shears, Scissors, Razors and Penknives, ground and finished on an improved plan, and warranted to excel any other in use in this city or elsewhere.

Currier's Steels constantly on hand, and warranted a superior article.

Blades inserted in knife-handles in the most approved style, and most reasonable terms. Looks repaired.

N. B. Country orders punctually attended to.

Albany, Feb. 14, 1829.

34f.

FRANKLIN LETTER FOUNDRY. The proprietors of this Foundry, offer on liberal terms, the following articles, viz:—Roman and Italic. Fourteen, Twelve, Ten, Eight, Seven, Six, Five, and Four Lines Pica, plain, Canon, Meridian, Double Great Primer, Double English, Double Small Pica, Great Primer, English, Pica, Small Pica, Long Primer Bourgeois, Brevoir, Minion, Nonpareil, Pearl.

Two Line Letter. Minion, and all larger, Nonpareil, Pearl.

Full Face. English and Pica, Small Pica, Long Primer, Bourgeois, Brevoir, Minion.

Borders and Flourishes of every kind.

Antiques. Ten and Six Lines, Four Lines Pica, Double Great Primer, English and Pica, Long Primer, Brevoir, Minion, Nonpareil.

Blacks. Four Lines Pica, Double Great Primer, Double Small Pica, Great Primer, English and Pica, Small Pica, Long Primer.

Open Blacks. Great Primer, Double Great Primer, and Four Lines Pica.

Italians. Seven Lines Pica, Five Lines Pica.

Tuscan. Eight Lines Pica, Four Lines Pica.

Shaded Letter. Eight Lines Pica, Four Lines Pica, Double Great Primer, Two Lines Brevoir, Two Lines Nonpareil, Eight Lines Pica, Ornamented, Six Lines Pica, Ornamented.

Leads. Six to pica and thicker, Seven to pica, Eight to pica.

Quotations; Space Rules, from one to eight ems, Long Primer; Astronomical, and other signs; Spanish and French Accents; Fractions; Composing Sticks, from twenty to four inches in length; Cases; Chases; Slugs, Brass, and common Galleys; Iron and Mahogany Furniture; Press's ink; Skins; parchment; points. Premos also furnished.

Several new founts of letter have been cut; and it has been the aim of the proprietors to combine the beauty of the modern, with the clearness and durability of the ancient style of typography, and to produce types at once handsome, legible, and useful. Specimens of these will be sent to printers. The greatest care has been taken in the composition of the metal with which all their founts of letter are cast.

All orders, either by letter or otherwise, left at their Counting Room, No. 41, State-street, or at their Foundry, Eagle-street, south of State-street, will receive prompt attention.

A. W. KINSLEY & Co.

Albany, Feb. 14, 1829.

35f.

PAINTING AND GLAZING.—The subscriber respectfully informs his friends and the public that he continues the House and Sign Painting and Glazing, at the old stand, No. 298, corner of North Market and Steuben streets, where he will accommodate the public with any article in his line. Paints in pots mixed ready for use, of the first quality, can be had at any time. Personal attention will be paid to all orders.

March 9, 1828.

JOHN F. PORTER.

POETRY.

For the Masonick Record and Saturday Magazine.

STANZAS TO A LADY.

I view thee in the lighted hall,
The queen of the bright festival;
In the gay dance thy form I see,
Moving in maiden dignity
To the soft breathing musick note,
That seems upon the air to float,
Sweet as thy voice's winning tone,
The dearest sound my heart hath known.
But do they feel who view thee now,
Who to thy beaming beauty bow,
And with thee "thread the mazy dance,"
Say, do they watch each varied glance,
Each lovely tint upon thy cheek,
Each look of eyes that seem to speak
In sparkling language, flashing free,—
O, can thy loveliness there be Adored as I adore it!—No!
Thy throng of votaries can not show
A heart that clings so close to thine,
As does this trusting heart of mine;
None can more faithful homage pay,
For, till the close of life's dark day,
My ev'ry thought shall fly to thee,
Thy name my dying word shall be.

Feb. 11, 1829.

L.

MORNING IN SPRING.

BY GEORGE D. PRENTICE.

How sweet the landscape! Morning twines
Her tresses round the brow of day,
And bright mists o'er the forest pines,
Like happy spirits, float away
To revel on the mountain's crown,
Whence the glad stream comes shouting down
Through woods and rocks, that hang on high,
Like clouds against the deep blue sky.
The woven sounds of bird and stream
Are falling beautiful and deep
Upon the spirit, like a dream
Of music on the hour of sleep—
And gently from the dewy bowers
Soft murmurs, like the breath of flowers,
Are winding through the purple grove,
And blending with the notes of Love.
The streams in veins of silver flow—
The sunrise gale o'er flower and tree
So lightly breathes, it scarce would blow
A fairy bark upon the sea;—
It comes so fresh, so calm, so sweet,
It draws the heart from its retreat
To mingle with the glories, born
In the first holy light of morn.

A cloud is on the sky above—
And calmly o'er the young years blue,
'T is coming like a thing of Love
To gladden in the rising dew—
Its white waves with the sun-light blend,
And gentle spirits seem to bend
From its unrolling folds, to hear
The glad sounds of our joyous sphere.
The lake, unruffled by the breeze,
Smiles in its deep unbroken rest,
As it were dreaming of the trees
And blossoms pictured on its breast—
Its depths are glowing bright and fair,
And the far skies seem hollowed there,
Soft trembling—as they felt the thrill
Of musick, echoed from the hill.

The living soul of beauty fills
The air with glorious visions—bright
They linger round the sunny hills
And wander in the clear blue light—
Off to the breathing Heavens they go,
Along the Earth they live and glow,
Shed o'er the lake their happy smiles,
And beckon to its glittering isles.
O, at this hour, when air and earth
Are gushing love, and joy, and light,
And songs of gladness hasten birth
Of all, that's beautiful and bright—
Each heart beats high—each thought is blown
To flame—the spirit drinks the tone
Of brighter worlds, and melts away
In visions of eternal Day.

From the Yankee and Boston Patriot Gazette.

THE OLD MAN IN WINTER.

Oh! there's a charm in a morn like this,
For one who is as old as I,
I love to see those teeth-like eaves,
And the snow that is drifting by.
It gives my heart a youthful thrill,
And I love the wind and the blast,
I love their shrieks, as they pile on high
The snow that is falling fast.

This Winter Morn! this Winter Morn!
How I long to be wading out,
And be the first to tread the snow,
And be lost in the drifts about;
I would dare the crust—so lightly step
As to leave not a print or track;
But now I'm old, and dare not go
As I would if my youth were back.

Those bending trees! those breaking trees!
That have their icy fetters on,
I mark those rainbow hues and tints
Their branches wear, in early sun;
And as I look, those fetters break,
And set the stiffened branches free,
They slide upon the crusted snow,
And in every piece new tints I see.

And see those joyous skaters go;
And turn upon the dazzling steel,
They dare the ice, those merry boys,
Which bends beneath them as they wheel.
Methinks I hear their shouts afar,
And see them start, and half turn back,
As glancing through the glassy ice,
They look far down and hear it crack.

Away! away! ye merry boys!
The cold wind bids ye hie away;
If I were young, I would lead your throng,
Or join you in your noisy play.
Away! away! I cannot come,
For age is on my withered brow,
But still I know your fears and joys,
For I have felt, as you feel now.

Away! away! it must not be:
These pleading limbs; this hoary hair—
Are eloquent to keep me back
From the holiday spirit there:
My heart springs up, and I am would go
And join you as you sweep along,
At every shout my blood is up,
And my aged pulses strong.

Farewell, my boys; and think, oh, think!
What the old man passing by,
Though his hair is gray, still feels for you,
Ye boys of the sparkling eye.
My Summer's ended, and my heart,
Though I number threescore years
Of Winter's chill, at a sight like this Overflows with youthful tears.

Charlestown, Jan. —

CAM.

From the New Monthly Magazine.

A LETTER OF ADVICE

From Miss Medora Trevilian, at Padua, to Miss Araminta Vavasour, in London.

"Eh! Monsieur, un homme aimable:
Voilà pourquoi je ne saurais l'aimer."

Scribe.

You tell me you're promised a lover,
My own Araminta, next week;
Why cannot my fancy discover
The hue of his coat and his cheek?
Alas! if he look like another,
A vicar, a banker, a beau,
Be deaf to your father and mother,
My own Araminta, say "No!"

If he wears a top boot in his woeing,
If he comes to you riding a cob,
If he talks of his baking or brewing,
If he puts up his feet on the hob,
If he ever drinks port after dinner,
If his brow or his breeding is low,
If he calls himself "Thompson" or "Skinner,"
My own Araminta, say "No!"

If he studies the news in the papers,
While you are preparing the tea,
If he talks of the damps and the vapours,
While moonlight lies soft on the sea,
If he's sleepy while you are capricious,
If he has not a musical "Oh!"
If he does not call Water delicious,
My own Araminta, say "No!"

If he ever sets foot in the city,
Among the stockbrokers and Jews,

If he has not a heart full of pity,
If he do n't stand six feet in his shoes,
If his lips are not redder than roses,
If his hands are not whiter than snow,
If he has not the model of noses,—
My own Araminta, say "No!"

If he speaks of a tax or a duty,
If he does not look grand on his knees,
If he's blind to a landscape of beauty,
Hills, valleys, rocks, waters, and trees,
If he dotes not on desolate towers,
If he likes not to hear the blast blow,
If he knows not the language of flowers,—
My own Araminta, say "No!"

He must walk like a god of old story,
Come down from the home of his rest;
He must smile, like the sun in his glory,
On the buds he loves ever the best;
And oh, from its ivory portal,
Like musick his soft speech must flow!—
If he speak, smile, or walk like a mortal,—
My own Araminta, say "No!"

Do n't listen to tales of his bounty,
Do n't hear what they tell of his birth,
Do n't look at his seat in the county,
Do n't calculate what he is worth;
But give him a theme to write verse on,
And see if he turns out his toe;—
If he's only an excellent person,—
My own Araminta, say "No!"

From Knight's Quarterly Magazine.

TO A GIRL THIRTEEN YEARS OF AGE

Thy smiles, thy talk, thy aimless plays,
So beautiful approve thee,
So winning, light, are all thy ways,
I cannot choose but love thee:
Thy balmy breath upon my brow
Is like the summer air,
As o'er my cheek thou leanest now,
To plant a soft kiss there.

Thy steps are advancing towards the bound
Between the child and woman;
And thoughts and feelings more profound
And other years are coming;
And thou shalt be more deeply fair,
More precious to the heart;
But never canst thou be again,
That lovely thing thou art!

And youth shall pass, with all the brood
Of fancy-fed affection:
And care shall come with womanhood,
And wake with cold reflection;
Thou'lt learn to toil, and watch, and weep
O'er pleasures unreturning,
Like one who wakes from pleasant sleep
Unto the cares of morning.

Nay, say not so! nor cloud the sun
Of joyless expectation,
Ordained to bless the little one,
The freshling of creation!
Nor doubt that He who now doth feed
Her early lamp with gladness,
Will be her present help in need,
Her comforter in sadness.

Smile on, then, little winsome thing,
All rich in nature's measure;
Thou hast within thy heart a spring
Of self-renewing pleasure;
Smile on, fair child, and take thy fill
Of mirth, till time shall end it;
'T is nature's wise and gentle will,
And who shall reprehend it?

BOOK BINDING. Sign of the Golden Ledger, corner of State and North Market streets, Albany. WILLIAM SEYMOUR, carries on the above business in all its branches; viz: plain, extra, and super extra—has a first rate ruling machine, and other necessary implements for manufacturing Blank Books of every description, on the most reasonable terms, of the best workmanship.
An assortment on hand. Subscribers to the American Masonick Record can have their volumes handsomely bound in boards, with leather backs and corners, at 22 1/2 cents a volume. Feb. 14. 3m3

THIS PAPER

Is published every Saturday, by E. B. CHILD.

AT THE CORNER OF NORTH MARKET AND STEVENSON STREETS, ALBANY, N. Y.

TERMS—To city subscribers, Three Dollars a year. To subscribers who receive their papers by mail, Two Dollars and Fifty Cents, in ADVANCE—otherwise, Three Dollars.
JOB PRINTING neatly executed at this office.

AND ALBANY SATURDAY MAGAZINE.

VOL. III.

ALBANY, N. Y. SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1829.

NO. 5.

MASONICK RECORD.

MASONRY.

Whether the strenuous and malignant efforts which are now making by sundry desperate or deluded wretches within this commonwealth, to disturb the peace of the community, and raise a new flame out of the expiring excitement of the Morgan affair in New-York, should be met by any thing besides silent scorn, we have sometimes entertained a doubt. To enter, however, upon any course of argument or of extensive disputation, with men determined if possible to undermine the whole fabric of civil society in the hope of finding foothold upon the ruins, would be less profitable, even, than an attempt to reason with highwaymen or incendiaries. It is to be lamented that any decent newspaper, or other journal of any description, has been found in this region, whose conductors have consented to the admission into their columns, of the stale slang and infuriated ravings of Solomon Southwick and his accomplices, as doled forth from a late mock "convention" in our neighborhood.

But, if these things are thus suffered to grow upon us, to invade our institutions and even our families, assuming at every step new and more menacing positions, what is to be done? Shall the harmony of society be interrupted with impunity? Is not the load of life already sufficiently grievous and burdensome, without the additional evils and prejudices thus thrown upon it? Is there an honest, peaceable disposed citizen, who seriously desires the introduction into this quarter, of a state of affairs like that which recently prevailed in the western counties of New York—where fathers and sons have been made to quarrel—where families have been broken up—where brethren, before united in religious or social fraternities, have been separated, and estranged from each other, or their former friendships converted into deadly enmities, by an imaginary spirit of reform—an accursed demon, with scarce enough of plausibility to screen its forged deformity, ridiculously cristened anti-masonry.

But such is the condition of our world, that public disorganizers, as well as petty thieves and skulking pirates, must necessarily be watched and guarded against—and under this impression, we give place to the annexed communication from a venerated and gallant patriot—who, with characteristic independence, gives us leave to announce his name. The writer is major DANIEL JACKSON of Newton; and his remarks, which are both pithy and pertinent, the result of sound sense and experience, will be read with satisfaction by every true friend to the peace, prosperity, and honour of our common country. [Boston Bulletin.]

"As indisposition prevented me from attending the late "anti-masonick" meeting at Dedham, I take the liberty of making some inquiries I should have proposed there, to those who were masons and to those who were not. Why is this rage against Masonry?—a society, which has existed for so many ages, and against which the gates of hell have never been able to prevail? Shall a man who pretends to divulge its secrets, do it any harm? There are good and bad in all societies; and if some persons think the secrets of masonry have been divulged, let them enjoy their own opinion; but not disturb the existing harmony of religious societies, nor say that persons shall not belong to the church of Christ, if they acknowledge that they are members, and frequent the lodges of free and accepted masons. If a member will not sit under a minister presiding because he is a mason, does he not by such conduct condemn him? To whom is he accountable, but unto his lord and master, whether he stand or fall? Is not God to approve or disapprove of our conduct; or is man to take this work out of his hands?

"I am a Royal Arch Mason; have been the master of a Lodge, am almost seventy-seven years old, and am a member of the Christian church; and if I thought that masonry would prevent me from placing my affections on my heavenly Father, or cause me to neglect the fulfilment of my duties to Him, I think, so far as I know my own heart, I would relinquish it, and every thing here below, for the sake of Him, whom, for so many years, I have endeavored to serve in all humility and lowliness of mind. Was not St. John a mason, and a beloved disciple of our Lord? God knows the secrets of masonry better than unenlightened man. Let us not judge one another, for with what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged.

"Far be it from me in my old age, to injure the cause of Christ, or jeopardize the liberties of my country, for which I have fought and bled. I cannot think our civil and religious liberties are in any danger from masonry, or from such as pretend to ridicule both. I cannot think that true and accepted masons would be disposed to injure either a Morgan or a printer. The latter may expect to obtain subscribers to his paper, or privately sell his books by endeavoring to degrade the order; but the depravity of man is not so great, nor the American people so credulous, as that individuals may make their fortunes in this way. My brother masons ought not in my opinion to take much notice of the attempts made to injure so benevolent a society; but by their lives and conversation convince the world they are sincere Christians; and are ready to do all they can to promote the liberties of their country. No honest man can suppose by this communication that I wish to injure the latter, as I have fought for those liberties during the whole of the Revolutionary war. But I confess, I am apprehensive they may be destroyed by demagogues and unprincipled men. What will they not do? I am fearful they would act as the Jews did, in the ignorance of a blind zeal. If, because I am a mason, I am expelled from communion with the church of Christ here below, it will matter not, if I am but permitted to join with that heavenly Lodge of christians which is above. My brothers of the Masonick family, lay not aside either the old or new Testament scriptures, but labour for the increase of brotherly love, hope and charity; and may the chain of benevolence that united the Lodge four or five thousand years ago, and through the dark ages, continue to bind us together in this land of liberty and religious toleration, of science, and of philanthropy."

ELECTION OF OFFICERS.

STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Officers of the Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the state of Pennsylvania, for the year 1829:—

John M. Read, Grand High Priest,
Samuel H. Perkins, Grand King,
Thomas Kittera, Grand Scribe.
John J. Kane, Grand Captain of the Host.
Francis Cooper, Grand Principal Sojourner.
Charles Stout, Grand Royal Arch Captain.
Emmon T. Weaver, George Blackford, John Y. Black, Grand Masters of the Vails.

Rev. G. T. Bedell, Henry Lenhart, Robert Pigot, Grand Chaplains.

Joseph S. Riley, Grand Treasurer.
Samuel H. Thomas, Grand Secretary.
Enos S. Gandy, Grand Marshal.
Thomas Amies, Alexander Qninton, Grand Stewards.
Charles Schneider, Grand Tyler.

Officers of the Grand Lodge of the state of Pennsylvania, for the year 1829:—

R. W. Samuel Badger, Grand Master.
Michael Nisbet, Deputy Grand Master.
John Steele, Senior Grand Warden.
George M. Dallas, Junior Grand Warden.
Randall Hutchinson, Grand Treasurer.
Samuel H. Thomas, Grand Secretary,
Joseph R. Hopkins, Senior Grand Deacon.
James Gowen, Junior Grand Deacon.
Rev. George C. Potts, G. Bedell, W. E. Ashton.
R. W. Morgan, Grand Chaplains.
Thomas Amies, William Stephens, Grand Stewards.

Henry Horn, Grand Sword Bearer.
John K. Kane, Grand Marshal.
David Gathans, Grand Pursuivant.
Charles Schneider, Grand Tyler.

STANDING COMMITTEES.

Of Correspondence—Samuel H. Perkins, Joseph S. Riley, Jesse R. Burden.
Of By-Laws—Samuel H. Thomas, N. Fowle.
Of Charity—Joseph R. Hopkins, Francis Cooper, F. E. Brewster, John Y. Black, and Fred. Plummer.
Of the Hall—Frederick Erringer, G. W. Jones, William Weaver.
Of the Gas Manufactory—Samuel M. Stewart, Charles Stout, Wm. Carl Brewster, M. D.
Of Finance—Britton White, William Boyd, John M. Read, C. Wheeler, Samuel Wonderly.
Of Publication—Robinson R. Moore, David C. Skerret, M. D., Thomas Cave.

DISTRICT OFFICERS.

Second District—R. W. Joseph Kingsberry, of Bradford county, Deputy Grand Master, Rev. Solomon Everts, Grand Chaplain.
Third District—Rev. Richard D. Hall, of York, and J. B. Clemson, Grand Chaplains.
Fourth District—Rev. Joseph Spencer, of Carlisle, Grand Chaplain.
Fifth District—R. W. Samuel Pettigrew, of Allegheny county, Deputy Grand Master.
Sixth District—R. W. Francis B. Nichols, of Schuylkill county, Deputy Grand Master.
Seventh District—R. W. James Kelton, of Chester county, Deputy Grand Master.
Eighth District—Rev. Henry Lenhart, of Lycoming county, Deputy Grand Master, Rev. James Depui, Grand Chaplain.
Tenth District—R. W. Stephen Barlow, of Crawford county, Deputy Grand Master, Rev. Timothy Alden, Grand Chaplain.
Eleventh District—R. W. John H. Hill, M. D., of Montgomery county, Deputy Grand Master.
Thirteenth District—R. W. Thomas H. Baird, of Washington county, Deputy Grand Master.
Fourteenth District—R. W. James M. Porter, of Northampton county, Deputy Grand Master.

MASONICK LOANS.

The following named persons compose the board of trustees for the present year, viz:
Edward Burd, President; Thomas Hale, Treasurer, Samuel H. Thomas, Secretary; Samuel

Badger, Michael Nisbet, John Steele, George M. Dallas, Stephen Girard, Joseph Swift, Thomas Biddle, Norris Stanley, Randall Hutchinson.

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

ACOUSTICKS.

A bell rung under water, returns a tone as distinct as if rung in the air.

Stop one ear with the finger, and press the other to one end of a long stick, or piece of deal wood, and if a watch be held at the other end of the wood, the ticking will be heard, be the wood or stick ever so long.

Tie a poker on to the middle of a strip of flannel 2 or 3 feet long, and press with the thumbs or fingers the ends of the flannel into your ears, while you swing the poker against an iron fender, and you will hear a sound like that of a very heavy church bell. These experiments prove that water, wood, and flannel, are good conductors of sound, for the sound from the bell, the watch, and the fender, pass through the water, and along the deal and flannel to the ear.

It must be observed, that a body while in the act of sounding is in a state of vibration which it communicates to the surrounding air, the undulations of the air affect the ear and excite in us the sense of sound. Sound, of all kinds, it is ascertained, travels at the rate of thirteen miles in a minute; the softest whisper travels as fast as the most tremendous thunder. The knowledge of this fact has been applied to the measurement of distances.

Suppose a ship in distress fires a gun, the light of which is seen on shore, or by another vessel, 20 seconds before the report is heard, it is known to be at the distance of 20 times 1,142 feet, or little more than four miles and a half.

Again, if I see a vivid flash of lightning, and in two seconds hear a tremendous clap of thunder, I know that the thunder cloud is not more than 760 yards from the place where I am, and should instantly retire from an exposed situation.

The pulse of a healthy person beats about 76 times in a minute; if, therefore, between a flash of lightning and the thunder, I can feel 1, 2, 3, 4, &c. beats of my pulse, I know that the cloud is 900, 1,800, 2,700, &c. feet from me.

Sound, like light after it has been reflected from several places, may be collected into one point as a focus, where it will be more audible than in any other part; on this principle whispering galleries are constructed.

Speaking trumpets, and those intended to assist the hearing of deaf persons, depend on the reflection of sound from the sides of the trumpet, and also upon its being confined and prevented from spreading in every direction. A speaking trumpet, to have its full effect must be directed in a line towards the hearer. The report of a gun is much louder when towards a person than one placed in a contrary direction.

An echo is the reflection of sound striking against a surface adapted to the purpose, as the side of a hill, house, wall, &c.

THE TRAVELLER.

TOMBUCTOO.

The last New Monthly Magazine contains a short but interesting account of M. Caille and his visit to Tombuctoo. He is a native of Rochelle, and was employed on the coast of Africa in the capacity of merchant's clerk, and while in this situation conceived the idea of undertaking his journey. The city of Tombuctoo with its supposed population of a million of inhabitants, was an object of curiosity to all Europe. England had sent out learned and enterprising travellers, and aided their expeditions with money and all the influence of her government, but none of them had been able to arrive at it, or at least none who visited it had returned. It struck M. Caille, therefore, that if he, poor, unaided and unknown as he was, could visit this city and carry home some account of it, his merit would be the greater. He, therefore, applied himself to the study of Arabic, and to making inquiries of the government and mode of living in the interior of Africa. He learned that the zealous Musselmans of that country hold it to be their duty to convert all strangers who come among them, and if they cannot do this to take their lives. This piece of information was of great use in enabling him to preserve his own.

He quitted the coast, taking with him a small packet of merchandise, assumed the dress of the natives, conformed to their customs and professed the Musselman religion. He told them that he was a native of Egypt, carried by the army of Bonaparte at an early age to France, where the infidels not only hindered him from following the Musselman religion, but had even made him forget his mother tongue. He added, that being taken by his master, a rich French merchant, to the coast of Africa he had found means to escape, and that fearful of falling again into the hands of infidels he had adopted the plan of crossing the continent of Africa to regain his native country. Sometimes this story served his purpose, but at other times robbers deprived him of his little packet, which they however gave up on seeing him betake himself to the reading of the Koran.

At length, after encountering various difficulties and suffering much from illness, he had the unspeakable satisfaction of reaching Tombuctoo. He had previously satisfied himself that the accounts of its prodigious population were exaggerated, so that he felt no astonishment at finding that it contained no more than twelve thousand inhabitants. The houses consist only of the ground floor with a terrace on the roof. The inhabitants are composed of the two different races of Moors and Negroes, the former of whom are the most enlightened. The color of M. Caille's skin shocked them at first, but the diligence with which he read the Koran at length brought them to treat him with great respect. His Koran served him as a journal, for he wrote the memorandums of his travels between the lines of the book, and when these were filled up, on little scraps of paper between the leaves. He also traced on the page of the sacred book, by the aid of a compass which he had been able to preserve, a map of his journey.

The people of Tombuctoo have made little progress in civilization. They have very confused notions of any people existing out of Africa. They look upon every stranger coming among them as a magician sent from foreign countries to discover hidden treasures in the neighborhood of their city by virtue of a compact with the devil, and they hold that it is a meritorious action to put to death an infidel. The environs of the country are singularly barren. The city is five miles distant from the river; only rain water is used which is kept in reservoirs, and tastes execrably, and no fuel is used but camels dung. M. Caille thinks that Tombuctoo is only a commercial entrepot and that if the trade of that part of the world should decline the city itself would disappear in the course of a few years, by the removal of the families, who, for the convenience of water, would establish themselves on the banks of the river. According to the inhabitants of Tombuctoo, Major Laing was the first white man ever seen in their city. They said he remained there a month and then returned to the coast, where he died. M. Caille, however, afterwards learned that about forty-eight leagues from Tombuctoo Major Laing met a party of Musselmans, who commanded him to address a prayer to the Prophet, which refusing to do, he was strangled.

M. Caille remained a month in Tombuctoo. He crossed the desert on the back of a camel, with his mouth carefully covered to prevent all humidity from escaping. His small parcel of merchandise was reduced to almost nothing by the journey. He is the subject of great curiosity and interest at Paris. He passes several hours every day in writing the account of his travels. The Jesuits have attacked him furiously for having taken the turban, but the French government have rewarded him with the cross of the Legion of Honor and a pension of about fifty pounds a year.

FARM-HOUSES ON THE SNEEUWBERG MOUNTAINS.

The farm-houses in the Sneeuwberg, and in most of the colder districts of the colony, are usually of the following description:—The house resembles a large barn divided into two or three apartments. One of these is the kitchen, which also serves for the sitting and eating apartment. In the others the family sleep; while, in the outer one already mentioned, visitors and travellers are accommodated with a rush mat, a feather bed, and a coverlet spread on the clay floor. In this situation I have often enjoyed, after a fatiguing day's ride, the most balmy repose; while a swarthy train of slaves and Hottentots were moving round the embers of the fire, wrapped in their sheepskin mantles, and dogs, cats, and fowls were trampling over my body. The more wealthy and long settled families, however, usually have the kitchen separate from their sitting-room. In such houses curtained beds, and other articles of decent furniture, are not unfrequently found; but the poorer classes are content with a few thong-bottomed chairs and stools, two or three wagon-chests, and a couple of deal tables. At one of the latter sits the mistress of the house, with a tea-urn and a chafing-dish before her, dealing out every now and then tea-water, or coffee, and elevating her sharp shrill voice occasionally to keep the dilatory slaves and Hottentots at their duty. In this same apartment is also invariably to be seen the carcass of a sheep killed in the morning, and hung up under the eye of the mistress, to be served out frugally for the day's provision as it may be required. The houses, being without any ceiling, are open to the thatch; and the rafters are generally hung full of the ears of Indian corn, leaves or rolls of tobacco, slices of dried meat, called bill tongue, &c. The last is a sort of ham from the muscular part of the thigh of an ox, or the larger species of antelopes; it is very convenient for carrying on journeys, and is found in the boor's houses in every part of the colony. It is cut into very thin slices, and eaten with bread and butter, or with bread and the melted fat of the sheep's tail, which is a common substitute for butter; either way it is no contemptible dish when one is a little hungry, and many a time I have heartily enjoyed it.

A traveller, on arriving, if it does not happen to be meal-time, is always presented with a cup of tea, without sugar, milk, or bread; unless occasionally, when you may be favoured with a small piece of sugar-candy out of a tin snuff-box, to be kept in your mouth to sweeten the bitter beverage as it passes. When their tea and coffee are exhausted, a succedaneum is found in roasted grain, prepared in the same way as Hunt's radical coffee, which, if not very palatable, is nevertheless a refreshment to a thirsty and weary traveller. They never think of asking you to eat unless at meal-time; but then you are expected to draw in your chair, and help yourself, without invitation, in the same easy manner as one of the family. The dishes consist for the most part of mutton stewed in sheep's-tail fat, or boiled to rags; sometimes with very palatable soup, and a dish of boiled corn, maize or pumpkin. Cayenne-pepper, vinegar, and few home-made pickles, are also usually produced to relish the simple fare, which, served up twice a day, forms, with tea-water and the soopie, or dram of Cape brandy, the amount of their luxuries. In this quarter of the colony, however, I found every where good bread; and, upon the whole, the farmers of Bruintjes-Hoogte and the Sneeuwberg appeared in much more independent and comfortable circumstances than those along the coast.

[Thompson's Southern Africa.]

HISTORICAL.

EARTHQUAKES.

[Translated from a work published at Lima in 1815.]

The terrible phenomenon of earthquakes most frequently occurs in the latter part of Spring, and the beginning of Summer. If it happens at any other period of the year, it is generally in Autumn. Earthquakes usually take place in the night, two or three hours after sunset, or about day break.—Their course is from North to South in the direction of the Andes. Fatal experience has shown, that the most violent concussions, return at intervals of half a century each, within the space, which lies between the equator, and the tropick of Capri-corn, and that they follow each other with a kind of regularity from the tropick to the equator. This remark is confirmed by the subsequent table of the earthquakes, which have been felt in Quito, Arequipa and Lima, since the conquest of the country.

Arequipa.	Lima.	Quito.
1592	1586	1587
1604	1630	1645
1687	1697	1698
1715	1746	1757
1784	1806	1797

On the return of the disastrous period about the close of the last century, the city of Arequipa, and the provinces of Quito were ruined. Lima has hitherto escaped. How shall we obtain from Heaven exemption from this dire calamity! The gloomy reflection that we must found the Capital anew every fifty years, and that it may be reduced to a heap of rubbish, just at the moment when a finishing hand has been put to its greatness and splendour, fills us with terror and dismay. Elderly and pious persons affirm, that earthquakes have been less common and violent in Lima, since its churches have resounded with the sacred hymn to the Trinity. Surely, a religious people ought to enkindle their faith, and to nourish the sentiments of adoration in their hearts; since He alone to whom this devout and sublime hymn is consecrated, has power to shake the earth to its centre, or to uphold it in repose.

Variable days are most exposed to earthquakes; and hence they occur between Spring and Summer, and during the Indian Summer of Autumn. They are preceded by copious rains, which moisten the earth, and penetrate, and fill up its cavities. The hot weather following these rains, forms a mass of subterraneous vapors, which, finding no outlet, are liable to be exploded by the electric spark or volcanic fire. About the time of an earthquake, dark exhalations often cover the Heavens, and give a melancholy aspect to the stars.

Vegetation is apt to suffer much at these fatal periods. The earthquake of 1687 rendered our lands unfit for the cultivation of wheat. The stalks grew luxuriantly until the ear appeared; but the grain was totally blasted, and the harvest lost. Twenty years afterwards, the soil began to resume its former fertility; but a mortal blow had been inflicted upon our agriculture. During the scarcity, resort was had to Chili, for supplies; and this country, to which our ancestors exported bread-stuffs, has become our granary; and the most valuable branch of our agriculture has been ruined for want of consumers.

On the 1st of December 1806, a greater earthquake occurred at Lima than has been known since the destructive earthquake of 1746. It began at six in the evening, and shook the city terribly for a minute and a half. At 8 o'clock the tide rose 18 feet in the port of Callao; at half past nine it was still higher; but, by ten o'clock, the sea became tranquil. The course of this earthquake was from North to South; and its motion was perceptibly undulatory and exceedingly rapid. I consider it as an accomplishment of the semi-centennial period of earthquakes in Peru.

THE REPOSITORY.

From the Anniversary edited by Allan Cunningham.

FEMALE BEAUTY.

It has been said by some one, and if not said, it shall be said now, that no woman is incapable of inspiring love, fixing affection, and making a man happy. We are far less influenced by outward loveliness than we imagine. Men speak with admiration and write with rapture of the beauty which the artist loves, which, like genius in the system of Gall, is ascertained by scale and compass; but in practice, see how they despise those splendid theories, and yield to a sense of beauty and loveliness, of which the standard is in their own heart. It is not the elegance of form, for that is often imperfect; it is not in loveliness of face, for of these nature has been perchance neglectful; nor is it in the charm of sentiment or sweet words, for even among women there is an occasional lack of that; neither is it in the depth of their feelings, nor in the sincerity of their affection, that their whole power over man springs from. Yet every woman, beautiful or not, has that power, more or less; and every man yields to its influence.

The women of all nations are beautiful. Female beauty, in the limited sense of the word, is that outward form and proportion which corresponds with the theories of poets and the rule of artists—of which every nation has examples, and of which every one has a share. But beauty by a more natural definition of the word, is that indescribable charm; that union of many qualities of person and mind, and heart, which insures to man the greatest proportion of happiness. One of our best poets has touched on this matter with the wisdom of inspiration;—these are his words:—

She dwelt among the untrodden ways
Beside the springs of Dove,
A maid whom there was none to praise,
And very few to love.
She lived unknown, and few could know,
When Lucy ceased to be:
But she is in her grave, and oh!
The difference to me.

—There was a maiden something more to the purpose than the slender damsels whom academies create on canvass, or of whom some bachelor bards dream. The poet of Rydal Mount is a married man and knows from what sources domestick happiness comes. The gossamer creations of the fancy, were they transformed to breathing flesh and blood would never do for a man's bosom. Those delicate aerial visions, those personified zephyrs, are decidedly unfit for the material wear and tear of the world. Not so the buxom dames of our two fine islands. Look to them as they move along. If not with its scale and compasses, and its eternal chant of "the beau ideal"—the beau ideal, had peopled the world, we would have been a nation of ninnies, our isles would have been filled with gay figures and beings "beautiful exceedingly," but loveliness, joyless, splendidly silly, and elegantly contemptible. It has been better ordered.

I have looked much on man, and more on woman. The world presents a distinct image of my own perception of beauty; and from the decision of true love I could lay down the law of human affection, and the universal opinion entertained respecting female loveliness. There is no need to be profound, there is no occasion for research, look on wedded society, it is visible to all. There is a man very plain wedded to a woman very lovely; a creature silent as marble, to one eloquent, fluent, and talkative; a very tall man to a very little woman; a very portly lady to a man short and slender, and attenuated; the brown weds the black, and the white the golden; personal deformities are not in the way of affection; love contradicts all our theories of loveliness, and happiness has no more to do with beauty than a good crop of corn has with the personal looks of him who sowed the seed. The question, therefore, which some simple person has put, "which of the three kingdoms has the most beautiful ladies?" is one of surpassing absurdity. Who would ever think of going forth with rules of artists in their hands, and scraps of idle verses on their lips, to measure and adjust the precedence of beauty among the three nations? Who shall say which is the fairest flower of the field, which is the brightest of the stars of heaven? One loves the daisy for its modesty, another the rose for its splendour, and a third the lily for its purity, and they are all right.

ON LOVE.

PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY.

"What is love? Ask him who lives what is life; ask him who adores what is God.

"I know not the internal constitution of other men, nor even of thine whom I now address. I see that in some external attributes they resemble me, but when, misled by that appearance, I have thought to appeal to something in common, and unburden my inmost soul to them, I have found my language misunderstood, like one in a distant and savage land. The more opportunities they have afforded me for experience, the wider has appeared the interval between us, and to a greater distance have the points of sympathy been withdrawn. With a spirit ill-fitted to sustain such proof, trembling and feeble through its tenderness, I have every where sought, and have found only repulse and disappointment.

"Thou demandest what is Love. It is that powerful attraction towards all we conceive, or fear, or hope, beyond ourselves, when we find within our own thoughts the chasm of an insufficient void, and seek to awaken in all things that are, a community with what we experience within ourselves. If we reason we would be understood; if we imagine, we would that the airy children of our brain were born anew within another's; if we feel, we would that another's nerves should vibrate to our own, that the beams of their eyes should kindle at once, and mix and melt into our own; that lips of motionless ice should not reply to lips quivering and burning with the heart's best blood;—this is Love. This is the bond and the sanction which connects not only man with man, but with every thing which exists. We are born into the world, and there is something within us, which, from the instant that we live, more and more thirst after its likeness. It is probably in correspondence with this law that the infant drains milk from the bosom of its mother; this propensity develops itself with the development of our nature. We dimly see within our intellectual nature, a miniature as it were of our entire self, yet deprived of all that we condemn or despise, the ideal prototype of every thing excellent and lovely that we are capable of conceiving as belonging to the nature of man. Not only the portrait of our external being, but an assemblage of the minutest particles of which our nature is composed: a mirror whose surface reflects only the forms of purity and brightness: a soul within our own soul that describes a circle round its proper Paradise, which pain and sorrow and evil dare not overleap. To this we eagerly refer all sensations, thirsting that they should resemble and correspond with it. The discovery of its antitype; the meeting with an understanding capable of clearly estimating our own; an imagination which should enter into and seize upon the subtle and delicate peculiarities which we have delighted to cherish and unfold in secret, with a frame, whose nerves, like the chords of two exquisite lyres strung to the accompaniment of one delightful voice, vibrate with the vibrations of our own; and a combination of all these in such proportion as the type within demands; this is the invisible and unattainable point to which Love tends; and to attain which, it urges forth the powers of man to arrest the faintest shadow of that, without the possession of which, there is no rest or respite to the heart over which it rules. Hence in solitude, or that deserted state when we are surrounded by human beings, and yet they sympathize not with us, we love the flowers, the grass, the waters, and the sky. In the motion of the very leaves of Spring, in the blue air, there is then found a secret correspondence with our heart. There is eloquence in the tongueless wind, and a melody in the flowing brooks and the rustling of the reeds beside them, which, by their inconceivable relation to something within the soul's, awaken the spirits to dance of breathless rapture, and bring tears of mysterious tenderness to the eyes, like the enthusiasm of patriotick success, of the voice of one beloved singing to you alone. Sterne says that if he were in a desert he would love some cypress. So soon as this want or power is dead, man becomes a living sepulchre of himself, and what yet survives is the mere husk for what once he was."

FRIENDS.

Like worldly treasures, our best friends are sometimes deceitful; for as riches and honour will flee, and leave a man destitute and powerless—so those that are apparently our friends, will often forsake us in times of danger and distress. When we choose a friend, we ought to select one upon whom we can rely in all situations of life. If we are in affluence, in our reverses of fortune he may relieve or ever comfort us. Liable to the tossing influence of fortune, it seems to have been, in the beginning, ordained by Providence, that human nature should be supplied with a staff to support him—a friend to relieve him in adversity, and comfort him in affliction.

THE LEGENDARY.

THE HAUNTED SHIPS.

Concluded.

"And trow ye," said the old woman, who attracted from her hut by the drowning cries of the young fisherman, had remained an auditor of the mariner's legend. "And trow ye, Mark Macmoran, that the tale of the Haunted Ships is done? I can say no to that. Mickle have mine ears heard; but more mine eyes have witnessed since I came to dwell in this humble home by the side of the deep sea. I mind the night weel; it was on Hallowmas eve: the nuts were cracked, the apples were ate, and spell and charm were tried at my fire-side; till, wearied with diving into the dark waves of futurity, the lads and lasses fairly took to the more visible blessings of kind words, tender clasps, and gentle courtship. Soft words in a maiden's ear, and a kindlie kiss o' her lip, were old world matters to me, Mark Macmoran; though I mean not to say that I have been free of the folly of daunting and daffin with a youth in my day, and keeping tryste with him in dark and lonely places. However, as I say, these times of enjoyment were passed and gone with me; the mair's the pity that pleasure should fly sae fast away—and as I could nae make sport I thought I should not mar any; so out I sauntered into the fresh cold air, and sat down behind that old oak, and looked abroad on the wide sea. I had my ain sad thoughts, ye may think, at the time: it was in that very bay my blythe good-man perished, with seven more in his company,—and on that very bank where ye see the waves leaping and foaming, I saw seven stately corpses streaked, but the dearest was the eighth. It was a woeful sight to me, a widow, with four bonnie boys, with nought to support them but these twa hands, and God's blessing and a cow's grass. I have never liked to live out of sight of this bay since that time; and mony's the moonlight night I sit looking on these watery mountains and these waste shores; it does my heart good, whatever it may do to my head. So ye see it was Hallowmas night, and looking on sea and land, sat I; and my heart wandering to other thoughts soon made me forget my youthful company at home. It might be near the howe hour of the night: the tide was making, and its singing brought strange old world stories with it; and I thought on the dangers that sailors endure, the fates they meet with, and the fearful forms they see. My own blythe good-man had seen sights that made him grave enough at times, though he aye tried to laugh them away. Aweel, atween that very rock aneath us and the coming tide, I saw, or thought I saw—for the tale is so dream-like that the whole might pass for a vision of the night—I saw the form of a man: his plaid was gray; his face was gray; and his hair which hung low down till it nearly came to the middle of his back, was as white as the white sea-foam. He began to howk and dig under the bank; an' God be near me, thought I, this maun be the un-blessed spirit of auld Adam Gowdgowpin, the miser, who is doomed to dig for shipwrecked treasure, and count how many millions are hidden forever from man's enjoyment. The form found something which in shape and hue seemed a left foot slipper of brass; so down to the tide he marched, and placing it on the water, whirled it thrice; round and the infernal slipper dilated at every turn, till it became a bonny barge with its sails bent, and on board leaped the form and scudded swiftly away. He came to one of the Haunted Ships, and striking it with his oar, a fair ship, with mast, and canvas, and mariners, started up: he touched the other Haunted Ship, and produced the like transformation; and away the three spectre ships bounded, leaving a track of fire behind them on the billows which was long unextinguished. Now was nae that a bonnie, a fearful sight to see beneath the light of the Hallowmas moon! But the tale is far frae finished; for mariners say, that once a year, on a certain night, if ye stand on the Borranpoint, ye will see the infernal shallops coming through the Solway; ye will hear the same laugh, and song, and mirth, and minstrelsy, which our ancestors heard; see them bound over the sand banks and sunken rocks like sea gulls, cast their anchor in Blawhooly bay, while the shadowy figure lowers down the boat, and augments their numbers with the four unhappy mortals to whose memory a stone stands in the kirk yard, with a sinking ship and a shoreless sea cut upon it. Then the spectre ships vanish, and the drowning shriek of mortals, and the rejoicing laugh of fiends are heard, and the old hulls are left as a memorial that the old spiritual kingdom has not departed from the earth. But I maun away, and trim my little cottage fire, and make it burn and blaze up bonnie, to warm the crickets, and my cold and crazy bones, that maun soon be laid aneath the green sod in the eerie kirk yard." And away the old dame tottered to her cottage, secured the door on the inside, and soon the hearth flame was seen to glimmer and gleam through key-hole and window.

"I'll tell ye what," said the old mariner, in a subdued tone, and with a shrewd and suspicious glance of his eye after the old sibyl, "it's a word that may not very well be uttered, but there are many mistakes made in evening stories if old Moll Moray there, where she lives, knows not mickle more than she is willing to tell of the Haunted Ships and their unhallowed mariners. She lives cannily and quietly; no one knows how she is fed or supported; but her dress is aye whole, her cottage ever smokes, and her table lacks neither of wine, white and red, nor of fowl and fish, and white bread and brown. It was a dear scoff to Jock Matheson, when he called old Moll the uncannie carline of Blawhooly: his boat ran round and round in the Solway,—every body said it was enchanted,—and down it went head foremost; and had na Jock been a swimmer equal to a sheldrake he would have fed the fish;—but I'll warrant it sobered the lad's speech; and he never reckoned himself safe, till he made auld Moll the present of a new kirtle and a stone of cheese." "O father," said his grand-daughter Barbara, "ye surely wrong poor old Mary Moray: what use could it be to an old woman like her, who has no wrongs to redress, no malice to work out against mankind, and nothing to seek of enjoyment save a cannie hour and a quiet grave—what use could the fellowship of fiends and the communion of evil spirits be to her? I know Jenny Primrose puts rowan tree above the door-head when she sees old Mary coming; I know the goodwife of Kittlenak-et wears rowan-berry leaves in the head-band of her blue kirtle, and all for the sake of averting the unsousie glance of Mary's right ee; and I know that the old laird of Burntroutwater drives his seven cows to the pasture with a wand of witch-tree, to keep Mary from milking them. But what has all that to do with haunted shallops, visionary mariners, and bottomless beats! I have heard myself as pleasant a tale about the Haunted Ships and their unworlly crews as any one would wish to hear in a winter evening. It was told to me by young Benjie Macharg, one summer night, sitting on Abridgland bank; the lad intended a sort of love meeting; but all that he could talk of was about smearing sheep and shearing sheep, and of the wife which the Norway elves of the Haunted Ships made for his uncle Sandie Macharg. And I shall tell ye the tale as the honest lad told it me.—Alexander Macharg, besides being the laird of three acres of peatmoss, two kale gardens, and the owner of seven good milch cows, a pair of horses, and six pet sheep, was the husband of one of the handsomest women in seven parishes. Many a lad sighed the day he was bridged; and a Nightsdale laird and two Annandale moorland farmers drank themselves to their last linen, as well as their last shilling, through sorrow for her loss. But married was the dame; and home she was carried, to bear rule over her home and her husband, as an honest woman should. Now ye maun ken that though the flesh and blood lovers of Alexander's bonnie wife all ceased to love and to sue her after she became another's, there were certain admirers who did not consider their claim at all abated or their hopes lessened by the kirk's famous obstacle of matrimony. Ye have heard how the devout minister of Tinwald had a fair son carried away, and bedded against his liking to an unchristened bride, whom the elves and the fairies provided; ye have heard how the bonnie bride of the drunken laird of Soukitup was stolen by the fairies out at the back-

window of the bridal chamber, the time the bridegroom was groping his way to the chamber door; and ye have heard—but why need I multiply cases? such things in the ancient days were as common as candle-light. So ye'll no hinder certain water elves and sea fairies, who sometimes keep festival and summer mirth in these old haunted hulks, from falling in love with the weel-faured wife of laird Macharg; and to their plots and contrivance they went how they might accomplish to sunder man and wife, and sundering such a man and such a wife was like sundering the green leaf from the summer, or the fragrance from the flower. So it fell on a time that laird Macharg took his halve-net on his back, and his steel spear in his hand, and down to Blawhooly bay gade he, and in to the water he went right between the two haunted hulks, and, placing his net, awaited the coming of the tide. The night, ye maun ken, was mirk, and the wind lowne, and the singing of the increasing waters among the shells and the pebbles was heard for sundry miles. All at once lights began to glance and twinkle on board the two Haunted Ships from every hole and seam, and presently the sound as of a hatchet employed in squaring timber echoed far and wide. But if the toil of these unearthly workmen amazed the laird, how much more was his amazement increased when a sharp shrill voice called out, 'Ho! brother, what are you doing now?' A voice still shriller responded from the other Haunted Ship, 'I'm making a wife to Sandie Macharg!' and a loud quavering laugh running from ship to ship, and from bank to bank, told the joy they expected from their labour. Now the laird, besides being a devout and a God-fearing man, was shrewd and bold; and in plot, and contrivance, and skill in conducting his designs, was fairly an overmatch for any dozen land elves; but the water elves are far more subtle; besides, their haunts and their dwellings being in the great deep, pursuit and detection is hopeless if they succeed in carrying their prey to the waves. But ye shall hear. Home flew the laird,—collected his family around the hearth,—spoke of the signs and the sins of the times, and talked of mortification and prayer for averting calamity; and finally taking his father's Bible, brass clasps, black print, and covered with calf-skin, from the shelf, he proceeded without let or stint to perform domestic worship. I should have told ye that he bolted and locked the door, shut up all inlet to the house, threw salt into the fire, and proceeded in every way like a man skilful in guarding against the plots of fairies and fiends. His wife looked on all this with wonder; but she saw something in her husband's looks that hindered her from intruding either question or advice, and a wise woman was she. Near the mid hour of the night the rush of a horse's feet was heard, and the sound of a rider leaping from its back, and a heavy knock came to the door accompanied by a voice, saying, 'The cummer drink's hot, and the knave bairn is expected at laird Laurie's to-night; sae mount, goodwife, and come.' 'Preserve me!' said the wife of Sandie Macharg; 'that's news indeed; who could have thought it! The laird has been heirless for seventeen years! Now Sandie, man, fetch me my skirt and hood.' But he laid his arm round his wife's neck, and said, 'If all the lairds in Galloway go heirless, over this door threshold shall you not stir to-night; and I have said, and I have sworn it: seek not to know why nor wherefore—but, Lord, send us thy blessed morn-light.' The wife looked for a moment in her husband's eye, and desisted from further entreaty. 'But let us send a civil message to the gossips, Sandie; and had nae ye better say I am sair laid with a sudden sickness; though it's sinful-like to send the poor messenger a mile agate with a lie in his mouth without a glass of brandy.' 'To such a messenger, and to those who sent him, no apology is needed, said the austere laird, 'so let him depart.'—And the clatter of a horse's hoofs was heard, and the muttered imprecations of its rider on the church treatment he had experienced. 'Now Sandie, my lad,' said his wife, laying an arm particularly white and round about his neck as she spoke, 'are you not a queer man and a stern! I have been your wedded wife now these three years; and, beside my dower, have brought you three as bonnie bairns as ever smiled aneath a summer sun. Q man, you a dounce man, and fitter to be an elder than even Willie Greer himself, I have the minister's ain word for't, to put on these hard-hearted looks, and gang waving your arms that way, as if ye said, 'I winna take the counsel of sic a hempie as you,' your ain leal wife; I will and I maun have an explanation.' To all this Sandie Macharg replied, 'It is written—wives, obey your husbands; but we have been stayed in our devotion, so let us pray;' and down he knelt; his wife knelt also, for she was as devout as bonnie; and beside them knelt their household, and all lights were extinguished. 'Now this beats a,' muttered his wife to herself; 'however, I shall be obedient for a time; but if I dinna ken what all this is for before the morn by sunken-time, my tongue is nae langer a tongue, nor my hands worth wearing.' The voice of her husband in prayer interrupted this mental soliloquy; and ardently did he beseech to be preserved from the wiles of the fiends and the snares of Satan; from witches, ghosts, goblins, elves, fairies, spunkies, and water-kelpies; from the spectre shallop of Solway; from spirits visible and invisible; from the Haunted Ships and their unearthly tenants; from maritime spirits that plotted against godly men, and fell in love with their wives—'Nay, but his presence be near us!' said his wife, in a low tone of dismay. 'God guide my gude-man's wits: I never heard such a prayer from human lips before. But Sandie, my man, lordsake rise! what fearful light is this!—barn, and byre, and stable, maun be in a blaze; and Hawkie and Hurley, Doddie, and Cherie, and Damson-plum, will be smooored with reek, and scorched with flame.' And a flood of light, but not so gross as a common fire, which ascended to heaven and filled all the court before the house, amply justified the good wife's suspicions. But to the terrors of fire Sandie was as immovable as he was to the imaginary groans of the barren wife of laird Laurie; and he held his wife, and threatened the weight of his right hand—and it was a heavy one—to all who ventured abroad, or even unbolted the door. The neighing and prancing of horses, and the bellowing of cows, augmented the horrors of the night; and to any one who only heard the din, it seemed that the whole onstead was in a blaze, and horses and cattle perishing in the flame. All wiles, common or extraordinary, were put in practice to entice or force the honest farmer and his wife to open the door; and when the like success attended every new stratagem, silence for a little while ensued, and a long, loud, and shrilling laugh wound up the dramatick efforts of the night. In the morning, when laird Macharg went to the door, he found standing against one of the pilasters a piece of black ship oak, rudely fashioned into something like human form, and which skilful people declared would have been clothed with seeming flesh and blood, and palmed upon him by elfin adroitness for his wife; had he admitted his visitants. A synod of wise men and women sat upon the woman of timber, and she was finally ordered to be devoured by fire, and that in the open air. A fire was soon made, and into it the elfin sculpture was tossed from the prongs of two pair of pitchforks. And the blaze that arose was awful to behold; and hissing, and burstings, and loud cracklings, and strange noises were heard in the midst of the flame; and when the whole sunk into ashes, a drinking cup of some precious metal was found; and this cup, fashioned no doubt by elfin skill, but rendered harmless by the purification with fire, the sons and daughters of Sandie Macharg and his wife drink out of to this very day."

MISCELLANY.

IRVING'S "CONQUEST OF GRANADA."

A new work by Washington Irving, entitled A Chronicle of the Conquest of Granada is in the Philadelphia press, and, it is said, will soon be published. The National Gazette, from which the following chapter is taken, observes, that "the subject is happily chosen—it abounds with romantic incident and picturesque scenery—it possesses peculiar historical, and indeed religious interest." Mr. Irving's residence in Spain has rendered him familiar with the manners, traditions and history of the country; and as the subject he has chosen is well suited to his peculiar style, a work of extraordinary attraction is expected.

CHAPTER II.

How the Catholic Sovereigns sent to demand arrears of tribute of the Moor, and how the Moor replied.

In the year 1478, a Spanish courtier arrived at the gates of Granada, as ambassador from the Catholic monarchs, to demand the arrear of tribute. His name was Don Juan de Vera, a zealous and devout knight, full of ardor for the faith, and loyalty for the crown. He was gallantly mounted, armed at all points, and followed by a moderate but well appointed retinue.

The Moorish inhabitants looked jealously at this small but proud array of Spanish chivalry, as it paraded, with that stateliness possessed only by Spanish cavaliers, through the renowned gate of Elvira. They were struck with the stern and lofty demeanour of Don Juan de Vera, and his sinewy frame, which showed him formed for hardy deeds of arms; and they supposed he had come in search of distinction, by defying the Moorish knights in open tourney, or in the famous tilt with reeds, for which they were so renowned; for it was still the custom of the knights of either nation to mingle in these courteous, chivalrous contests, during the intervals of war. When they learnt, however, that he was come to demand the tribute so abhorrent to the ears of the fiery monarch, they observed that it well required a warrior of his apparent nerve, to execute such an embassy.

Muley Aben Hassan received the cavalier in state, seated on a magnificent divan, and surrounded by the officers of his court, in the hall of ambassadors, one of the most sumptuous apartments of the Alhambra. When De Vera had delivered his message, a haughty and bitter smile curled the lip of the fierce monarch. "Tell your sovereigns," said he, "that the kings of Granada, who used to pay tribute in money to the Castilian crown, are dead. Our mint at present coins nothing but blades of scimitars and heads of lances."

The defiance couched in this proud reply, was heard with stern and lofty courtesy by Don Juan de Vera, for he was a bold soldier, and a devout hater of the Infidels; and he saw iron war in the words of the Moorish monarch. He retired from the audience chamber with stately and ceremonious gravity, being master of all points of etiquette. As he passed through the Court of Lions, and paused to regard its celebrated fountain, he fell into a discourse with the Moorish courtiers on certain mysteries of the Christian faith. The arguments advanced by those Infidels (says Fray Antonio Agradida) awakened the pious indignation of this most Christian knight and discreet ambassador, but still he restrained himself within the limits of lofty gravity, leaning on the pommel of his sword, and looking down with ineffable scorn upon the weak casuists around him. The quick and subtle Arabian witlings redoubled their light attacks upon this stately Spaniard, and thought they had completely foiled him in the contest: but the stern Juan de Vera had an argument in reserve, for which they were but little prepared; for on one of them, of the race of the Abencerrages, daring to question, with a sneer, the immaculate conception of the blessed virgin, the Catholic knight could no longer restrain his ire. Raising his voice of a sudden, he told the infidel he lied, and, raising his arm at the same time, he smote him on the head with his sheathed sword.

In an instant the Court of Lions glistened with the flash of arms, and its fountains would have been dyed with blood, had not Muley Aben Hassan overheard the tumult, and forbade all appeal to arms, pronouncing the person of the ambassador sacred while within his territories. The Abencer rage treasured up the remembrance of the insult until an hour of vengeance should arrive, and the ambassador prayed our blessed lady to grant him an opportunity of proving her immaculate conception on the head of this turbaned infidel.

Notwithstanding the occurrence, Don Juan de Vera was treated with great distinction by Muley Aben Hassan; but nothing could make him unbend from his stern and stately reserve. Before his departure, a scimitar was sent to him by the king, the blade of the finest Damascus steel, the hilt of agate, enriched with precious stones, and the guard of gold. De Vera drew it and smiled grimly as he noticed the admirable temper of the blade. "His majesty has given me a trenchant weapon," said he: "I trust a time will come when I may show him that I know how to use his royal present." The reply was considered as a compliment of course; the bystanders little knew the bitter hostility that lay couched beneath.

Don Juan de Vera and his companions, during their brief sojourn at Granada, learned the force and situation of the Moor, with the eyes of practised warriors. They saw that he was well prepared for hostilities. His walls and towers were of vast strength, in complete compair; and mounted with bombards and other heavy ordnance.—His magazines were well stored with all the munitions of war: he had a mighty host of foot soldiers, together with squadrons of cavalry, ready to scour the country and carry on either defensive or predatory warfare. The Christian warriors noted these things without dismay; their hearts rather glowed with emulation, at the thoughts of encountering so worthy a foe. As they slowly pranced through the streets of Granada, on their departure, they looked round with eagerness on its stately palaces, and sumptuous mosques; on its alcayceria or bazar, crowded with silks and cloth of silver and gold, with jewels and precious stones, and other rich merchandise, the luxuries of every clime; and they longed for the time when all this wealth should be the spoil of the soldiers of the faith, and when each tramp of their steeds might be fetlock deep in the blood and carnage of the Infidels.

Don Juan de Vera and his little band pursue their way slowly through the country, to the Christian frontier. Every town was strongly fortified. The Vega was studded with towers of refuge for the peasantry; every pass of the mountain had its castle of defence, every lofty height its watch tower. As the christian cavaliers passed under the walls of the fortresses, lances and scimitars flashed from their battlements, and the turbaned sentinels seemed to dart, from their dark eyes, glances of hatred and defiance. It was evident that a war with this kingdom must be one of doughty peril and valiant enterprise; a war of posts, where every step must be gained by toil and bloodshed, and maintained with the utmost difficulty. The warrior spirit of the cavaliers kindled at the thoughts, and they were impatient for hostilities; "not," says Antonio Agradida, "from any thirst for rapine and revenge, but from that pure and holy indignation which every Spanish knight entertained at beholding this beautiful dominion of his ancestors defiled by the footsteps of the infidel usurpers. It was impossible," he adds "to contemplate this delicious country, and not long to see it restored to the dominion of the true faith, and the sway of the Christian monarchs."

When Don Juan de Vera returned to the Castilian court, and reported the particulars of his mission and all that he had learned and seen in the Moorish territories, he was highly honoured and rewarded by king Ferdinand; and the zeal he had shown in vindication of the sinless conception of the blessed virgin, was not only applauded by that most Catholic of sovereigns, but gained him great favour and renown among all pious cavaliers and reverend prelates.

LORD AVONMORE.

Lord Avonmore was subject to perpetual fits of absence, and was frequently insensible to the conversation that was going on. He was once wrapped in one of his wonted reveries; and, not hearing one syllable of what was passing, (it was at a large professional dinner given by Mr. Bushe,) Curran, who was sitting next to his lordship, having been called on for a toast, gave "All our absent friends," patting, at the same time, Lord Avonmore on the shoulder, and telling him that they had just drunk his health. Quite unconscious of any thing that had been said for the last hour, and taking the intimation as a serious one, Avonmore rose, and apologizing for his inattention, returned thanks to the company for the honour they had done him by drinking his health.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1899.

ELDER STREETER'S "SOMETHING LIKE A MOB." A wonderful story about "masonic vengeance," as let loose upon the domicile of Elder Randolph Streeter, of Tully, in the county of Onondaga, has been going the anti-masonic rounds for nearly two months. The story, as told, not by the Elder, but by an obliging anti-masonic friend for him, is tolerably awful: and is furnished with a recommendation to the credulity of the ignorant, by means of a few pious observations about "a christian community," "civilization," and "the blessing of God." The time chosen is about midnight, and the family is just retiring to rest. Suddenly the doors of the house are seized with trembling, the glass in the windows is broken into a thousand pieces, and the family thrown into unspeakable consternation. The Elder, without hesitation, divines the cause of the tumult to be a score of freemasons, in search of his tongue, heart, &c.; and finally, the family takes refuge in the house of a neighbour, which, by the special interference of Divine Providence, is protected from masonic mobs and murderers.

Now it appears that when this story is honestly told, the Elder is a little given to misrepresentation and exaggeration, and is not half so worthy of the special attention of Providence as he would have others think he is. We have before us the Republican Register, published at Hamilton, Madison county, which contains a statement of facts, made in consequence of the republication of the story of the Elder and his friend in a pamphlet form. The editor of the Register received his information from a gentleman whose respectability and veracity places the truth of his statement beyond the reach of doubt, and the names of those connected with the affair are given at length and without hesitation. The original of the Elder's tale is in substance as follows:

Elder Streeter was a mason, and was placed in an awkward situation by the zeal of some of his anti-masonic brethren and sisters. After much ado, "brother E. P. Dean, and sister Dean, his wife," obtained from him a writing, in which he said, "I hereby renounce all connexion with the institution of freemasonry;" "intending thereby," according to his own acknowledgement, "to renounce all connexion with the institution, and not the institution itself, though willing it should be understood in either way." But sister Dean had of late studied Giddins' almanack rather more than her Bible, and she was not to be "blinded by the Elder's artifice." She wanted something stronger, and accordingly summoned a caucus of feminine spirits (who were much in need of employment to keep them out of mischief), and after the adoption of sundry other important measures, Aunt Patty Bunce was appointed to live in the Elder's house, and endeavour to drive masonry from his soul by pouring her eloquence into his ears. What could the Elder do? The sisterhood governed the church, and they had authorised Aunt Patty to threaten him with their displeasure, and use any other means necessary, to accomplish their object. The poor man at length trembled, and some time in December last, promised not only to renounce but to denounce masonry on the then approaching first of January. About Christmas, an intemperate itinerant fellow, called Congo, who occasionally lives in Tully, went to Elder Streeter's house and requested a night's lodging; "this," says the Register, "the Elder refused, and Congo, moneyless and friendless, stole into the barn until his drunken fit was passed, when he determined to repay the Elder's uncharitableness with a fright, and make a little sport for himself. He accordingly passed around the house, thumping and kicking it, and as the Elder came out, concealed himself. He however remained around all night, and Aunt Patty discovered him in the morning as she went out to draw water, and by that means was let into the whole mystery.

"This presented an excellent opportunity for the Elder to play off a game with the candid party of the church, and throw in part the garb of necessity over his renunciation. He immediately spread the news that his house had been mobbed the night before, as he believed, by freemasons, and that if they wished to preserve the life of their Elder, they must turn out and guard him. At the same time, Aunt Patty communicated the whole affair to sister Dean, and measures were immediately taken. Twelve antis, after the manner of the twelve apostles, were stationed within the Elder's house, as a guard, with swords, and muskets on their shoulders.

"Meanwhile, Aunt Patty notified sister Dean, and she and brother and sister Whitcomb, in solemn consultation, laid their plans. A few of the most confidential antis were notified, and proceeded to act the part of a masonic mob, around the house of their good pastor. The guard stationed themselves in Aunt Patty's room and had already blocked the windows with blinds, when the assault commenced. Ah! the effects of mortal fear are wonderful on the human body; for as the first pane of glass was dashed through, those of the twelve that could, fled to the upper part of the house, and the remainder sought refuge under Aunt Patty's bed. This same trick was played off two successive nights, with little variation. The next day was the time fixed on for the Elder's renunciation, and all nature stood aghast to see him make his debut into anti-masonry. There was nothing sublime in his discourse, but the antis said it was a fair "expose" of masonry. After the service, measures were taken for the safety of the Elder. Himself and his whole kit, were raised from the gulf of Christian Hollow, and conveyed that night to brother Dean's, where it was resolved that the Elder should write an account, of the perilous night's adventures, with such additions as his fertile imagination should suggest, that the sermon that day preached should be added, and the whole printed in pamphlet form."

We will leave it to the reader to say, whether Elder Streeter has been influenced in his conduct towards the masonic institution, by any Christian or honourable motive. In our view, the motives of the actors and actresses in the scenes above described, are too palpably displayed to be misunderstood by any body. But does not the appearance of even common honesty leave them, when we repeat a further statement in the Register, that one hundred dollars have actually been offered for the profits derived from the sale of Elder Streeter's pamphlet, and refused? The speculation was not entered into by a "beggary printer," but by the ruling spirits of a church, who profess to conceive every design, and to perform every action with the purity and benevolence of Christianity! It is well that a sacred faith does not depend upon them for an illustration of its virtues. But enough has been said;—their baseness is too detestable for comment; and the judgement of the people will not confound the truly pious with those who traffick with the devil six days in the week, and play the hypocrite before their God on the seventh.

COL. KING. We regret that it has again become necessary to correct a misrepresentation of this gentleman's conduct, and in doing it we shall not mince words. It is stated in most of the anti-masonic papers, and in some of them under a very imposing display of capitals, that colonel King has "decamped, leaving his bail to pay his bonds;"—the assertion is nothing less than a wilful, deliberate, and malicious lie. The authority given for making the statement is "a letter from Albany;" but we know of no person in the city so reckless as to invent a slander of the kind; if we except Solomon Southwick, and we believe him mean enough for any thing, were it even to present gall to his Saviour on the cross. But even had a letter of the kind been written by a man of veracity, it would be taking great liberty with private reputation to ground a charge upon it. Colonel King's residence was at Youngstown, in Niagara county, more than three hundred miles from this city; and if he had really "decamped," the fact would undoubtedly have been known to his neighbours as soon as to the citizens of Albany. But is it probable that a man who left his business, and travelled four thousand miles to wipe a stain from his character, would "decamp and leave his bail to pay his bonds"? We think not, and men who are not easily wheedled out of their common sense will require better authority than an anonymous "letter from Albany," before they believe that he has done it. The story was first published by the editorial pander who made romance of Elder Streeter's beggary inventions.

The facts are these:—Colonel King left home in the latter part of December, to resume his business at Cantonment Townson. Both his friends and his enemies in the vicinity of his residence knew of his intentions for several weeks previous to, and at the time of, his departure. Prior to leaving Youngstown for Cantonment Townson, he placed a daughter at school in Lockport, and two sons in the academy at Middlebury Village; his wife, and several remaining children, still reside in Youngstown. Colonel King is in moderate circumstances, and relies wholly upon active business for means to support a large family. No man in Niagara county possesses more than himself the confidence of his friends; and even his enemies at Lewiston consider the idea of his having "decamped" too preposterous to gain credence, and pronounce it false, when questioned on the subject. We were at Lewiston soon after colonel King's departure, and heard the facts above, stated by some of the leading anti-masons in that place. As to the "bonds," we believe all fears respecting them are indebted to anti-masonic sensibility for their origin.

The stream of personal abuse which continually pours from anti-masonic presses is an eloquent comment upon the desperation to which the party is reduced. With them no law of God or man is too sacred for violation—no baseless too foul for eulogium, if interest demand it. An unimpeachable life is not sufficient to shield an individual from their calumnies: the brighter the mark the more wanton the abuse with which it is assailed. Colonel King is not a solitary sufferer: cases even more aggravated have occurred within a few months past. Every slander makes the grand tour; and as anti-masonic editors universally publish with eagerness, and without being possessed of any facts to support them, all reports intended to favour their cause, when questioned as to their authenticity, they refer from one to another, till the investigator finds himself introduced to some such tool of corruption as Thurlow Weed, or the Albany bedlamite. What is more, the most virulent editions of stories are most extensively circulated. Yet we are told that anti-masonry "sprung from the Throne of God!" that masonry threatens the destruction of religion! and that a score of men, some of whom we know scoff at religion under any name, and whether natural or revealed, are "a Spartan band, marshalled under the banner of the Almighty!"

For the Record and Magazine.

SAMUEL MILES HOPKINS. Among the names of the delegates to the late Anti-masonic State Convention, I noticed those of SOLOMON SOUTHWICK and SAMUEL MILES HOPKINS, as the representatives of this city. For the latter of these individuals I have too high a respect to suppose that he has any thing in common with his colleague, except, indeed, that desire of distinction, which seems to be one of the frailties of our nature. And yet these two have become brothers in the high and charitable business of denouncing a whole body of men, for the follies, the crimes if you choose, of a few of its members.

For Mr. Southwick I have neither praise nor censure; and his name is only introduced to give his colleague the full benefit of the association. If I were an enemy of Mr. Hopkins, I should not desire a more gratifying exhibition; but as a friend, I cannot conceal my mortification.

Mr. Hopkins, I am informed, is, and has been for a long time, a prominent member of the Presbyterian Church, and from the extent of his general knowledge I doubt not is well acquainted with its history. He can recount the stories of the outrages, the cruelties, nay the inhuman murders, committed by those of his own sect during the reigns of Charles I. and James II. of England. He can tell how misguided and enthusiastick presbyters thought it doing God's service to murder those who did not think and act like themselves. He can follow along this history and tell you of other enormities, and other excesses almost down to the period in which we live. Does Mr. Hopkins brand the whole sect for these acts of a few of its perhaps unworthy members? If he is sincere in his present professions, he certainly does not. Why then does he refuse to another class of men, that charity which he so much needs for the church of his adoption.

I have only to ask of Mr. Hopkins to review attentively the proceedings of this convention, and particularly those which originated with himself, and then to inform us whether they are the offspring of that charity which the gospel inculcates, or of a more low and selfish feeling. Those of us who are so unfortunate as to confound precept with example, principle with practice, have a deep concern in the reply.

A PROFESSOR OF MORALITY.

MR. HAZELTINE'S REPORT. We have read this report, but as all the facts contained in it have been before the public a long time, we do not think it worth while to repeat them. It is very liberal in every manner of reflection, prejudicial to masonry; but this was expected from the known character of the committee. No departure from official dignity is to be considered out of order, if beneficial to anti-masonry; and therefore Mr. Hazeltine's abuse will undoubtedly be christened, the quintessence of patriotism. It is, however, very shallow—entirely too much so to have any material weight with reflecting men. We imagined last week that it might be necessary to analyse its sophistry; but a better acquaintance with it has altered our opinion, and we leave it to those who take the trouble to read it to say, whether it is not just such stuff as should be expected from a set of men who know that truth is one thing, and what they are seeking for, another. To the report is attached an appendix of forty-five pages, made up of the proceedings of anti-masonic conventions, and similar matter. Giddins' Almanack, Southwick's 'Solemn Warning,' or Johanna Southcote's opinions, might have been added with equal propriety, and with as much prospect of 'enlightening' the legislature. But the committee have their objects in view, and we have no right to believe they will so far forget their private interests as to consult the public good.

MORGAN TRIALS. We learn from the Ontario Messenger of Wednesday, that the trials of John Whitney and James Gillis, on indictments for participating in the abduction of Morgan, have been postponed till May next. The trial of Mr. Whitney was put off in consequence of Moseley's having informed Mr. W's counsel that it would not be proceeded with until the question of law, raised in the case of Mr. Bruce should be decided by the Supreme Court. The trial of Mr. Gillis was postponed because, when it should have proceeded, the district attorney discovered that himself was not ready. Mr. Gillis is now a resident of the state of Pennsylvania, and it may be anti-masonic policy to subject him to expensive and inconvenient journeys for the benefit of the excitement. Mr. Gillis declared his readiness to be tried; and Mr. Whitney would undoubtedly have been prepared, had not the declaration of Mr. Moseley destroyed the prospect of a trial.

The Anti-masonic State Convention adjourned last Saturday night, after the adoption of an address, &c. The proceedings in relation to Mrs. Morgan we shall notice hereafter. A more exquisite display of hypocrisy we have not seen this many a day. The leading anti-masons in and about Batavia do not care a copper for Mrs. Morgan. Money subscribed for her in charity, has been taken to pay David C. Miller for printing pamphlets! This the pitiful hypocrite, who made the report respecting her, knows very well, and may the Lord forgive him for lying.

We last week neglected to notice the receipt of THE CRAFTSMAN, a spirited republican Journal just commenced in the village of Rochester, and edited by E. J. ROBERTS, esq., formerly of the National Advocate. Mr. Roberts is a republican of the old school, and speaks plainly and fearlessly of the anti-masonic excitement. There can be no doubt of his success; for the tide of correct opinion is forcibly setting against anti-masonry, in all those parts which have heretofore been called its strong holds. "Truth is powerful, and will prevail."

The little gentleman of the Niagara Courier gets into a "terrible stew" about us once in a while, and really seems to imagine that we care a fig what he may say. Now, we give him our word for it, that we do not; he is among the small matters which we collect together by dozens, when we want them to make a tolerable show. We will say a word in his favour, however,—he prints the most decent "whole hog" anti-masonic paper that we are acquainted with, not even excepting that "rainbow of magnificent horror," the particularly edifying hebdomadal of the patriot Phelps. Pray feel if your pulse is not disordered, Doctor Cadwallader, and don't be so profuse with your pop-gun stuff—you'll need all your ammunition before the end of the war.

JOHN C. SPENCER, esq. has been appointed, by the governor, special counsel in relation to the abduction of William Morgan, in the place of Mr. Moseley, appointed circuit judge.

TO CORRESPONDENTS. We thank NEMO for his communication, but the great press of matter upon masonic and anti-masonic subjects, has compelled us to omit it. It would however, undoubtedly be improper for us, who have never meddled with such subjects, to enter into a discussion of the political merits of certain new converts to anti-masonry. Nemo's opinions are correct—we know that the individuals whom he mentions are strangers to every republican feeling; but, apart from all other inconsistency, their present attempt to convert a popular excitement to their own private uses, should be considered an indication of dishonesty, sufficiently strong to exclude them from the favour of the people.

Our friend at U—V—, author of "The self-boasting Pharisee,—now called Anti-masonry,—overheard," is possessed of very correct thoughts, but unfortunately was not born a poet. The following stanza will answer as a specimen:

"Of all things wretched to be done,
My subjects to them hasten;
And nothing fear beneath the sun,
But charge them to the masons."

That the subject matter is fact, will not be doubted; but the author is a very careless writer.

We concur with the editor of the Rochester Republican in the opinion that the following article contains "good advice." It is taken from the Brockport Recorder, of which the Rev. Mr. Dodge, pastor of the Baptist society in Brockport, is one of the editors. The meeting noticed was to have been held in Rochester on Wednesday last.

"We notice in this paper, by the request of several respectable gentlemen in Rochester, a meeting to be held in that place, composed of religious masons, for the purpose of considering what may be their duty as christians relative to the Masonick Institution, under the present excitement. As we personally know some of those who have aided in calling the convention, we would say, by way of caution, 'mind what you do.' You have been conscientious Masons, for years, and have contended for it as a moral institution, and if you were sincere and honest, there is nothing to fear from the present excitement. Many who were honest in their trials on this subject at first, and still think that christians had ought to leave its ceremonies and associations, are satisfied with such an abstinence on the part of their brethren, though they consider the Institution as possessing moral principles and worth in the hands of just men. By these the excitement was not got up, nor is it maintained by them. They have retired, for they are the peacemakers who shall be blessed. But those who had political ends in view, are still loud talking and boisterous; and some of them are so far destitute of moral character, while reproaching the fraternity for the want of it, that it causes every man some reflection, which they most need, censure or pity. The excitement is unpleasant, yet—it is not in the power of christian masons to stop it. They may hold conventions, from Georgia to Maine, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific; and openly denounce it to a man, but unless they could, in these, correct the contaminated motives of designing politicians, and stop the mouths of those who have more tongue than brains, more knowledge than sense, it will be in vain.

"We have taken seven degrees of that Institution; and still there are those who have never seen the inside of a lodge room, who can tell us what we never heard nor saw, and never expect to find true.

"Those who are pressing, for the relief of their own conscience, should recollect every man has a conscience, and that it has pleased the kind Preserver of man, so to permit the order of things that each may exercise his conscience free of the prerogative of his fellow.

"We may say to every conscientious opposer, of every description, as Paul did to the Hebrews, 'we have also a conscience.'

"THE REFORMERS!"—Their defeat at the late election seems to have maddened the Antimasonicks of Otsego county. The proceedings of their late county Convention, as particularized in the Cooperstown Freeman's Journal, furnish some choice specimens of Antimasonic "moderation."

Mr. John C. Morris concluded his speech by declaring that "Masonry must and would be put down, even though, in its last struggles, a resort to the 'KNIFE' should be found necessary to accomplish the object!!!"

A young law student, named Marvin, recently "from the west," took the floor next, and proved himself a worthy disciple of his predecessor. He "soon wrought himself into such a ferment as to induce a call for a glass of water, which had the effect to cool his excitement for the moment, and he went on with a speech of more than an hour in length, characterized throughout by the most violent vituperation against Masonry, and finally closed by saying that he would revolutionize the United States, were it to be done at the point of the bayonet."

This hopeful brace of worthies were rewarded for their patriotism by being appointed delegates to the anti-masonic state convention. The fable of "Satan rebuking sin" is realized, when such tools set themselves up as the moral beacons of the age.

[Rochester Republican.]

BLESSINGS OF ANTI-MASONRY.—It appears from the Rochester papers that the taxes of the people of that county have been nearly doubled during the last year under the management of their anti-masonic supervisors. They have allowed an anti-masonic jailor one quarter more than had ever before been allowed for boarding criminals, and they have so managed by their frequent and long sessions as to mete out to themselves in the same proportion. As might be expected, this has had the effect to open the eyes of the people there in some measure, and it will be the surest means of working a reformation. People can bear to be gulled for a while in their opinions, but when once their interest is touched, the scales fall from their eyes, and they begin seriously to look at the cause of it.

[Censor.]

INDICTMENTS. The Grand Jury of Genesee county have made some "trouble among the Printers" of Batavia. The editors of the Advocate, the anti-masonic paper, were indicted for a libel on ex-sheriff Thompson—and in retaliation, probably, the editors of the People's Press were indicted for a libel on Phineas L. Tracy, the anti-masonic Member of Congress, published during the election—and a bill was found against Follett, of the "Times," for "an alledged libel upon Capt. Morgan and St. David Cade Miller" published nearly three years ago. The anti-masonic libeller in this county finds more favour at the hands of the juries.

[Rochester Republican.]

MORE ABOUT THE SEA SERPENT. Extract of a letter from Mr. Benjamin Rogers to Samuel L. Mitchell, dated Jan. 27, 1829:—"I have this day conversed with Capt. Dixon, of Cape Ann, who is now in New-York. He is the man whose name was attached to the famous story of the sea serpent in the year 1821. He stated to me personally that the whole story was a hoax. It was merely this, Capt. Dixon master of the sloop Nancy, of Salem, from Sedgewick, Me. in 1821, was bound into Salem harbour. On passing the eastern point of Cape Ann, he was called from the cabin by an old pilot then on board and at the helm, whose name was Fowes. Now, said the old son of Neptune, we will give the Salemites a fish story. See here Capt. Dixon, immediately on the starboard side is a range of small rocks near each other, about seventy feet in length from east to west, covered with sea weed and barnacles, which will answer for the bunches and scales of a sea serpent's back and on your compass is a picture representing a serpent with its jaws extended, and shewing its forked tongue. His head is now in sight, and above the vessel's quarter in height.

Take it altogether, said the veteran mariner, this is just the touch for the famous believers in witchcraft. On the arrival of the sloop, the pilot told the story in glowing certainty. The captain being called upon to verify, says, that in a joke he assented: little thinking his name, with vouchers, was to be transported to all parts of the country wherever the mail and newspapers travel."

MASONICK CALENDAR.

[Regular meetings in the city of Albany, at the Masonick Hall.]
Temple Encampment, 2d Friday in each month.
Temple Chapter, 2d and 4th Tuesday in each month.
Temple Lodge, 1st and 2d Tuesday in each month.
Mount Vernon Lodge, 1st and 3d Thursday in each month.
Masters Lodge, 1st and 3d Wednesday in each month.

ODD FELLOWS' CALENDAR.

[Regular meetings in the city of Albany.]
Hope Lodge, Monday evening in each week, at Montgomery Hall.
Philanthropic Lodge, Wednesday evening in each week, corner of Lodge and State-streets, over Osborn and Gray's.
Clinton Lodge, Friday evening in each week, Masonick Hall.

DIED,

In this city this morning, MARY, youngest daughter of Heber Stone, aged 3 years. The friends and acquaintances are respectfully invited to attend the funeral on Sunday, at 12 o'clock.

POETRY.

TO A LADY ON THE DEATH OF HER SON.

BY BERNARD BARTON.

The unfortunate subject of these verses had lived, or existed, from childhood to manhood, in a state of most pitiable mental and bodily infirmity. To some the death of such a sufferer may seem to claim little sympathy. But the heart of a mother is naturally bound up in that of her child, especially an only one; and no common void must be caused by the removal of such an object of years of anxious solicitude.

The world, the heartless world may deem
But lightly of a loss like thine,
And think it a romantick dream
For such an one in grief to pine:
A gentler creed, my friend, is mine,
Knowing what human hearts can bear,
And how a Mother's must enshrine
The object of its love and care.

For was he not, though on him fell
A cloud that wrapt his soul in night,
The tenderest tie, the strongest spell,
That could thy heart to earth unite?
His was a child's endearing right,
By helplessness but made more dear;
Nor can he vanish from thy sight,
Unwept by Nature's mournful tear.

But when the bitterness of grief
Hath been allowed its sacred claim,
What soothing thoughts must yield relief,
And fan a purer, holier flame!
Whatever plans the heart might frame,
Had he survived thee for his sake,
Could others have fulfilled each aim,
Or effort, love like thine would make?

A Mother's heart, and hand, and eye,
Alone could do as thine have done,
And unremittingly supply
The wants and claims of such a Son:
But now thy love its meed hath won,
Thy fond solicitude may cease;
His race of life is safely run,
His spirit fled where all is peace!

And who may tell how bright the ray
Of light and life from Heaven may fall
On minds which, in their mortal clay,
Seemed bound in dark Affliction's thrall?
Think not that He who governs all,
Whose power and love no bounds can know,
Would one into existence call
To suffer helpless, hopeless woe.

With humble hope to Him entrust
Thy mourned one; in strong faith that He
Can call forth from his slumbering dust
A Spirit from all frailties free;
And yet permit thy soul to see
One who on earth seemed vainly given,
A form of light to welcome thee
Hereafter to the joys of Heaven.

From the Yankee and Boston Literary Gazette.

THE ICE-SHIP.

I stood upon our tall ship's deck,
And looked upon the sea,
I saw a vessel moving on,
And solemnly came she.
Slowly and softly crept she on,
Like a thing whose life is gone.

Her sides were black, her masts were bent—
And when she came us near,
Her deck was ice, no sails she had;
Alas! it made me fear—
But still I looked as she came along,
Like a spectre-ship the ice among.

Nearer and nearer she cometh up,
Nearer and nearer yet—
And on her deck in its dreariness,
No living beings sit.
But she is still as the house of death—
So still, the ear at wearieth.

No sound, no sound—alas for her!
The tomb is not so still—
Alas for her—and for the crew,
That once the ship did fill,
That crowded snow, that place of dread,
The ice-girt home of many dead.

In truth it was a fearful sight,
As up it came to me;
For years and years that ship had sailed
Upon that silent sea;
Securely going her dangerous way—
As in the South on a summer day.

Her frozen crew, alas that they
Their friends should never see!
But that for ever, night and day,
They in the ice should be;
And sleep upon the sullen wave,
At length to be their quiet grave,
That time is past, but not to me,
Even now—there comes that sight;
My soul is on that frozen sea,
In visions of the night;
God shield us from that spectre sail
That mindeth neither shout nor hail,
Nor leave us in the frozen sea,
With the spectre-ship for company.

ALBERT.

From the Ladies' Magazine.

THE SPIRIT OF THE NORTH.

Spirit of the frozen North,
Where the wave is chained and still,
And the savage bear looks forth
Nightly from his caverned hill!
Down from thy eternal throne,
From thy land of cloud and storm,
Where the meeting icebergs groan,
Sweepeth on thy wrathful form.

Spirit of the frozen wing!
Dweller of a voiceless clime,
Where no coming on of spring
Gilds the weary course of time!
Monarch of a realm untrod,
By the restless feet of men,
Where alone the hand of God,
'Mid his mighty works hath been!

Throned amid the ancient hills,
Piled with undecaying snow,
Flashing with the path of rills,
Frozen in their first glad flow,—
Thou hast seen the gloomy north,
Gleaming with unearthly light,
Spreading its pale banners forth,
Chequered with the stars of night.

Thou hast gazed untrembling, where
Giant forms of flame were driven,
Like the spirits of the air,
Striding up the vault of heaven!
Thou hast seen that midnight glow,
Hiding moon and star and sky,
And the icy hills below,
Reddening to the fearful dye.

Dark and desolate and lone,
Curtained with the tempest-cloud,
Drawn around thy ancient throne
Like oblivion's moveless shroud—
Dim and distantly the sun,
Glances on thy palace walls,
But a shadow cold and dun
Broods along its pillared halls.

Lord of sunless depths and cold!
Chainer of the northern sea—
At whose feet the storm is rolled,
Who hath power to humble thee?
Spirit of the stormy north!
Bow thee to thy Makers nod—
Bend to Him who sent thee forth—
Servant of the living God.

W.

From the New-England Galaxy.

THE OLD GENTLEMAN.

It has often been said that the old one
Is a cloven-foot, sable-tailed knave;
With an odour of sulphur about him,
And a mien rather cunning than grave.
His eyes have been likened to Etnas,
And his ears have been called rather long,
Sitting up on each side of his head,
Like the two outer teeth of a prong.

I happen to know that all this
Is a most malicious untruth;
For I had a sly glimpse of him years ago
One frolicking night in my youth.
I don't think it proper to tell the when,
Nor even to mention the why,
But the old spot is to this day shown,
In the beautiful town hard by.

The old was one as crystal clear,
The air was balmy and still;
Most delicate silver the tree tops tinged,
With soft tones murmured the rill.
The sky was pure as an infant's dream,
And the earth, in its summer green,

Was as bright as a lover's thought of bliss,—
So brilliant the moonlight sheen.

The character I have alluded to
Was a very fine looking man;
I had time to survey him minutely,
As much so as any one can.
And I must declare his appearance
Struck me as vastly genteel;
He was dressed very much like a modern buck
From the top of his head to his heel.
And first, he had doffed a very 'cute hat,'
London make—must have cost a mint—
And his whiskers were trimmed so neat,—I wish
Our barbers could once get the hint—
And his coat collar come to a point behind,
And his flaps grew long below,
And big brass buttons, full many I ween,
On his waistcoat made goodly show.

His boots were square-toed, very square indeed,
And his pantaloons small at the knees;
A sulphur-striped neck-cloth adorned his neck,
As stiffened with starch as you please.
The devil, he wears no shirt, it seems,
But his dickeys were made so fine—
I wish I could purchase a pair of them,
For they set even better than mine.

And this is the truth,—it is indeed,
He dresses as well as one can;
And when ready for company, looks very much
Like a perfect gentleman.
And poets and preachers may say what they will,
I am sure that they don't speak true,
If they paint him a different devil at all
From the one I have painted to you.

WEDDING DAY ANNIVERSARY.

"And though by many a jolt apprised,
Life's ways are not McAdamised,
Or smooth as wealth could make them;
O'er ups and downs, unjaded still,
We never felt the wish or will
To shorten or forsake them.

Nor can we, Mary, justly say,
Though neither quite so young or gay,
As when, cold Prudence spurning,
We scampered forth for Pleasure's sake,
And Fortune thought to overtake,
Or meet at every turning.

Nor can we say we're much the worse
For such a long and anxious course,
With Care still at our heels;
And such a household troop around,
As Hymén has too often found
A drag upon his wheels.

'Tis true we rarely dance or sing,
Or bound with that elastic spring,
The steps of youth discover;
But, had quadrilles not cut us out,
Our dancing days, I make no doubt,
We'd prove were not yet over.

In times, which memory still enhances,
Our good Scotch reels and country dance
On limb alert and supple,
We tripped it gayly through the night,
Nor thought it any great exploit,
To dance down thirty couple.

But now, amidst a stately throng,
The grave quadriller glides along,
With far more airs than graces,
Or unabashed, while matrons stare,
In giddy waltz, the breathless fair
Her whirling beau embraces.

BOOK BINDING. Sign of the Golden Ledger, corner of State and North Market-streets, Albany. WILLIAM SEYMOUR, carries on the above business in all its branches; viz: plain, extra, and super; extra—has a first rate ruling machine, and other necessary implements for manufacturing Blank Books of every description, on the most reasonable terms, of the best workmanship.
An assortment on hand. Subscribers to the American Masonick Record can have their volumes handsomely bound in boards, with leather backs and corners, at 22 1/2 cents a volume. Feb. 14. 3m3.

THIS PAPER

Is published every Saturday, by E. B. CHILD.

AT THE CORNER OF NORTH MARKET AND STEUBEN STREETS, ALBANY, N. Y.

TERMS.—To city subscribers, Three Dollars a year. To subscribers who receive their papers by mail, Two Dollars and Fifty Cents, IN ADVANCE—otherwise, Three Dollars. JOB PRINTING neatly executed at this office.

AMERICAN MASONICK RECORD,

AND ALBANY SATURDAY MAGAZINE.

VOL. III.

ALBANY, N. Y. SATURDAY, MARCH 7, 1829.

NO. 6.

MASONICK RECORD.

AN ADDRESS,

Delivered before the Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the state of New-York, at its annual communication in Albany, February 4, 1829.

By REV. COM. JOSEPH PRENTISS, A. M.

Rector of St. Luke's Church, Catskill, and Trinity Church, Athens.

The first sentiment, that must naturally arise in our minds on this occasion, is, devout gratitude and pious acknowledgement, for that preservation of life and health, which enables so many of us again, to salute each other, in this place.

Once more assembled, as we are, to confer and deliberate upon the various matters which concern the prosperity and honour of the highest order of ancient Masonry in this section of our country, and to soothe and bless, by its charities, some of its most needy and suffering members, it will not, I trust, be deemed improper, to notice to the Companions, that afflicting dispensation of Divine Providence by which we are deprived of the presence and counsel of one of the most distinguished of Masons and of men.

It was uncharitably whispered that our illustrious Companion, the late Gov. CLINTON, by political considerations, and not by bodily infirmity, was prevented from honouring us with his attendance at our last annual communication, as had been his former and usual custom. But the fatal event which, so shortly after, electrified us all with astonishment and grief, and converted our cheerful citizens into a family of mourners, showed, what many of us well knew before, that sickness with him was no pretence on that occasion; and that, so far from his absence being voluntary, his inability to attend occasioned him deep and sincere regret.

On most subjects he was of too independent a spirit, to be improperly influenced by popular opinion, and least of all could he have been driven to renounce his Masonick profession, or to desert his Masonick Companions and duties through fear of popular clamour. More than any other class of citizens, therefore, shall we feel, and more cause than they, have we to deplore his loss.

I am not about to invite you to sing his praises or listen to his eulogy. The former may furnish a theme and inspiration to the poet or the orator, and the latter may be read by your descendants in the future and faithful page of history. His fame was not ephemeral, nor his greatness factitious. His character was original. He rose, through the mighty energies of mind, of talent and intellectual acquirement, to those distinguished stations of publick trust and confidence, in the state, and in our brotherhood, from which, while at the zenith of his usefulness and fame, death summoned him suddenly away.

Excursive, clear and discriminating in his views, and possessing the rare and happy talent of presenting them, with almost irresistible force to others, some of the most humane and charitable, and many of the literary and scientific institutions, of which our state is justly proud, have taken their origin from his suggestion, and are largely indebted for their endowment and efficiency to his eloquent and forcible appeals.

I shall not trespass upon your indulgence by noticing the acts of his publick life. Indeed, I know nothing in this respect, but what is equally known to you all, who have taken notice of passing events, and have observed and marked the movements and measures of the common weal, for the last twenty years.

In this state, he was certainly the champion, and before our Union, he set the inspiring example, of internal improvement—"and that the greatest and most useful enterprize of the age in which we live, received, if not its conception, at least its first impulse, from his comprehensive mind and enlightened counsel, and moved on to its splendid accomplishment, under his watchful and untiring zeal, may, of itself, satisfy the ambition of any individual, however lofty his views, and it will perpetuate and crown his name with imperishable glory."

Let it not be forgotten, that in the highly and responsible station of Chief Magistrate, whose duty it is to bear impartially the sword of justice, to execute the laws and vindicate the violated honours of the state, he saw nothing incompatible with wearing the honours, discharging the duties, and fostering the institutions of Masonry. The most honourable testimony hath been given, that he ably and fearlessly discharged the duties involved in each of these relations, and his powers of pacification, when internal dissensions arose in the fraternity, were as useful and salutary, as his intelligence, firmness and zeal were, and would have continued to be, efficient, in protecting it against the assaults of persecuting fanaticism or misguided legislation. Charity commands us to trust, that he hath been called from the spheres of these arduous labours, to scenes of the most splendid and satisfying refreshment; and duty requires that we venerate his memory as a man,—that we vindicate his name and imitate his virtues as a Brother.

The obloquy thrown upon masonry, and the prejudice arrayed against the whole order in consequence of the unauthorised acts of some individuals belonging to it; the furious excitement which has followed, and the feelings of exterminating hostility which continue to manifest themselves, and the fearful array of publick sentiment by which we are threatened, are subjects which cannot fail to produce in the mind of every patriotic and intelligent Companion, sober reflection, deep regret, and lively apprehension.

I confess myself ignorant of particulars, in the case of Morgan. I have not been able to obtain sufficient information for forming an opinion satisfactory to myself, much less one that I would venture to express to others, as it respects his fate and destiny. I have heard opinions, diametrically contradictory to each other, advanced with the same confidence and maintained with the same obstinate pertinacity, and by men, so far as I could judge, of equal intelligence and capacity—both within and without the circles of Masonry.

Perhaps one of the most important requisites for the successful investigation of any matter of this kind, and to enable the inquirer to arrive at truth, is, in the words of the eloquent Saurin, "to suspend our judgement, until such facts and proofs shall be produced as will enable us to form a correct one."

Judgement or opinion formed, in disregard of such precaution, must always be liable to error and subject to sudden change.

Thus in the case of the apostle Paul, after his memorable shipwreck on the famous island of Malta. "When the barbarians saw a viper come out of the fire and fasten on his hand, they immediately pronounced, no doubt this man is a murderer, whom, though he hath escaped the sea, yet vengeance suffereth not to live. But when they had looked a great while that he should have swollen, or fallen down dead suddenly, and saw him shake off the venomous beast into the fire, and feel no harm, they instantly changed their minds and thought he was a God." In both these opinions, as you know, they were equally wide of truth.

The hasty and groundless manner in which opinions are formed and prejudices entertained, exhibits mortifying evidence of human frailty, and sometimes of human depravity, to the deep and lasting injury both of individuals and societies.

As a foundation for argument, however, and for the purpose of canvassing, a little, the principle upon which the crusaders against masonry have proposed to act, let us take it for granted that Morgan is dead. And that he is dead, and that he died by the hand of violence, we shall readily believe on the exhibition of the proper evidence; and without that evidence no man of a sound mind can believe either. And we shall heartily concur in the sentence of death upon any person, mason or no mason, who shall be pronounced guilty by an impartial jury, and under the equal laws of our country. But what have the chief movers in this matter, and who, professedly, are so extremely anxious and impatient to wipe away this stain and avenge this outrage, proposed? Not merely that the dust should be brushed away from the scales of justice—that its fulcrum should be oiled—that so, with equal beam she might weigh, compare, and try all things presented, and ascertain the truth. No.—They would create a new tribunal, and institute a new process for this particular case, and for the trial of masons. As hath been well expressed by some of the most able and eloquent of our jurists, who are neither masons nor the friends of masonry, "they would establish a kind of travelling court of inquisition;" the favourite child and the foulest offspring of tyranny and superstition. Let the publick mind become reconciled to this doctrine, let this principle be admitted as sound and correct, let it be introduced into our halls of legislation, and govern their enactments, and then farewell to all safety and security to liberty or life. This point gained, if the present feverish excitement can be kept up and sufficiently extended, the next measure proposed will be that of a portable gullotine to accompany the new inquisition as its travelling companion from county to county, for the purpose of making a head shorter, every Mason who will neither renounce the order nor swear every person guilty of the blood of Morgan, whom suspicion might accuse.

The truth I apprehend, is, that the tragedy of Morgan has not been altogether the cause of the extent of the present excitement, but is rather used as the occasion for giving scope and action to feelings of jealousy and intolerance, which had been previously cherished by men of weak or bigotted minds. Wheels of another kind, however, have been moved, by the outlet and united current of those bitter waters, and other springs were simultaneously touched, by the corrupting fingers of political ambition.

The extermination of Masonry was the watchword and professed object of the blind fanaticism, ignorance or malignity of the many, and personal elevation to political consequence and emolument, was the real object of the few, who assumed the charitable office of marshalling the enemy, and leading them on to the attack. Heaven and the remaining good sense of the people be praised, for the failure of the latter, and God forbid that the former should be crowned with better success.

Like that Jewish confederacy, whose members bound themselves under a curse that they would neither eat nor drink until they had killed Paul, so this league of fanaticism and ambition seem to have sworn together, not merely that justice shall be done in the case of Morgan, but that the lamp of Masonry shall be forever extinguished.

For this purpose, conventions are called, societies, some of them general and publick, and others local and secret, are formed, inflammatory speeches made, and the most scandalous misrepresentations are journalized and spread. If Masonry shall ever adopt, and act upon, principles so intolerant, and pursue a course so dishonourable and morally degrading, then let its enemies invoke the vengeance of man and the malediction of heaven upon its head.

The slanders against Masonry, that it seeks to interfere with, or in any way to influence or control political suffrage, civil administration or religious opinion, are as false and foul, as their authors are ignorant or malicious.

Are not the various orders of Masonry in this country, composed of men of every political school, of every peculiarity of religious creed, and of every civil profession and employment? And what Mason has ever dared to lip the proposition within our walls, to unite in putting down, or building up any one of them to the prejudice of the other?

(Conclusion in our next.)

ELECTION OF OFFICERS.

STATE OF NEW-YORK.

Officers of Union Temple Royal Arch Chapter, No. 94, in the city of New-York, elected December 21, 5828:—

S. Butler, jun., High Priest; Aaron B. Norns, King; William Van Norden, Scribe; Charles Colgert, Captain of the Host; Andrew Williams, Principal Sojourner; S. C. Cleveland, Royal Arch Captain; I. M. Leon, Secretary; O. Hull, Treasurer; James Mabbett, F. A. Davis and A. Mitchell, Masters of Vails; R. Young, Tyler.

Officers of Rome Royal Arch Chapter, No. 102, in the village of Rome, Oneida county, elected December 24, 5828:—

Silas Cornish, High Priest; Aylmer Keith, King; Abraham L. Wood, Scribe; Joseph D. Gage, Captain of the Host; Thomas S. Edgerton, Principal Sojourner; Alexander H. Brainard, Royal Arch Captain; Lyman Briggs, Jeremiah Brainard, and Orman Butler, Masters of Vails; Numa Leonard, Treasurer; Joseph B. Read, Secretary; Charles Brown and Jacob Tibbetts, Stewards.

Officers of Roman Lodge, in the village of Rome, Oneida county, elected December 16, 5828:—

Aylmer Keith, Master; Joseph D. Gage, Senior Warden; Thomas S. Edgerton, Junior Warden; Samuel B. Stephens, Treasurer; E. R. Thompson, Secretary; James Holbert, Senior Deacon; Abraham Hartwell, Junior Deacon; Lyman Briggs and Daniel Dickinson, Stewards; Calvin West, Tyler.

Officers of Western Luminary Royal Arch Chapter, No. 89, in the village of Warsaw, Genesee county, elected, December 4, 5828:—

Peleg Ewell, High Priest; Rufus Harvey, King; Asahel Perry, Scribe; Nathan B. Lee, Captain of the Host; Ira Curtiss, Principal Sojourner; Daniel W. Phillips, Royal Arch Captain; Samuel W. Curtiss, Benjamin Bancroft, and Jonas Cutting, Masters of Vails; Calvin Rumsey, Treasurer; Almon Stevens, Secretary; Rev. John F. Bliss, Chaplain; Daniel Knapp and Zera Tanner, Stewards; Ephriam Beebe, Tyler.

Officers of Warsaw Lodge, No. 244, in the village of Warsaw, Genesee county, elected December 16, 5828:—

Jonas Cutting, Master; Rufus Harvey, Senior Warden; Almon Stevens, Junior Warden; Calvin Rumsey, Treasurer; David Day, Secretary; David Seymour, Senior Deacon; Daniel Knapp, Junior Deacon; E. Beebe and J. Sharp, Stewards; Zera Tanner, Tyler.

Officers of Oneida Castle Lodge, in the village of Oneida, Oneida county, elected December 25, 5828:—

Rev. Solomon Davis, Master; John Smith, Senior Warden; Warren M'Clure, Junior Warden; James Hooker, Secretary; Charles G. Egleston, Treasurer; Ira Brown, Senior Deacon; Howard Vinton, Junior Deacon; John Morrison and Stephen Parkhurst, Stewards; David A. Parkill, Tyler.

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

From the London Quarterly Journal of Agriculture.

POISONING OF VEGETABLES.

Several very curious experiments on the poisoning of vegetables, have recently been made by M. Marcet, of Geneva. His experiments on arsenick, which is well known to every one as a deadly poison to animals, were thus conducted. A vessel containing two or three bean plants, each of five or six leaves, was watered with two ounces of water, containing twelve grains of oxide of arsenic in solution. At the end of from twenty-four to thirty-six hours, the plants had faded, the leaves drooped, and had even begun to turn yellow; the roots remained fresh, and appeared to be living. Attempts to restore the plants after twelve or eighteen hours by abundant watering, failed to recover them. The leaves and stem of the dead plant gave, upon chemical examination, traces of arsenick. A branch of a rose-tree, including a flower, was gathered just as the rose began to blow; the stem was put into a vessel, containing a solution of six grains of oxide of arsenic in an ounce of water. The flower and leaves soon showed symptoms of disease, and on the fifth day the whole branch was withered dead, though only one-fifth of a grain of arsenick had been absorbed. Similar stems, placed in pure water, had, after five days, the roses fully expanded, and the leaves fresh and green.

On June 1st, a slit of one inch and a half in length was made in the stem of a lilack tree, the branch being about an inch in diameter. The slit extended to the pith. Fifteen or twenty grains of moistened arsenick were introduced, the cut was closed, and the stem restrained in its original position by osier ties. On the 8th, the leaves began to roll up at the extremity; on the 28th, the branches were dry, and, in the second week of July, the whole of the stem was dry, and the tree itself dead. In about fifteen days after the first, a tree, which joined the former a little above the earth, shared the same fate, in consequence of its connexion with that into which the poison had been introduced. Other trees similarly cut, but without having been poisoned, suffered no kind of injury.

M. Marcet's experiments upon vegetable poisons are no less interesting, and still more wonderful, as indicating a degree of irritability in plants somewhat similar to that which depends on the nervous system of animals. After having ascertained that the bean plants could exist in a healthy state for five or six days, if immersed in the same quantity of spring water, he tried them with five or six grains of opium dissolved in an ounce of water, the consequence of which was, that in the evening the leaves had dropped, and, by the middle of the next day they were dead beyond recovery. Other vegetable poisons of the narcotick class produced a similar effect. Hemlock was equally fatal, and six grains of dry powdered foxglove, in an ounce of water, began to operate, by wrinkling some of the leaves of the bean in a few moments, which it completely killed in twenty-four hours. Oxalick acid or salt of sorrel, though found in common and wood sorrel, and a great many plants, proved a very fatal poison to others. The absorption of one-tenth of a grain, killed a rose branch and flower in forty-eight hours.

TURPENTINE.

Common turpentine is the produce of the Scotch pine. Trees with the thickest bark, and which are most exposed to the sun, generally yield the most turpentine. The first incision is made near the foot of the tree, and as the resin flows most abundantly in hot weather, the operations are begun about the end of May, and continue to September. The juice is received into holes dug in the ground, is afterwards taken out with iron ladles, poured into pails, and removed to a hollow trunk, capacious enough to hold three or four barrels. Essential oil of turpentine is obtained by distillation. Common resin is the residuum of the process for obtaining the essential oil. Tar is obtained from the roots and other parts of old trees.

[Med. Botany.]

GUM ARABICK.

The purest and finest gum arabick is brought in caravans to Cairo, by the Arabs of the country round Mounts Tor and Sinai, who bring it from this distance on the backs of camels, sown up in bags, and often adulterated with sand, &c. The gum exudes spontaneously from the bark and trunk of the branches of the tree, in a soft, nearly fluid state, and hardens by exposure to the air, or heat of the sun. It begins to flow in December, immediately after the rainy season, near the flowering time of the tree. Afterwards, as the weather becomes hotter, incisions are made through the bark, to assist the transudation of the juice. [Ibid.]

CURE FOR SICK HEAD ACHE.

A few days ago a person was labouring under a very severe headache, when a friend called, whose attention has for many years past been confined altogether to the study of chemistry, in connexion with a profitable business in which he is engaged. The gentleman, observing the indisposed person, inquired the cause; and on ascertaining it, immediately offered to cure him by a very easy and pleasant process in less than an hour. The offer was accepted; half an ounce of citric acid was sent for, which cost only a few pence; three or four small lumps each of the size of a pea, was dissolved in cold water and drank. The beverage is an agreeable one, very like the taste of lemonade, being, I believe, used in making this pleasant cooling liquor. In less than half an hour the patient was able, without any inconvenience, to attend to his business again as usual, and in another half hour he was well as ever.

BLISTERED FEET.

The following mode of cure was communicated to Captain Cochrane, and which he says he never found to fail:—"It is simply to rub the feet at going to bed, with spirits mixed with tallow dropped from a lighted candle into the palm of the hand. On the following morning no blisters exist: the spirit seemed to possess the healing power, the tallow serving only to keep the skin soft and pliant. The soles of the feet, ankles, and insteps, should be rubbed well; and even where no blisters exist, the application may be usefully made as a preventive. Salt and water is a good substitute—and while on this head, I would recommend foot travellers never to wear right and left shoes, it is bad economy, and indeed serves to cramp the feet: and such I felt to be the case."

RECIPE FOR WET FEET.

Half a pint of boiled Linseed Oil, 1-2 pound of Mutton Suet, 8 ounces of clean Bees' Wax, 8 ounces of common Rosin. Dissolve these ingredients well together, over a gentle fire, stir the mixture up well while melting, and put it on with a brush, hot, without burning the leather. Let it dry, and repeat the application twice more in the same way. [Nat. Intelligence.]

CHARACTER.

From the London Quarterly Review.

PALEY.

Paley would employ himself in his Natural Theology, and then gather his peas for dinner, very likely gathering some hint for his work at the same time. He would converse with his classical neighbour, Mr. Yates, or he would reply to his invitation that he could not come, for that he was busy knitting. He would station himself at his garden wall, which overhung the river, and watch the progress of a cast-iron bridge in building, asking questions of the architect, and carefully examining every pin and screw with which it was put together. He would loiter along a river, with his angle-rod, musing upon what he supposed to pass in the mind of a pike when he bit, and when he refused to bite; or he would stand by the sea-side, and speculate upon what a young shrimp could mean by jumping in the sun.

With the handle of his stick in his mouth, he would move about his garden in a short hurried step, now stopping to contemplate a butterfly, a flower, or a snail, and now earnestly engaged in some new arrangement of his flower-pots.

He would take from his own table to his study the back-bone of a hare, or a fisher's head; and he would pull out of his pocket, after a walk, a plant or stone to be made tributary to an argument. His manuscripts were as motley as his occupations; the workshop of a mind ever on the alert; evidences mixed up with memorandums for his will; an interesting discussion brought to an untimely end by the hiring of servants, the letting of fields, sending his boys to school, reproving the refractory members of an hospital; here a dedication, there one of his children's exercises—in another place a recipe for cheap soup. He would amuse his fire side by family anecdotes:—how one of his ancestors (and he was praised as a patron of perseverance) separated two pounds of white and black pepper which had been accidentally mixed—patiens pulveris, he might truly have added; and how, when the Paley arms were wanted, recourse was had to a family tankard which was supposed to bear them, but which he always took a malicious pleasure in insisting had been bought at a sale—

Hæc est
Vita solutorum misera ambitione gravique;

the life of a man far more happily employed than in the composition of political pamphlets, or in the nurture of political discontent. Nay, when his friend Mr. Carlyle is about going out with Lord Elgin to Constantinople, the very head-quarters of despotism, we do not perceive, amongst the multitude of most characteristic hints and queries which Paley addresses to him, a single fling at the Turk, or a single hope expressed that the day was not very far distant when the Cossacks would be permitted to erect the standard of liberty in his capital.

I will do your visitation for you [Mr. Carlyle was chancellor of the diocese,] in case of your absence, with the greatest pleasure—it is neither a difficulty nor a favour.

Observanda—I. Compare every thing with English and Cumberland scenery: e. g., rivers with Eden, groves with Corby, mountains with Skiddaw; your sensations of buildings, streets, persons, &c. &c.; e. g., whether the Mufti be like Dr.—, the Grand Seigneur, Mr.—.

2. Give us one day at Constantinople minutely from morning to night—what you do, see, eat, and hear.

3. Let us know what the common people have to dinner; get, if you can, a peasant's actual dinner and bottle; for instance, if you see a man working in the fields, call to him to bring the dinner he has with him, and describe it minutely.

4. The diversions of the common people; whether they seem to enjoy their amusements, and be happy, and sport, and laugh; farm-houses, or any thing answering to them, and of what kind; same of public-houses, roads.

5. Their shops; how you get your breeches mended, or things done for you, and how (i. e. well or ill done;) whether you see the tailor, converse with him, &c.

6. Get into the inside of a cottage; describe furniture, utensils, what you find actually doing.

All the stipulations I make with you for doing your visitation is, that you come over to Wearmouth soon after your return, for you will be very entertaining between truth and lying. I have a notion you will find books, but in great confusion as to catalogues, classing, &c.

7. Describe minutely how you pass one day on ship-board; learn to take and apply lunar, or other observations, and how the midshipmen, &c. do it.

8. What sort of fish you get, and how dressed. I should think your business would be to make yourself master of the middle Greek. My compliments to Bonaparte, if you meet with him, which I think is very likely. Pick up little articles of dress, tools, furniture, especially from low life—as an actual smock, &c.

9. What they talk about; company.

10. Describe your impression upon first seeing things; upon catching the first view of Constantinople; the novelties of the first day you pass there. In all countries and climates, nations and languages, carry with you the best wishes of, dear Carlyle,

Your affectionate friend,
W. PALEY.

THE GATHERER.

JOHN RANDOLPH.

The following anecdote of Mr. Randolph is given in the New-York Morning Courier, on the authority of a correspondent at Washington:—

While he was at a boarding school in Virginia, he as well as the other scholars had frequent occasion to complain of the quality of the butter, with which they were supplied, and, as is customary in such establishments, the complaints received but little attention. Finding all remonstrance unavailing, a combination was formed, not to use the butter, but to besmear the walls of the study and corridor with it. Amongst the conspirators Randolph was pre-eminent, and succeeded in destroying more of the butter, than any of his fellow students. The dominie soon observed the indications of their distaste of the butter, and hoping, from his youth to discover the sinner, he called up to his desk Master John, when the following dialogue ensued:

Master. I know John you will inform me, who threw the butter on the wall, tell me!

J. R. I see no reason why I should be singled out.

Master. Of whom then shall I enquire?

J. R. Why, I think you should ask the butter—I know it is old enough to answer for itself and you see it has got a pretty long beard.

ANECDOTE OF A BANKER.

At the present moment, when so much is said about bankers and banking business, the following anecdote of a deceased member of the craft may not be unacceptable.

"The late Sir M—B— always used to say, 'D—n banking!'—I hate banking. When I was a banker I never slept soundly, and there never was a day I was not afraid of stopping payment."

"Some years after he failed he used to tell humorous stories of the numerous escapes his bank had had from time to time; take the following as a specimen:—'One afternoon,' said he just as we were shutting up for the day, at 5 o'clock, our head cashier came running to me and said, 'Lord, Sir, here's a man just come in with a cheque for 540l. and I do not know what to do, we have only 500l. and a little silver and copper in the till.' Oh! said I, 'never mind do you close the doors, and then run out and borrow 40, and I'll keep the chap in jaw; and so we saved the bank that time. Next morning, luckily, a customer paid in, as soon as we opened shop, two thousand pounds: which made all right. The fatal day, however, was to come, and come it did with a vengeance; we were run upon most unexpectedly, and, long before I had breakfasted, the house was shut up, and a large mob was round the doors. For a long time I could not account for it—at last it came across me like a flash of lightning. We had, only a week or two before we stopped, taken in a new clerk to replace one that had died, and the cashier, when he went to dinner, by mistake left him at the counter. The chap was a Yorkshireman, and at once saw how things were, and, not having been used to our ways, he told some friend, that friend told a third, and so we were run out. This, however, I will say for all other clerks—we paid them well, dined them well once a week, they knew our secret, and kept it for full ten long years. My first toast after dinner always was—'D—n Banking! Curse Banking! B—t Banking!' and next was, to the clerks, 'Come, boys, hear, see, and say nothing!'"

WOMANKIND.

The womankind never looks sœ bonnie as in wunter, accepp indeed it may be in spring. You auld bachelors ken naething o' womankind—and hoo should ye, when they treat you wi' but ae feelin', that o' derision? Oh, sirs! but the dear creters do look weel in muffs—whether they haud them, wi' their invisible hauns clasped thegither in their beauty within the cozy silk linin', close prest to their innocent waists, just aneath the glad beatins o' their first love-touched hearts. Or haud them hingin' frae their extended richt arms, leavin' a' the feegur visible, that seems taller and slimmer as the removed muff reveals the clasps o' the pelisse a' the way doon frae neck till feet! Then is there, in a' beautifu' and silent unfauldin's o' natur amang plants and flowers, ony thing sœ beautifu' as the white, smooth, soft chafes o' a bit smilin' maiden o' sixteen, righteen, or twunt, blossomin' out, like some bonnie bud o' snaw-white satin frae a coverin' o' rough leaves,—blossomin' out, sirs, frae the edge o' the fur-tippet, that haply a lover's happy haun had delicately hung ower her gracefu' shooters—oh, the dear, delightfu' little Laplander!—Noctes.

[Blackwood's Magazine.]

KNOWING PEOPLE.

How happily do these few lines characterize a certain set of people who pick up news from "good authority," and settle the fate of the nation over strong potations of brandy and water, or Calvert's porter, forgetting that "people who drink beer, think beer." Suppose a question of great public interest afloat:—

"Reports are abroad, precisely of the proper pitch of absurdity, for the greedy swallowing of the great grey-goggle-eyed publick, who may be seen standing with her mouth wide open like a crocodile, with her hands in her breeches-pockets, at the crosses of cities on market-days, gluttonously devouring whatever rumour flings into her maw—nor in the least aware that she is all the time eating wind. People of smallish abilities begin to look wiser and wiser every day—their nods seem more significant—in the shaking of their heads there is more of Burleigh—and in short sentences—that sound like apophthegms—they are apt to impose themselves on their credulous selves as so many Solomons."

GROUND OF RECOGNITION.

A man went to a restaurateur's (or chop-house) in France, to dine. He perceived another man in the room and hurried away to tell the master. "If you do not, Sir, order that man, who is dining alone at the table in the corner, out of your house, a respectable individual will not be able to sit down in it."—"How is that, Sir?"—"Because that is the executioner of R—." The host, after some hesitation, at length went and spoke to the stranger, who calmly answered him: "By whom have I been recognized?"—"By that gentleman," said the landlord, pointing out the former. "Indeed, he ought to know me, for it is not two years since I whipped and branded him."

PEREMPTORY CONCLUSION.

An advocate, whose pleading appeared too diffuse for the cause he was defending, had received an order from the first president to abridge it; but the former, without omitting a word of his intended address, replied in a firm tone, that all he uttered was essential. The president, hoping at length to make him silent, said to him, "The court orders you to conclude."—"Well," replied the advocate, "then I conclude that the court shall hear me."

SPINSTERS.

Formerly it was a maxim that a young woman should never be married till she had spun herself a set of body, table, and bed linen. From this custom all unmarried women were termed spinsters, an appellation they still retain in England, in all deeds and law proceedings.

CONVENIENT ABSENCE.

An individual often visited a landscape painter, who had a very beautiful wife, but he always met with the husband. "Zounds," said he, one day to him, "for a painter of landscapes, you are very seldom in the country."

THE LEGENDARY.

THE FUGITIVE GLADIATOR.

The following powerful and affecting description of the flight of a Roman gladiator from his brutal master, is extracted from Mr. Horace Smith's new novel, entitled Zillah, a Tale of the Holy City. The time is during the second triumvirate; and the heroine, the daughter of the second high priest of the Jews. Zillah is on the road to Rome.

As she gazed vaguely around her, listening rather than looking, she perceived something stealthily moving amid the foliage, midway up one of the prodigious oaks, scarcely twenty yards from their carriage. At first she conjectured it to be some wild creature, but another moment undeceived her. Yes, yes, it was he—the fugitive, holding his sword in his mouth, and clambering up the oaken tower, as if he had been fashioned by nature for the purpose, a clawed animal, a thing of the woods. Instantly averting her eyes lest their gaze should direct others to the same spot, she fixed them upon the ground, and, clasping her hands, remained for some moments in an agony of suspense; almost afraid to breathe, and still more fearful of betraying her emotion. The shout of many voices, the clamour of a brazen throated trumpet blowing a peal of triumph, and the hoarse cries of "Found! found! In the tree! In the great oak!" revealed to her that the object of her deep solicitude was discovered; and as she clung to her father, trembling with agitation, and uttering an involuntary sob of sympathetick anguish, she again cast up her eyes to see whether the poor wretch might still possess some chance of escape.

Conscious as he must have been that he was discovered, he neither accelerated nor retarded his progress; but appearing to bestow no attention whatever upon the hubbub beneath him, and the numerous pursuers who were now converging hastily towards the spot, he continued climbing up—up, up, till he had nearly gained the summit of the tree, where a leafless, bare bough, apparently one that had been blasted by the lightning, shot itself into the giddy air, stretched athwart the road. Along this crazy, fearful perch, he began to crawl upon his hands and knees, still holding the sword in his mouth. The branch trembled—it swayed to and fro—it bent with his weight. Zillah shut her eyes with a shudder; she tried even to stop her ears, expecting every moment to hear the appalling crash, the death-shriek—the horrible signal that he was precipitated from that terrific height, and dashed to atoms upon the rock.

As nothing indicated the catastrophe she had anticipated, she again ventured to look up. Still retaining the wreath around his helmet, he had now seated himself at the forked extremity of the bough, with his face towards the tree, and, brandishing his sword in his right hand, poised in mid air, swinging between heaven and earth like a wounded eagle upon his prey, he seemed resolved to await his assailants upon the perilous field of battle that he had chosen for himself. Zillah was at a loss to account for some small object that kept momentarily glistening in the sunshine beneath him, and losing itself in the shade, until a plashing sound drew her eyes to the road below, where she beheld a crimson circle formed by the continual dropping of his blood! Her previous sympathy with the sufferer was hardly capable of increase, but her indignation against his ruthless pursuers was not a little inflamed at this pitiable sight.

By this time, the horsemen, descending from the brow of the mountain, stood together under the tree, as if waiting for orders; while several of their comrades on foot successively made their appearance, and stationed themselves around the oak, without offering to climb it. After a short interval, a huge, ferocious, ruffian-like fellow, holding a trumpet in one hand and a sword in the other, came out of the bushes, puffing and panting to the spot, and immediately began to issue orders, as if he were the leader of the party. "Shall I bring him down with an arrow?" asked one of the horsemen, adjusting his bow;—"he is a dead shot as he sits now, and we shall never catch him otherwise, unless we wait till he drops out of the tree from hunger."

"At your peril, sirrah!" bawled the leader, shaking his sword at the fellow who had made the proposition. "He is my best man—worth any two of ye. Besides, have n't I entered him, and been paid the deposit, for the great match at Capua, and the festival of Jupiter at Beneventum? No, no, we must fetch the rascal down without hurting him. Let's see, let's see!" Going out into the road for the purpose of taking a more exact observation of the fugitive's position, he began to shake and scratch his head, muttering to one of his companions, "Should n't mind putting an arrow into him myself, if he wern't up so high, so desperate high. Wing him as delicately as you will, the fall is sure to spoil him. Ugly job! Then, if I send up after him, no use—the chap is no flincher—will fight till all the flesh is hacked off his bones. Besides, the bough wout hold two—shall lose 'em both:—t would cost a good round sum to replace 'em. Coax him—coax him down."

Raising his hoarse rough voice so as to be heard by the man in the tree, he endeavoured to wheedle him down by the most solemn promises of granting him his freedom after the Jupiter festival at Beneventum, winking at the same time to his companion, swearing in an under tone, that the runaway rogue should be effectually prevented from repeating this prank, if he could only get him safe into his clutches. His fawning, yet hoarse loud voice, and the villanous savage chuckle of his under tone, as he sneered at the credulity of the dupe he thought himself about to cajole, offered a singular contrast to the foreign accent, but clear, resolute, honest, intonation of his intended victim. "You have already repeatedly made me the same promise, and have as often violated your vow," said the latter.

"True, but I mean to keep it now. By Castor and Pollux, I do! (Say any thing to get the rascal out of the tree.)"

"Have you any objection to dip your two hands in what you have so long lived by—my blood;—there is plenty on the ground beneath; to lift them up to heaven, and swear by Hercules to give me my discharge after the festival of Beneventum?"

"Any objection!—not I—none in the world. (A lie more or less cannot make any great odds, so here goes.)"

He advanced to the little pool of blood, and was about to fulfil the stipulation, when the wretched fugitive, rendered desperate by the manifest impossibility of his escape, knowing by sad experience that the most solemn oaths of his villanous master were utterly unworthy of credit, and resolved to inflict a richly merited punishment upon his oppressor, while he got rid of his own miserable existence at the same time, had no sooner decoyed him under the tree than he threw himself headlong down upon him from his eyry in the sky, and both were instantly dashed to pieces on the flinty pavement of the Appian road.

HISTORICAL.

From the Lowell (Mass.) Journal.

THE JESUITS.

This sketch, though the subject is one of momentous and increasing importance, will be as brief as the nature of the design will admit. Some reflections naturally arising from the consideration of the subject will be deferred to the close of the article. For the following short and condensed account of the order of Loyola, the writer is chiefly indebted to two articles published in the Foreign Review; and for which that journal is indebted to Count Montlosier, the fearless and intrepid champion of the enemies of Jesuitism in France.

The history of its founder is curious merely as an evidence of the immense consequences that may result from trivial causes. Loyola was born in Spain in 1491. He was a courtier and soldier, and had his leg broken by a cannon shot, at the defence of Pampeluna, besieged by the French in 1521. Superstition was the habit of the time, and the more profligate the sinner, the more fanatic the convert. Loyola adopted the resolution of forming a new order of monks, and though his original design does not seem to have gone much beyond the common ambition of the time, that of adding one more to the useless and burdensome tribes of monkery, yet this fanatic with his ten associates, under the title of "the Company of Jesus," laid the first foundation of a vast and mysterious power—they commenced the organization of a system, whose rapid and wide development extended through all the corrupt ramifications of papal supremacy, and by its silent and insidious encroachments on the bulwarks of moral honesty and political right, threatened the entire destruction of all national order, and startled by the discovery of its wily but tremendous energy the high occupants of the thrones of Europe. The ostensible object of the order was the revival and support of religion by the education of the youth, preaching, and the administration of worship and missions. But the true and deeper object was the general suppression of religious truth, the general peril of civil government, and as equivalent to both, the general aggrandizement of the dominion of Rome. These were to be accomplished by the revival and support of the papal influence by political intrigue; by personal application of all the various ability to be found in their order; by compassing sea and land to gain a proselyte; by acquiring opulence even in secular pursuits; and by founding a secret influence in every leading city and court of Europe, and even of remote nations of Asia and the new world. Such was the origin—such the object of this celebrated institution. It would lead us into a detail incompatible with our design, to enter into a minute statement of their extensive and successful plans of operation, and of the internal police by which they were governed. It is sufficient to say, that the former were marked by a sagacious and cunning chicanery, altogether worthy of making the appellation of Jesuit but another name for an artful and designing conspirator—and that the latter in characteristic keeping, aimed at the utter subversion of all the nobler and better attributes of humanity, and the sacred privileges of free civilized and intelligent society. The government of the order rested in a general, who resided constantly at Rome, where he had five assistants attached to him as a sort of cabinet, who bore the names of the kingdoms whose business they conducted. Italy, Spain, Germany, France and Portugal.

One of the primary objects of the court of Rome has always been to bind the priest to the popish throne; to cut him off from all connexion with general society, and to prohibit his having any feeling separate from the aggrandizement of popery. It prohibits him from being a father or husband, so that all his most active sympathies and aspirations are diverted from the channel which God and nature designed for them, and turned with an unwavering and resistless impetuosity toward the ascendancy of an ambitious priesthood. By the laws of celibacy, poverty, and the rules of monachism it completely isolates its ecclesiastical members from their fellow men, and fixes in every country a stern and influential multitude to whom Rome is first, and last, and midst—father, and wife, and child—the great engrossing object of such sympathies as the cloister may have permitted to survive. It may well be believed then, that this important and increasing order was received with the fullest approbation of the pontiffs, already shrinking under the great German reformation, and anxious to raise up any antagonist to the mighty champion of truth and light, that was then trampling down bigotry and superstition through Europe. It was opposed by the University of Paris, by the government of France, and by the celebrated sect of the Jansenists, equally learned and equally superstitious, but it surmounted with a sort of fiendish triumph all these obstacles—it was now paramount. It had the ear of the monarch, whom it stimulated to all the impolicy, crime, and fury of religious persecution. It had its emissaries in every popish and protestant kingdom in Europe; in the latter rousing the people to direct rebellion; and in the former rapidly absorbing all the sources of influence, filling office with its creatures, and evidently preparing their bigoted and duped sovereigns for the victims of some general and sweeping convulsion.

About the middle of the eighteenth century Jesuitism was in the zenith of its power—it was impossible that so extensive a conspiracy could be carried on, without a wide extension of confidence, and the consequence was a gradual discovery and disclosure of the true character and objects of Jesuitism. Its books were dragged forth from their unholy concealment, and a list of Jesuit opinions published under the sanction of the Parliament of Paris in 1762. In 1772 it was put down by the pope at the unanimous desire of the kings of the popish countries. It was, however, notorious that the suppression was but nominal, and the signs and spirit of the congregations were preserved until the French revolution employed the genius of conspiracy in a more exulting and fearless development of power and ruin. The first act of the papacy on the restoration in 1815 was to refix this criminal order in the full confidence of Rome, and to make all efforts for its public reinstatement in the European states. The Jesuits were declared by the pontiff, to be the "vigorous rowers, who were necessary to the labouring ship of the church," and they have spread and prospered accordingly. The system is now declared to be spreading through France to the most extraordinary and most hazardous extent. A universal espionage for its purposes is established, and all classes are enlisted in it, from the confidential servants of the throne down to the labourers in the fields. The workmen are embodied and disciplined under the name of the "Association of St. Joseph"; every district or parish, has a chief, and the whole have a commander, who is secretly a Jesuit. The common wine-sellers are incorporated; and even valets and chambermaids are of the congregation. It requires no vast fund of argument to prove the peril of France and Europe, if this mysterious power should advance, and that its purpose is to advance, and to use its power with a high, exclusive, and remorseless hand, is evident from the nature and history of Jesuitism.

In conclusion, and in relation to the comparative probability of the triumph or the defeat of Jesuitism in France, our partial knowledge of the subject, and the necessary uncertainty of such speculations warns us to offer an opinion with becoming diffidence. The writer of this article was in Paris in the spring of 1827, during the most tumultuous period since the coronation of the present King. The chambers of Deputies and of Peers were then in session, and the measures of the Jesuit and ministerial party were never marked by a bolder or more high handed determination—nor was the voice of the people of Paris ever more fearlessly or decidedly expressed. The immediate cause of the excitement at this time was an attempt originating with M. Villele, then at the head of the ministry, to stifle the liberty of the press. In the chamber of Deputies there was a large majority of the ministerial party, and notwithstanding the opposition of the liberal part, led on by Benjamin Constant, Cassimir Perrier, and Royer Collard, three gifted and powerful advocates of a more free and liberal order of things, the project was carried through this department of the government. The excitement among the people was tremendous—the King and his party had never been more odious and unpopular—and the Constitutionnel and a few other leading opposition papers spoke out in a tone of threatening remonstrance which could not be misunderstood. On Monday, 15th May, there was a grand review of National Guards. The obnoxious law had passed the chamber of Deputies, and the people had an opportunity at the review of expressing their feelings towards M. Villele and his Jesuits. The King as he rode through the ranks of soldiery attended by his body guard, and followed by the Duchesses D'Angouleme and De Berri was received with the most sullen and profound silence—not a voice was raised from the vast throng of spectators to welcome him. Such was the state of the public mind at this period of the transaction. The character of the hereditary branch of the government—the chamber of Peers—was decidedly liberal. The hopes of the intelligent opposition—of the better part of France were resting on the decision of this Chamber. But while the subject was still under their consideration—in consequence it was then said of the ministry having ascertained that the project would be rejected by the Peers—the King voluntarily withdrew the proposition, and thus for the time terminated the affair. This was done a day or two after the review, and the tide of popular feeling was turned in favour of the King. All Paris was in uproar—There was a very general illumination—the windows of houses occupied by Jesuitical tenants which were not lighted, were broken with stones and brick bats—the streets were filled with the populace following the white flag to the music of trumpets, drums and fiddles, and the shouts of "Live the Constitution."—"Down with the Ministers!"—"Live the Liberty of the Press," and "Down with the Jesuits!" rung out from every street and lane of this vast capital. On Sunday the 29th of the same month there was a second review. The number of soldiers was about 15000, and the populace thronged in immense numbers to the place of parade. They were estimated at 300,000. This was the first public opportunity enjoyed by the people, since the defeat apparently by the King, of the press project, to testify their feelings toward the monarch. He was received and followed during his whole progress through the ranks, by the most enthusiastick and universal acclamations both from the people and soldiery. But mingled with "Live the King" were heard distinct and repeated shouts of "Down with the Ministry" and "Down with the Jesuits." The next morning all the papers except the Moniteur—the official court print, were filled with brilliant and glowing descriptions of the review and of the feelings of gratitude and attachment with which the monarch was received by his subjects. In the Moniteur appeared the following laconick annunciation signed by the King—"The National Guard of Paris is disbanded." The people were thunder-struck. The measure was bold, mysterious and inexplicable. It was the most daring act of the government, and drew more deeply and distinctly than ever, the line of division between King and people. The revulsion of popular feeling was instantaneous and tremendous, and French enthusiasm exhausted its vocabulary of epithets of contempt reproach and hatred for the whole system of government:—King, Ministry, and Jesuitism.

The foregoing recital is given to show the power and designs of the Jesuit party in France, and the feelings of the people in relation to it. It is a decided conviction of the writer, that Jesuitism and religious intolerance in a beautiful and interesting country is destined to meet with an utter and overwhelming defeat. They are marshalling all their forces and arraying them with their accustomed dexterity and skill—they are monopolizing as far as possible the early education of the country—thus hoping to stifle in its infancy that genius of light with which they dare not grapple in its manhood—they hold not only all the civil and political places of power and trust, but the very professorships in the learned and scientific institutions are many of them filled with their creatures—and no effort is spared to exclude from all participation in the rewards and honours of government every individual suspected of holding opinions opposed to their principles and spirit of domination. But a new party has arisen and is daily increasing with a certainty and rapidity which may well make them tremble for the final issue. There has been since the restoration a steady and triumphant advancement of liberal and anti-Jesuitical principles. The ministerial party in the Chamber of Deputies is yearly diminishing in numbers and in talent. All the large cities are unquestionably liberal, and they send into their hall of representatives their most gifted and influential citizens—Gen. Lafayette has been elected to that body, and there is now in the representative chamber, an array of talent, learning and high patriotick independence which promises the most cheering results. Of the four thousand members of the schools of law and medicine, perhaps there is not one in fifty suspected of the disreputable and odious predilection for the principles of the dominant party. The Constitutionnel, the prominent and fearless champion of the opposition laws, established about the time of the restoration and from a circulation of a few hundreds has increased to more than twenty thousand daily—the shares in the paper which were originally 500 francs are now said to be worth 15,000, and while it has made its editors and proprietors opulent, the ministerial prints do not pay their expenses. Judging from these facts and others of similar nature we cannot but believe that the day is not far distant when the people of France will rise up in the conscious power of a holy and hallowed cause, and shake off forever the paralyzing thralldom of a wicked and bigotted combination.

THE TRAVELLER.

From the New-York Courier.

THE EASTERN WORLD.

Mr. Buckingham, the celebrated editor of the London Oriental Herald, and formerly editor of the Calcutta Journal, is at present delivering lectures in Liverpool on the state of the Eastern world. Mr. Buckingham has long been known as an accomplished traveller, a man of fine genius and high and independent character. To his uncompromising disposition and unbending integrity, he owed his expulsion from the East Indies, a few years ago. He now presides over the editorial department of three distinct publications in London, viz: the Sphynx, the Athenæum, and the Oriental Herald.

From the Liverpool papers we gather the outline of Mr. B's present lectures. He commenced with Egypt, which, he said, comprised one entire valley, about 600 miles in length; and owed its great fertility (three crops of corn annually) to the deposits made by the overflowing of the Nile. That river had excited great interest amongst the ancients, and whole armies had been sent to solve the grand problem of its source. This river, supposed by some to be cœval in its source with the Niger—the two rivers forming the grand boundaries of Africa on the west, and the north,—flows for 800 miles, without receiving any tributary stream—and imparting fertility wherever it runs. Mr. B. next alluded to the navigable canals of Egypt, its lakes and works of art. In adverting to the towns, he stated that ancient Alexandria was half as long again as London, yet was only a third or fourth rate town in Egypt. It was fifteen miles in length, and nine in breadth. Pompey's Pillar was a column supposed to be erected by the people to commemorate the bounty of Severus. The obelisks of Egypt he next noticed—one of which, though brought 600 miles by the Egyptians, a modern army of 10,000 men were unable to remove. Memphis was in ruins before Alexandria was destroyed—and, what is curious, the ancient Egyptians permitted no body to be interred in lands producing animal sustenance.

In alluding to the architecture of Egypt, Mr. Buckingham mentioned that the portico of Her-mopolis was so beautiful that a peasant on first seeing it was heard to exclaim "This is a place worthy of gods and not of men." At another city, Koum Ombo, was a lighthouse for the guidance of vessels on the Nile, the only one on record in ancient times. The great gate at Edfou was so immense that there was actually a village on the top of it.

During his travels through Egypt, Mr. Buckingham visited the famous Statue of Memnon, which is of such a size that when he stood on tiptoe (the foot of the statue resting horizontally on the ground) he could not see over the instep of that stupendous monument of art.

This statue stands upon alluvial soil; and is cut from one solid block of granite.

The Acropolis extends a mile under ground, and a fine monument of alabaster was procured from it by the late M. Belzoni, and is now in the British Museum. There are chambers in this immense sepulchre, in which the visiter may walk upon a pavement of human heads.

Mr. Buckingham confutes the general opinion that the crocodiles are ferocious; they never attack the inhabitants even when bathing in the Nile. The hyæna too, he says is perfectly harmless. If this be so, the hyæna's looks belie its disposition very much. We saw one last summer, and a worse favoured brute we never set eyes on—it was snapping and growling unceasingly, and looked as if it was made exclusively for mischief and iniquity.

The flowers of Egypt are numerous and aromatic. A man may actually travel for thirty miles upon beds of roses. These flowers are appropriated for the extraction of the otto of roses.

Egypt is now four times more wealthy than it was twenty years ago. This has arisen from the policy of the present Pacha, of whom we have made honourable mention in a late number of the Morning Courier. He encourages European artists, and strains every nerve to promote the interest of commerce.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, MARCH 7, 1829.

THE REV. HENRY JONES. Among the anti-masonick savans who have astonished the wonder-and-novelty-loving people of these latter days by marvellous presentations from their vast profundity, the Rev. Henry Jones, "A. M. once a Royal Arch Mason," holds a station no doubt pretty considerable, according to his standard of weights and measures. The Reverend gentleman is a disciple of that new and convenient theory which declares that promises, however solemnly given, are not at all morally binding; and he has rendered himself somewhat notorious by means of half a score of epistolary essays in defence of backsliding. His arguments are as logical as his theory is consistent; and the quantity of meekness and christian forbearance which his pious zeal has brought out from under the bushel is truly astonishing.

Our object at this time, however, is chiefly to introduce the following questions, and Mr. Jones' answers, which are the best possible comment upon his epistolary sophistry. In his letters, Mr. Jones labours to establish doctrines directly reverse to those contained in his answers. Whether such inconsistency accords with his ministerial character, we presume it is not necessary for us to say. The reverend gentleman is represented to us, by those who are acquainted with him, as of a shallow mind, and troubled with a great desire for petty distinction.

Questions proposed to the Rev. Henry Jones, by Deacon ———, at the Ecclesiastical Convention, held at Danville, Vermont, December, 1828, for the purpose of considering the subject of freemasonry, as it respects the members of churches.

Question 1. Did you, while a member of the lodge, consider that the oaths you had taken impugned upon your religious or political opinions. Ans. I did not.

Q. 2. Did you feel yourself bound to execute the penalties upon a member who should disclose the secrets of masonry? Ans. I am not willing to own that I was even at heart a murderer. [On the question's being repeated, and a definite answer requested, the answer was—I did not.]

Q. 3. Did you suppose, from any thing you saw or heard, that your brethren with whom you associated, felt that they were to take the life of one that should disclose? Ans. I did not.

Q. 4. Did you consider yourself bound to vote for a brother to any office in preference to another of equal qualifications? Ans. I did not.

Q. 5. Did you consider yourself bound to screen from justice a brother, who had committed a crime which exposed him to punishment by the civil law? Ans. I did not.

Q. 6. Did you ever hear any particular religious tenets or political principles discussed in the lodge? Ans. I never did.

NARRATIVE OF THE ANTI-MASONICK EXCITEMENT. A gentleman whose information well qualifies him for the task, has just put to press in the village of Batavia, a work bearing the above title. The first two chapters have been politely forwarded to us, and they contain such evidences of candour and a disposition for fair dealing, that we think the work will be worthy of the patronage of all who have any desire to be informed of the true character of the Morgan matters. The chapters before us are barely introductory to the subject—containing a brief history of the rise of masonry in the west, and a few observations on its present state in some particular places. The Le Roy seceders were among those chiefly instrumental in introducing it and extending its popularity, and so zealously were they engaged in its cause, that the lodge and chapter to which many of them belonged, "continued in session day after day, sometimes for a whole week together!" And John Hascall, too, actually went more than one hundred miles for the express purpose of being initiated into two or three of the higher degrees! Yet these very zealots cry out that masonry is operating against "our liberties," undermining "our republican institutions," and subverting "our sacred religion!" Marvellous consistency! But will the people be deceived by such barefaced villany? will they place confidence in the assertions of men whose conduct declares them as unstable as the wind—who go to the extreme of every thing, and are sincere in nothing? and shall the wretch be encouraged, who has the impious hardihood to declare, that "anti-masonry sprung from the Throne of God"? If such men, by any political chance, should be able to seize upon places of power, Heaven only knows where their reckless ambition would terminate!

We wish the author of the contemplated publication, success; not because we think that masonry is to be the subject of eulogy, but because the welfare of the country demands that the mysteries of anti-masonry should be revealed to the world, and its deformity portrayed in a manner that cannot be misinterpreted by the people.

☞ Lack-a-day! wo, wo, wo to anti-masonry! bundle up your rags, Governour Southwick; and you of the Niagara Courier, roll up your editorial swaddling clothes, and trudge back to your old sphere in South Gotham! for verily, a wonderful thing hath happened—a star is set—the patriot Phelps is gone down from the editorial chair of the Ontario Phoenix, even unto the walks of private life!! The melancholy intelligence reached this city by the western mail of last evening, and we hasten to lay it before our readers in order that they may get their mourning apparatus under weigh as soon as possible, and assist us in bearing the load of grief necessarily attendant upon so sad a bereavement. Our readers will recollect the patriot, as the author of sundry elegant extracts, which at various times appeared in the columns of the last volume of the Record. We have no time to speak of him at length, and must content ourselves with quoting of his own comprehensive phrases, with which he attempted to illustrate the character of Dr. Waterhouse, soon after the meeting of the Dedham convention—"It was a rainbow of magnificent horror, spanning the divine dead sea of blood and thunder!" But he's gone,—so weep Squire Hopkins—Governour Granger, weep! and "let the heavens be hung with black."

When Mr. Satterlee Clark, of the anti-masonick convention, made his publick renunciation of masonry, he concluded with this remarkably modest assertion—"that the Father of our country, our beloved Washington, did not possess sufficient energy to renounce what he knew to be ridiculous. But, sir," said the unassuming gentleman, "I dare do what he dared not." Qu. Did Mr. Clark intend to convey the idea that a greater than Washington had appeared in his person in our days? I looked at the picture of that great man over the speaker's chair, and I thought it blushed.

NO ANTI-MASON.

PUBLIC OPINION, AND SPIRIT OF THE PUBLIC JOURNALS.

☞ We exclude other matter for the purpose of giving place to the following extracts—they contain a true picture of the opinions of intelligent men. Read them with attention.

From the Oneida Observer.

Rome, February 21, 1829.
MEMRS. EDITORS—The Elucidator of the 13th inst. contained the proceedings of an anti masonick meeting, appointing me one of their corresponding committees. On Thursday last, a letter, of which the following is a copy, was left, at my request, with the gentleman having the charge of the Elucidator, at the printing office, who was desired to publish it in the paper of yesterday; but on examining that paper to-day, I find that the communication has not been published, nor has the fact that I am not an anti-mason, been communicated to the publick. I therefore request that you will publish it in the Observer. Respectfully yours,
HENRY A. FOSTER.
To the Editors of the Oneida Observer.

Rome, February 18, 1829.
MR. EDITOR—I observed in the last number of your paper, the proceedings of an anti-masonick meeting, held in this town on the 9th inst. by which it appears that I was appointed one of the town committee of correspondence:

In relation thereto I take the liberty of saying that I did not attend any such meeting, nor did I know that such a meeting was to be held; and that my appointment took place entirely without my knowledge or approbation. I am not a mason, and I have never desired to be one, but I am willing that every man should in relation to masonry, pursue the dictates of his own judgement; believing that a person of good character becomes no worse, and one of bad character no better, by joining the institution; and that although I have no particular friendship for masonry, in itself considered, I am acquainted with many members of that fraternity whose honesty and good moral conduct, are sufficient to satisfy me that there is nothing in the institution itself, dangerous to the peace and good order of society, or subversive of the free principles of our government; and that those men are not directly or indirectly concerned in, or accountable for, the lawless and brutal conduct of those who have, no doubt, murdered William Morgan.

I wish I could say that the results of anti-masonry are no worse than those of masonry. That there are many of those opposed to masonry, who are sincere in the course they are pursuing to put it down, I most readily admit; but I am satisfied that those who are most vociferous against it, and who style themselves, or are styled by others, the leaders of anti-masonry, are endeavouring to win for themselves political power, rather than to destroy an institution which they believe to be dangerous.

The most of them are disappointed politicians, who have assumed at different times, all the names now to be found in the political vocabulary, for the purpose of distracting and defeating the democratic party of the state; but who have, notwithstanding, been known by the people, and have almost invariably received from them a just measure of reward.

They are again in my opinion, trying to deceive the people, reckless of the consequences, if they can obtain for themselves political preferment, under the hope that they can make the honest prejudices of a portion of this community against masonry, subservient to their designs; and what are the consequences which have hitherto resulted from anti-masonry, where it has succeeded most? Has it produced any thing favourable to the cause of religion? Certainly not—look at the situation of the churches in the western part of this state; where, but a short time since, union, harmony, and brotherly love prevailed; the demon of discord now reigns, and scatters jealousy and confusion—ministers have been driven from the sacred desk by those who had for years looked up to them as patterns of piety: who had received from them the sacred ordinances; and whose instructions they had listened to with lively emotions: and they have been dismissed, not for any overt acts committed by them; not for any offence meditated or committed in secret against the laws of God or man; but because they would not surrender their rights and privileges, at the requirement of those who had no authority to demand them. For the same reasons, and for no other, those who had vowed to watch over and love each other, and who had the same hopes in relation to a hereafter, have risen up against each other, and uttered their dire anathemas.

Has anti-masonry been beneficial to the peace of societies and neighbourhoods? It has served to destroy those feelings which men are usually proud to cherish; which blunt the weapons of political hostility, and enable men of different creeds, to meet as friends in their social circles: and it has not only destroyed those feelings, but has substituted feelings of personal hostility. It has set "the father against the son, and the son against the father;" and for what, the most of them know not; but in fact, only to minister to the designs of aspiring demagogues. These are some of the effects of what I call political anti-masonry; and all those who help to fan the flame are only increasing the evil; an evil which, if suffered to increase to any great extent, will be beyond the controul of the "master spirits" who now direct it, and the consequences of which no man can predict.

These are some of the reasons why I cannot consent to become an agent in carrying forward the schemes of political anti-masons; and you will confer a favour on me by publishing them in your next number: I make this request, not because I wish to appear as a champion of masonry, but because your paper has been the organ through which I have been proclaimed an anti-mason. Yours, &c.
HENRY A. FOSTER.
To the Editor of the Elucidator.

From the Boston Bulletin.

RECANTATIONS. We have no objections to any person's renouncing whatever opinions he may have entertained, and in any manner, publick or private, which he may choose; but whenever any man makes a publick renunciation, with a view to influence publick opinion, it is incumbent upon us to look at the circumstances under which it is done, so as to know how much confidence we may safely put in the new assertions of the renouncer.

It will be remembered by some of our readers, that a man named Lewis Tappan, about a year since, renounced Unitarianism, and said that it was a bad faith, that it never had a good effect upon him, and that its professors were a set of cold hearted men, who attended to some of the forms, but did not, as far as he knew, feel the influence of Christianity. This may, by a strange possibility, be true; but it is not to be believed on account of Mr. Lewis Tappan's assertion; because, first, he pretended to make the publick renunciation, for the benefit of his former associates, and at the same time, endeavoured to sell to one or more of those old associates, Unitarian books, of so powerful a character, that he could not keep them in his library; second, because, he was in so much disrespect with the Unitarian sect, that he could hope for no pecuniary assistance from them, at a time when he was obliged to abandon his usual mercantile pursuits; and by turning orthodox, he could obtain aid from the orthodox party, as a conductor, in part, of an orthodox paper; and third, because he could not but have known that no better men lived on earth, than many of the most zealous Unitarians whose fair fame he saw fit to depreciate, as much as he could. If Lewis Tappan had been wholly without inducement to turn, except such as might be found in his conscience, or, if he had done it silently, without an attempt to gain such notoriety as might be favourable to his future projects, much more credit could be placed in his assertions. As it is, no sensible man can think a whit less estimable of the Unitarians or their faith, for his denunciations. Judas was once a professed follower of our Saviour, but his renunciation of faith has not affected the world; even deists do not rely on his testimony.

Within a short time, this same Lewis Tappan has renounced and denounced masonry! Poor abused masonry! We have not seen a letter published, as yet, by the celebrated turn-about, to any of his former brethren; but it is not to be doubted, that a letter might be written, containing arguments quite as just, and defamation quite as well deserved, as were in that to the clergymen of Boston. We should like to know, as the orthodox paper has failed in New-York, and passed into other hands, if the great renouncer is about to establish an anti-masonic paper, and thus heralds its approach. One thing we are sure he will not renounce, that is all claim to the confidence of men of sense—that is too far gone to require renunciation.—[Communicated.]

From the Oneida Observer.

A DILEMMA. The Anti-Masons recommend the Legislature to pass a law, "preventing a Mason officiating as Jury-man, in any case where either party belongs to the fraternity, while the other is not a member;" and the Masons, it is said, claiming as they have a right to do, equal protection, desire that in that event the Legislature shall pass another law, "preventing an Anti-Mason officiating as Jury-man, in any case where either party belongs to the fraternity of Anti-Masons, while the other is not a member." As the case now stands it is obvious that the rights of Masons are quite as much in need of Legislative protection as those of Anti-Masons. We should not very well like to be tried by a Jury of Anti-Masons composed of the leaders of that party in Oneida county; to expect justice from them would be as unreasonable as to think of gathering "grapes from thorns or figs from thistles." We should be condemned, not for being Masons, but for a much more heinous offence in their estimation—for that of being Democrats.

Should the prospective and demoralizing principles which govern the conduct of POLITICAL Anti-Masons be extensively acted upon, society would be torn in pieces by contending factions, and the bitter waters of strife would be poured without stint into our churches and families. If political Anti-Masons, claim the right to have Masons excluded from Juries—we may soon see the different religious sects asking for political privileges for themselves, and disabilities against others.

From the Middlesex (Conn.) Gazette.

ANTI-MASONRY IN CONNECTICUT. The editor of the Journal, a paper printed at Bennington, Vermont, in speaking of the astonishing rapidity with which the anti-masonic excitement has spread over various portions of our country, remarks:—

"Take Connecticut—for instance—the land of steady habits." Her inhabitants have simultaneously started up, as if a great trumpet had sounded for battle; and never has there been exhibited a more calm, and determined, and zealous spirit, than that which now animates the breasts of all classes."

We cannot divine from what source the respectable editor derived information on this subject, which authorized him to put forth the above paragraph. He is incapable, we trust, of wilful misrepresentation; but we assure him that he has done gross injustice to the people of Connecticut. The great mass of our citizens care no more for masonry or anti-masonry, than for the sources of the Nile. There is, it is true, a skeleton or frame of a party, in the eastern part of the state, the professed object of whose members is the overthrow of the masonic institution; but it is composed principally of designing demagogues, and ignorant dupes—the pairings and ends of obsolete factions—banded together in the hope, on the part of the leaders of acquiring political influence, to be used as their interest might dictate. In this pitiful business, our substantial inhabitants have no hand.

We should hardly deserve the reputation, of which we are justly proud, of intelligent, sober, thoughtful people, were we capable of being wrought into a state of feverish excitement on the subject of an imaginary, or at least equivocal grievance, by the sophistry of casuists, or the intemperate ravings of pretended fanatics.

From the Ithaca Journal.

THE WESTERN EXCITEMENT.—Who would have thought that such a man as Solomon Southwick could receive nearly one eighth part of the votes given by this state for governor? This same Southwick was a few years since, a candidate for the same office, and obtained about 1700 votes. His character has by no means improved since that time; and if indeed he can be regarded as a same person, the history of no country or age, presents to our knowledge a more desperate and unprincipled demagogue. In a recent Observer, among other blasphemous expressions, he exclaims:

"Was not Anti-Masonry, in the late election, fighting under the banner of Jesus Christ and the Testament of the Eternal God, which he came to deliver?"

What makes his blasphemy the more striking and preposterous, is the fact, that many of the leaders of the anti-masonic excitement at the west, are known to be avowed ATHEISTS and HYPOCRITES—who deny the existence of a Supreme Being, or scoff at and ridicule the Christian religion. One of them, who was elected to a responsible office, at the late election, declared that he believed Christianity was no better than Masonry, and that both ought to be put down. A famous anti-masonic lecturer, named Hamilton, was a few months since at the court in Ontario county, convicted of an infamous assault upon a young female, and sentenced to the state prison. At the same court, Giddins, the author of the anti-masonic almanac, was refused his oath as a witness, because of his disbelief in Deity, he having declared that he would as soon worship a dumb beast as the being called God! Alas, the heart sickens at the reflection, that many honest, well meaning citizens, have become the dupes of these unprincipled men, and lent themselves to a system of detraction, intolerance and persecution, subversive of civil rights, and of the peace and harmony of society, and hostile to the spirit of civil liberty and to the free institutions of our country! But reason and reflection, truth and justice, will soon resume their power, and the dregs which have risen upon the bitter and troubled waters, will sink to their natural level.

From the New-York Enquirer

A NEW THING.—New-York must always have something new to keep the citizens alive. Every week, or every month at least, an excitement must be got up. Death, desolation, or certainly one of the seven plagues of Egypt would be the consequence of the contrary.

Heretofore we have been accustomed to treat every country novelty with indifference. If it came from the interior we would put our arms a-kimbo, utter a "pshaw" and kick it to the antipodes. Nothing but what originated in the city was supportable or even tolerable. This sentiment has given way to a slight exception. The angel of Anti-Masonry has descended and troubled the pool of public opinion. On Thursday evening an assemblage of three hundred persons was held at the corner of Mott and Chatham streets, where speeches were delivered—resolutions passed—delegates appointed—and every thing went off in the most superior style.

A pilgrim from the West was introduced, who gave a long and interesting statement of facts connected with the abduction of poor John Morgan.

In short, a very considerable anti-masonic concern has been erected here all on a sudden; and several very excellent orators, on all occasions, intend to ride on the little whirlwind as far and as fast as they can. We wish them much success for the next month.

Contents of The Western Journal of the Medical and Physical Sciences, for January.—Essays and Cases—An account of the successful resuscitation of three persons from suspended animation, by submersion in the river Ohio for twenty or twenty-five minutes. Observations on Fever and other Diseases of the South and West. views: Lectures on Anatomy, Surgery, and Pathology, including Observations on the nature and treatment of Local diseases, delivered at St. Bartholomew's Hospital.

Contents of Flint's Weekly Monthly Review, for January.—Thoughts on a National University (concluded), My Mother, Present State of the Jews, The Black Revolution, The Sabbath, New-York High School, Wabash and Miami Canal, The Pandect, Livingston County High School, United States' Law Intelligencer and Review, New Theory of Medicine, French Literature, Liberal Christianity, Methodist Error, Miss Robbins' School Books, Culture of Silk, Kirkham's Grammar, To Readers.

From the National Intelligencer.

The new Administration.—We have now satisfied ourselves, from authority upon which we place reliance, that the following gentlemen will be nominated to the Senate, by the President Elect, to fill the office attached to their names respectively:

MARTIN VAN BUREN, of New York, to be Secretary of State
SAMUEL D. INGHAM, of Pennsylvania, to be Secretary of Treasury.

JOHN McLEAN, of Ohio, to be Postmaster General.
JOHN H. EATON, of Tennessee, to be Secretary of War.
JOHN BRANCH, of North Carolina, to be Secretary of the Navy.

JOHN McPHERSON BERRIEN, of Georgia, to be Attorney General.

Under this arrangement, the Postmaster General, (who, we are glad to see, is to retain his present station,) is to be considered as a Member of the Cabinet; which has not been the case heretofore, and takes rank, (if there be any thing like rank in an official relation purely conventional, and recognized by no law) next after the Secretary of the Treasury.

BOOK OF JASHER.—It is stated in the English papers, that an interesting discovery has been made in Persia, of the Book of Jasher, mentioned in Joshua. The manuscript was procured at great expense, and it was supposed that it had been preserved in Persia since the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity. It contains a minute account of the battle of Gideon, when the Sun miraculously stood still in the mid heaven.

The New York Enquirer remarks, that there are yet many interesting biblical discoveries to be made, and that it is evident they will be made in Persia, for the Jews, after their seventy years' captivity, left several of their sacred books, in Persia, which were preserved by that portion of their brethren who were content with the administration of Cyrus and preferred remaining in Babylon. The permission granted by that monarch, and confirmed by Darius, allowing them to return to their native land, was so promptly accepted, that many religious works were left behind. There are, at least, eight or ten Books, referred to in the bible, of which no traces have been found. They are 'Book of the acts of Solomon,' 'Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Judah,' 'Book of Samuel the Seer,' 'Book of Nathan the Prophet,' 'Book of Gad the Seer,' 'The Visions of Iddo the Seer,' 'Book of Semiah the Prophet,' 'Book of Jehu.'

The recovery of these would throw great light upon many important facts, and explain points upon which there exists the most contradictory opinions.

We shall doubtless find many of the missing books in Persia, and no place more likely than Ecbatana, the ancient Shushan, the city in which the Jews enjoyed the greatest privileges after their escape from Haman.

ALBANY TYPOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY.

At a meeting of the Journeymen Printers in the city of Albany, held at Harmony Hall, on the 25th February, 1839, Solomon Baker was called to the chair, and P. Sturtevant appointed secretary.

The object of the meeting having been stated, it was unanimously Resolved, that it is expedient and proper to form a Typographical Society, in the city of Albany.

A committee was appointed to draft a constitution for the regulation and government of the proposed society; when the meeting adjourned until Tuesday evening, 3d March.

Tuesday evening, March 3. The meeting convened, pursuant to adjournment. The committee appointed at the previous meeting, reported a form of a constitution, which, after some modification was adopted.

The society then proceeded to the election of officers; when the following persons were duly chosen:

Murdoch McPherson, President, Philo K. Cole, Secretary,
Giles K. Winne, Vice-President, Abraham A. Keyser, Treasurer.
Board of Directors—Thomas S. Ranney, Caleb Child, jr., John D. Kearney, John Malcolm, Alexander H. Glenn,

MASONICK CALENDAR.

[Regular meetings in the city of Albany, at the Masonick Hall.]

Temple Encampment, 2d Friday in each month.
Temple Chapter, 2d and 4th Tuesday in each month.
Temple Lodge, 1st and 2d Tuesday in each month.
Mount Vernon Lodge, 1st and 3d Thursday in each month.
Masters Lodge, 1st and 3d Wednesday in each month.

ODD FELLOWS' CALENDAR.

[Regular meetings in the city of Albany.]

Hope Lodge, Monday evening in each week, at Montgomerie Hall.
Philanthropic Lodge, Wednesday evening in each week, corner of Lodge and State-streets, over Osborn and Grays.
Clinton Lodge, Friday evening in each week, Masonick Hall.

The most marked tokens of respect appear to have been paid to the memory of "the good Father ANTONIO DE SEDELLA," whose remains were interred at New-Orleans, on the 29d ult. The state legislature adjourned to attend the funeral. The members of the city council resolved to wear mourning on the occasion, and the publication of the daily newspapers was suspended, to enable those attached to the establishments to attend the obsequies.

It is supposed (says the New-Orleans Mercantile Advertiser) that no less than 15,000 persons were present at the end and imposing solemnity. The legislature, the military, the masonic lodges, the corporate bodies were all zealous to evince their profound respect for the memory of one whose virtues will be ever enshrined in the grateful remembrance of those whom his wisdom benefitted, whom his kindness consoled, and whom his unbounded charity so oftentimes relieved.

ALBANY TYPOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY.—The members are requested to attend an extra meeting of the Society, at Harmony Hall. THIS EVENING, at 8 o'clock precisely. Persons desirous of becoming members, by applying at this time, will be entitled to admission by paying the original initiation fee. By order.
mr 7 dit P. K. COLE, Sec'y.

BOOK BINDING. Sign of the Golden Ledger, corner of State and North Market streets, Albany. WILLIAM SEYMOUR, carries on the above business in all its branches; viz: plain, extra, and super-extra—has a first rate ruling machine, and other necessary implements for manufacturing Blank Books of every description, on the most reasonable terms, of the best workmanship.

An assortment on hand. Subscribers to the American Masonick Record can have their volumes handsomely bound in boards, with leather backs and corners, at 62 1/2 cents a volume. Feb. 14. 3m3

TO ARCHITECTS. The Grand Lodge of Ancient Freemasons of South Carolina, being about to erect a MASONICK HALL in the city of Charleston, offer a premium of one hundred dollars for the plan which shall be approved. The lot is about one hundred feet front on Meeting-street, and of sufficient depth from east to west for any required buildings. The front will be to the east, and must present a specimen of the strictest chasteness, simple, but conforming in proportions to the best models. The building must be calculated to contain on the second floor a superb Hall for public purposes, the lower floor for supper rooms, and other conveniences for public parties; the third story must contain a room for the assembly of the Grand Lodge; one or more wings extending from the main building to the west, must contain rooms for the subordinate Lodges, the Chapters, &c. and the lower story to be calculated for kitchens, and other requisite offices. Each plan must be accompanied with an estimate, specifying the value of the materials on which it is founded. To be forwarded to Ed. Hughes, Recording Grand Secretary, on or before the 1st of May next. By order of the Grand Lodge.
BENJ. FANEUIL HUNT, G. M.

POETRY.

From the New-York Morning Courier.

HEBREW.—SAUL.

"I bid from old ocean
The atom return,
And mingle in motion
The dust of his urn—
From tempest I gather
The matter that formed,
And snatch from the fire
The spirit that warmed,
Form of my power,
I beckon thee here!
Shade of the sleeper,
Appear! appear!"

Thus the Sybil breathed her spell,
And the viewless owned it well.
Phantoms came and went and came,
Stranger things without a name,
'Till the wild and fitful scene
Wore the form of what had been.
In the distance dim discerning,
Like the taper's feeble burning,
'Mid the mists the charnels gather
Over sleeping son and father,
Stood the spirit—something given,
Fetter link 'twixt earth and Heaven—
Nameless—breathless—shadowing,
Yet itself a shadowed thing,
Fearful as a dungeon's gloom,
Stern and death-like as the tomb.
With a deep and hollow sound,
Thus it broke the still profound;"

"Thing of an hour
That bade me appear,
Shrink from the power
That beckoned me here—
For, Chieftain, of sorrow
My breathings must be,
I hear in the morrow,
Dark voices for thee;
Oh, why on the hidden
Thus bending intent?
Too soon for thy bosom
The veil will be rent:
In the gathering gloom afar
I but see the falling star,—
O'er the landscape laughing wide,
Soft I mark a sweeping tide;
Now the silver stream goes,
Headlong in the gulph below—
Where yon sable shadows fall
I can read a crumbling wall—
Buried spear and broken guest,
Shame upon the chosen feast,
Now a form is by my side,
Sullied are its notes of pride—
Crouching in its shame it comes
To its father's voiceless home—
Now their shadows coldly twine
And, O Chief, that form is thine—
Tremble—for in all I see
But thy own dark destiny!"

NORRIS

From the Connecticut Journal.

THE LIGHT GUITAR.

The light guitar, the light guitar,
I hear its tinkling sound afar,
Where underneath the evening star
The dance is wheeling;
And many a laugh, and many a shout
The busy echoes toss about,
Till joyous with the merry rout
The hills are pealing.

The light guitar, I know it well;
I heard it first, when evening fell
Around the vine-embowered well
By Rhone's broad river—
Joy to thy valleys, gay Provence!
Thou sunny paradise of France,
Carols at eve, and song and dance
Are thine forever.

The light guitar, it sends me where
A living glory fills the air,
And all of gay and bright and fair
Is full of flowing.
Below me sleeps the purple sea,
Above me clouds of amber flee,
And gold on every tower and tree
And spire is glowing.

The light guitar, its warning sound
Maidens and youth are thronging round
With song and shout, and leap and bound—
No dream of sorrow.

Away with grief, away with care!
Glad thoughts alone are welcome there;
They care not, if or dark or fair
May rise the morrow.

Then glory to the light guitar—
Its holiest time the evening star,
When liquid voices echo far
By rock and river.
O! might such heavenly nights be mine,
Where overhead the rambling vine
Lets quivering through the bright moonshine
By Rhone forever.

LINDA ALHAYA.

The following pretty verses are extracted from a volume of poems, of which the principal is entitled "The Sorrows of Rosalie," a most touching and delightful burst of poetry. It is attributed, and we believe truly, to Mrs. Norton, daughter of Tom Sheridan, a lady in whom the inheritance of genius, so long possessed by her family, still exists. Albion.

Slow rippling in the zephyr's breath,
The murmuring waters flow beneath;
Warm glows the sun—sweet breathes the air,
Why are these scenes, though bright and fair,
To me a dreary wilderness?
Linda Alhaya! can'st thou guess?
Why do I gaze on flowerets blue,
Which rival heaven's own matchless hue,
And wander by their native stream,
Though it to other eyes may seem
Unworthy of my constancy?
Linda Alhaya! tell me why?
Why do I gaze on them and smile,
Then set me down and weep awhile,
Sadly, but fond as they recalled
Something which held my heart enthralled:
Then slowly wend my weary way?
Linda Alhaya! can'st thou say?

Linda Alhaya hears me not—
Linda Alhaya has forgot
That e'er her starry path I crossed,
Where every end but joy was lost,
And hast thou lost all thought of me,
Linda Alhaya! can it be?

Not so have I of thee, sweet maid—
Deep in my heart my love is laid,
Scentless and withered each flower to me—
Leafless and scathed each towering tree;
Oh, Linda Alhaya, can'st thou not guess?
Thou wert my rose of the wilderness!

Linda Alhaya! those flowerets blue
Hath not thine eyes a soft liquid hue,
But they the same language hold,
Waving above those waters cold;
And as we parted on this spot,
They said "farewell, forget me not!"

Those flowers may bud, and bloom, and die,
Above the brook that wanders by;
And while they live, their blossoms seem
Reflected on its silver stream;
But when rude time the bud shall sever,
Their images are fled forever.

Oh! thus shall it never be with me
While I have breath and memory;
The stream of life may swell its tide—
The image still secure will bide!
My faithful heart in death shall tell,
Linda Alhaya, I loved thee well.

From the Literary Souvenir.

THE MUSICK OF THE REEDS.

A voice of musick swells from yonder reeds,
Where flits on feeble wing the rising blast,
Low as the sound when gentle Pity pleads,
Or lone remembrance mourns the cherished past;
Now, with wild notes upon the waters cast,
Like solemn voices joined in holy strain;
Anon with measures intermingling fast,
As peals the distant choir,—and hushed again,
Like Hope that cheers Despair—or Grief that weeps in vain.

II.

It is the native harmony of earth,—
The slow and awful hymn of solitude;
A melting strain which owns no mortal birth,
But breathed by Nature in her softest mood,
From heath, or sunless grove, or mountain rude,
Where fountains in their leafy twilight rise,
And blooms that graceful tenant of the wood,
Grief's golden emblem, with the plant which vies
In name with Friendship's self, in hue like summer's skies.

III.

And well the Arcadian Deity of yore,
Beneath the shade of moss-grown boughs reclined,

Where nodding thickets crowned the pebbled shore.
And raised the reed its answer to the wind,
Amidst the whispered melody might find
The infant breathing of that conquering power,
The first, and mightiest mistress of the mind,
While lasts Affliction's storm, or Danger's hour,
Raising the drooping soul, as dews the withered flower.

IV.

Sigh on, thou breeze, and ye, light leaves, that make
The forests musical, the desert mild,
And fill with sounds of peace each rustling brake.
Be tuneful still,—amidst this pathless wild,
The western sky with clouds of glory piled,
Night's star above—earth—ocean calm below,
And fair as when creation's morning smiled;
I would not change the strains which ye bestow,
For all that earth can teach—for all that skill can show.

FROM AN ABSENTEE.

BY BARRY CORNWALL.

Let me wander where I will,
Thy sweet voice is near me still—
On the dumb, untrodden mountains—
In the silver speaking fountains—

In the wandering winds that roam,
And never, never find a home—
In the sky-larks merrier measure,
When she fills the morn' with pleasure;

And by day, and in the night,
Thy soft eyes are my love-light,
While thy tender voice doth cherish
Hope to life, which else might perish.

O voice, which comes o'er land and seas!
O eyes, bright midst the tamarisk trees!
Why need I dream of past emotion?
Of distant skies! of severing ocean?

Midst toil and war, 'neath Indian suns,
Midst deserts where no river runs,
What care I? Ye are shade and river—
Are hope—are joy which faileth never!

From the Ladies' Magazine.

TO THE SEA.

BY MRS. L. H. SIGOURNEY.

Grant me thy company thou solemn sea!
Earth speaks of man—her trimly, trelliced walks,
Her groves, her gardens, and her gorgeous domes,
All speak of man. Even the pure, lofty sky
With all its change of garniture,—its robe
Of morning purple, and its garb by day
Of blue and silver tissue, richly wrought,
Its mantle for the eve, of nameless dyes,
Oft seems to me (may Heaven forgive the thought!)
Like some fair woman in her coquetry.
—But thou dost speak of God,—thou holy Sea!
Thou wonder-working, mortal-mocking One.
Alone upon thy shore I rove, and count
The crested billows in their ceaseless play;
And when dense darkness shrouds thy awful face,
I listen to thy voice and bow me down
In all my nothingness to Him whose eye
Beholds thy congregated world of waves
But as a noteless dew drop.

PAINTING AND GLAZING.—The subscriber respectfully informs his friends and the public that he continues the House and Sign Painting and Glazing, at the old stand, No. 299, corner of North Market and Steuben streets, where he will accommodate the public with any article in his line. Paints in pots mixed ready for use, of the first quality, can be had at any time. Personal attention will be paid to all orders. March 9, 1823. JOHN F. PORTER.

FINE CUTLERY, &c.—JAMES DICKSON, Cutler and Surgical Instrument Maker, No. 3 Beaver street, (formerly at No. 98 North Market street) Albany, manufactures and repairs all kinds of instruments in the above branches, with neatness, accuracy and despatch, and warranted equal to any article imported, or manufactured in the United States.

Shears, Scissors, Razors and Penknives, ground and finished on an improved plan, and warranted to excel any other in use in this city or elsewhere.

Currier's Steels constantly on hand, and warranted a superiour article.

Blades inserted in knife-handles in the most approved style, and most reasonable terms. Locks repaired.

N. B. Country orders punctually attended to.
Albany, Feb. 14, 1823.

31f.

THIS PAPER

Is published every Saturday, by E. B. CHILD,
AT THE CORNER OF NORTH MARKET AND STEUBEN
STREETS, ALBANY, N. Y.

TERMS.—To city subscribers, Three Dollars a year. To subscribers who receive their papers by mail, Two Dollars and Fifty Cents, IN ADVANCE—otherwise, Three Dollars JOB PRINTING neatly executed at this office.

AMERICAN MASONICK RECORD

AND ALBANY SATURDAY MAGAZINE.

VOL. III.

ALBANY, N. Y. SATURDAY, MARCH 14, 1829.

NO. 7.

MASONICK RECORD.

AN ADDRESS,

Delivered before the Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the state of New-York, at its annual communication in Albany, February 4, 1829.

By Rev. Com. JOSEPH PRENTISS, A. M.

Rector of St. Luke's Church, Catskill, and Trinity Church, Athens.
Concluded.

As a minister of the gospel of peace, as the subject of that Prince, whose "Kingdom is not of this world," and as the chaplain of this ancient society, I know no political creed, and have no party attachments; and I trust that I shall say nothing which charity can construe into a contradiction of this profession. But you will suffer me to ask, by way of contrast, what has been the course pursued by the organized body of anti-masons?

Have they not consented to abandon all former political alliance, and to concentrate all their political strength, for the avowed object of giving the executive power and legislative control in this state to persons who had pledged themselves for the destruction of Masonry, and who have thus far laboured in that cause, with a zeal without knowledge and without charity? Have they not unblushingly avowed the intolerant and proscription design of repelling Masons from any participative in public trust or official station, either political, civil or religious? Their cause they tell us, is too holy, and their zeal too pure and disinterested to be combined with political names. The time for the open avowal of such combination, and for disposing of their political strength to the highest bidder, not having yet arrived, they now rally under a new flag, inscribed with "Destruction to Masonry." They reject, as a thing polluted, either food or raiment, which has passed masonick hands; they consider the air which masons breathe as polluted; even the movements and revolutions of the heavenly bodies, their changes and eclipses, are only considered safe and entitled to confidence when observed by anti-masons and announced by their publications: and if masonry cannot be put down or masons banished, we may expect to see this new and holy brotherhood, with their chivalrous and frothy champion at their head, taking up their march to colonize at Oregon, or in some other remote and uncivilized region of the earth not yet profaned by masonick foot.

For the ignorant, the honest and the deluded, in this new fraternity, I feel sentiments of pity and of sorrow; for their more knowing and hypocritical leaders, I have feelings of contempt which the solemnity of this place forbid me to express. But to return to our own defence.

Equally groundless as that of political intolerance, is the charge that masonry claims the right of inflicting upon its refractory members, the most barbarous and sanguinary punishments. The laws and records of masonry may be searched in vain, for any colour of proof in support of this charge.

The inflated representations of this kind, with which the public have been amused, and the credulous and timid have been frightened, are mere words of sound and fury. Masonry claims and exercises no other power over its members than is claimed and exercised by every moral and religious association in our country; the highest and severest penalty which she claims the right to inflict, or which, by her authority ever hath been inflicted upon an offending brother, is expulsion from all the rights and privileges and charities of the fraternity.

If masons violate the laws of their country, by those laws let them be tried and punished, they have no lien upon the fraternity for protection, nor dare they come here and ask to be shielded from the retributions of the civil arm.

But the specious justification of the demand for further and special legislation upon this subject, is the tranquilizing the public mind; for, notwithstanding all that hath been done, the phrenzied excitement, they tell us, still continues.

And will wise and sober men attempt to allay public excitement by an abandonment of the first principle, and by a prostration of the very citadel of civil liberty, the enjoyment by all, of equal laws, impartially administered?

If touched by this excitement, or urged on by its clamours, our legislators shall make enactments, in violation of that principle, they will hereafter look with astonishment upon their folly, and they will have cause to thank heaven, rather than their own wisdom and prudence, if they, or their descendants, become not the victims of their own dangerous precedent. But why this keen and morbid sensibility in relation only to the alleged murder of Morgan? Is this the only crime of the kind, if, indeed, it hath been perpetrated, that sleeps unrevenged in our state? How many murders have been committed with such subtlety of precaution as to elude the eye and escape the retributions of earthly justice. In such instances, and one,* committed under circumstances of peculiar atrocity, have occurred in our adjoining county, on the banks of the Hudson, within a few years, at no great distance from each other, and the perpetrators, who for aught we know were anti-masons, have never been discovered. Why in each such case were not the laws new modelled, new statutes made, and new ministers of justice appointed?

I have not dwelt upon this subject on account of any peculiar importance which I attach to the existence of masonry, nor from any fears of its extermination, nor from any anxious desire for its extension. Indeed, I apprehend, that it is to a too rapid extension, by a too hasty admission and advancement of members, that we are indebted for much of the obloquy and embarrassment which we now suffer. No, I fear nothing from without. It is true, numerous, powerful and intolerant combinations may annoy us; the civil powers may be seduced by misrepresentation to believe, that they shall do God service, to persecute us. But masonry has a hiding place, secured against the inquisition or assault of human power, provided by the Almighty, guarded by his all-seeing eye, and defended by his presence. My fears are, that under the influence of this excitement, laws of unequal bearing may be obtained, jeopardizing the freedom and equal rights of our fellow-citizens:—That masons may conceive themselves persecuted, and under the specious pretence of self preservation or defence, or for the more reprehensible purpose of retaliation or revenge, may be drawn into political or other associations, contrary and corrupting to the principles of their order, and dishonourable to its name.

Truly proud, may we be, of masonry and masons, Brethren, if their prudence and wisdom and patient forbearance, shall steer them safely through the perils and dangers of the rugged passage which seems now to lie before them.

* Miss Hamilton.

It is not in the sunny calm, nor under the fair and gentle breeze, but when the storm rages, when rocks and shoals are near, when the billows roll and the deep is lashed into foam by the fury of the tempest, that the wisdom and skill and firmness of the mariner will appear.

It is, when persecution threatens, or when iniquity abounds and the love of many waxes cold, that the christian's faith and perseverance are tried. And it is under circumstances like those by which masonry is now surrounded, that fortitude, and steadfastness, and sound discretion are required in each individual companion.

If any of our Brethren have scandalized their profession, by perjury or violence, let us deplore it: If we have been individually careless in our moral deportment, or negligent of our obligations as citizens and believers in the just retributions of religion and of laws, let us make haste to reform: If we have been remiss in the administration of official trust, let us return to a prompt, upright and faithful performance of that duty—that so by well doing we may, if possible, "put to shame the ignorance of foolish men." Or, if we are satisfied that the present state of public sentiment and feeling is such, as to suspend the wholesome and charitable operations of masonry: If we believe that the prejudice created by the wilful falsehoods and scandalous imputations of its enemies, will, hereafter, render its institutions, however benevolent in their design, or pure in their administration, productive of more evil than good, then let us quietly, peaceably, and voluntarily lay them aside. But, conscious of our own integrity and innocence, in regard to the outrage which is the alleged justification of that indiscriminate abuse which hath been poured upon us, and having, on a former occasion, most solemnly and publicly disclaimed all knowledge or participation in it,* let us not be intimidated by the violence of either political or religious demagogues, or apostate masons. Let us look for safety to the protecting providence of that Almighty Being "who ruleth the raging of the sea and the noise of his waves," and who is therefore able to restrain and control "the madness of the people." And let us not treacherously denounce an ancient society which in every age hath numbered among its patrons and active supporters, such men as a Washington and a Warren, and a host of individuals distinguished in the higher walks of life for patriotism, and for all the moral and christian virtues, merely because its enemies are unusually clamorous, on account of having discovered, what masons themselves have often sincerely and publicly lamented, that, in common with all other associations, social or religious, it has its unprincipled, depraved and unworthy members.

Neither let us degrade ourselves in the estimation of all pure-minded, enlightened and honourable men of whatever name, by seeking to acquire popular favour, through traitorously surrendering it into polluted hands, or by falling ourselves into the misguided ranks of those who have taken the field for its destruction.

Companions—If after having held fast our integrity as masons; if after having faithfully done our duty as good and obedient citizens, we must still be offered up to appease the angry gods of anti-masonry, then let the sacrifice be made upon the altar of a pure heart; let it be made in the presence of an approving conscience; and it will then be an acceptable sacrifice to Him, "unto whom all hearts are open, all desires known, and from whom no secrets are hid."

* See Appendix, next column.

APPENDIX.

Extract from the proceedings of the Grand Chapter, 1827.

The committee appointed by resolution of the Grand Chapter, on the affair of William Morgan, made the following report, which was accepted, and the preamble and resolution adopted.

That they have attended to the duties assigned them, and that from the highly agitated and inflamed state of public feeling on this subject, and from the false and undeserved imputations which have been thrown upon freemasons, and the masonic order generally, your committee deem it proper that this Grand Chapter should make a publick expression of its sentiments in relation to the affair alluded to. Your committee, as expressive of their views on this subject, would offer for the consideration of the Grand Chapter, the following preamble and resolutions.

Whereas, the rights of personal liberty and security are guaranteed by the free constitution under which we, the members of this Grand Chapter, in common with the rest of our fellow-citizens, have the happiness to live: And whereas we esteem the preservation of these rights of vital importance to the perpetuity and full enjoyment of the blessings of our republican institutions: And whereas the community has lately witnessed a violation of the same, under the alleged pretext of the masonic name and sanction, in the case of William Morgan: And whereas, the principles of our ancient and honourable fraternity contain nothing which, in the slightest degree, justify or authorise such proceedings; but, on the contrary, do in all their tenets and ceremonies, encourage and inculcate a just submission to the laws, the enjoyment of equal rights by every individual, and a high and elevated spirit of personal as well as national independence:

Therefore Resolved, by this Grand Chapter, that we its members, individually and as a body, do disclaim all knowledge or approbation of the said proceedings, in relation to the abduction of the said William Morgan; and that we disapprove of the same, as a violation of the majesty of the laws, and an infringement of the rights of personal liberty, secured to every citizen of our free and happy republic.

ODD FELLOWS' DEPARTMENT.

AN ADDRESS,

Delivered before the Philanthropic Lodge, No. 5, of Independent Odd Fellows, in the city of Albany, by the M. N. G.

Respected Brethren,—It is with considerable diffidence that I rise to present you an address, introductory to the regular course adopted at our last meeting; a diffidence which arises from a consciousness of my inexperience in a performance of this nature, and my inability to do justice to a subject requiring the talents and exertions of one more skilled in the execution of so interesting an office. But while I labour under these disadvantages, I am warmly encouraged in the belief that my endeavours will be succeeded by brethren better qualified to discharge so instructive a duty; and that we have brethren eminently possessed of such abilities, I need not hesitate proudly to assert.

As the adoption of this weekly course was intended to unite amusement with instruction, and while it beguiles away the few moments of time we are permitted to spend in our meetings of friendship, that we should be gaining thereby, without the labour of direct application, that instruction applying practically to our welfare. Following up the idea, I shall direct your attention to the importance of the acquirement of knowledge and its undeniable value.

Perhaps, brethren, there is no country in existence, whose inhabitants are more happily blessed with the opportunities of obtaining the general groundwork of an education, calculated to release the mind from the vassalage and degradation of ignorance, than the land we now inhabit, and are proud to acknowledge as the place of our nativity. Nor must the promulgation of popular instruction be estimated as contributing alone to the exaltation of our minds and heightening the enjoyments of secluded society; it has claims upon our attention of far greater magnitude.

The repeated failures sustained by the ancients in the formation of their republics clearly proves, that a nation, to maintain that honourable distinction, must be emphatically a "Republic of Letters;" and it may with certainty be asserted, that education and the general intelligence of our countrymen is the spine of our happy constitution, from whence are derived those blessings of liberty daily appreciated by ourselves; and increasing terror to the reigning aristocrats of the world, and the envy of their oppressed subjects.

Ignorance is certainly the source of more than half our miseries and misfortunes; it renders our exertions feeble, our best intentions ill directed, and exposes us as a prey to the more crafty intelligent. Ignorance, in a political point of view, is likewise attended with the same evils, and subjects us to the like impositions of the wicked, as in the more secluded avocations of life.

History is replete with evidence sufficiently strong to substantiate the truth of this allegation. It affords numerous instances of governments established upon what was then thought to be the strongest and most lasting basis, and intended to insure the prosperity and happiness of its framers; and we have seen them gradually fall a prey to the artifices of some restless aspirant, who, acquainted with the weakness of its structure, and imposing upon the unsuspecting credulity of his countrymen, has finally usurped the sovereignty of the nation, to gratify his ambitious designs.

The hand of improvement is naturally tardy in its operations even under the most propitious circumstances; our surprise therefore decreases when we reflect how gradual the change has been in the course of knowledge and refinement, even opposed by numerous and powerful obstacles, which it had to surmount before it could have wrought the happy change, witnessed in the present day, of which we are all more or less partakers.

Leaving those days of Antiquity, before invention was brought in to aid the cause of Science and Philosophy, let us trace the art of promulgating information by means of the press, through all those countries where it was suffered to exist, and diffuse its benign influence, the history of its trials and conflicts in the prostrate cause of general intelligence, will afford us sufficient evidence of the importance the sovereigns of those countries attached to its extinction, to enable them to support their unhallowed cause of usurpation and tyranny. What wise monarch, wishing to sustain his sovereignty, would give license to a system calculated to inspire the minds of his subjects with feelings of personal independence, and a disposition to question the right of his authority? On the contrary, it would be his policy, as it has been the policy of sovereigns in all ages, to humble the rising spirit of independence, which is the natural effect of minds expanded by knowledge and reflection, and raised above the level of grovelling submission, the consequence of ignorance.

Knowledge being therefore power, and ignorance imbecility, is it to be wondered that the advances of the ancients should have been so slow in its attainment, when we consider this dampening interest standing ever ready to oppose the liberating spirit, whenever it began to extend its genial influence.

Conclusion next week.

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

ENCKE'S COMET.

The comet, denominated Encke's comet, which is now engrossing the publick mind generally, and the scientific world in particular, has justly claimed and received the careful attention of astronomers, since its appearance in 1818 engaged Professor Encke to consider the elements of its orbit. He was enabled to identify it with a comet described by Messrs. Mechain and Messier in 1786, in the constellation Aquarius; also with a comet discovered in 1795, by Miss Herschel in the constellation Cygnus; and with the comet in 1805. The investigation of the professor enabled him to foretell its re-appearance in 1822, and to state the probability of its not being observable in our climate. This anticipation was realized by the fortunate circumstance of the attachment of Sir Thomas Brisbane to astronomical pursuits, who was then governor of New South Wales, and had fitted up an observatory there, and provided himself with the able assistance of Mr. Rumker. The latter gentleman appears to have discovered the phenomena of June 2, 1822; and his accurate observations afforded Encke the means of reconsidering the true elements of the comet's orbit, and with additional confidence to compute its return for 1825. This occurred as was expected; the fresh data afforded by that return were carefully collated by the professor to enable him still more satisfactorily to define the orbit, and with increased confidence to predict its return this year. It was first observed by Mr. South on October 30, 1828. This comet affords particular interest to the mind of the astronomer, though it does not offer a splendid object to his eye. Its orbit is an ellipsis of comparatively small dimensions, wholly within the orbit of Jupiter; its period is about three years and three-tenths,—a much shorter period than has hitherto appeared due to any other comet, with the exception of one seen in 1770, which did not satisfy, as far as observation has been able to show, the prediction of the period of five years and a half which was attributed to it. In the opinion of Encke and other astronomers, the comet which is now visible may afford an opportunity of proving that the heavens oppose a resisting medium to the motion of bodies. This subject has been discussed in the Transactions of the Astronomical Society of London, by the able mathematician Masotti; and that gentleman offers strong reasons for considering comets capable of affording a demonstration of a resisting medium in the heavens, though planets may give no indication of it. Another comet which encourages the anticipation of much astronomical gratification, is one which Biela discovered February 27, 1826, and which was afterwards seen by Gambart and others. It seems to possess similar claims to the attention of astronomers as that of Encke, it being conceived to revolve about the sun in about six years seven-tenths, and to be the same as the comet which appeared in 1772, and that which appeared in 1806. Encke's comet will be in its perihelion, by computations, on 10th January, 1829.

[Companion to the Almanack.

COMET OF 1811.

According to the recent calculations of the Professor Lambert, of the University of Dorpat, the comet so long visible in the year 1811, was 57 2-3 times smaller than the sun, but 17 times bigger than Jupiter, 25,104 times bigger than our globe, 1,255,000 times bigger than the moon, while its orbit exceeds that of all the planets of our solar system put together.

[Leipziger Literatur Zeitung.

THE WINDS.

It may be stated as a rule without exception, that the west winds are more frequent than the east. But the west winds diminish more and more in proportion as the centre of the continent is approached; they are more frequent in England, Holland, and France, than in Denmark, and in the greatest part of Germany: they are of more frequent occurrence in the last mentioned countries than in Sweden and Russia. In London, the east winds (N. E., E., S. E.) are to the west winds (N. W., W., S. W.) as 1 is to 1.7; at Amsterdam, as 1 to 1.6; at Sandmoer as 1 to 1.6; at Copenhagen as 1 to 1.5; at Stockholm as 1 to 1.4; at Saint Petersburg as 1 to 1.3.

The west winds blow from the direction of the south point in proportion as the Atlantick sea is approached: towards the middle of the continent, they blow more nearly from the direct west quarter, or from N. W. The north winds appear to increase as we go eastward. Among the winds which blow from the west, that of the S. W. quarter is most prevalent in England, Holland and France: the direct west predominates in Denmark, and in the greater part of Germany; at Moscow, the N. W. is most prevalent; at Saint Petersburg and Stockholm, the north wind is much more frequent than in the more western parts of Europe.

In the western and central parts of the north of Europe, such as England, France, Denmark, Germany, Norway, the west winds are much more frequent during the summer than during the winter and spring. This does not appear to be the case in Sweden or Russia. During winter, the point from which the western winds blow inclines to the south; they are more direct and more northern in the summer. The rule, however, does not appear to extend to the eastern parts of Europe.

[Bull. Univ.

CHARACTER.

THE LATE REV. WILLIAM TAYLOR.

The following notice of this respected individual, formerly of the Catholic Church in Boston, and who recently died in Paris, is from the Genius of Masonry, by Col. Knapp:

This good man we mourn, was the Rev. Dr. Taylor. In his death the world has lost one of its brightest ornaments, in or out of the pulpit. He was among the most learned of the present generation of distinguished men. He was a profound mathematician and an admirable linguist; deeply read in his profession, and master of the accomplishments of a gentleman, and gifted with the graces of a christian. In the odour of sanctity he practised all the courtesies of society, nor did he, like some narrow minded ecclesiastics, fear to bring the charms of classical learning into the persuasions of the sanctuary. He defended his faith with the warmth of an apostle and a martyr, and at the same time seized the dark and thick envelopements of bigotry with the strong hand of a reformer. His eloquence, if not faultless, was most attractive; it was rich with the spoils of time, and full of the unction of truth. To make his calling effectual to his flock, he whispered the promises of hope to the unhappy, and brought the consolations of the gospel to the wounded in spirit; he gave instructions with words of comfort, and accompanied his reproofs with needful precepts; but amiable as he was, the denunciations of the Messiah to the oppressor and the hypocrite were breathed in terror from his lips. His pen was as fluent as his tongue, and drew copiously from the sweetest fountains of knowledge—the master spirits of the classic ages—and from the scriptures, the deep wells of eternal life. He wrote on all subjects with the ease of high acquirements and commanding talents; he passed from eloquence to poetry, not as a business, but as an elegant amusement, which, if it does not consecrate an hour, throws the perfume of taste and genius over the moments of leisure, and invigorates the minds for weightier duties.

All his holy functions were divinely administered; he stood by the bed where parting life was laid, to charm away the fiends of conscience by the power of the repentance which he taught, and by the gospel promises he had in store; and waited in earnest prayer (for he believed this world more intimately connected with another than most men) to deliver over to whispering angels, and sister spirits, the humble, the contrite, the believing, trusting soul. Like all men of refined minds and studious habits, he was sometimes overtaken by the clouds of a gloomy hour; but he brushed away the tear that unpleasant recollections or sad forebodings had wrung from his heart, and he came out, and joined the social circle, when his duties would permit, with alacrity and interest; and by his presence impressed upon the votaries of fashion this great truth; that elegance, refinement and intelligence require the purity of devotion, and the gentleness of sanctity, to give a perfect and an exquisite finish to the manners of a gentleman.

MAHOMET.

The following curious particulars of the personal character of this celebrated impostor are derived from a "Description of Mussulman Records in the Cabinet of the Duc de Blacas;" recently published by M. Reinaud, of the King's Library at Paris.

Mahomet was naturally gay, affable, and of an even disposition. He listened patiently to every body; and, to use the expression of his historians, when he was in company he was never the first to rise.

His domestick establishment was simple, modest; in short, like that of a private individual. Dates and water were the food most frequently used; and sometimes two months would elapse without the lighting of a fire. Mahomet darned his own stockings, mended his own clothes, swept his own room, and waited on himself.

He constantly maintained forty persons at his own expense. Whatever they asked, he never refused; so that more than once it happened to him to be in want of the necessaries of life. God,—again to use the words of his historians,—offered him the keys of all the treasures of the earth; but he declined them.

The feeling which Mahomet was the least able to controul, especially towards the latter part of his life, was the love of women. That taste, and a liking for perfumes, were, after ambition, his two ruling passions. "Two things," he himself said, "attract and excite me—women and perfumes; these two things recreate me, and render me more disposed to prayer."

Mahomet married about a dozen women, not reckoning slaves. At his death he left nine of them. This was an evident violation of the precept which he had himself established, and which fixed the number of wives at four. But in his character of a prophet he pretended to be exempted from the common law: He affected to say, that all the prophets who had preceded him had acted in the same manner. The truth is, that whether we regard his own life, or certain passages in the Alcoran, it is manifest that he placed sovereign happiness in sensual pleasures.

Mahomet was very zealous for his friends. He loved to serve them with the same ardour with which they served him; which was in his eyes the surest method of attaching them to his cause. But in proportion as he was disposed to serve his friends, was he implacable towards his enemies. If any one interposed an obstacle to his designs, he gave himself up to excessive resentment; fire, poison,—he stuck at nothing. In this respect he shared the vindictive feelings of his countrymen; and he did not begin to manifest any greatness of soul, until the firm establishment of his power had placed him above these horrible atrocities.

Mahomet treated religion as a political means of arriving at his ends. On every occasion he made Heaven speak. Thus, by the assistance of the Alcoran alone, we may form a notion of the most important epochs of his life. He never failed to give to all his proceedings a religious character. The Mussulmans, in order to express the extreme attention of Mahomet to every thing which related to the Deity, say, that even when he looked down on the earth, his reflections were on heaven.

By such devices he inspired an enthusiasm among his companions, of which it is difficult to find a second instance. When he cleansed himself, his disciples took the water which had washed away his filth, and respectfully drank it; when he expectorated, they swallowed his saliva; when he cut his hair, they eagerly collected the fragments. In speaking of this subject, an idolater of Mecca, who had witnessed the splendour of the Caesars of Constantinople, and that of the Cosroes of Persia, declared that no king had ever been so respected, that no prince had ever enjoyed such an empire, as Mahomet.

THE GATHERER.

A THANKSGIVING TURKEY.

An ingenious contriver of ways and means, residing hereabouts, some twenty years ago, being in want of a turkey wherewith to be thankful according to law on the last Thursday in November, set his wits to work to procure one without labour, love, or money. Turkeys, as every body knows, are fond of an apple tree for their couch, and our hero, going in the stillness of night, singled out a fine fat gobbler from a tree full belonging to one of his neighbours. While reconnoitering the roost, he heard the feathered bipeds say, very distinctly, "Quit! Quit! Quit!" But considering these as mere words of course, he did not regard him a feather, but taking a bit of red yarn from his pocket, he made it fast to the right leg of his intended prize, and retired without further alarming the brood, or at all disturbing their owner. The next day he went to his neighbour's house with the following interrogatory—"You hav'nt seen no stray gobbler here, have ye?" The neighbour answered that he had not; but that there might possibly be one amongst his turkeys; and asked the other if he should know his turkey on seeing him? "O yes," said the wily man of inventions, "I should know him very well, by a bit of red yarn he had round his right leg." Accordingly the whole flock of turkeys were assembled, and the man deeply regretting his loss, and declaring he would not have taken a silver dollar for the bird, began to examine the "whole lot." "Gobble! gobble! gobble!" said an indignant turkey, taller than the rest by a head. "Ah! that's he," said the man, springing up two feet as he spoke, "that's the very identical feller, don't you see he has got the mark on?" "Well so he has, sure enough," said the honest neighbour, taking two quids of pig-tail in three seconds, "and yet I'll be darned and roasted alive, if he does'nt look as much like a gobbler of mine as two white beans! Howsomer, as the critter belongs to you, why, you must take him, that's all." He said no more, but caught the turkey and handed him over (as he verily supposed) to the rightful claimant. The other thanked him for his trouble, and after inviting him to come and take a thanksgiving supper with him and telling him he should be as welcome to a bit of the turkey as though it was his own, he marched off triumphantly, with the prize under his arm, and a laugh in his sleeve. [Berks. American.

HISTORY OF COFFEE.

The discovery of coffee is generally attributed to the Prior of a monastery in that part of Arabia where the shrub is indigenous. The facts of the case, however, as verified by the learned Abdalculder, whose manuscript is in the King of France's library, and by M. Galland, translator of the Arabian Tales, are as follows:—About the middle of the fifteenth century, one Gemaleddin, who resided at Aden, near the mouth of the Red Sea, having occasion to travel into Persia, found there some of his countrymen, who were in the habit of taking coffee; and who were loud in the praise of its virtues. On his return to Aden, he was cured of sickness by the use of coffee. As Mufti of Aden, and having occasion to pass whole nights in prayer, Gemaleddin persuaded the Dervishes, the better to fit them for watching, to make use of coffee. In a short time there was no beverage in Aden so popular as coffee: lawyers took it to stimulate their faculties; mechanicks and artists to invigorate their bodies; travellers to aid them in prosecuting their journey by night: in short, all Aden took it. From Aden it passed to Mecca, where it became in a short time, if possible, still more popular. From Arabia Felix it was carried into Egypt, thence to Syria, and finally to Constantinople.

WINE.

The ancients had a high opinion of this beverage. The Greeks regarded it as the most precious gift of the gods. Callimachus sings that the power of wine is equal to that of fire: it puts all the humours of his body into motion—draws out the profoundest secrets of his heart, and produces disorder in his mind. Aristophanes says that wine is the milk of Venus and the Loves, but that its excess leads to the most shameful and criminal debauchery. The Greek Anthology contains a beautiful epigram on the power of wine in love: "Weaving a crown, I discovered Love concealed among roses—I seized him by his wings, and plunged the little urchin into wine, and drank it—But how has he avenged himself? He has infused fury into the very marrow of my bones."

TURN-COAT.

The Duke of Savoy took indifferently sometimes part with France, and sometimes with Spain, for that purpose he had a juste au corps, white on one side and scarlet on the other; so that, when he meant to declare for France, he wore the white outside, and when for Spain the red. This is the origin of the proverb, tourner casaque, or "turn-coat."

MAN.

Man is so pugnacious an animal, that even the quakers, who in all other things seem effectually to have subdued this part of their animal nature, carry on controversy, whenever they engage in it, tooth and nail. [Quarterly Review.

THE LEGENDARY.

From "Legends of the Lakes," by T. Crofton Croker.

DARBY O'REILY.

In the good old times there existed in Ireland a race of mortals, who, under the denomination of "poor scholars," used to travel from parish to parish, and county to county, in order to increase their stock of knowledge. These poor scholars were for the most part men of from twenty to five-and-twenty years of age; and as they were also agreeable, social fellows, who during their peregrinations had acquired a fund of anecdote, could tell a good story, and never refused to lend a helping hand in any business that was going forward, they were received with a *caed mille fauiltha at every farmer's house throughout the country, where they were welcome to stay as long as they pleased. It happened one evening in the month of July, that one of these peripatetics, a stout, platter-faced mortal, by name Darby O'Reily (the very same it was who invented the famous stone soup), made his appearance at the house of the widow Fleming, who dwelt not far from the old church at Kilcummin. Now, the widow Fleming, who, since her husband's death had taken the entire management of a large farm upon herself, was very glad to see Darby O'Reily for a variety of reasons. In the first place, it was the hay harvest, and Darby would lend a helping hand and keep the men in good humour at their work with his merry stories; then he could teach the children great A B C of an evening; and then she was a lone woman, and Darby was a pleasant companion, and an old acquaintance moreover. Whether this last idea was of deeper root than the others is not for me to say, but certain it is that Darby received on the present occasion more than a common welcome from the widow Fleming. After having partaken of the good cheer which the widow set before him in the greatest profusion, and having renewed his acquaintance with the inmates of the house, even to Darby the dog that was named after him, and the cat, he proposed to step down to the parish jig-house, just to shuffle the brogue with his old sweethearts, hear the news, and see how the neighbours were getting on,—for it was near a twelvemonth since he had been in that part of the country. Now, whether it was the mention of sweethearts that disagreed with the widow, or whatever else might have been the cause, it is certain that she was much against Darby's going to the jig-house; but seeing that she could not with any decency or effect gainsay his intentions, she was obliged to assent, at the same time, however, warning him to be back early, and not to keep up the house. Away he went to the jig-house, where he found himself quite at home, and as welcome as the flowers of May. Fine fun he had of it, for the pipes played merrily up, while he footed it bravely with the prettiest girls and the best moneen jiggers in all the barony. To speak the truth, he wasn't a bad hand at a jig himself, for there were few could equal him in the "heel and toe" step; and then he put such life and spirit into his motions, that he made the house ring again with his grinding and the merry snap of his fingers. But your dancing is doughty work,—at least Darby O'Reily was of that opinion, although there was no fear of his dying for the want of a drop to drink, as he had news for the old, and stories for the young, till at last it was Darby here, and Darby there, and who but Darby? The soul of merriment and the prince of good fellows, every one striving who should be the first to treat him, Darby soon became as comfortable as any gentleman could wish to be. But while Darby was drinking, and dancing, and making merry, he never remembered it was time to go home, or bestowed a single thought upon the widow Fleming's good advice, which was very ungrateful of him, considering the civil way she had behaved to him, and that she was even then herself sitting up waiting his return. The longest day will have an end, and the greatest merriment must at length give way to repose, as Darby found to his sorrow, when the party broke up, and he had to stagger away as well as he could. He was so much "in the wind" that he didn't well know which way he was going; and as bad luck would have it, he went every way but the right; for instead of keeping the straight road, by way of making a short cut, he turned off through the fields; and after wandering about for as good as an hour, where should he find himself but in the old fort at Claunteens. A bad place it is to get into at the dead hour of the night, when the good people are going their rounds and making merry, as Darby soon found; for though it was easy enough to get into the fort, he could not get out of it for the life of him: it even appeared to him as if the fort had increased its dimensions to a boundless extent. He wandered up and down and round about for a long time, without ever being able to get out, and was obliged at last to content himself where he was, so down he sat on a stone. There's small fun in sitting on a could stone in the moonshine," muttered Darby; "and sure it's a pitiful case to be bewitched by the fairies—the good people, I mean,—and stuck fast in the middle of an ould fort; but there's no help for it, so what can't be cured must be endured." No sooner had he come to this very wise conclusion, than he heard a most tremendous hammering under the very stone he was sitting on. "O Darby," cried he, "what'll become of you now?" Plucking up his courage he boldly took a peep beneath the stone, when what should he see but a cluricaune sitting under the projecting ledge of what had been his seat, and hammering as hard as he could at the heel of an old shoe. Although Darby was very much afraid of the fairies, he wasn't a bit in dread of the cluricaune; for they say if you catch a cluricaune and keep him fast he'll show you where his purse is hid, and make a rich man of you. But it wasn't thinking of purses Darby was, for he'd rather be out of the fort than to get all the purses in the world. So when he saw the cluricaune, it came into his head that may be he'd lend him a helping hand, for they say the little fellow is fond of a drop himself. "Success to you, my boy, you are a good hand at a shoe, any how," said Darby, addressing himself to the cluricaune. "Ah! Darby, my jolly buck, is that you?" said the cluricaune, getting up from his work and looking him full in the face. "The very same at your honour's service," answered Darby. "What brought you here?" said the cluricaune; "I'm thinking you've got yourself into a bit of a scrape." "Fakes then, your honour, I'm thinking the very same," said Darby, "if your honour does not lend me a helping hand." So he told him how he stopped at the widow Fleming's, how he went down to the jig-house, and being a little overtaken in liquor, how he wandered through the fields until he found himself in the old fort, and wasn't able to make his way out again. "You're in a bad case, Darby," said the cluricaune; "for the good people will be here directly; and if they find you before them, Darby, they'll play the puck with you." "Oh, murder!" cried Darby, "I throw my life upon the heel of your honour's shoe." "Well," said the cluricaune, "you're a rollocking lad as ever tipped a can, and it's a pity any harm should ever come of taking a drop of good drink. So give me your hand, and I'll save you. And as you never did any hurt to me or mine, I'll do more than that for you, Darby. Here, take this charm, and you are made, for ever, my man." "And what's the nature of it?" said Darby, at the same time putting it into his right-hand breeches pocket, and buttoning it up tight. "I'll tell you that," said the cluricaune; "if you only pin it to the petticoat of the first woman in the land, she'll follow you the wide world over; and that's no bad thing for a poor scholar." So saying, the cluricaune took him out of the fort, put him on the straight road, and wishing him success with the charm, burst into a fit of laughter and disappeared. "Good riddance of you, any how,—but 'tis an ugly laugh you have with you," said Darby as he made his way to the widow Fleming's, who was in no great humour; and no wonder, to be kept up so late by such a drunken bletherum as Darby. Now when he saw the widow in a bit of a fret, "Ho! by my soul," said he, "I've the cure in my breeches pocket." So with that he outs with the charm, and pinned it slyly to the widow's gown. "I've charmed her now," says Darby, "if there's any truth in that little chap of a cluricaune." And certainly there was soon a wonderful change in the widow, who, from being as glum as a misty morning, became as soft as butter. So very careful was she of Darby, that, late as it was, she made down a good fire, lest he should be cold after the night, brought him a supper of the best the house could afford, and had as much cooram about him as if he was lord of the land. Darby grinned with delight at the success of his charm, but he was soon made to grin at the wrong side of his mouth; for the widow, in the midst of her love, chanced to discover the charm that was pinned to the tail of her gown. "What's this you've pinned to my gown, you rogue you?" said she, at the same time flinging it into the fire. "Botheration," roared Darby, "I'm settled for now;" and no wonder he should roar, for the charm took instant effect; and the fire jumped holus bolus after Darby, who made for the door, and away he went as fast as his legs could carry him. But if he did, the fire came after him, roaring and blazing as if there were a thousand tar barrels in the middle of it. Away he ran for the bare life, across the country, over hedge and ditch, for as good as two miles; neither stopping nor staying till he came to a deep well on a high farm, between Tullig and Gleun a Heelah, when who should he meet but his old friend the cluricaune. "Arrah, Darby!" says the little fellow, "you seem to be in a wonderful hurry; where are you going so fast, man, that you would not stop to spake to an old acquaintance?" "Bad luck to you, you deceitful hop of my thumb," said Darby; "for sure it's all along of you and your charm that I'm in the neat way I am this blessed night." "And that's my thanks for saving you from the good people," says the cluricaune: "very well, Mister Darby, there's the fire at your heels, and who's to save you now?" "O! thunder alive! sure you would not be after sarving Darby that way." "Well," said the cluricaune, "I'll take compassion on you this once; so here's my advice, leap into the well, and you'll be safe." "Is it into the well you mane," says Darby, "why then do you take me for a fool entirely?" "O! you're a very wise man, to be sure, seeing you're a scholar, Darby, so you may take your own way if you like, and welcome. Good night to you, Darby O'Reily," said the spiteful little fellow, slapping his cocked hat on his head, and walking off with a most malicious grin. "Good night to you, Darby O'Reily." "Murder! murder!" shouted Darby, for by this time the fire had come so near that it began to scorch him; when seeing there was no alternative, and thinking it better to be drowned than burned, he made a desperate plunge into the well. Souse he went into the well, and souse went the fire after him. Immediately the water bubbled, sparkled, growled, and rose above the verge of the well, filling with the velocity of lightning all the adjacent hollow ground, until it formed one of those little sparkling lakes which are so numerous in this hilly country. Darby was borne with the speed of a whirlwind on the top of a curling billow, and cast senseless on the shore. The first thing he saw on awaking from his trance was the sun shining over him; the first voice he heard was that of the widow Fleming, who had travelled far and near in search of him; and the first word Darby uttered, upon thoroughly recovering himself, was, "Bad luck to the good people, for sure 'tis they that have been playing tricks upon me all the night." Then he up and told the widow Fleming and the neighbours the whole history of his night's adventure. "It's drunk you were, Darby, and you know it," said the widow; "You're a bad boy, Darby." But whatever was the cause, whether Darby got the charm from the cluricaune or not, it is certain that the widow Fleming not long after became Mrs. O'Reily, and that Loch Bran or the Lake of the Burning Cole, is to be seen to this day.

It would be a very pleasant thing, if literary productions could be submitted to something like chemical analysis,—if we could separate the merit of a book, as we can the magnesia of Epsom salts, by a simple practical application of the doctrine of affinities.

* A hundred thousand welcomes.

MISCELLANY.

THE SHELL.

AN HISTORICAL APOLOGUE.

"The world was made for Man," said he.

"I will tell you an apologue," answered the teacher:

1. In a beautiful bay of the celebrated island Atlantis, a large Shell of the delicate white, and the most rounded form, the relic from some previous world, lay on the smooth and elastic sand. It was left for a long period undisturbed and unaltered; sometimes kissed by the extreme bubbles of the billows, and often trembling so melodiously in the wind as to have furnished to the early gods the first hint of a musical instrument, and to have been the prototype of the sounding conches which accompanied with their deep notes the feasts on Olympus, and the Indian triumphs of Bacchus.

2. The moist dust gradually accumulated within it, and the germ of a sea-weed fell upon the soil, and grew until a fair and flourishing plant, with long dark leaves, overhung the white edge of the thin and moonlike vase. For many months the ocean herb retained its quiet existence, imbibed the nightdew of the heavens, rejoiced in the fresh breezes from the sea, and lived in tranquil safety through every change of shower and sunshine. At length a storm arose which rolled the waters upon the shore. The Shell was overwhelmed, the plant washed out of it, and the light vessel swept into a cleft of the rocks.

3. After some days of calm and warmth, a bird dropped into it a seed, which sprouted, and became an orange-tree. Its leaves were so thick and green, that they would have supplied a graceful chaplet to a wood-nymph, and she might have delighted to place in her bosom the pearly and fragrant blossoms which hung amid the tuft of verdure. The seasons with their varieties, and the starry influences of gentle nights, nurtured the shrub, and the pure flowers were changed into gorgeous fruits, which gleamed through the foliage like the glimpses of a gilded statue in some deserted temple through the robes and coronals of creepers which have overgrown it. The orange-tree had gladdened many spring-times with its sweetness and its splendour, when it faded and died; and the birds of the air piped a lamentation over the shrub, amid the living beauty of which they had so often nestled.

4. In after years, when nothing remained of the orange but a slight and dreamy odour around the Shell, and the last light grains of the dust wherein it grew had been borne away by the eddy breezes, a butterfly, as red and glittering as the planet Mars, came on its crimson wings to the dim and spiral cell. It fluttered round the ivory entrance, poised itself upon it for a moment, and waved its silken sails. Then, after darting and circling, like a winged mote of the sunbeam, through the deep woods and over the sea, it returned to perish. While it sank into its quiet and beautiful retreat, it yet seemed loth to leave a world which to it had been a fairy domain; but the necessity of its nature was upon it, and it closed the gay leaflets which had sustained its flight, and resigned itself to death.

5. It was followed by a troop of bees, which took possession of the Shell, and, after their daily excursions over meadow and bloomy bank, returned to its smooth and undulated chambers with the materials of their combs, and with large stores of bright and luxurious honey. The tiny echoes of their abode resounded with the constant hum of labour and happiness, and it was soon as brimming as a wine cup at a nuptial-feast, with the rich and perfumed treasures of the insects, arranged and sealed in the exact compartments which filled the interior of their silvery palace. But a bird attacked and destroyed their commonwealth, and again the Shell was left empty.

6. A humming-bird, all emerald, ruby, and sapphire, then discovered the lonely nook, and folded there its jewelled wings. It soon found a mate, and together they lived a flowery life. He who had seen either of them wandering at sunset through the glen, would have believed that the brilliant core of the western sky was fluttering away along the earth; or the little animal might have been thought the choicest signet of a prince, transformed of a sudden into a living thing, and endowed with the power of flight. When they wheeled together towards their home at twilight, no pair of fire-flies, no twin-lights of the firmament could be brighter than were their diamond crests. The sweet essences of a thousand buds and flowers supplied their nourishment; and, while they sucked the delicious juices of ripe fruits, their wings were tintured by the lightest bloom of the plum and the grape. But the rain dropped thick and fast into the Shell, and the gentle birds, which seemed made to whisper love-messages in the rosebud ear of a lady, and to hide themselves in sport among her ringlets, departed from their nest, and sought in sparry grotto, or in southern bower, a more secure habitation for their lovely but frail existence.

7. Lastly, at sunrise, seemed flitting from the morning star an elfin spirit, which danced into the Shell, and assumed it as his home. It thrilled with life and pulsation; and, while a spring gushed out of the rock, and bore it along towards the sea, he spread his thin wings to the breeze, and sailed in his lily-coloured argosy away over the blue and sunny deep. The white Shell, and its new sovereign, moved forward with the graceful swiftness of a snowy swan, tilting over the light ripples of the water, and, when night came with its constellations, seemed to be itself a trembling star on the verge of the horizon. That spirit, too, shall inhabit the Shell but for a time, and shall then depart, that he may develop, in some other more fitting position, the whole capacities of his nature. The Shell will sink into the waves, and be joined to the treasures of the ocean caverns, in them, also, to aid the existence of other beings, and to fulfil a new cycle of its ministry.

That Shell is the WORLD: that spirit, MAN. Yet not for man alone was it created, but for all the living things in the successive stages of existence, which can find in it a means of happiness, and an instrument of the laws which govern their being.

From the "Disowned," by the author of "Pelham."

ADVANTAGES OF A GOOD HEART.

The next day, Sir Christopher Findlater called on Clarence. "Let us lounge into the park," said he. "With pleasure replied Clarence; and into the park they lounged. By the way they met a crowd, who were hurrying a man to prison. The good hearted Sir Christopher stopped—"Who is that poor fellow?"—said he, "It is the celebrated"—(in England all criminals are celebrated. Thurtell was a hero, Thistlewood a patriot, and Fauntleroy was discovered to be exactly like Bonaparte)—"it is the celebrated robber, John Jeffries, who broke into Mrs. Wilson's house, and cut the throats of herself and her husband, wounded the maid-servant, and split the child's skull with a poker." * * * "John Jeffries!" exclaimed the baronet, "let us come away." "Linden," continued Sir Christopher, "that fellow was my servant once. He robbed me to some considerable extent. I caught him. He appealed to my heart, and you know, my dear fellow, that was irresistible, so I let him off. Who could have thought he would have turned out so!" And the baronet proceeded to eulogize his own good nature, by which it is just necessary to remark, that one miscreant had been saved for a few years from transportation in order to rob and murder ad libitum, and having fulfilled the office of a common pest, to suffer on the gallows at last. What a fine thing it is to have a good heart! Both our gentlemen now sunk into a reverie, from which they were awakened at the entrance of the park, by a young man in rags, who with a piteous tone, supplicated charity. Clarence, who to his honour be it spoken, spent an allotted and considerable part of his income in judicious and laborious benevolence, had read a little of political morals, then beginning to be understood, and walked on. The good hearted baronet put his hand in his pocket, and gave the beggar half-a-guinea, by which a young, strong man, who had only just commenced the trade, was confirmed in his imposition for the rest of his life; and instead of the useful support, became the pernicious incumbrance of society. Sir Christopher had now recovered his spirits. "What's like a good action?" said he to Clarence, with a swelling breast. The park was crowded to excess; our loungers were joined by Lord St. George. His lordship was a staunch Tory. He could not endure Wilkes, liberty, or general education. He launched out against the enlightenment of domesticicks. "What has made you so bitter?" said Sir Christopher. "My valet!" cried Lord St. George, "he has invented a new toasting fork; is going to take out a patent, make his fortune, and leave me; that's what I call ingratitude, Sir Christopher; for I ordered his wages to be raised five pounds but last year." "It was very ungrateful," said the ironical Clarence. "Very!" reiterated the good hearted Sir Christopher. "You cannot recommend me a valet, Findlater," renewed his lordship; "a good, honest, sensible fellow, who can neither read nor write?" "N—o—o—that is to say, yes! I can; my old servant, Collard, is out of place, and is as ignorant as—as—" "I—or you are," said Lord St. George, with a laugh. "Precisely," replied the baronet. "Well then, I take your recommendation: send him to me to-morrow at twelve." "I will," said Sir Christopher. "My dear Findlater," cried Clarence, when Lord St. George was gone, "did you not tell me some time ago, that Collard was a great rascal, and closely lie with Jeffries? and now you recommend him to Lord St. George!" "Huah, hush, hush!" said the baronet; "he was a great rogue, to be sure; but poor fellow, he came to me yesterday with tears in his eyes, and said he should starve if I would not give him a character; so what could I do?" "At least tell Lord St. George the truth," observed Clarence. "But then Lord St. George would not take him!" rejoined the good hearted Sir Christopher, with forcible naivete. "No, no, Linden, we must not be so hard hearted; we must forgive and forget;" and so saying, the baronet threw out his chest, with the conscious exultation of a man who has uttered a noble sentiment. The moral of this little history is, that Lord St. George, having been pillaged "through thick and thin," as the proverb has it, for two years, at last missed a gold watch, and Monsieur Collard finished his career, as his exemplary tutor, Mr. Jeffries, had done before him. Ah! what a fine thing it is to have a good heart. But, to return, just as our wanderers had arrived at the further end of the park, Lady Westborough and her daughter passed them. Clarence excusing himself to his friend, hastened towards them, and was soon occupied in saying the prettiest things in the world to the prettiest person, at least in his eyes: while Sir Christopher, having done as much mischief as a good heart well can do in a walk of an hour, returned home to write a long letter to his mother, against "learning and all such nonsense, which only served to blunt the affections and harden the heart." "Admirable young man!" cried the mother, with tears in her eyes; "a good heart is better than all the heads in the world." Amen!

RELIGION IN HOLLAND.

The following representation of the state of religion in Holland, taken from a Leyden paper, is full of instruction:

"In Holland the equality and good fellowship existing between the different religious sects are equally delightful and instructive. No religious test is there applied to the candidate for office, and no inquiry made farther than as to his aptitude for the post which he seeks to fill. So far does this harmony extend, that it is no uncommon thing for one sect to borrow the place of religious worship of another; and ministers of different religious persuasions have the honor in turn, of preaching before the Royal Family and the Court. As no one religious body is particularly elevated, so no one is particularly degraded, and there is a universal interchange of mutual respect. The pay of all the ministers of the different persuasions is equally provided for by the government, which makes no distinction between the Mennonite and the Roman Catholic—between the Calvinists, who are many, and the Remonstrants, who are few. The latter is by far the smallest of the Dutch sects, and probably does not consist of more than three thousand persons, though the popular eloquence of some of their preachers cause their churches to be frequently crowded. The number of Lutherans is about 300,000; of the Reformed Church, 1,300,000; and the remainder of the population are Catholics, with the exception of not a very considerable number of Jews. It is no uncommon thing for Jews to sit as Representatives in the Chambers; and at Amsterdam, there have been for a long time Jews among the local Senators. In Flanders, all the Protestant sects are blended in one, which is called the Protestant Church, but the number of Protestants, as compared with the Catholics, is very inconsiderable."

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, MARCH 14, 1829.

Below will be found a circular addressed to the lodges in the western district, and an address to the people, signed by eighty masons of high standing as citizens in the county of Ontario. We cheerfully give them a place, having good faith in the motives which produced them; but we doubt their efficacy, inasmuch as the honesty of anti-masonry is like a grain of corn in a bushel of cockle, and there is little to be gained by trusting to it. Those who have the publick good at heart will be satisfied; but the excitement is the treasury of knaves, and will be nurtured and kept alive by them as long as it enables them to get by foul means what fair means would never yield them.

The members of the Encampment, Chapter, and Lodge in the village of Rochester, have resolved to return their charters to the powers that granted them. Their reasons are similar to those contained in the circular and address below; and we shall probably publish them next week. The policy of these measures is, of course, a matter of mere speculation, and we shall be able to judge more correctly of it a week or two hence. They have already occasioned some grumbling in the anti-masonick camp. The "whole hog" papers censure them; others have got into a sort of "betweenity," and have put on their spectacles to look at the weather-cock. We would not be surprised, should Greek meet Greek before long.

Mr. Satterlee Clark seems to have been so well pleased with the notice taken of him in a few lines from a correspondent last week, that it affords us much satisfaction to be able to furnish him with another cud to chew and digest for the next National Observer. We recollect seeing the name of Satterlee Clark, act as "hind captain" to a number of windy affairs which appeared in a New-York paper two or three years since; but no body seemed to care a great deal about any thing he said; and as we had not heard of him for some time, till he was picked up by the anti-masonick convention, we did not know but Uncle Sam had abducted him, in consideration of "a small trifle" that slipped through Satterlee's fingers one day while he was paymaster. It affords us inexpressible pleasure, however, to be quite sure the gentleman is "alive and kicking," and, in his own estimation, at least a Washington Secundus. In our opinion he has an "awful squinting" towards captain Bobadil.

From the Troy Budget.

O! SATTERLEE, "How art thou fallen." Satterlee Clark, either a drum major, recruiting major, or some other officer in Uncle Sam's corps de reserve, or corps on duty, lately paid a visit to the city of Albany. Satterlee is lately from the west, perhaps from Utica. The convention, dubbed anti-masonick, being in session, Satterlee attended, was convicted and converted, renounced masonry on the spot, and confessed some of his sins. It is counted one of the greatest conversions which the world ever witnessed. The conversion of Paul is not a circumstance to that of Satterlee Clark. But Satterlee's change seems to be directly the reverse of Paul's. For a few days since, as reports from Albany declare, Satterlee attended the theatre, and took occasion to quarrel, and in the affray he made forcible use of his cane, wherefor, if rumour be not a liar, the said Satterlee was called upon the next day to "sign and seal" his name, and procure a friend to "sign and seal" a certain piece of paper, partly written and partly printed, and to remember all the requirements, contained in, and appertaining to, the same.

Satterlee, however, did not stop here. Mr. Fowler, a member of the Assembly from Orange county, being present when the conversion was announced by the convert, made some remarks not over complimentary on the occasion. The courage and military prowess of Satterlee, it is said, burst out on hearing of them, and he forthwith despatched by the hands of a brother anti-mason [Mr. Senator Maynard, of Oneida], a small card or billet doux, to Mr. Fowler. What the result of the matter will be, report saith not. We hope Satterlee wont cane the attorney general.

The editor pro tem. of the Baltimore Emerald is informed that the article headed "Politeness" was not published in this paper as original. There has been thieving in this matter, but the sin does not lie at our door, very heavily. The paper from which we took the article gave credit to the Harvest; but as we had read the essay of "Benedict," and knew it to be similar, we struck out the credit—had we retained it the Emerald would have gained nothing, and we are not sure that we would have done an act of justice. We beg the "editor pro tem." to be a little cautious hereafter in the use of positive assertions—they may sometimes do unmerited injury. The Emerald says the essay on "Politeness" is "a fine specimen of literary cooking-up." Now, who cooked it up? Not we, upon our veracity.

NATIONAL APPOINTMENTS. MARTIN VAN BUREN, of New-York, to be Secretary of State.

SAMUEL D. INGHAM, of Pennsylvania, to be Secretary of the Treasury.

JOHN M'LEAN, of Ohio, late Post-Master General, to be an Associate Judge of the Supreme Court of the United States.

JOHN W. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, to be District Judge for the district of Ohio.

ANDREW DUNLAP, to be Attorney of the United States for the district of Massachusetts, vice George Blake.

Mr. HARPER, to be District Judge for the district of Louisiana, and Mr. SLIDELL Attorney of the United States for the same district.

Mr. Van Buren resigned the office of governor on Thursday. The address of Lieut. Governor Throop to the Senate on resigning the presidency of that body to enter upon a discharge of the executive duties was a plain declaration of his political views, and of the policy intended to be pursued; but as it was not favourable to political anti-masonry, it will be opposed by all the "whole hogs" in the state.

The attention of the literary reader is directed to the advertisement of Mr. Willmer. We have experienced the benefits of his arrangements and of Mr. Coleman's agency, and can therefore safely recommend them to the patronage of those who desire to receive English periodicals.

The first number of Mr. N. P. Willis' American Monthly Magazine will be published on the 15th of April next. Editors generally think it will be a good thing—we hope so.

The Silas Richards, which arrived at New-York on Sunday last, brought Liverpool papers to the 24th of January. The most interesting portion of their contents consists of speculations as to the probable destiny of Ireland. The Duke of Wellington is said to be opposed to the Catholics, and it seems to be the general opinion that there will be fighting or something like it before a great while. Portugal is quite uneasy, and Greece is not yet tranquil. The English are getting to be jealous of the commercial success of the United States, in the Mediterranean and in India. The Markets in England are said to be dull.

CIRCULAR.

To the Officers and Members of the Chapters and Lodges of Freemasons, in the Western part of the State of New York:—

We, as members of this community, being desirous of contributing to the well being of society, have, after mature reflection, thought proper to address you on a subject which has claimed, and still claims, a deep consideration, and on which we have addressed the publick at large; a copy of which address we herewith enclose you for consideration.

We have found it extremely difficult to present any thing which we could have reason to believe, would be entirely satisfactory to the publick, or to the members of the institution in general.

When we consider the unhappy state of society now existing, and contemplate the many evils that will unavoidably befall this section of the country, unless some measures are adopted to restore harmony and confidence; we have, from a sense of duty, felt impelled to make an effort to bring about so desirable a result.

We believe this cannot be effected otherwise than by extending to each other a mutual spirit of forbearance and compromise.

When passions are excited, men will not act with reason; criminations and recriminations are thrown out, and so long as a spirit of that kind is indulged, there is an end to all hope of an amicable termination of existing difficulties.

From a regard to the sentiments and feelings of a very large proportion of our fellow-citizens, entitled to respect, who honestly and most religiously believe that the existence of masonick chapters and lodges is productive of much evil; we have come to the conclusion that, all things considered, it is expedient to suggest and recommend to you the propriety of returning the charters thereof, and appropriating your funds for the support of schools in the places where they have been collected, as the only measure that can be adopted to "restore harmony to social intercourse."

We do not, however, consider ourselves driven to this course; no necessity exists for its adoption, but the consideration that the general good of society will be promoted thereby.

Let us, therefore, in the spirit of liberality and forbearance, proffer to the publick this compromise, which we can now do without any sacrifice of principle, or great injury to our own feelings, and thus afford them an opportunity to meet us on grounds of conciliation, not doubting, that although we have been much abused, and our principles and sentiments misrepresented, the dispassionate and candid portion of the community will be disposed to do us justice.

We cannot but indulge the hope that you will, on mature reflection, consent to forego personal gratifications for the general good, and thus add another evidence to those already on record, of our patriotism and readiness to contribute to the happiness of mankind.

(Signed) Micah Brooks, Bowen Whiting, Lemuel Morse, Joseph Garlinghouse, Thomas Smith, Samuel C. Ward, William B. Welles, Mason Hatfield, Daniel McDonald, Samuel Colt, David Cook, William S. De Zeng, Wm. A. Townsend, David Hudson, Richard M. Bayly, William H. Coddington, Moses Fairchild, John F. Reed, Asa Stanley, Jacob Bowers, George Fox, E. B. Woodworth, Rapin Andrews, Edwin Gilbert, Dennis Whitney, David Howland, Linus Gunn, Hiram Ashley, Victor N. Hodge, Levi Phelps, Silas Reed, Joel Gilbert, David Thompson, John McCarty, Amos Stone, Jr., Orlando Brown, Harvey Pettibone, Calvin Blood, Birdseye Brooks, Chester Loomis, Richard Wells, John Dizon, Jared Willson, Z. Barton Stout, Eben'r S. Cobb, Malachi Loveland, Joseph Ashley, Robert E. Dorsey, Arad Joy, Daniel Hudson, Samuel Southworth, Aaron Young, John S. Hogarth, William Brewster, John B. Ramey, Joseph Brown, Elias Gilbert, Darius Carter, Theophilus Short, Olin Crittenden, Edward D. Lake, William Baker, Pliny Hayes, Henry P. Sartwell, Willis Newman, Theodore Brown, Harry Smith, Oliver Adams, Joshua Phillips, Addison N. Buck, Stephen Brewster, Horace Gilbert, David Pierpont, Samuel Crooks, Jesse Bishop, Joseph Butler, Alfred Nichols, Burton H. Hickox

Ontario county, February 20, 1829.

TO THE PUBLICK.

Fellow Citizens—As Members of the Masonick Fraternity, we have not been inattentive or unconcerned spectators of the events, that have agitated this community for the last two years.

As the publick voice calls for some act from us, in reference to those events, we have, on mature reflection, deemed it our duty, respectfully to answer the requisition, and in doing so we have endeavoured to consider what is due to ourselves, as well as to the community at large.

We solemnly aver that, as Members of the Masonick Society, we do not, nor ever have considered ourselves under any obligation to act otherwise, than in accordance with the strictest rules of morality, and in obedience to the laws of our country. It can not be denied, and we are free to admit, that some Members of the Masonick Society, through most mistaken notions of duty, have violated the laws of our country; an event which we deeply deplore; and we should regard ourselves wanting in duty to our fellow-citizens, if we did not unite our efforts with theirs in vindication of those laws.

It is not our purpose to eulogize the Masonick Institution; nor would it become us to detract from its merits, whatever they may have been. We have entertained a belief, that it has been instrumental in meliorating the condition of mankind, in different periods of the world; but like all human institutions, it was susceptible of abuse, and has been abused, and perverted to sinister purposes.

We are sensible that the prejudices of a portion of our fellow-citizens are deeply and honestly enlisted against the Society; and that much evil has resulted, and will continue to result to this community, if the Lodges are not closed and discontinued. Religious, civil, and social relations are embittered, and may be ultimately disturbed to a degree forbidding a return to reconciliation, and a mutual support of the best interests of civil and moral being.

While we disregard the clamours of those, who would pervert just vigilance of the people over their rights and liberties, we cheerfully accord to that large and respectable class of our fellow-citizens, who oppose the Masonick Institution upon principle, and in whose patriotism and philanthropy we have every confidence, the full measure of our respect for their deliberate opinions.

In view, therefore, of the wide spread and extending evils which are engendered and kept alive by the continuance of Freemasonry, and from a decent respect to public opinion, we feel it our duty to discontinue our attendance on Chapters and Lodges; and to recommend, (as we have done in a Circular to the Chapters and Lodges in this vicinity,) the expediency of returning their charters, and appropriating their funds in the places where they may have been collected, for the support of schools, as the only means of averting evils, which we consider would greatly overbalance all the benefits that could result from a continuance of the Society.

In adopting this course, we have been actuated by a sincere desire to restore peace and harmony to this distracted community, and in the hope that we shall be met by the publick, in a spirit of corresponding liberality.

(Signed) Micah Brooks, Bowen Whiting, Lemuel Morse, Joseph Garlinghouse, Thomas Smith, Samuel C. Ward, William B. Welles, Mason Hatfield, Daniel McDonald, Samuel Colt, David Cook, William S. De Zeng, Wm. A. Townsend, David Hudson, Richard M. Bayly, William W. Watson, William T. Coddling, Moses Fairchild, John F. Reed, Asa Stanley, Jacob Bowers, George Fox, E. B. Woodworth, Rapin Andrews, Edwin Gilbert, Dennis Whitney, David Howland, L. P. Gunn, Hiram Ashley, Victor N. Hopkins, Levi Noble, Silas Reed, Joel Gilbert, David Thompson, John McCartney, P. B. Underhill, A. Joel Stone, Jr., Orlando Brown, Harvey Pettibone, Calvin Blood, Chester Loomis, Richard Wells, John Dixson, Jared Willson, Z. Barton Stout, Eben'r S. Cobb, Malchi Loveland, Noah Ashley, Robert E. Dorsey, Arad Joy, Daniel Hudson, Samuel Southworth, Aaron Young, John S. Hogarth, William Brewster, John B. Kumeey, Joseph Brown, Elias Gilbert, Darius Carter, Theophilus Short, Orin Critchenden, Edward D. Lake, William Baker, Peter Mitchell, Pliny Hayes, Henry P. Sartwell, Willis Newman, Theodore Brown, Harry Smith, Oliver Adams, Joshua Phillips, Addison N. Buck, Stephen Brewster, Horace Adams, David Pierpont, Samuel Crooks, Jesse Bishop, Joseph Butler, Alfred Nichols, Burton H. Hickox.

Ontario County, Feb. 20th, 1829.

INAUGURAL ADDRESS,

Delivered by General ANDREW JACKSON, on being sworn into office, as President of the United States, on the 4th of March, 1829.

Fellow Citizens:—About to undertake the arduous duties that I have been appointed to perform, by the choice of a free people, I avail myself of this customary and solemn occasion, to express the gratitude which their confidence inspires, and to acknowledge the accountability which my situation enjoins. While the magnitude of their interests convinces me that no thanks can be adequate to the honour they have conferred, it admonishes me that the best return I can make, is the zealous dedication of my humble abilities to their service and their good.

As the instrument of the Federal Constitution, it will devolve on me, for a stated period, to execute the laws of the United States; to superintend their foreign and their confederate relations; to manage their revenue; to command their forces; and, by communications to the Legislature, to watch over and promote their interest generally. And the principles of action by which I shall endeavour to accomplish this circle of duties, it is now proper for me briefly to explain.

In administering the laws of Congress, I shall keep steadily in view the limitations as well as the extent of the executive power, trusting thereby to discharge the functions of my office, without transcending its authority. With foreign nations it will be my study to preserve peace, and to cultivate friendship, on fair and honourable terms, and in the adjustment of any differences that may exist or arise, to exhibit the forbearance becoming a powerful nation, rather than the sensibility belonging to a gallant people.

In such measures as I may be called on to pursue in regard to the rights of the separate States, I hope to be animated by a proper respect for those sovereign members of our Union; taking care not to confound the powers they have reserved to themselves, with those they have granted to the confederacy.

The management of the publick revenue—that searching operation in all governments—is among the most delicate and important trusts in ours; and it will, of course, demand no inconsiderable share of my official solicitude. Under every aspect in which it can be considered, it would appear that advantage must result from the observance of a strict and faithful economy. This I shall aim at the more anxiously, both because it will facilitate the extinguishment of the national debt—the unnecessary duration of which is incompatible with real independence—and because it will counteract that tendency to public and private profligacy, which a profuse expenditure of money by the government, is but too apt to engender. Powerful auxiliaries to the attainment of this desirable end, are to be found in the regulations provided by the wisdom of Congress, for the specific appropriation of publick money, and the prompt accountability of publick officers.

With regard to a proper selection of the subjects of impost, with a view to revenue, it would seem to me that the spirit of equity, caution and compromise, in which the Constitution was formed, requires that the great interests of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, should be equally favoured; and that, the only exception to this rule, should consist in the peculiar encouragement of any products of either of them, that may be found essential to our national independence.

Internal improvement, and the diffusion of information, so far as they can be promoted by the constitutional acts of the Federal Government, are of high importance.

Considering standing armies as dangerous to free governments, in time of peace, I shall not seek to enlarge our present establishment, nor disregard that salutary lesson of political experience which teaches that the military should be held subordinate to the civil power. The gradual increase of our Navy, whose flag has displayed, in distant climes, our skill in navigation, and our fame in arms, the preservation of our forts, arsenals, and dockyards; and the introduction of progressive improvements in the discipline and science of both branches of our military service, are so plainly prescribed by prudence, that I should be excused for omitting their mention, sooner than enlarging on their importance. But the bulwark of our defence is the national militia, which, in the present state of our intelligence and population, must render us invincible. As long as our government is administered for the good of the people, and is regulated by their will; as long as it secures to us the rights of person and of property, liberty of conscience, and of the press, it will be worth defending, and so long as it is worth defending, a patriotic militia will cover it with an impenetrable ægis. Partial injuries and occasional mortifications we may be subjected to, but a million of armed footmen possessed of the means of war, can never be conquered by a foreign foe. To any just system, therefore, calculated to strengthen this natural safeguard of the country, I shall cheerfully lend all the aid in my power.

It will be my sincere and constant desire, to observe towards the Indian tribes within our limits, a just and liberal policy; and to give that humane and considerate attention to their rights and their wants, which are consistent with the habits of our government, and the feelings of our people.

The recent demonstration of publick sentiment inscribes, on the list of executive duties, in characters too legible to be overlooked, the task of reform; which will require, particularly, the correction of those abuses that have brought the patronage of the Federal Government into conflict with the freedom of elections, and the counteraction of those causes which have disturbed the rightful course of appointment, and have placed or continued power in unfaithful or incompetent hands.

In the performance of a task thus generally delineated, I shall endeavour to select men whose diligence and talents will ensure, in their respective stations, able and faithful co-operation—depending, for the advancement of the publick service, more on the integrity and zeal of the publick officers, than on their numbers.

A diffidence, perhaps too just, in my own qualifications, will teach me to look with reverence to the examples of publick virtue left by my illustrious predecessors, and with veneration to the lights that flow from the mind that founded, and the mind that reformed our system. The same diffidence induces me to hope for instruction and aid from the co-ordinate branches of the government, and for the indulgence and support of my fellow citizens generally. And a firm reliance on the goodness of that Power whose providence mercifully protected our national infancy, and has since upheld our liberties in various vicissitudes, encourages me to offer up my ardent supplications that He will continue to make our beloved country the object of his divine care and gracious benediction.

Whole hog Anti-Masonry is rather on the decline in this county. The work of reform, as we understand, in the town of Alexander, Bennington and Bathany, which towns have held their annual town meetings, has commenced in good earnest. In the first and second of the above towns, the Jacks, as they are styled by Antis, have carried every thing before them; and have succeeded wholly or partially in the latter. Emisaries were dispatched from this village to attend the polls and goad the Antis on to the fight—but all to no purpose—the Jacks, as is natural for them, were determined to be contrary, and do as they pleased—and they had their will most effectually. This may safely be put down as a "sign." [Batavia Times.]

It will be recollected that upon the trial of Eli Bruce, at Canandaigua, for an alleged participation in the abduction of Morgan, some points of law were reserved by the counsel for Bruce, which were to be submitted to the Supreme Court. We now learn that the court has decided upon the question, and in favour of Mr. Bruce, who has been discharged. This settles the principle of jurisdiction. The trial must be had in the county where the overt act was committed. [Ibid.]

A DOUBT RENUNCIATION. Wm. Deland, of Busti, in this county, says, in the last Jamestown Journal, that he considers it his duty to withdraw from the masonick Institution; and then adds, "but lest I should be considered an anti-mason, I further state that I do not feel it my duty to join with them, because I can not conscientiously act with them." We them, because I can not conscientiously act with them. We can assure brother Deland that the anti-masons will not thank him for such a renunciation: they want none but such as will "go the whole hog"—blasphemy and lunacy "not excepted." [Fredonia Censor.]

SUMMARY.

Morgan over again—the new Abduction. Morgan, who recently murdered his wife, in this town, has escaped, or rather has been carried off. As far as we can understand, it appears that he was under arrest, in the alms-house, guarded by an officer during the day, and by a woman during the night. Yesterday, we have been told, he was so exceedingly sick, and found it so difficult to breathe, that the windows were opened to preserve life. This was probably a part of the plan, on his side—for during the last night he was visited by a number of fishermen, fellow-craftsmen, it is said, who, in the absence of the female from the room, contrived to bear him off, and to this hour, he has not been heard of. We learn that ladders were provided by his friends, who managed the abduction, by which the high fence or wall that surrounds the building was scaled, and he was enabled to descend from his window. We are not acquainted with further particulars. The case, however, falls, in no wise short of that of Morgan, the mason—and the New-York abduction has now a parallel, if not in interest, at least in romance and singularity.

[Portland (Maine) Advertiser.]

An Odd Fellows' lodge; of Philadelphia, presented $100 for the relief of the poor the other day. The only opposition raised to it, says the New-York Enquirer, was, the amount of the sum. The minority were strenuous in insisting on $99.99, or $100.01. They swore they would not give $100—it was absurd—it was inconsistent, &c.—but they were perfectly willing to give either of the two. What does Solomon Southwick think of this? Is there not some fearful mystery in it?

Money Found. A man, while digging for clams near Great Point one day last week, discovered an iron chest, containing a large sum of money. On attempting to open it, the most frightful sights were seen and horrid sounds heard, which were so appalling that the prize would have remained forever on the beach, had not an old lady, who is gifted at conjuring, burnt an anti-masonick almanack on the lid of the chest, upon which it flew open, and was found to contain—nothing. [Nantucket Inquirer.]

Extended Taxation. The legislature of this commonwealth, have passed a bill, which has received the signature of the governor and thus becomes a law of the state, in addition to the existing acts respecting taxation. By this bill it is provided that sheep and the machinery in cotton, woollen, and linen manufactories shall hereafter be assessed as other taxable property—that the presidents, professors, tutors, librarians and students of Harvard, Williams, and Amherst colleges, and all other theological, medical, and literary institutions, ministers of the gospel, preceptors of academies, and Latin grammar schoolmasters, shall hereafter be assessed for their polls and estates in the same manner as the other citizens of this commonwealth—and that the income of certain species of property, which has heretofore escaped taxation, shall hereafter be assessed. [Bos. Pal.]

The Anti-masonick Free Press of Boston, appears to be opposed to banks. Others of the anti-masonick party say that banks have secrets—swear their officers and clerks to keep them—do not know what they are—and, therefore are opposed to them. [Noah.]

A doubtful Compliment. Among the presents which have been forwarded by different individuals to general Jackson, in testimony of their respect for his character and virtues, is a large barrel of whiskey from Tobias Funk, of Franklin county, Pennsylvania.

Longitudinal President. General Jackson was president in Boston, nearly twenty minutes before he was at Washington, on account of the difference of longitude.

Young Napoleon. A pamphlet has been published at Paris, the writer of which strongly recommends to the various powers of Europe to convert the existing governments of Greece into an independent monarchy, and to place young Napoleon on the throne! This project seems to have excited much attention.

MARRIED,

In Unadilla, Otsego county, on the 9th ult. by the Rev. N. H. Adams, Mr. THOMAS WYCOTT, of Watertown, N. Y. to Miss ELIZABETH SANDERS, of the former place.

MASONICK CALENDAR.

[Regular meetings in the city of Albany, at the Masonick Hall.]
Temple Encampment, 2d Friday in each month.
Temple Chapter, 2d and 4th Tuesday in each month.
Temple Lodge, 1st and 2d Tuesday in each month.
Mount Vernon Lodge, 1st and 3d Thursday in each month.
Masters Lodge, 1st and 3d Wednesday in each month.

ODD FELLOWS' CALENDAR.

[Regular meetings in the city of Albany.]
Hope Lodge, Monday evening in each week, at Montgomery Hall.
Philanthropick Lodge, Wednesday evening in each week, corner of Lodge and State-streets, over Osborn and Grays.
Clinton Lodge, Friday evening in each week, Masonick Hall.

ENGLISH MAGAZINES, REVIEWS, &c. The American public are informed that the above works have been shipped in the following packets, throughout the year 1828, by EDWARD WILLMER, Bookseller and News Agent, Liverpool.

January,	Packet of Jan. 8.	July,	Packet of July 2.
February,	ditto Feb. 1.	August,	ditto Aug. 8.
March,	ditto Mar. 1.	September,	ditto Sept. 1.
April,	ditto Apr. 1.	October,	ditto Oct. 1.
May,	ditto May 1.	November,	ditto Nov. 1.
June,	ditto June 1.	December,	ditto Dec. 1.

The English magazines are published in London, in the evening of the last day of the month, and are procured by E. W. by Mail Express, 210 miles.

Orders may be directed to Liverpool, with a remittance or reference, or handed over to E. Willmer's agent, Mr. W. A. COLMAN, Park Place House, New-York.

POETRY.

From the London New Monthly Magazine, for January, 1829.

TWENTY-EIGHT AND TWENTY-NINE.

"Rien n'est change, mes amis!"—Charles Dix.

I heard a sick man's dying sigh,
And an infant's idle laughter;
The old Year went with mourning by,
The new came dancing after:
Let Sorrow shed her lonely tear,
Let Revelry hold her ladle;
Bring boughs of cypress for the bier,
Fling roses on the cradle:
Mutes to wait on the funeral state!
Pages to pour the wine!
And a requiem for Twenty-eight,—
And a health to Twenty-nine.

Alas! for human happiness,
Alas! for human sorrow;
Our Yesterday is nothingness,
What else will be our Morrow?
Still Beauty must be stealing hearts,
And Knavery stealing purses;
Still Cooks must live by making tarts,
And Wits by making verses;
While Sages prate and Courts debate,
The same Stars set and shine;
And the World, as it rolled through Twenty-eight,
Must roll through Twenty-nine.

Some King will come, in Heaven's good time,
To the tomb his Father came to;
Some Thief will wade through blood and crime,
To a crown he has no claim to:
Some suffering Land will rend in twain
The manacles that bound her,
And gather the links of the broken chain
To fasten them proudly round her:
The grand and great will love, and hate,
And combat, and combine;
And much where we were in Twenty-eight,
We shall be in Twenty-nine.

O'Connel will toil to raise the Rent,
And Kenyon to sink the Nation;
And Sheil will abuse the Parliament,
And Peel the Association:
And the thought of bayonets and swords
Will make ex-Chancellors merry;
And jokes will be cut in the House of Lords,
And throats in the County Kerry:
And writers of weight will speculate
On the Cabinet's design;
And just what it did in Twenty-eight,
It will do in Twenty-nine.

Mathews will be extremely gay,
And Hook extremely dirty;
And brick and mortar still will say
"Try Warren, No. 30:"
And "General Sauce" will have its puff,
And so will General Jackson;
And peasants will drink up heavy stuff,
Which they pay a heavy tax on:
And long and late, at many a tete,
Goosberry champagne will shine;
And as old as it was in Twenty-eight,
It will be in Twenty-nine.

And the Goddess of Love will keep her smiles,
And the God of Cups his orgies;
And there'll be riots in St. Giles,
And weddings in St. George's:
And Mendicants will sup like Kings,
And Lords will sweat like Lacqueys;
And black eyes oft will lead to rings,
And rings will lead to black eyes:
And pretty Kate will scold her mate,
In a dialect all divine:
Alas! they married in Twenty-eight,—
They will part in Twenty-nine.

John Thomas Mugg, on a lonely hill,
Will do a deed of mystery;
The Morning Chronicle will fill,
Five columns with the history:
The Jury will be all surprise,
The Prisoner quite collected;
And Justice Park will wipe his eyes,
And be very much affected:
And folks will relate poor Corder's fate,
As they hurry home to dine,
Comparing the hangings of Twenty-eight
With the hangings of Twenty-nine.

A Curate will go from the house of prayer
To wrong his worthy neighbour,
By dint of quoting the texts of Blair,
And singing the songs of Weber:

Sir Harry will leave the Craven hounds,
To trace the guilty parties;
And ask of the Court five thousand pounds,
To prove how racked his heart is:
An Advocate will execrate
The spoiler of Hymen's shrine;
And the speech that did for Twenty-eight
Will do for Twenty-nine.

My Uncle will swathe his gouty limbs,
And tell of his oils and blubbers;
My Aunt, Miss Dobbs, will play longer hymns,
And rather longer rubbers:
My Cousin in Parliament will prove
How utterly ruined trade is;
My Brother at Eton will fall in love
With half a hundred ladies:
My Patron will sate his pride from plate,
And his thirst from the Bordeaux vine,
His nose was red in Twenty-eight,—
'Twill be redder in Twenty-nine!

And oh! I shall find, how, day by day,
All thoughts and things look older;
How the laugh of Pleasure grows less gay,
And the heart of Friendship colder;
But still I shall be what I have been,
Sworn foe to Lady Reason,
And seldom troubled with the spleen,
And fond of taking treason;
I shall buckle my skait, and leap my gate,
And throw, and write, my line;
And the woman I worshipped in Twenty-eight,
I shall worship in Twenty-nine!

The following beautiful lines to the Arctick Dove, are from "Days Departed; a Lay of the Severn Sea;" a volume lately published in London, by the Rev. William L. Bowles.

THE ARCTICK DOVE.

Ride on;—the ark, majestick and alone
On the wide waste of the careering deep,
Its hull scarce peering through the night of clouds,
Is seen. But lo! the mighty deep has shrunk!
The ark, from its terrific voyage, rests
On Ararat. The raven is sent forth,—
Send out the dove, and as her wings far off
Shine in the light, that streaks the se'ring clouds,
Bid her speed on, and greet her with a song:

Go, beautiful and gentle dove,
But whither wilt thou go?
For though the clouds ride high above,
How sad and waste is all below!

The wife of Shem, a moment to her breast
Held the poor bird, and kissed it. Many a night
When she was listening to the hollow wind,
She pressed it to her bosom, with a tear;
Or when it murmured in her hand, forgot
The long, loud tumult of the storm without.—
She kisses it, and, at her father's word,
Bids it go forth.

The dove flies on! In lonely flight
She flies from dawn till dark;
And now, amid the gloom of night,
Comes weary to the ark.
Oh! let me in, she seems to say,
For long and lone hath been my way;
Oh! once more, gentle mistress, let me rest,
And dry my dripping plumage on thy breast.

So the bird flew to her who cherished it.
She sent it forth again out of the ark;—
Again it came at evening fall, and lo,
An olive-leaf plucked off, and in its bill.
And Shem's wife took the green leaf from its bill,
And kissed its wings again, and smilingly
Dropped on its neck one silent tear for joy.
She sent it forth once more; and watched its flight,
Till it was lost amid the clouds of heaven:
Then gazing on the clouds where it was lost,
Its mournful mistress sung this last farewell:—

Go, beautiful and gentle dove,
And greet the morning ray;
For lo! the sun shines bright above,
And night and storm are passed away.
No longer drooping, here confined,
In this cold prison well;
Go, free to sunshine and to wind,
Sweet bird, go forth, and fare thee well.

Oh! beautiful and gentle dove,
Thy welcome sad will be,
When thou shalt hear no voice of love
In murmurs from the leafy tree:
Yet freedom, freedom shalt thou find,
From this cold prison's cell;
Go, then, to sunshine and the wind,
Sweet bird, go forth, and fare thee well.

From the London Literary Gazette.

FROM THE SPANISH.*

Were I the ruler here below,
(God grant us better care!)
How matters upside down should go,
How sober folks should stare!

The pretty girls should all be free
To have whate'er they want;
Unknown those hateful names should be.
Duenna, nurse, and aunt.

If ugly women sinned, they'd all
Do penance in the sheet;
But her no parson should miscall
Whose eyes are bright and sweet.

Whene'er I saw an old man dote
Upon a fair young bride,
I'd dress him in her petticoat,
His shroud 'twould well provide.

Yon cautious burgher, soft and plump,
Should wed some jolly lass,
Who all the day would dance and jump,
And tell him he's an ass.

With jealous lords, ye ladies fine,
Ye'd not be long distressed;
Their ghosts in bed-posts I'd confine,
Then let them growl their best.

I would throw open every jail,
And set bold felons free;
Your judge severe or lawyer pale
As good a bird might be.

When lady talks of age to lady,
I'd stand behind their backs;
For every lie a marvel'd
Would make a royal tax.

O might I rule this ball of earth!
One hour of perfect sway
Would furnish forth a store of mirth
To last for many a day.

* Si yo gubernara el mundo, &c.—Romancero General, 1604.

FRANKLIN LETTER FOUNDRY. The proprietors of this Foundry, offer on liberal terms, the following articles, viz:—
Roman and Italic. Fourteen, Twelve, Ten, Eight, Seven, Six, Five, and Four Lines Pica, plain, Canon, Meridian, Double Great Primer, Double English, Double Small Pica, Great Primer, English, Pica, Small Pica, Long Primer Bourgeois, Brevier, Minion, Nonpareil, Pearl.

Two Line Letter. Minion, and all larger, Nonpareil, Pearl.
Full Face. English and Pica, Small Pica, Long Primer, Bourgeois, Brevier, Minion.

Borders and Flowers of every kind.

Antiques. Ten and Six Lines, Four Lines Pica, Double Great Primer, English and Pica, Long Primer, Brevier, Minion, Nonpareil.

Blacks. Four Lines Pica, Double Great Primer, Double Small Pica, Great Primer, English and Pica, Small Pica, Long Primer.

Open Blacks. Great Primer, Double Great Primer, and Four Lines Pica.

Italians. Seven Lines Pica, Five Lines Pica.

Tuscan. Eight Lines Pica, Four Lines Pica.

Shaded Letter. Eight Lines Pica, Four Lines Pica, Double Great Primer, Two Lines Brevier, Two Lines Nonpareil, Eight Lines Pica, Ornamented, Six Lines Pica, Ornamented.

Leads. Six to pica and thicker, Seven to pica, Eight to pica.

Quotations; Space Rules, from one to eight ems, Long Primer; Astronomical, and other signs; Spanish and French Accents; Fractions; Composing Sticks, from twenty to four inches in length; Cases; Chases; Slice, Brass, and common Galleys; Iron and Mahogany Furniture; Prout's ink; Skins; parchment; points. Presses also furnished.

Several new founts of letter have been cut; and it has been the aim of the proprietors to combine the beauty of the modern, with the clearness and durability of the ancient style of typography, and to produce types at once handsome, legible, and useful. Specimens of these will be sent to printers. The greatest care has been taken in the composition of the metal with which all their founts of letter are cast.

All orders, either by letter or otherwise, left at their Counting Room, No. 41, State-street, or at their Foundry, Eagle-street, south of State-street, will receive prompt attention. A. W. KINSLEY & Co.
Albany, Feb. 14, 1829. 31

BOOK BINDING. Sign of the Golden Ledger, corner of State and North Market-streets, Albany. WILLIAM SEYMOUR, carries on the above business in all its branches; viz: plain, extra, and super extra—has a first rate ruling machine, and other necessary implements for manufacturing Blank Books of every description, on the most reasonable terms, of the best workmanship.

An assortment on hand. Subscribers to the American Masonick Record can have their volumes handsomely bound in boards, with leather backs and corners, at 62 1/2 cents a volume. Feb. 14. 3m3

THIS PAPER

Is published every Saturday, by E. B. CHILD,
AT THE CORNER OF NORTH MARKET AND STEUBEN
STREETS, ALBANY, N. Y.

TERMS—To city subscribers, Three Dollars a year. To subscribers who receive their papers by mail, Two Dollars and Fifty Cents, in advance—otherwise, Three Dollars.
JOB PRINTING neatly executed at this office.

AMERICAN MASONICK RECORD

AND ALBANY SATURDAY MAGAZINE.

VOL. III.

ALBANY, N. Y. SATURDAY, MARCH 21, 1829.

NO. 8.

MASONICK RECORD.

AN ADDRESS,

Delivered to GENERAL LAFAYETTE, on his arrival in Natchez, Mississippi, when on his tour through the Union, by Br. R. PARKINSON, W. M. of Andrew Jackson Lodge, No. 2, in that city.

Distinguished Brother,—Permit me, in the name and on behalf of Andrew Jackson Lodge, No. 2, of the city of Natchez, over which I have the honour to preside, and which I now represent, to bid you a cordial, brotherly, and heartfelt welcome amongst us.

That we are not able to receive you with all that pomp and splendour with which our more fortunate brethren of the North and East have greeted you, is not perhaps much to be regretted, when we reflect that parade and show form no part of the true principles of our ancient and honourable institution,—that masonry performs all her works in secrecy and silence, and that the effect and influence of her principles upon the human heart and society at large, are rather felt than seen. You will therefore, when we extend to you the right hand of fellowship in sincerity and truth, realize our feelings and appreciate our motives. That one of the principal causes of the present peaceful, prosperous, and happy state of the craft, is to be found in the free and liberal form of government under which we live, where genius is so much in accordance with the spirit of our order, must be obvious to the mind of every well informed and reflecting mason.

The conspicuous and useful part performed by you in that momentous struggle for our independence, when the fathers of the American Republic sweat drops of blood, can not and will not be forgotten. That you wrought, as a faithful and diligent labourer at the erection of this grand and stupendous temple, dedicated to liberty and the rights of man, is known to the world.

We therefore, in receiving you thus publicly as a worthy brother, and hailing you before the world as a good master, feel that we but "render honour to whom honour is due." That you may be permitted to pursue the remainder of your eventful journey through life, in peace and tranquillity; and that when you enter that unknown land from whence none return, you may pass on to happiness; and finally be raised and admitted within the Grand Lodge above, "that temple not made with hands, eternal in the heavens," is the sincere prayer of your masonick brethren of this city.

THE MORGAN REPORTS.

From the New-York Enquirer.

We have read Mr. Hayden's report on the Morgan question, which is represented to be a report of the "Joint Committee," but presume from some material errors in it, that it is Mr. Hayden's report alone.

He declares the order of masonry to be but one hundred and twenty years old, and to be founded on the ruins of the order of the Jesuits. Had he referred to the history of England, he would have found, "that 746 years ago the Tower of London was built 'masonically,' by William the Conqueror; and that a few years subsequently, his son Rufus, in like manner, built Westminster Hall, which is said to contain the largest lodge in the world." In the same history,—in the reign of Edward IV., nearly 350 years ago, we have a record that king Athelstane, the grandson of Alfred the Great, was a strong encourager of masonry, and himself a freemason of renown, reforming and regulating lodges, with rules preserved from the time of the Romans." In continuation, we also find that more than 300 years ago, Edwin, son of king Athelstane, also professed freemasonry, "and took upon himself the charge of master mason, for the love he had of the said craft, and the honourable principles whereupon it is grounded." Prince Edwin, in virtue of his charter, congregated with his masonick brethren at York, in general assembly, of which he was Grand Master. We also find Henry VI. of England, operating "as a master mason."

The great philosopher, Locke, relates in his works the fact, that a manuscript in the hand-writing of king Henry VI. was actually found in the "Bodleian Library." We also find in British history, "that in the year 1561, December 27th, the eccentric and jealous queen of England, Elizabeth, because she could not join the order of freemasons, in revenge, sent an armed force to break up the annual Grand Lodge at York—Sir Thomas Sackville, being the Grand Master, who, instead of being dismayed at such an unexpected visit, gallantly told the officers that nothing could give him greater pleasure, than seeing them in the Grand Lodge, as it would give him an opportunity of convincing them that freemasonry was the most honourable institution that ever was founded, and truly consonant to laws, both divine and moral; the consequence was that he made the chief men freemasons, who on their return made an honourable report to the queen, so that she never more attempted to dislodge or disturb them, but esteemed them as a peculiar sort of men, that cultivated peace and friendship, arts and sciences, without meddling in the affairs of church or state."

From French history we shall make barely one quotation, which, with those also of ancient data, we have already made, will plainly prove Mr. Hayden is not acquainted with the subject. "Nearly eleven hundred years ago, Charles Martell, king of France, sent freemasons into England, at the solicitation of the king of Saxony, to raise, with masonick honours, several monuments of fame." English history will also corroborate this fact. We will not tire our readers with further quotations, although we could fill pages with them, none of which can be disproved or doubted.

We are not disposed to mangle further in this delicate question. There are many honest men embarked in it, and many allow themselves to be swept into the current, for sinister objects. It must have its way and its influence, as other excitements have had, and they will wear away in time, and the old order of things be renewed.

From the Cayuga Patriot.

We have received in pamphlet form the report of Mr. Hayden, chairman of the anti-masonick committee of the senate of this state; some particulars of which we may notice, as we find leisure.

In the following sentences, page 22, the committee evidently labour under some embarrassment.

"That there are virtuous and excellent men, who belong to the institution, can be doubted by none of us, who look around upon the circle of our relatives, friends, and acquaintances. How this fact is compatible with the opinion we maintain of the character of the institution, neither time nor the occasion will permit us to explain."

We wonder it did not occur to the committee that there must be some mistake or misrepresentation by which themselves were blinded, and that these "virtuous and excellent men," never did understand masonry, or any part of it, to teach them any thing inconsistent with moral purity, or to do injustice of any kind, in court, or out of court, to any man or men, for the benefit of masons or masonry, or for any other purpose. We solemnly declare that we never understood masonry to teach either immorality or injustice of any kind whatever, and that we neither would nor will be bound by any obligation, to do evil. Nor did we, nor do we, understand masonry to bind or authorize its members to inflict any higher punishment than expulsion from the privileges of the fraternity, which is equivalent to the withdrawal of fellowship in the churches. We have proof of this assertion furnished by the committee. In their report, page 27, is published the following:—

No. 3. "From the Knight of the Red Cross' Oath. You further swear that should you ever know a companion violate any essential part of this obligation, you will use your most decided endeavours, by the blessing of God, to bring such person to the strictest and most condign punishment, agreeably to the rules and usages of our ancient fraternity, and this by pointing him out to the world as an unworthy and vicious vagabond, by opposing his interest, by deranging his business, by transferring his character after him wherever he goes, by exposing him to the contempt of the whole fraternity and the world, during his whole natural life."

Now we know no more about the knights of the Red Cross than any other citizen. We do not believe the above to be correct, however, because it rests for authority on disclosures made by the Le Roy convention, which we know has published statements that do extreme injustice to the masonick institution. But for the sake of argument, we will suppose this piece of an obligation to be correctly published. It is not probable that one man in five hundred has ever taken the degree, and a Knight of the Red Cross has no more authority over other masons than the Grand Seigneur has over the people of this state. Now it seems that a Knight of the Red Cross has precise instructions how to punish those who violate the obligation appertaining to that degree. He is taught to manifest a vindictive spirit, but is he to take life? No; the offender who violates an essential part of his obligation, is to be pointed out to the world "as a vicious vagabond," &c. Does not this prove that the other degrees, which include nearly the whole body of masons, do not authorise any punishment as severe even as the traducing of character and the derangement of business? What should we say of our legislature, if in addition to our present law, it should pass an act declaring that any man guilty of murder should be punished with thirty days' imprisonment? This would be as consistent as for the Knights of the Red Cross, to swear to defame in a case where they had bound themselves in the previous degrees to commit murder.

It is plain, that if masonry was half as bad as it has been represented, it would not require a popular excitement to cause its dissolution. If it interfered in politics or religion the institution would be torn by factions, and soon be thrown into the most dire confusion. If it require its members to be partial as witnesses, jurors, or judges; to do wrong, to transgress the laws, or to commit violence, its obligations would produce no effect, because those who would take them with such an understanding, would not have sufficient moral feeling to be bound by any oath whatever. And where is the wretch who has taken masonick obligations, with such an understanding? Shall we point to the lamented Warren, to Washington, Jefferson, Lafayette, Tompkins, Clinton? Shall we point out our neighbours and friends, whom we know to be honest, worthy citizens? The idea carries an absurdity on the face of it.

The report states (page 6) that the institution of masonry has arisen "within the last one hundred and twenty years." Here the committee manifests either a culpable ignorance of history, or intentional deception. The Le Roy convention published an alleged obligation of Knights Templar, as a masonick obligation; and it is generally understood that this order was engrafted upon ancient freemasonry. In Hume's History of England, is an account of a persecution of Knights Templars in 1327, which was more than five hundred years ago, and after that order had existed for a considerable period. We publish the account in this place to show the spirit of such persecutions, the strange and incredible accusations by which they are justified, and how such accusations are supported by apostates. A similar scene might be taken from Josephus' account of the persecution of the Jews after the destruction of their city, which is probably familiar to many of our readers. To complete the picture, we would refer the reader to the History of Salem Witchcraft.

From Hume's History of England, Vol. 1. pp. 537—8.

"While these abominable scenes passed in England, the theatre of France was stained with a wickedness equally barbarous, and still more publick and deliberate. The order of Knights Templars had arisen, during the first fervour of the crusades, and, uniting the two qualities, the most popular in that age, devotion and valour, and exercising both in the most popular of all enterprises, the defence of the Holy Land, they had made rapid advances in credit and authority, and had acquired, from the piety of the faithful, ample possessions in every country of Europe, especially in France. Their great riches, joined to the course of time, had, by degrees, relaxed the severity of these virtues; and the templars had, in a great measure, lost that popularity which first raised them to honour and distinction. Acquainted, from experience, with the fatigues and dangers of those fruitless expeditions to the east, they rather chose to enjoy, in ease, the opulent revenues in Europe and, being all men of birth, educated, according to the custom of that age, without any tincture of letters, they scorned the ignoble occupations of a monastick life, and passed their time wholly in the fashionable amusements of the table. Their hunting, gallantry, and the pleasures of the table. Their rival order, that of St. John, of Jerusalem, whose poverty had, as yet, preserved them from like corruptions, still distinguished themselves by their enterprises against the infidels, and succeeded to all the popularity, which was lost by the indolence and luxury of the templars. But though these reasons had weakened the foundations of this order, once so celebrated and revered, the immediate cause of their destruction, proceeded from the cruel and vindictive spirit of Philip, the Fair; who, having entertained a private disgust, against some eminent templars, determined to gratify, at once, his avidity and revenge, by involving the whole order in an undistinguished ruin. On no better information than that of two knights, condemned by their superiors to perpetual imprisonment, for their vices and profligacy, he ordered, on one day, all the templars in France to be committed to prison, and imputed to them such enormous and absurd crimes, as are sufficient of themselves to destroy all the credit of the accusation. Besides their being universally charged with murder, robbery, and vices the most shocking to nature; every one, it was pretended, whom they received into their order, was obliged to renounce his Saviour, to spit upon the cross, and to join, to this impiety, the superstition of worshipping a gilded head, which was secretly kept in one of their houses at Marseilles. They also initiated, it was said, every candidate by such infamous rites, as could serve to no other purpose, than to degrade the order in his eyes, and destroy forever the authority of all his superiors over him. Above a hundred of these unhappy gentlemen were put to the question, in order to extort from them a confession of their guilt: the more obstinate perished in the hands of their tormentors: several, to procure immediate ease, in the violence of their agonies, acknowledged whatever was required of them: forged confessions were imputed to others: and Philip, as if their guilt were now certain, proceeded to a confiscation of all their treasures. But no sooner were the Templars relieved from their tortures, than, preferring the most cruel execution to a life with infamy, they disavowed their confessions, exclaimed against the forgeries, justified the innocence of their order, and appealed to all the gallant actions performed by them in ancient and later times, as a full apology for their conduct. The tyrant, enraged at this disappointment, and thinking himself now engaged in honour, to proceed to extremities, ordered fifty-four of them, whom he branded as relapsed heretics, to perish by the punishment of fire, in his capital: great numbers expired, after a like manner, in other parts of the kingdom; and, when he found that the perseverance of these unhappy victims, in justifying to the last their innocence, had made deep impression on the spectators, he endeavoured to overcome the constancy of the Templars by new inhumanities. The Grand Master of the order, John de Molay, and another great officer, brother to the Dauphin, were conducted to a scaffold, erected before the church of Notre-dame, at Paris; a full pardon was offered them, on the one hand, the fire, destined for their execution, on the other. These gallant nobles, still persisted in the protestations of their own innocence, and that of their order; and were instantly hurried into the flames by the executioner.

In all this barbarous injustice, Clement V., who was the creature of Philip, and then resided in France, fully concurred, and without examining a witness, or making any inquiry into the truth of facts, he summarily, by the plenitude of his apostolical power, abolished the whole order. The Templars, all over Europe, were thrown into prison; their conduct underwent a strict scrutiny; the power of their enemies still pursued and oppressed them; but nowhere, except in France, were the smallest traces of their guilt pretended to be found. England sent an ample testimony of their piety and morals: but, as the order was annihilated, the knights were distributed into several convents, and their possessions were, by command of the pope, transferred to the Order of St. John.

ODD FELLOWS' DEPARTMENT.

AN ADDRESS.

Delivered before the Philanthropic Lodge, No. 5, of Independent Odd Fellows, in the city of Albany, by the M. N. G.

Concluded.

There is no country, our own excepted, in which the press is not "curtailed of its fair proportion," and like a slave, unwilling to the imposition, compelled to hold its peace, or trumpet forth sentiments in opposition to the cause of truth and liberty, under the dread of tyrannical displeasure.

With the models of former republics before them, the immortal sages of the American revolution and the establishers of our happy privileges, marked with nice discrimination the defects in their original formation; defects which opened the avenues to corruption, and from corruption to the final prostration of civil liberty, and it is to their wisdom and integrity we are indebted for those principles of freedom which, though slow in their operations, its march is irresistible, and must eventually enfranchise the globe.

I have thus far entered upon the value and importance of knowledge as connected with our political safety and happiness, independent of all feeling of national prejudice, and shall now proceed to point out its effects on mankind in general.

A state of inactivity is found to be decidedly at variance with the happiness of man; his energies must be directed to some object sufficiently interesting to occupy his attention, or he ceases to enjoy his existence. Hence, for the want of a proper direction and employment, he is frequently found engaged in those pursuits, though gratifying to himself, inimical to the cause of virtue and morality.

The immortal conqueror of antiquity experienced the misery of this truth when his energies could no longer be called into action; having accomplished the height of his ambition, an ambition, had it been directed into the more ennobling fields of philosophy, could never have exposed him to the like calamity.

Philosophy contains inexhaustible resources for research, suited to the different characters of its students, and is found capable of engrossing those energies of the mind, which, otherwise directed, might be less conducive to the good of humanity.

He who feels interested in the spirit of improvement, will doubtless receive much satisfaction in marking its progressive march, and be pleased to behold that the means of affording general information is becoming the first object of all the well-wishers of their country, sensibly impressed with the belief, that where correct information is widely disseminated, the mass of mankind cannot greatly differ in opinion, and that the good sense of the whole must inevitably predominate in all questions of popular importance; nor should excitements, such as frequently become popular, more particularly, the one now in agitation against those disposed to confine the art of their happiness under the veil of secrecy, shake our faith in the final, correct decision of the community. Such excitements are the effect of abased and irritated good feeling, and bespeak what we should be pleased to discover, a people jealous of any supposed encroachments upon their privileges. It will however be superceded by sober inquiry, and aided by correct information; and truth is irresistible in its conviction, where the community have no motive to be governed by deception.

The opportunities for instruction are of so easy access, that he must be placed under peculiar circumstances indeed, as wilfully negligent, who has not reaped in some degree its invaluable benefits. Our situations in life, even under the most flattering prospects of durability, are subject to the blastings of disappointment and the precarious gambols of fortune, but a mind enlightened by the stores of literature and philosophy is a species of property which neither misfortune, poverty, nor age can depreciate, nor the oppression of the tyrant prevent us from enjoying. To ourselves it is a source of gratification when secluded from the crowd and bustle of the world, and enables us to render that instruction to the needy, aiding to the cause of morality and virtue. If accompanied with virtue, it procures us a ready introduction into the refined circles of society. The learned court it, and even the ignorant pay it homage and treat it with respect and reverence. It dissolves the clouds of mystery which ignorance throws over unknown subjects, and presents as objects of contempt ideas once supported by superstition.

The repeated exhortations we hear from the lips of those whose business it is to guard us against the insidious prevalence of vice, and the comparatively little benefit arising from their labours, might possibly incline us to the belief that the natural character of man was obstinately opposed to the dictates of virtue. But, brethren, permit me to remark, that I think it arises from our ignorance of the importance of doing good, though none are ignorant of the propriety. For the most refined, as well as the most debased pursuits are directed by selfishness, we either do not know, or lose sight of the truth, that no pursuit can possibly tend to our felicity, that is purchased at the price of the misery of others.

Another reason, although numbers might be enumerated to account for the inefficacy of their labours, is that we are apt to neglect attempting what we consider a hopeless ambition, however well we may be convinced of the truth of this assertion and the necessity of reform.

This therefore is one of the advantages of the course we have adopted, and will likely be attended with important good. The Lectures and Addresses being delivered by brethren moving in the same sphere as ourselves, surrounded by the same circumstances, and incident to the same impressions, will fall with double weight upon their hearers, and be treasured as attainable examples.

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

POISONED WOUNDS, ANIMAL VIRUS, &c.

Some very important experiments have recently been made in Paris, with the chlorurets of lime and soda, in cases of poisoned wounds and the inoculation of animal virus. The disinfecting qualities of the chlorurets were already well known; and it was supposed from analogy that they might be used with effect in neutralising the component parts of animal poisons. The disinfectant property of the chlorurets depending upon their affinity for hydrogen, and hydrogen being one of the elements of virus and venom, the others being oxygen, carbon, and, in animal matters, azote, it was imagined that by abstracting, even partially, one of the elements of the poison, the character would be so changed, as to enable nature, without further aid, to get rid of the infection. Dr. Coster, a Paris physician, proceeding upon this reasoning, has recently performed some extraordinary cures in cases of syphilitic and other ulcers, with a solution of the chloruret of soda; and upon animals of different kinds, which had been inoculated with the virus of diseases common to their species, his experiments were equally successful. In several cases of bites from vipers, he found chlorurated lotions and injections perfectly efficacious; and he relates a successful experiment made upon a dog which had been bitten by another suffering under positively defined hydrophobia. Two dogs were bitten in various parts by the rabid animal; one of them was tied up, and remained without any means being adopted to prevent the absorption of the virus beyond the application of ligatures above the surfaces of the wounds, and the injection of pure water in the places bitten. The other had also ligatures applied, and the wounds were washed with a strong solution of the chloruret of soda. Thirty-seven days after the animals had been bitten, that to which the chloruret had not been applied became furiously mad, and died in great agony. The other, whose wounds had cicatrised rapidly, was in perfect health, and has remained so from that time. Dr. Coster states, that this was the only experiment which he has been able to make on the virus of rabid animals; but the success which attended it was sufficient to hold out a hope that the use of the chlorurets may be found equally valuable in other cases.

NEW DISCOVERIES.

The Nantucket Inquirer contains the following list of discoveries made by Capt. W. Plasket of the late whale ship Independence, during his last voyage in the Pacific Ocean:—

Smut-face* island lat. 6 16 S. lon. 177 19 E.

Parker's† do lat. 1 19 S. lon. 174 30 E.

Brown's do lat. 18 11 S. lon. 175 48 E.

The latter lies about 20 miles N. W. by N. from Vavaoo, and is inhabited.

Captain P. ascertained that many of the Islands SW. of the Fejees are erroneously laid down, and he discovered many not noticed at all. He also found a very dangerous reef extending from the E. of Wywoolla across to the neighbouring islands at the NE.

He also furnishes the following discoveries and corrections of lat. and lon. made by Cap. Chase, of the Japan, now at sea:

Chase's island lat. 2 28 S. lon. 176 E.

Lincoln's do. lat. 1 50 S. lon. 175 30 E.]

The lon. of Simpson's Island should be laid down 174 30.

Briand's island lat. 0 20 N. lon. 174 E.

Dundas do. lat. 0 10 N. lon. 174 12 E.

* So named because the chiefs and men of distinction, as a mark of their superiority, daub their faces with smut.

† In honour of Robert F. Parker, merchant of Nantucket.

COURSE OF THE AIR.

Method of finding the Course of the Air when the Wind is still.—Place a basin of water in a free exposure, throw a red hot cinder into it, and observe how the smoke which it produce inclines. Sailors throw a piece of live coal into the sea for the same purpose; and also wet a finger, hold it up in the air, and then by feeling which part becomes (by evaporation) cool, they judge of the direction of the current air. An instrument on the last principle has been invented by Dr. B. M. M. Forster. [London Mechanics Magazine.]

THE TRAVELLER.

From the London Weekly Review.

THE PERSIAN EMPIRE.

The Persian empire, which extends from the twenty-sixth to the fortieth degree of north latitude, and from the forty-fifth to the sixty-first degree of east longitude, enjoys as great a diversity of climate as any country in the world, Hindoostan, perhaps, excepted. Its southern provinces, lying between the mountains and the shores of the Persian Gulf, are arid, sandy, and barren, resembling the Arabian deserts, and subject to intense heat; but, from various causes, the hot, suffocating wind, denominated Simoom, or Sirocco, so fatal in other Asiatick countries, is neither frequent, nor extremely dangerous, in these districts. As we proceed towards the north, the climate rapidly improves; the sandy desert is exchanged for beautiful hills and vallies, watered by innumerable rivulets, and thickly sprinkled with flower-gardens and fruit-trees. All the world have heard of the beautiful scenery on the banks of the Roccnabad, celebrated by Saadi, Hafiz, and other poets; but Isphahan and its vicinity enjoy a still more delicious temperature, even than Shiraz itself. In this capital or Irake, the air, impregnated throughout the year with the perfume of innumerable flowers, and scarcely ever tainted by the slightest vapour, is so dry and pure, that the finest Damascus scimitar might be exposed during the whole night without danger of rusting. Mazenderan, and the whole neighbourhood of the Caspian Sea, abound in forests, and are intersected by rivers, and consequently enjoy a climate less pure and salubrious; and Khorassan, and the other Eastern provinces, are too little known to allow of any thing positive being predicated respecting their soil or climate.

It is in western Persia, however, in the neighbourhood of the great rivers Tigris and Euphrates, that every thing for which the country is remarkable, is found. There are the celebrated fields in which the phalanxes of Greece, and the legions of Rome, triumphed over the barbarick pride and pomp of Oriental despotism. It was over the hills of Koordistan that Xenophon led his ten thousand, and effected the most memorable retreat recorded in the annals of war. It was in the same vicinity that the struggle between Alexander and Darius closed; and that the thousand battles which followed between the powers of the East and the West took place. There, too, beneath a sky highly favourable to the preservation of ancient monuments, are discovered the palace of a race of kings, whose history and name—nay, whose very language is forgotten. On the same spots, the more recent tombs of saints, poets, philosophers, heroes, and kings, are slowly crumbling away beneath the hand of time; while the ignorant Arab and the merry Persian, rob, and laugh, and dance and sing, as if, in the midst of universal decay and ruin, they themselves were imperishable.

The Orientals aim at glory, and sometimes obtain it, by the bold persevering exertion of physical power; they pile up huge stones into pyramids, until the summits pierce the clouds, and form a resting-place for the eagle; they hew mountains into the form of men or animals, and write their thoughts, frequently absurd or puerile, upon everlasting granite; they scoop out caverns in the hardest rocks, and leave their mute images to inform posterity how idle and how vain they were. We are actuated in Europe by a different spirit. By bestowing upon us a less genial climate and a more sterile soil, nature has determined that we shall either remain for ever a race of comfortless and gloomy savages, or invent those arts and sciences, by which the most unpromising lands are converted into a Paradise. With us, the most splendid buildings are comparatively frail and perishable, but the art of building is immortal; and we replace the structures that decay, by others more tasteful and commodious. Our greatness is the fruit of our intellect. We are in perpetual thought—in an orgasm of invention. We are haunted by the image of ideal perfection, for ever fitting before us; and we perpetually toil to overtake it, albeit in vain. The Oriental, more of an animal, recreates his senses on the charms of nature, or feasts upon the gorgeous banquet prepared by his imagination, and is satisfied. His fancy being rich and glowing, he delights, when it is in his power, to create senses of extravagant magnificence; to transport whole nations from one region to another; to transform a desert into a garden, or a city, a palace, or a Paradise into a howling wilderness. And this disposition is no less visible in his language than in his works. Every thing with him is the best or the worst. If he speak of beauty, it is like the sun and moon; it is the glory of the world; it is the light of his soul. If he deplore his misfortunes, he knows neither peace nor repose; daggers are in his heart; Satan himself might yield to him in misery.

From the Quarterly Review.

THE JEWS.

Their present actual numbers may, perhaps, not exceed six millions—numbers, however, probably greater than those over which Solomon reigned; and of these six millions there may be resident in the contiguous countries of Moravia, Ancient Poland, the Crimea, Moldavia, and Wallachia, above three millions. Except within the countries which formed Poland before its partitions, their population contained in any one European kingdom, cannot, therefore, be great. Yet so essentially are they one people, we might almost say one family; and so disposable is their wealth, as mainly vested in money transactions, that they must be considered as an aggregate, and not in their individual portions.

The Jews in France are perhaps from thirty to forty thousand; they abound chiefly at Metz, along the Rhine, and at Marseilles and Bordeaux. In Bonaparte's time they were imagined to amount to at least twice that number. They are relieved from civil restraints and disabilities in France, and in the Netherlands also. The Jews in Holland, of both German and Portuguese origin, are numerous; the latter are said to have taken refuge there when the United Provinces asserted their independence of Spain; they have a splendid synagogue at Amsterdam. Infidelity is supposed to have made more progress amongst them than amongst the German Jews in Holland. The Italian Jews are chiefly at Leghorn and Genoa; and there are four thousand of them at Rome. In speaking of the religion of the Jews, it is not necessary to particularize those who assumed the mask of Christianity under terror of the Inquisition, although much has been said of their wealth and numbers, and of the high offices they have filled in Spain, and especially in Portugal. But it is curious to see, in a very distant quarter, a like simulation produced amongst them by like causes. There are at Salonica thirty synagogues, and about twenty-five thousand professed Jews; and a body of Israelites have been lately discovered there, who, really adhering to the faith of their fathers, have externally embraced Mahomedanism.

The Barbary Jews are a very fine people; but the handsomest Jews are said to be those of Mesopotamia. That province may also boast of an Arab chief who bears the name of the Patriarch Job, is rich in sheep, and camels, and oxen, and asses, abounds in hospitality, and believes that he descends from him; he is also famed for his justice. The Jews at Constantinople, forty thousand in number, and in the parts of European Turkey on and near the Mediterranean, speak Spanish, and appear to descend from Israelites driven from Spain by persecution. The Bible Society are now printing at Corfu the New Testament, in Jewish-Spanish, for their benefit.

In truth, little appears to be known of the state of the Jews during some hundreds of years after the destruction of Jerusalem. The first body of learned Jew; which drew attention after that disastrous event was that settled in Spain; and from it all Jewish learned descends. As in accomplishment of the prophecy, the Jew is found over the whole surface of the globe; he has been long established in China, which abhors the foreigner; and in Abyssinia, which it is almost as difficult to reach as to quit. The early Judaism of that country, and in later days the history of the powerful colony of Jews established in its heart, which at one time actually reigned over the kingdom, are matters so curious, that we regret that we can do no more than advert to them; we must say the same as to the evidence existing of Jewish rites having extended themselves very far southward along the eastern coast of Africa; the numerous Jews of Barbary; and the black and white Jews, who have been established for ages, more or less remote, on the Malabar coast. It may be here observed, that all the Israelites hitherto discovered appear to be descendants of those who held the kingdom of Judah.

The Jews in Great Britain and Ireland are not supposed to be more than from ten to twelve thousand, very many of whom are foreigners, and migratory.

THE GATHERER.

A GOOD FELLOW.

The secretary of a literary society being requested to draw up "a definition of a good fellow," applied to the members of the club, individually, for such hints as they could furnish, when he received the following:—

Mr. Golightly.—A good fellow is one who rides blood horses, drives four-in-hand, speaks when he's spoken to, sings when he's asked, always turns his back on a dun, and never on a friend.

Mr. Le Blanc.—A good fellow is one who studies deep, reads trigonometry, and burns love songs; has a most cordial aversion for dancing and D'Egville, and would rather encounter a cannon than a fancy ball.

Hon. G. Montgomery.—A good fellow is one who abhors moralists and mathematicks, and adores the classicks and Caroline Mowbray.

Sir T. Wentworth.—A good fellow is one who attends the Fox-dinners, who goes to the Indies to purchase independence, and would rather encounter a buffalo than a boroughmonger.

Mr. M. Sterling.—A good fellow is a good neighbour, a good citizen, a good relation; in short, a good man.

Mr. M'Farlane.—A good fellow is a bonnie braw John Hielandman.

Mr. O'Connor.—A good fellow is one who talks loud and swears louder; cares little about learning, and less about his neckcloth; loves whiskey, patronizes bargemen, and wears nails in his shoes.

Mr. Musgrave.—A good fellow is prime—flash—and bang-up.

Mr. Burton.—A good fellow is one who knows "what's what," keeps accounts, and studies Cocker.

Mr. Rowley.—A good fellow likes turtle and cold punch, drinks Port when he can't get Champagne, and dines on mutton with Sir Robert, when he can't get vension at my lord's.

Mr. Lozell.—A good fellow is something compounded of the preceding.

Mr. Oakley.—A good fellow is something perfectly different from the preceding,—or Mr. Oakley is an ass.

INTENSE COLD.

The lowest temperature witnessed by Capt. Franklin in North America was on the 7th of February, of the second winter passed on the shores of Bear Lake. At eight in the morning, the mercury in the thermometer descended to 56° below zero; it had stood at—57.5°, and—57.3° in the course of that and the preceding day; between the 5th and the 8th, its general states was from—46° to—52°, though it occasionally rose to—43°. At the temperature of—52.2°, Mr. Kendall froze some mercury in the mould of a pistol-bullet, and fired it against a door at the distance of six paces. A small portion of the mercury penetrated to the depth of one-eighth of an inch, but the remainder only just lodged in the wood. The extreme height of the mercury in the tube was from 71° at noon to 73° at three o'clock.

THE LEGENDARY.

From "Legends of the Lakes," by T. Crofton Croker.

DONAGHA DEE'S TWO WISHES.

There was once (a long time ago) a poor man, whose name was Donagha Dee, and he lived in a small cabin, not far from a forest, in the heart of the county Kerry. Ireland at that time was not so bare as it is now, but was covered with great forests; inasmuch that it is said a squirrel might have travelled from Dingle de Couch to the city of Cork without once touching the ground. Now, you must know, that Donagha was a very poor man, and had a scolding wife; so that, between his wife and his poverty, he could scarcely ever get a moment's peace. A man might, perhaps, put up with a cross word now and then from a woman, if she was pretty, or had any other good about her; but, unluckily, Donagha's wife had nothing at all to recommend her; for, besides being cross, she was as old and as ugly as the black gentleman himself; so you may well suppose they had but a dog-and-cattish sort of life. One morning, in the beautiful month of May, Donagha was quietly smoking his doodeen (pipe) in the chimney-corner, when his wife, coming in from the well with a can of water, opened upon him all at once, as if there were a thousand beagles in her throat. "You lazy, good-for-nothing stocagh," said she, "have you nothing else to do this blessed morning but to sit poking over the ashes with your doodeen stuck in your jaw? would n't it be fitter for you to be gathering a broena (fire wood), than to be sitting there as if you were fastened to the sieshtheen (low seat) with a twelvepenny nail?" All this she said and much more, to which Donagha made no reply, but quietly took his bill-hook and gad, and away with him to the forest. I don't know what made him so quiet with her—may be he was n't in fighting humour, and may be he thought it best to get out of the way, for they say a good retrate is better than a bad fight any day. A beautiful fine day it was, sure enough; the sun was dancing through the trees, and the little birds were singing like so many pipers at a pattern; so that it was like a new life to Donagha, who, feeling the cockles of his heart rise within him, took up his bill-hook and began to work as contented as if he had nothing at home to fret him. But he was n't long at work, when he was amazed at the sound of a voice that seemed to come out of the middle of the wood; and though it was the sweetest voice he had ever heard, he could n't help being frightened at it too a little, for there was something in it that was n't like the voice of man, woman, or child. "Donogha! Donagha!" said the voice; but Donagha did n't much like to answer. "Donagha!" said the voice again; so when Donagha heard it again, he thought may be it would be better for him to speak. "Here I am," says he; and then the voice answered back again—"Donagha, do n't be frightened," said the voice, "for sure I'm only Saint Brandon, that's sent to tell you, because you're a good christin and minds your duty, you shall have two wishes granted to you; so take care what you wish for, Donagha." "Och, success to you for one saint, any how," said Donagha, as he began to work again, thinking all the time what in the wide world he had best wish for. Would he take riches for his first wish? then what should he take for the second? a good wife—or would n't it be better not to have any wife at all? Well, he thought for a long time without being able to make up his mind what to wish for. Night was coming on, and so Donagha, gathering a great bundle of fire wood up, he tied it well with his gad, and heaving it upon his shoulder, away home with him. Donagha was fairly spent with the work of the day, so that it was no wonder he should find the load on his shoulder rather too much for him: and, stumbling with weariness, he was obliged at length to throw it down: sitting upon his bundle, poor Donagha was in a great botheration; the night was closing in fast, and he knew what kind of a welcome he'd have before him if he either staid out too late, or returned without a full load of firing. "Would to heaven," says he, in his distress, and forgetting the power of his wish, "would to heaven that this broena could carry me instead of my being obliged to carry it." Immediately the broena began to move on with him, and, seated on the top of it, poor Donagha cut a mighty odd figure surely; for until he reached his own door he never stopped roaring at a thousand murders, he was so vexed with himself at having thrown away one of his wishes so foolishly. His wife Vauria (Maria) was standing at the door looking out for him, ready to give him a good saletting; but she was fairly struck dumb at seeing Donagha so queerly mounted, and at hearing him crying out in such a manner. When she came a little to herself, she asked Donagha a thousand questions about how he came to be riding upon a broena; and poor Donagha being so questioned, could not help telling her the whole story just as it happened. It was then that she was mad angry in earnest with him, to think that he would throw away his luck. Donagha, worn out and perplexed, was not able to bear it, and at length he cried out, as loud as he could, "I wish to heaven, I wish to heaven, you old scold, that's the plague of my life, I wish to heaven that Ireland was between us." No sooner said than done, for he was whipped up by a whirlwind and dropped at the north-eastern side of Ireland, where Donaghadee now stands. And Vauria, house and all, was carried off at the same time to its most south-western spot, beyond Dingle, and not far from the great Atlantick ocean. The place to this day, is known by the name of Tig na Vauria, or Mary's House; and when people would speak of places wide asunder, it has become a sort of proverb to say, "as far as Tig na Vauria from Donaghadee." And that's the reason, sir.

From the same.

SAINT PATRICK AND THE LAST OF THE "SARPINTS"

Sure, every body has hard tell of the blessed Saint Patrick, and how he druve the sarpints and all manner of venomous things out of Ireland. But for all that, there was one ould sarpint left, who was too cunning to be talked out of the country, and made to drown himself. Saint Patrick did n't well know how to manage this fellow, who was doing great havock; till, at long last he bethought himself, and got a strong iron chest made with nine boults upon it. So one fine morning he takes a walk to where the sarpint used to keep; and the sarpint who did n't like the saint in the least, and small blame to him for that, began to hiss and show his teeth at him like any thing. "Oh," says Saint Patrick, says he, "where's the use of making such a piece of work about a gentleman like myself coming to see you. 'Tis a nice house I have got made for you, agin the winter; for I'm going to civilise the whole country, man and beast," says he, "and you can come and look at it whenever you please, and 'tis myself will be glad to see you." The sarpint hearing such smooth words, thought that though Saint Patrick had druve all the rest of the sarpints into the sea, he meant no harm to himself; so the sarpint walks fair and easy up to see him and the house he was speaking about. But when the sarpint saw the nine boults upon the chest, he thought he was sould (betrayed), and was for making off with himself as fast as ever he could. "Tis a nice warm house, you see," says Saint Patrick, "and 'tis a good friend I am to you." "I thank you kindly, Saint Patrick, for your civility," says the sarpint; "but I think it's too small it is for me"—meaning it for an excuse, and away he was going. "Too small!" says Saint Patrick, "stop, if you please," says he, "you're out in that, my boy, any how—I am sure 't will fit you completely; and, I'll tell you what," says he, "I'll bet you a gallon of porter," says he, "that if you'll only try and get in, there'll be plenty of room for you." The sarpint was as thirsty as could be, with his walk; and 'twas great joy to him, the thoughts of doing Saint Patrick out of the gallon of porter; so, swelling himself up as big as he could, in he got to the chest, all but a little bit of his tail. "There, now," says he, "I've won the gallon, for you see the house is too small for me, for I can't get in my tail." When what does Saint Patrick do, but he comes behind the great heavy lid of the chest, and, putting his two hands to it, down he slaps it, with a bang like thunder. When the rogue of a sarpint saw the lid coming down, in went his tail, like a shot for fear of being whipped off him, and Saint Patrick began at once to boul the nine iron boults. "Oh! murder!—wont you let me out, Saint Patrick!" says the sarpint—"I've lost the bet fairly; and I'll pay you the gallon like a man." "Letyou out, my darling," says Saint Patrick, "to be sure I will, by all manner of means; but you see I have n't time now, so you must wait till to-morrow." And so he took the iron chest, with the sarpint in it, and pitches it into the lake here, where it is to this hour, for certain; and 'tis the sarpint struggling down at the bottom that makes the waves upon it. Many is the living man, continued Picket, besides myself, has hard the sarpint crying out from within the chest under the water—"Is it to-morrow yet?—is it to-morrow yet?" which to be sure, it never can be: and that's the way Saint Patrick settled the last of the sarpints, sir.

MISCELLANY.

GLEANINGS ON GLUTTONY.

Against Voracity and immoderate drinking, instanced by sundry histories.

Vitellius, an Emperor of Rome, was among divers other his notorious vices so luxuriously given, that at one supper he was served with two thousand fishes of divers kinds, and seven thousand flying fowles; he was afterward drawne through the streets with a halter about his neck, and shamefully put to death.

But what shall we wonder at emperours prodigalities, when of later years a simple Franciscan frier, Peter de Ruere, after hee had attained to the dignitie of cardinal by the favour of the pope, his kinsman, hee spent in two yeares, in which he lived at Rome, in feasts and banquets, two hundred thousand crownes, besides his debts, which were as much more.

In our time Muleasses, King of Tunis, was so drowned in pleasures, that being expelled from his kingdom for his vices, after his returne from Germany, being denyed of ayd hee sought of the Emperour Charles the Fifth, he spent an hundred crownes upon the dressing of a pea-cocke for his owne mouth. And that hee might with more pleasure heare musicke, he used to cover his eyes. —But the judgment of God fell upon him; for his sene or brother dispossessed him of his kingdom, and provided him a remedie that his sight should be no longer annoyance to his hearing, causing his eyes to be put out with a burning hot iron. He that is given to please his senses, and delighted in the excesse of eating and drinking, may, as Sallust saith, bee called animal, for hee is unworthy the name of a man. For wherein can a man more resemble brute beasts, and degenerate from his angelicall nature, than to serve his belly and his senses! But if our predecessours exceeded us in superfluitie of meats, we can compare and goe beyond them in drinking and quaffing.

King Edgar so much detested this vice of drunkennesse, that hee set an order that no man should drinke beyond a certaine ring, made round about the glasses and cups, of purpose for a marke.

Anacharsis saith, that the first draught is to quench the thirst, the second for nourishment, the third for pleasure, the fourth for madness.

Augustine Lercheimer reporteth a strange historie of three quaffers in Germany, in the yeare one thousand five hundred and fortie nine; these three companions were in such a jollity after they had taken in their cups, according to the brutish manner of that country, that with a coale they painted the devell on the wall, and dranke freely to him, and talked to him as though hee had been present. The next morning they were found strangled, and dead, and were burried under the gallows.

Surfeits maketh worke many times for the physician, who turning R into D giveth his patient sometimes a Decipe for a Recipe; and so payeth deerely for his travell that hastneth him to his end. Horace calleth such men that give themselves to their belly, a beast of Arcadia that devourerh the grasse of the earth.

Cornelius Celsus giveth this counsell when men come to meat; Nunquam utilis nimia satietatis, saepe inutilis nimia abstinentia; over-much satiety is never good, over-much abstinence is often hurtfull.

Mahomet desirous to draw men to the liking of him and his doctrine, and perceiving the proneness of men to luxuriousness and fleshly pleasures, yet dealt more craftily in his Alcoran, than to persuade them that felicity consisted in the voluptuousness and pleasures of this life, which he knew would not be believed nor followed but of a few, and those the more brutish sort, but threatened them with a kind of hell, and gave them precepts tending somewhat more to civilitie and humanitie, and promised his followers a paradise in the life to come, wherein they should enjoy all manner of pleasures which men desire in this world; as faire gardens environed with pleasant rivers, sweet flowers, all kinde of odoriferous savours, most delicate fruits, tables furnished with most daintie meats, and pleasant wines served in vessels of gold, &c. &c.

The Egyptians had a custome not unmeet to be used at the carousing banquets; their manner was, in the midst of their feasts to have brought before them anatomie of a dead body dried, that the sight and horror thereof putting them in minde to what passe themselves should one day come, might containe them in modesty. But peradventure things are fallen so far from their right course, that that device will not so well serve the turne, as if the carousers of these later daies were persuaded, as Mahomet persuaded his followers when hee forbade them the drinking of wine, that in every grape there dwelt a divell. But when they have taken in their cups, it seemeth that they many of them doe feare neither the divell nor any thing else.

Lavater reporteth a historie of a parish priest in Germanie, that disguised himselfe with a white sheete about him, and at midnight came into the chamber of a rich woman that was in bed, and fashioning himself like a spirit, hee thought to put her in such feare, that shee would procure a conjuror or exorcist to talke with him, or else speake to him herselfe. The woman desired one of her kinsmen to stay with her in her chamber the next night. This man making no question whether it were a spirit or not, instead of conjuration or exorcisme, brought a good cudgell with him, and after hee had well drunke to encrease his courage, knowing his hardinesse at those times to be such, that all the devils in hell could not make him afraide, hee lay downe upon a pallat, and fell asleepe. The spirit came into the chamber againe at his accustomed houre, and made such a rumbling noyse, that the exorcist (the wine not being yet gone out of his head) awaked, and leapt out of his bed, and toward the spirit hee goeth, who with counterfeit words and gesture, thought to make him afraid. But this drunken fellow making no account of his threatenings. Art thou the divell? quoth he, then I am his damme; and so layeth upon him with his cudgell, that if the poore priest had not changed his divell's voyce, and confessed himselfe to be Hauns, and rescued by the woman that then knew him, he had bin like not to have gone out of the place alive.

This vice of drunkennesse, wherein many take over-great pleasure, was a great blemish to Alexander's virtues. For having won a great part of Asia, hee laid aside that sobrietie hee brought forth of Macedon, and gave himselfe to the luxuriousnesse of those people whom he had conquered.

That King, Cambyses, tooke over-great pleasure in drinking of wine; and when he asked Prexaspes, his secretary, what the Persians said of him, he answered, that they commended him highly, notwithstanding they thought him over-much given to wine, the king being therewith very angry, caused Prexaspes' sonne to stand before him, and taking his bow in his hand, Now (quoth he) if I strike thy son's heart, it will then appeare that I am not drunk, but that the Persians doe lye; but if I misse his heart, they may be believed. And when he had shot at his son, and found his arrow had pierced his heart, he was very glad; and told him that he had proved the Persians to be lyars.

Flolmus, king of the Gothes, was so addicted to drinking, that hee would sit a great part of the night quaffing and carousing with his servants. And as on a time he sate after his accustomed and beastly manner carousing with them, his servants being as drunke as he, threw the king, in sport, into a great vessell full of drinke, that was set in the midst of the hall for their quaffing, where hee ridiculously and miserably ended his life.

Cineas being ambassadour to Pyrrhus, as he arrived in Egypt, and saw the exceeding height of the vines of that country, considering with himselfe how much evill that fruit brought forth to men, sayd, that such a mother deserved justly to be hanged so high, seeing shee did beare so dangerous a child as wine was. Plato considering the hurt that wine did to men, sayd, that the gods sent wine downe hither, partly for a punishment of their sinnes, that when they are drunke, one might kill another.

Paulus Diacrus reporteth a monstrous kinde of quaffing, between foure old men at a banquet, which they made of purpose. Their challenge was, two to two, and he that drunke to his companion must drinke so many times as hee had yeares; the youngest of the foure was eight and fiftie yeares old; the second three-score and three; the third four-score and seven; the fourth four-score and twelve; so that he which drunke least, drunke eight-and-fifty bowles full of wine, and so consequently, according to their yeares, whereof one drunke four-score and twelve bowles.

The old Romanes, when they were disposed to quaff lustily, would drinke so many carouses as there were letters in the names of their mistresses, or lovers; so easily were they overcome with this vice, who by their virtue some other time, became masters of the world; but these devices are peradventure stale now; there be finer devices to provoke drunkennesse.

In the time of Antonius Pius, the people of Rome being given to drinke without measure, he commanded that none should presume to sell wine but in apothecaries' shops, for the sicke or diseased.

Cyrus, of a contrary disposition to the gluttons and carousers, in his youth gave notable signes and afterwards like examples of sobrietie and frugalitie, when he was monarch of the Persians. For, being demanded when he was but a boy, of his grandfather, Astyages, why he would drinke no wine, because, said hee, I observed yesterday when you celebrated the feast of your nativitie, so strange a thing, that it could not be but that some man had put poison into all the wine that ye drank; for at the taking up of the table, there was not one man in his right minde. By this it appeareth, how rare a matter it was then to drinke wine, and a thing to be wondered at to see men drunke. For when the use of wine was first found out, it was taken for a thing medicinable, and not used for a common drinke, and was to be found rather in apothecaries' shops than in taverns. What a great difference there was betweene the frugalitie of the former ages and the luxuriousnesse of these latter dayes, these few examples will shew. This Cyrus, as hee marched with his army, one asking him what he would have provided for his supper, hee answered, bread; for I hope, sayth hee, wee shall find a fountain to serve us of drinke. When Plato had bene in Sicilia, being asked what new or strange thing hee had seene; I have seene, sayth hee, a monster of nature, that eateth twice a day. For Dionysius whom he meant, first brought the custome into that country. For it was the use among the Hebrewes, the Grecians, the Romanes, and other nations, to eat but once a day. But now many would thinke they should in a short time be halfe famished, if they should eat but twice a day; nay, rather whole dayes and nights bee scant sufficient for many to continue eating and quaffing. Wee may say with the poet—

Tempora mutantur et nos mutamur in illis.
The times are changed and we are changed in them.

By the historie of the swine (which by the permission of God, were vexed by the divell) we be secretly admonished that they which spend their lives in pleasures and deliciousnesse, such belly-gods as the world hath many in these daies, that live like swine, shall one day be made a prey or the divell; for seeing they will not be the temple of God, and the house of the Holy Ghost, they must of necessitie be the habitation of the divell. Such swine, sayth one, be they that make their paradise in this world, and that dissemble their vices, lest they should bee deprived of their worldly goods.

DANCING.

Dancing is defined to be "to move in measure; to move with steps correspondent to the sound of instruments." But there are other species of dancing—as for these long months

To dance attendance for a word of audience:

and to dance with pain, or when, as Lord Bacon says, "in pestilences, the malignity of the infecting vapour danceth the principal spirits." The Chorea S. Viti, or St. Vitus's Dance is another variation, said to have once prevailed extensively, and to have been cured by a prayer to this saint! whose martyrdom is commemorated on June 15. It may not be generally known that a person afflicted with this species of dancing can run, although he cannot walk or stand still. Another and a more agreeable species is to lead the dance, an unjust usurpation which is practised in a thousand other places beside the hall-room.

According to the mythologists, (authorities always quotable, and nobody knows why,) the Curetes or Corybantes, a people of Crete, who were produced from rain, first invented the dance to amuse the infant Jupiter—with what success he danced we know not, for when a year old he waged war against the Titans, and then his dancing days must have terminated.

A history of dancing is, however, not to our purpose; but a few of its eccentricities. It occurs in the customs of all people, either as a recreation or as a religious ceremony—held in contempt by some, and in esteem by others. David danced before the ark; the daughters of Shiloh danced in a solemn yearly festival; and the Israelites, (good judges) danced round the golden calf.

The ancients had a peculiar penchant for dancing, whether in person or by animals; and the feats of the latter distance all the wretched efforts of the bears, dogs, and horses of our days. The attempts of Galba to amuse the Roman people throw into the shade all the peace-rejoicings and illuminations of St. Jame's and Green Parks. Suetonius, Seneca, and Pliny tell us of elephants in their time that there were taught to walk the rope, backwards and forwards, up and down, with the agility of an Italian rope-dancer. Such was the confidence reposed in the docility and dexterity of the animal, that a person sat upon an elephant's back, while he walked across the theatre upon a rope, extended from the one side to the other. Lippsius, who has collected these testimonies, thinks them too strong to be doubted—perhaps even stronger than the rope. Scaliger corroborates all of them; Busbequius saw an elephant dance a pas surl at Constantinople; and Suetonius tells us of twelve elephants, six male and six female, who were clothed like men and women, and performed a country dance, in the reign of Tiberius. In later times, horses have been taught to dance. In the carousals of Louis XIII. there were dances of horses; and in the 13th century, some rode a horse upon a rope. All this eclipses the puny modern feats of Astley and Ducrow.

The Greeks and Romans were divided upon the propriety of dancing. Socrates who held death in contempt, when a reverend old gentleman, learned to dance of Aspasia, the beautiful nurse of Grecian eloquence. The Romans forgot their loss of the republick and of liberty—the air we breathe

If we have it not we die,

in seeing Pylædes and Bathyllus dance before them in their theatres—an indifference of which we were reminded on hearing that the Parisians sat in the Cafes on the Boulevard du Italien—sipping coffee and sucking down ice, during the capitulation of the city, and while the French, killed and wounded, were conveyed along the road before them.

* Miraculous dancing is met, however, confined to animals; for William of Malmesbury gravely relates an instance of 15 young women and 18 young men who (by the anathema of a priest) continued dancing a whole year, and wore the earth so much, that, by degrees they sunk halfway into the earth!

Cato Censorius, danced at the age of fifty-six. Cicero, however, reproached a consul with having danced. Tiberius, that monster of indulgences, banished dances from Rome; and Domitian, the illustrious fly-catcher, expelled several of his members of parliament for having danced. We are much more civilized, for such an edict as that of Domitian would clear our senate-houses as effectually as when Cromwell turned out the Long Parliament.

Among the Italians and the French, even there have been found enemies to dancing. Alfieri, the poet, had a great aversion to dancing; and one Daneau wrote a Traite des Danses, in which he maintains that "the devil never invented a more effectual way than dancing, to fill the world with —." The bishop of Noyon once presided at some deliberations respecting a minuet; and in 1770, a reverend prelate presented a document on dancing to the king of France. The Quakers considered dancing below the dignity of the Christian character; and an enthusiast, of another creed, thinks all lovers of the stage belong to the schools of Voltaire and Hume, and that dancing is a link in the chain of seduction. Stupid, leaden-heeled people, who constantly mope in melancholy, and neither enjoy nor impart pleasure, will naturally be enemies to dancing; and such we are induced to think the majority of these opponents.

The French are inveterate dancers. They have their bals pares and their salons de danse in every street; and as long as the weather will permit, they dance on platforms out of doors, and a heavy shower of rain will scarcely cool their ardour in recreation. Some of their stage figurantes resemble aerial beings rather than bone and blood, for flesh may almost be left out of the composition. But the Italians are a nation of dancers as well as the children of song, and they seem to have followed the noble example of old Cato, in this respect, with better effect than they have studied his virtue.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, MARCH 21, 1829.

PROGRESS OF ANTI-MASONRY. If the results of the recent town elections in the western part of this state are to be taken [and we believe they are] as indications of the public opinion on the subject of anti-masonry, the ultimate defeat of the political abettors of the Morgan excitement cannot rationally be doubted. The "strong holds" are becoming weak; and the "infected district" is fast sacrificing its claims to that appellation. The eyes of the people are penetrating the mists which have so long kept the truth from them—the false colouring which interest has thrown over affairs is fading away, and "poor, abused common sense" is gathering courage to rise and assert its rights. We do not believe, however, that anti-masonick jugglery will die easily or speedily. The struggle may be long; it certainly will be as desperate on the part of the pretended reformers as their total want of honesty and necessary reliance upon management and action can make it; but the "signs of the times" are too plain to be misunderstood, and they clearly predict the downfall of proscription and intolerance. We do not say this on slight grounds. We have watched the progress of affairs and are acquainted with their complexion. We have now abundant proof of a change in the public sentiment, and every week strengthens the opinion we have formed. In Genesee county, the very heart of anti-masonick violence, the work of reform is begun in earnest; Monroe county, the residence of the famous "central committee," is making a retrograde movement; and Wayne, Madison, and other counties, hitherto governed by the mania, are casting aside their fetters and throwing their strength into the opposite scale. It is true, that a few places which until lately were quiet, are getting to be a little troubled; but the means employed to create, and the juggling necessary to sustain the excitement, mark it with infamy, and the spirit of regeneration which is abroad, will hasten the end of its brief existence.

If we cast our eyes beyond our own state, the same symptoms are observed. Men of honesty and worth are taking a decided stand in favour of toleration and liberal principles. Wherever the excitement has existed for any length of a time, it is becoming unpopular; and even where it has all the claims of novelty to recommend it to the prejudices of the people, its success is so meagre that it scarcely deserves the name. In Connecticut, it is a mere parody of seriousness. In Massachusetts, where no means have been left unused to give it extent and power, it barely has an existence; and depends for its continuance upon a gaping score or two, that are governed, and cheated of their money and their faculties, by half a dozen papers; compared with which the Ontario Phoenix is respectable. The uneasy spirits of Vermont, too, are striving for their day: they will probably have it; but it will not be one exactly to their liking. With a hypocritical old editor as commander-in-chief, and a shallow and vascillating priest as keeper of their consciences, they will "make nice of no vile hold to stay their fortunes up"; and as villany is always rewarded in one way or another, their labour will not be fruitless, though it may yield them thorns instead of roses. The following extract explains the causes of excitement in one county; and we think that after reading it, our readers will give the anti-masons of Vermont credit for about the same quantity of honesty as is possessed by men of the same profession in this state. Did a shadow of similar facts exist on the other side of the question, the whole tribe of anti-masonick papers would be filled with capitals, and oaths and obligations that no mason ever heard of, for a month to come.

From the Vermont Advocate and White River Advertiser.

ANTI-MASONRY. Text. It has been asserted by the anti-masons that one great objection to the masonick institution, with them, is "that a mason, when acting as a juror, is bound to interfere between a criminal and justice, provided the criminal be also a mason."

Application. We have received information from several different sources, that secret efforts are making throughout Orange County, by the anti-masonick party, to secure the jury boxes to themselves, at the meetings for the election of officers in the several towns, in order to prevent a bill of indictment being found against a prominent member of that party, who is now under bonds to answer for a criminal offence before the next term of Orange County Court.

Comment. The text we know to be false—and we would that the application should prove equally unfounded. We may be justly alarmed when our jury boxes are made to subserve the purposes of any party by screening the guilty from the penalty of crimes from the consideration that he is a member of such party.

It is not in the nature of things for such men as the leaders of anti-masonry to become the rulers of a republican people. As knaves will sometimes do, in spite of the exertions of honest men to the contrary, they may by management get into inferior places of trust and profit; but when the public mind recovers from its delirium, and men again think and judge for themselves, they will be hurled from their ill-gotten power into the contempt and disgrace they merit.

It will be a week, to-morrow morning, since Mr. Satterlee Clark, esquire, et cetera, went into the fidgets. As the public are supposed to be interested in the affairs of those connected with them by such peculiar ties as bind Mr. Satterlee Clark to his fellow sufferers, we give the following journal of his proceedings for the past week: Sunday—He made quite a formidable display of eloquence in a public house in this city; but he conquered nothing except the patience of his hearers. Monday—He came to see us, with his whiskers erect and his tongue on fire; but as we were otherwise engaged at the time of the terrible meeting, Mr. Clark merely "flashed in the pan." Tuesday—The gentleman and his friend Mr. Maynard held a secret session in the Senate chamber. Wednesday—He solicited the advice and assistance of the district attorney. Thursday—He opened his budget of woes for the inspection of the Grand Jury. Friday—The Grand Jury refused to find a bill. Saturday—We understand Mr. Clark is convalescent, and by the time the week is ended, he will probably be settled into that state of quietness which best becomes "waiters on Providence."

Rowland Stephenson, an English bankrupt, about whom so much has been said in the papers lately, is now under arrest in the city of New-York. The proceedings against him since his arrival in this country show that abductions are not the fruit of masonry alone. As the violence with which he has been treated has created some excitement, we shall make a summary of the facts connected with his case, and give it to our readers next week. In the mean time, we think it would be well for the people to be cautious what faith they put upon ex parte statements, whether of this or any other affair.

Both houses of the legislature have resolved to attend the funeral of the late Lieut. Gov. Tayler, on Monday next. An obituary notice of this distinguished individual will be found in a subsequent column.

The communication of Federal Republican is too much of a politico-religious nature for our columns. We are as much opposed to imprisonment for debt as our correspondent is; but we trust he will excuse us for declining to view the subject as he does.

The address of the Rochester masons is not received.

For the American Masonick Record.

THEY ARE THE FACTION. Having attended the late convocation of Morganites, that burlesque on the Hartford Convention, I did think of sending you a brief abstract of their proceedings and characters, but the more I have examined, the more I have become convinced that they are both too completely despicable to deserve or excite any other sentiments than those of contempt and disgust, which they occasioned in every candid spectator of that unsuccessful farce of Great Cry and Little Wool. Being beyond the pale of the infected district, they were in no small quandary to obtain a decent place for exhibition. They in vain attempted, in their infatuation, to be allowed the ad-use of two respectable churches, and at last, the house of assembly, from pity to their forlorn condition, and perfect indifference to their vaunting nothingness, permitted them to meet in its chamber. On opening, a promiscuous crowd of all classes attended, from curiosity to see the puppet show, and so extremely interesting and important did it prove, that when the scene of iniquity was about being closed, (which was done with prayer) the whole number of lookers on, both in the gallery and lobbies, including masons, anti and neutrals, actually amounted to as many as thirty. Southwick's story was worthy of himself; the same old tale, told for the thousandth time, full of sound and fury signifying nothing. His followers then showed (that is, said,) that the wall being of our civil and religious institutions and the very existence of the republic itself, absolutely required the extermination of freemasonry, because masonry is possessed of neither antiquity, power, nor importance, but is a feeble, unmeaning, insignificant, short-lived institution (for which fact, these veridical blowers of hot and cold in the same breath, gave the same incontrovertible evidence, their own indubitable assertions), and for this invaluable discovery and invention, with the unparalleled regard for modesty and justice peculiar to themselves, they only claim an exclusive patent right to ALL the offices in the country to begin with. The ranting of these avowed advocates and abettors of treachery, perjury and blasphemy, about allaying an excitement of which their own selfish aggrandizement is both the cause and most accursed effect, strongly reminds one of Franklin's disappointed Frenchman, who wanted pay for "de trouble and de expense of heating de poker."

A large part of this convention of consistent and exemplary supporters of social order, morality and religion, was composed of broken down politicians, equally destitute of character, fortune, and principle, the cankers of a calm world and a long peace, and the complement made up of deluded men, notorious only for being weak in the upper story. Among the faction I perceived a few, very few, who, for their own sakes, I regretted to see in such company and cause, but not a single one in the whole herd eminent either for mental or moral greatness. I would confidently appeal to every human being possessed of common honesty and common sense, and who may have had the patience and the stomach, to hear or read their hackneyed misrepresentations of Morgan's abduction, and their stale slang of murder and conspiracy, to declare whether Solomon Southwick, Thurlow Weed, Francis Granger, David C. Miller, Myron Holley, and the other ringleaders of the gang, can, or do possess the least regard for the fate of Morgan, or the slightest apprehension that our constitution and laws are endangered, unless indeed they should be jeopardized by the imbecile and madly desperate assaults of the Morganites themselves.

I shall content myself at present with sending you the following list of anti-masonick delegates to be put on "Record," that the portion of the world to whom they are respectively known, may judge for itself of their virtues and their talents, and that their names and memories may be made the object, as far as they deserve, of the esteem and admiration of every honest and honourable man.

ARISTIDES.

Albany county. Samuel M. Hopkins, Solomon Southwick,* Thomas Helme, Cettarusus, Russell Hubbard, Cayuga, William Bruce, John Taylor, Aaron Watson, H. William Seward, Samuel Phelps, Chautauque, Abner Hazeltine, Nathan Mixer,† Cananaga, Joel Kendrick, Jethro Hatch, James Thompson, Columbia, David Wager, Isaac B. Potter, John Hughes, Cortland, Alanson Curley,† Eli Carpenter, Delaware, Ebenezer Penfield, Joel Parks, Dutchess, Cornelius Husted, Robert Hoag, Thomas H. Bickey, Eric, Albert H. Tracy, Thaddeus Joy, Isaac F. Trimble,† Essex, Franklin Stone, George, Timothy Fitch,† George W. Lay,† Augustus P. Hascall, Greene, Joseph Carman, Knight Bonnet,† Herkimer, Hiram Nelson, Abraham Randall, Jr., Stephen Hull, Jefferson, A. W. Stow, S. N. Sweet, Alfred Guthrie, Livingston, James Percival,† Holloway S. Long, Madison, Thomas Bookman,† John F. Fairchild,† Francis Whitmore, Monroe, Brooks Mason,† Frederick Whittlesey,† William Groves,† Thurlow Weed,† Montgomery, John Merrill, Alexander Sheldon, Tiffany Brockway, New York, Henry Dana Ward,† L. B. Griswold, B. J. Seward,† Niagara, Bates Cooke,† John Phelps,† Oneida, Thomas R. Palmer, William Williams, Nicholas Devereaux, Richard R. Lansing, Satterlee Clark, Onondaga, Parley Howlett,† John Negus, Parson G. Shipman, Ontario, Ralph Wilcox, Francis Granger,† Irving Mott, Orange, William Fin, Orleans, Chauncey Robinson, Oswego, Arvin Rice, Otsego, Erasmus Crafts, James Hawks,† John C. Morris, Putnam, Harrison Hopkins, Rensselaer, Ambrose Moseley, Welcome Whitaker, David Greene, Jonathan Nichols, Holden Sweet, Saratoga, Caleb Greene, James Mott, David Garney, Schoenckedy, Solomon Kelly,† Schoharie, James W. Throop, Jacob S. Hager, Seneca, Enoch Chamberlain, Daniel Scott,† Steuben, Henry R. Townsend, Tioga, Stephen M. Perch, Tompkins, Hiram Cobb, Robert Swartwout, John Hartman, Ulster, Jonathan Du Bois,† Jesse T. Conklin, Washington, John Cary,† Chautauque, Whitney, Benjamin Ferris, Wayne, Myron Holley, Luther Fillmore,† Morris F. Shepard.*

* Those in Italics are confessed apostate masons.

* Anti-masonick office-holders. † Defeated at the last fall election. ‡ Morgan committee-men. § Printers of anti-masonick newspapers. || A resident of Orange county. || A resident of the state of Pennsylvania.

CANOVA'S STATUE OF WASHINGTON. In the London New Monthly Magazine for January, there is a communication from a British correspondent at Rome, in which the writer describes Canova's statue of Washington and the character of our illustrious patriot as follows:—

"The 'Washington' is another instance of mortality divinized. It is something more than the mere fixing of a man into marble. It is an apotheosis of his mind. Washington was no hero, but something infinitely better. He did not save America, but he showed America how she might save herself: one of the few great men who, more contented to be great for their country only, and who, founding a state by the mere force of single-hearted high-minded public feeling, had the still greater glory of knowing how to retire when the mighty work was done. He was no genius, no orator, no writer; but he was thoroughly penetrated with the consciousness of a great and solemn trust; he was stamped with a firmness which welded and kneaded events to his will; he was glowing with an unextinguishable devotion to liberty; beside which, the world, and all that the world could, was as dust and dross in the scale. To shape out such faculties to the eye was no easy task; for an Italian it might seem impossible. But Canova has cast into his work all the inspiration of the 'America Libera'; he has sculptured what Alfieri wrote."

MORGAN'S BODY. A long report, detailing the operations of the Morgan Committee, (or, as it is now politically termed, the "Anti-masonick Central Committee,") was read in the late anti-masonick convention, and has since been published. The Morgan affair, and their own exertions in ferretting out the perpetrators, is the burden of their song; but, singular to relate! not a syllable is said concerning the corpse discovered in the fall of 1827 at the junction of Oak-orchard creek with Lake Ontario. This is the more surprising, as the persons who sign the report (viz. Samuel Works, F. F. Backus, Frederick Whittlesey, Thurlow Weed, &c.) are the same who once invoked the Almighty to witness their belief that the body there found was no other than that of Morgan! at the same time attributing the discovery of the body to the miraculous interference of God!

Their silence on this subject, in the report, speaks volumes.

On the eve of an important election, thirteen months after the abduction and supposed murder of Morgan, the body in question was found on the shore, in such a state of preservation as forbid the idea that it was many weeks in the water. It was discoloured externally, but had not undergone more than the first stage of decomposition, notwithstanding its exposure to the elements. It was about four inches longer than Morgan was proved to be—it had heavy whiskers on, when found, although Morgan never wore whiskers—it had "a large patch of hair on the top of its head," but Morgan was perfectly bald, from the forehead to the hinder part of the crown—it had not a single article of clothing which Morgan was ever known to have worn—it had no marks of violence upon it, although Morgan was alleged to have been barbarously murdered, by having his throat cut, &c. and weights attached to his mangled body when thrown into the lake—and yet, in the face of all this—in the face of God and honest men—with testimony within their reach conclusive against even the probability of their assertion—these political committeemen sanctioned their declaration by an appeal to Deity, that the body had been "identified as Morgan's, beyond the shadow of a doubt!!!"

They did not probably suppose, when making this declaration, that the body would be disinterred and submitted to the scrutiny of impartial men.

If they actually believed what they thus affirmed with the solemnity of an oath, how is it that no mention is made of the body of Morgan, in their report? If it was not the body of Morgan, in what an awful predicament have they placed themselves before God and their fellow men!

Such has been the conduct of some of the persons appointed by the citizens to investigate the Morgan outrage; and such the unblushing effrontery with which they have perverted that sacred trust to their own selfish and party purposes, that, when doubts were expressed to some of them respecting the identity of the corpse, the reply was, "It will make a good enough Morgan till after election." The hoax was however detected before election;—and an honest jury, on the third inquest, when the subject was fairly investigated, pronounced the body to be, not Morgan's but that of Timothy Monroe.

These facts are characteristic of the means employed to prostitute the Morgan excitement to the political uses of its foster-fathers. They furnish a fair specimen of the management of those broken down politicians who are seeking to regenerate their fallen fortunes through the agency of political Anti-masonry. [Rochester Republican.]

The Freemasons in Ontario county, N. Y. have at length made the first advances towards healing the difficulties that exist in the western part of the state of New-York. Upwards of seventy members have signed an address recommending the return of the charters to the grand lodge, and appropriating their funds for the support of schools. They still adhere to their principles that the Institution is a good one, and admit that there are members who are no credit to them, but they are willing to forego all the benefits derived from their stated meetings, that on their part no obstruction may remain to allay the excitement. How different this course to that pursued by their persecutors! They are willing to yield every thing but their opinion, for the public peace; and if their persecutors have a spark of christianity left in their bosoms, they will accept the hand of fellowship that is proffered to them; if not, they may pursue their own course, for no further concessions will be made, and none others ought to be asked of honourable men.

There are some who have dabbled in this business for the purpose of making money, and in a few instances they have succeeded. It will now be seen what course they pursue—those who have made their fortunes will be satisfied, whilst those who have been disappointed, and whose conscience is seared to all the tender sympathies of forgiveness and mutual forbearance, will show their chagrin and mortification by redoubling their endeavours to throw obstacles in the way of a general peace. [Morristown Jerseyman.]

As the Anti-Masonick party, if we take their own words for it, have deeply at heart the punishment of those concerned in the outrage committed upon Morgan, we should like to be informed of the reason why they do not take the notorious Giddins in hand. This man, if he is to be believed, which by the way is doubted by some, is more guilty than any one who has as yet been brought out to the public view. He is the man who says he acted as Morgan's jailer—he is the man who turned the key upon his prisoner, when supplicating in the most piteous terms to be released—he turned a deaf ear to all his entreaties, and is now canonized as a Saint by the Anti-Masons, merely because he renounced Masonry! Can men be honest who denounce the whole fraternity of Masons as murderers, and at the same time harbour such a viper as Giddins in their bosoms! If they wish to convince the people of the honesty of their intentions, why not make an example of this man, instead of enriching him for his crimes by way of Anti-Masonick Almanacks? This subject is exciting considerable inquiry among the people; and they ask an explanation. Will you give it? [Batavia Times.]

JEFFERSON COUNTY. The annual town elections which took place in the several towns in this county on the 3d inst. were contested with more than usual asperity. The hydra headed monster anti-masonry, reared its snaky crest in almost every town, and a bold push was made to secure a majority of the board of supervisors. It is a fact, however, as creditable to the good sense of the community, as it must be gratifying to the friends of liberal principles, and the enemies of proscription and intolerance, that in only five of the eighteen towns of which the county is composed, have they succeeded; and in almost every town where they obtained large majorities at the fall election, they have been beaten. [Watertown Freeman.]

VARIETIES.

Chinese Proclamation. The chief magistrate of the city of Canton, in China, as is usual every new year, has published a proclamation to the citizens. He refers to the infamous practices of thieves, vagrants, and local blackguards, and calls upon his people to reform their habits in the following singular phraseology:—"After this proclamation let all aim to renew the skin of their faces, and avoid that repentance which is as useless as a man's attempting to bite his own navel. Ye dwellers in market places, take good heed to your doors, and shut them carefully morning and evening. If vagabonds, as before, swindle, rob and annoy, seize them, and drag them before a magistrate. If liars connive and combine, I shall, on the moment of detection, flog them till they die. I am resolved to show them no indulgence. Let every one trembling obey. Oppose not. A special proclamation."

A person who calls himself an idler has made the following calculations: there are in London, according to the latest and most authentic records, 4,692 inns, taverns, and public houses; 2,211 tailors; 1750 grocers; 1,715 bakers; 1,568 boot and shoe makers; 1,426 merchants; 1,843 butchers; 1,818 physicians, surgeons, apothecaries, &c.; 1,212 carpenters; 1,008 cheesemongers; 8,100 lawyers, barristers, special pleaders, &c. It would therefore appear, that the number of those who are reputedly skilful in "taking away our life," is less than half the number of those who, with some truth, are accused with taking away the means whereby we live.

Liberality. The committee appointed to procure subscriptions for the suffering poor in New-York, recently waited on a poor man, whose property was estimated at something short of a million. He gave them a dollar. Then waited upon a widow, who, it was said, could not afford to give any thing. Her mitre was cheerfully bestowed—TEN DOLLARS! The best of the joke is, that another poor man, who thought the publication of the above incidents related to him or his brother, stopped his newspaper, the Commercial Advertiser, in which they first appeared. It happened to be neither himself nor his brother.

[East Patriot.]

Voyages of Discovery. According to a statement in a French paper, there are at present no less than thirteen vessels actually employed in voyages of discovery. Of these France has three, England five, Russia two, Sweden one, Holland one, and the United States one. It remains to be seen, whether the last mentioned expedition will ever put to sea. We want yet the example of Spain, Portugal, and the small Italian states.

[Southern Patriot.]

Mining.—By a statement of the Directors, and other calculations of the United Mexican Mining associations, in England, it appears that the expenses from August 1st to October 18th last year, exceeded the receipts in the three principal districts of Zacatecas, Guanajuato and Sambarote, to the amount of $191,926; and in some smaller districts, 60,000, making a loss of $251,926, in little more than three months.

[Boston Bulletin.]

Centenary of Methodism. It is stated in some of the papers, that the year 1829 will form the great Centenary of Methodism, which first commenced at Oxford, under the Rev. John Wesley; but this is a mistake, as it appears from the Quarterly Tickets of that body, that "Wesleyan Methodism was established in 1739," not 1729.

[Boston Palladium.]

Murder and Sociability. A late Irish newspaper contains the following paragraph:—"On Thursday, the Lord Lieutenant visited Carton, where he shot in the morning, and afterwards spent the day with the Duke of Leinster."

From the Albany Argus of yesterday.

DEATH OF LIEUT. GOV. TAYLER.

The venerable patriot and citizen JOHN TAYLER, expired at 7 o'clock last evening, after a short illness, at his residence in this city, full of years and of honours, but in the vigour of his faculties.

Gov. Tayler was a chief of the Revolution; and he exhibited in the purity of his life, the simplicity of his habits, and his mental energies and physical strength, the traits of character peculiar to the great men of that period. He entered the 67th year of his age on the 4th day of July last; and until within the past week, was abroad in the discharge of the duties of a citizen.

In all the period of the revolution, he was zealous and efficient in the service of his country. In 1776 he was a delegate to the provincial congress: In 1777 a conspicuous member of the committee of safety, a body of fearless patriots, who at the hazard of their lives, exercised the executive powers, from the subversion of the colonial government until the adoption of our first state constitution; and he was a member of the convention that framed that instrument.

For many years prior to 1813, he was a member of the state senate, from the then eastern district. In that year, he was elected lieutenant-governor of this state, in which office he was continued, by successive elections, until January, 1823, when he retired from public life. From February, 1817, until July following, he administered the government of the state, in consequence of the resignation of gov. Tompkins.

In December last, he was chosen by the electoral college of this state, an elector of president and vice-president; and the vote which he gave on that occasion for gen. Jackson, was the last official act of his life.

It may be said of him—but the remark will apply to few of any age or country—that for the last sixty years he has been, almost without interruption, in the discharge of civil trusts, of the highest public importance.

Of his private life, his praise is on the tongues of all who knew him. It was an example of piety, benevolence and charity—of useful, and until the infirmities of age prevented, of active, citizenship.

CONTENTS OF THE IRISH SHIELD, FOR FEBRUARY. Published monthly, by Caleb Bartlett, No. 70, Bowery, New-York. Price, $3.50 per annum.

HISTORY of Ireland, Chapters I and II; Fatal Curiosity, (an Irish Historical Tale); Grecian Females and manner, No. II; Literary and Biographical notices of Irish; Authors and Artists, No. V, (Hugh Hamilton); Irish Topography, No. II; Ecclesiastical Edifices of Dublin, No. II (Christ's Church); Essays on the present state of Ireland, No. I. Irish Affairs—Letter from the Most Rev Dr Curtis to the Duke of Wellington; the Marquis of Anglesey's letter to the Most Rev Dr Curtis, Speech of Mr O'Connell, M.P. at the meeting of the Catholic Association of Ireland; Speech of Mr Sheil; of Mr Steele; Mr David Latouche; Address of the Catholic Association of Ireland, to the friends of civil and religious liberty in the city of Charleston; Extract from the Catholic Journal relative to Mr. O'Connell; Association of the Friends of Ireland in New-York; The Drama (Park Theatre); To the Patrons of the Irish Shield. Editorial Country. Original Poetry—Lives in Memory of Mary, Queen of Scots; The Drooping Rose; Fare thee Well; What is Love; A Lover's Oath; A Tear: Epigram, addressed to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

POETRY.

THE CORONATION OF INEZ DE CASTRO.*

BY MRS. HEMANS.

"Tableau, au l'Amour fait alliance avec la Tombe; union redoutable de la mort et de la vie." Madame de Staël.

There was music on the midnight;
From a royal fane it rolled,
And a mighty bell, each pause between,
Sternly and slowly it tolled.
Strange was their mingling in the sky,
It hushed the listener's breath;
For the music spoke of triumph high,
The lonely bell, of death.

There was hurrying through the midnight:—
A sound of many feet;
But they fell with a muffled fearfulness,
Along the shadowy street:
And softer, fainter, grew their tread,
As it neared the Minster-gate,
Whence broad and solemn light was shed
From a scene of royal state.

Full glowed the strong red radiance
In the centre of the nave,
Where the folds of a purple canopy
Sweep down in many a wave;
Leading the marble pavement old
With a weight of gorgeous gloom;
For something lay 'midst their fretted gold,
Like a shadow of the tomb.

And within that rich pavilion
High on a glittering throne,
A woman's form sat silently,
Midst the glare of light alone.
Her jewelled robes fell strangely still—
The drapery on her breast
Seemed with no pulse beneath to thrill,
So stone-like was its rest.

But a peal of lordly music
Shook e'en the dust below,
When the burning gold of the diadem
Was set on her pallid brow!
Then died away that haughty sound,
And from th' encircling hand,
Stept Prince and Chief, 'midst the hush profound,
With homage to her hand.

Why passed a faint cold shuddering
Over each martial frame,
As one by one, to touch that hand,
Noble and leader came?
Was not the settled aspect fair?
Did not a queenly grace,
Under the parted ebon hair,
Sit on the pale still face?

Death, Death! canst thou be lovely
Unto the eye of Life?
Is not each pulse of the quick high breast
With thy cold mein at strife?
—It was a strange and fearful sight,
The crown upon that head,
The glorious robes and the blaze of light,
All gathered round the Dead!

And beside her stood in silence
One with a brow as pale,
And white lips rigidly compressed,
Lost the strong heart should fail;
King Pedro with a jealous eye
Watching the homage done
By the land's flower and chivalry
To her, his martyred one.

But on the face he looked not
Which once his star had been:
To every form his glance was turned,
Save of the breathless queen;
Though something, won from the grave's embrace,
Of her beauty still was there,
Its hues were all of that shadowy place,
'Twas not for him to bear.

Ah! the crown, the sceptre,
The treasures of the earth,
And the priceless love that poured those gifts,
Alike of wasted worth!
The rites are closed—bear back the Dead
Unto the chamber deep,
Lay down again the royal head,
Dust with the dust to sleep.

There is music on the midnight—
A requiem sad and slow,

As the mourners through the sounding aisle
In dark procession go,
And the ring of state, and the starry crown,
And all the rich array,
Are borne to the house of silence down,
With her, the queen of clay.

And tearlessly and firmly,
King Pedro led the train—
But his face was wrapt in his folding robe,
When they lowered the dust again.
—'Tis hushed at last, the tomb above,
Hymns die, and steps depart:
Who called thee strong as Death, O Love?
Mightier thou wert and art!

From the Connecticut Mirror.

THE GOOD SAMARITAN.

Who bleeds in the desert, faint, naked and torn,
Left lonely to wait for the coming of morn?
The last sigh from his breast, the last drop from his heart,
The last tear from his eye-lid seemed ready to part.

He looks to the east with a death-swimming eye,
Once more the bleat beams of the morning to spy;
For penniless, friendless, and houseless he's lying,
And he shudders to think that in darkness he's dying.

Yon meteor!—'t is ended as soon as begun—
Yon gleam of the lightning!—it is not the sun—
They brighten and pass—but the glory of day,
It is warm while it shines, and does good on its way.

How brightly the morning breaks out from the east!
Who walks down the path to get tithes for his priest!
It is not the robber who plundered and fled—
'T is a Levite. He turns from the wretched his head.

Who walks in his robes from Jerusalem's halls?
Who comes to Samaria from those sacred walls?
There is pride in his step—there is hate in his eye—
There is scorn or his lip, as he proudly walks by;
'T is thy Priest, thou proud city, now splendid and fair;
A few years shall pass thee, and—who shall be there!

Mount Gerizim looks on the vallies that spread
From the foot of high Ebal to Esdrelon's head,
The torrent of Kishon rolls back on the plain,
And Tabor sends out its fresh floods to that main,
Which, purpled with fishes, flows rich with the dyes
That flash from their fins, and shine out from their eyes.
Flow sweet are the streams, but more pure is the fountain
That gushes and swells from Samaria's mountain.

From Galilee's city the Cushite comes out,
And by Jordan washed Tizrah, with purpose devout,
To pay at the altar of Gerizim's shrine,
And offer his incense of oil and of wine,
He follows his heart, that with eagerness longs
For Samaria's anthems, and Syria's songs.

He sees the poor Hebrew; he stops on the way,
By the side of the wretched, 't is better to pray
Than to visit the holiest temple that stands
In the thrice blessed places of Palestine's lands.
The oil that was meant for Mount Gerizim's ground,
Would better be poured on the sufferer's wound;
For no incense more sweetly, more purely can rise,
From the altars of earth to the throne of the skies,
No libation more rich can be offered below,
Than that which is tendered to anguish and wo.

From the London Literary Gazette.

OPENING OF THE NIEBELUNGENLIED.

To us in ancient stories he marvels many told
Of glorious achievements of the mighty men of old—
Both of featings and fightings, both of blood and of tears:
I too will tell my story, if you vouchsafe your ears.

In Burgundy to womanhood a noble maiden grew,
So fair, that in no country was nought more fair to view;
Chrimbild was she called, a lovely maiden she,
And for her many noble knights were doomed their death to dre.

If many loved the maiden, no marvel that I hold,
For she was gazed on daily by heroes good and bold:
She was surpassing lovely—she was a noble maid,
And good as she was lovely;—her truth no tongue gainsaid.

There was a boy in Netherland, a boy of kingly kind;
His father was King Siegesmond, his mother Siegelind:
Within a noble city, far round the nations known,
In Santen by the Rhine, to manhood he was grown.

I tell you of this hero, how beautiful he was,
For blaming of his beauty all over was no cause;
Full strong and full stately was the comely bold young man;
Ha! what mighty honour unto this world he wan.

Siegfried he was called, this champion so good;
He wasted kingdoms many in the virtue of his mood;

He in his strength and glory rode many a realm around;
Ha! what a furious horseman for Burgundy was found!

Ere yet this dauntless hero had a beard his cheek upon,
With his own hand I tell ye such wonders he had done,
That ever more about them we might both sing and say;
But we must pass them over until another day.

In Siegfried's fairest season, in the spring-time of his days,
Where many wonders spoken of him and of his praise—
What honour he had conquered, and how lovely was his frame.

And red was many a lady's cheek when men but named his name.

He now was so y-waxen, that he to court did ride,
Where him with admiration fair dames and maidens eyed;
They wished, when they beheld him, to lead the boy astray;
But he was modest-hearted—that was his shield and stay.

'Twas on the seventh morning, to Worms upon the sand,
He came with all his company, riding by his hand;
With gold their armour gleamed, and proudly ate each one.
And stately stept their horses the level sands upon.

Their shields they were new; they were broad and they were bright;
And beautiful their helmets, as becometh noble knight;
Thus Siegfried the bold to King Gunther's castle came:
I wis a comelier riding was never than that same.

"Now, greatly do I marvel," said King Gunther, out of hand,

"Why you, most noble Siegfried, hast ridden to this land;
Or what you wish to come at in Worms here on the Rhine."
Then to the host thus spake the guest:—"A simple tale be mine:

"Men many times did tell me, within my father's land,
That round the great King Gunther there rode a peerless band:

No other knights could match them—such men I'd fain be near—

No outlawed knight durst beard them—and therefore am I here.

"For I too am a soldier, and born to wear a crown,
Which from right noble fathers, a worthy line, comes down:
But none shall say I owe it to nothing but my line;
But that of right of prowess, too, both crown and land are mine."

From the London Literary Gazette.

SIMPLE BALLAD.

Young Rosa yet gay, and her heart always light,
Her cheek ever blooming, her eye ever bright,
And her laugh was so joyous, so wild, and so free!
Youth, beauty, and mirth,—oh! she had them all three.

But Colin, false Colin, soon stole all away;
For, guiltless no longer, no longer she's gay;
With her innocence all her enjoyment went too,
Forsaken, heart-broken, what could Rosa do?

Then the rose on her cheek, ah! how soon did it fade!
While her dim, sunken eye her soul's anguish betrayed:
And she who had seemed never destined to sigh,
Felt the first wound of sorrow, and felt it to die.

But o'er the green grave that poor Rosa contains,
The flowers that wave are her beauty's remains;
No mortal, the villagers say, placed them there,
Like her Nature's children, like her they are fair.

FINE CUTLERY, &c.—JAMES DICKSON, Cutler and Surgical Instrument Maker, No. 3 Beaver street, (formerly at No. 98 North Market street) Albany, manufactures and repairs all kinds of instruments in the above branches, with neatness, accuracy and despatch, and warranted equal to any article imported, or manufactured in the United States.

Shears, Scissors, Razors and Penknives, ground and finished on an improved plan, and warranted to excel any other in use in this city or elsewhere.

Currier's Steels constantly on hand, and warranted a superior article.

Blades inserted in knife-handles in the most approved style, and most reasonable terms. Locks repaired.

N. B. Country orders punctually attended to.
Albany, Feb. 14, 1829.

34.

PAINTING AND GLAZING.—The subscriber respectfully informs his friends and the public that he continues the House and Sign Painting and Glazing, at the old stand, No. 299, corner of North Market and Steuben streets, where he will accommodate the public with any article in his line. Paints in pots mixed ready for use, of the first quality, can be had at any time. Personal attention will be paid to all orders.
March 9, 1823. JOHN F. PORTER.

THIS PAPER

Is published every Saturday, by E. B. CHILDS,
AT THE CORNER OF NORTH MARKET AND STEUBEN
STREETS, ALBANY, N. Y.

TERMS.—To city subscribers, Three Dollars a year. To subscribers who receive their papers by mail, Two Dollars and Fifty Cents, IN ADVANCE—otherwise, Three Dollars. JOB PRINTING neatly executed at this office.

* Don Pedro of Portugal, after his accession to the kingdom, had the body of the murdered Inez taken from the grave, solemnly anointed and crowned.

AMERICAN MASONICK RECORD

AND ALBANY SATURDAY MAGAZINE.

VOL. III.

ALBANY, N. Y. SATURDAY, MARCH 28, 1829.

NO. 9.

MASONICK RECORD.

ADDRESS

Of the Freemasons of Monroe county, to the publick, on returning their Charters. Adopted by a Convention of Delegates from several Lodges, held in Rochester, on Friday, 13th of March, 1829.

The following Masonick Lodges of the county of Monroe, namely, Welles Masters Lodge, Hamilton Royal Arch Chapter, Monroe Encampment of Gates; the Monroe Chapter and Monroe Lodge at Brockport, Henrietta Lodge, Morning Star Lodge at Pittsford, Penfield Union Lodge, and Brighton Lodge—having determined to surrender their charters, and being unwilling to submit tamely to the sweeping denunciations which have been so prodigally lavished against them, and inviting a free but impartial inquiry into their views and reasons, have respectively assigned to committees the task of announcing publicly the leading considerations which have guided to this determination.

In entering jointly upon the discharge of this duty, devolved upon us, it is not conceived that the occasion calls for an elaborate review, nor indeed for a serious refutation, of all the absurd imputations and extraordinary charges which have been so industriously arrayed against the fraternity: neither is it proposed to indulge in angry rebukes and bitter sarcasms against the doubtful motives and unkind passions which obviously have and still do direct the movements of the master spirits of the exclusive party, styling themselves anti-masons. Such a course, although justifiable by the law of retaliation, would not mitigate past evils, and might perhaps aggravate anticipated ones which we are unaffectedly anxious to avert.

With these preliminary remarks, we proceed to advance, as tenable propositions, that an utter disregard of public opinion, when once clearly settled and ascertained, is, on the part of the citizen, unwise under any form of government—that especially under such an one as it is our common happy condition to enjoy, (being one, emphatically of opinion, controlled by the genius, sustained by the energies, and regulated by the intelligence of the people,) a reckless opposition to the confirmed public sentiment cannot be defended, and that it is not only unwise to treat it with indifference, but, where no violation of principle is involved, to set it at defiance is to be culpably obstinate.

Doubtless, occasions frequently arise, when personal gratification and convenience, even though their indulgence be not inhibited by law, must yield to other and higher claims arising out of our relation to society. Such alternative, we believe, now presents itself to the freemasons of Monroe county. After deliberate discussion and anxious reflection, we have unanimously arrived at the conclusion that public opinion at this time unequivocally calls upon them to relinquish their masonick rights.

It is not to be disguised that this concession has cost us a considerable effort, particularly while smarting under the lash of persecution and proscription: but, appealing as we do to the justice of an enlightened community, it is due to the dignity of the tribunal before which we are thrown, to stifle the suggestions of private grief at the shrine of public duty.

Having thus signified the acquiescence of the before enumerated lodges in what appears to be the publick will, our task as a committee would seem to be accomplished: yet not evading the most rigid scrutiny, and because we believe it to be in the contemplation of those whom we represent, we do solemnly aver, that the alleged and probable perpetration of the death of William Morgan by the hand of violence, has been uniformly condemned by us and by them as an offence alike obnoxious to the principles of masonry, to the laws of the country and the laws of God. Nor will we say—considering the abiding sensation which that unaccountable outrage has produced—that we could regard as discreet, or even blameless, further manifestations of a determined disposition, on the part of any in this country, to brave public opinion by a continued maintenance of their institutions.

That a virtuous indignation should have been roused by the commission of the offence in question, was both natural and laudible, nor is it matter of surprise that the impunity and concealment which the offender or offenders have courted, should have heightened that indignation; but the evil to which this feeling has been liable, is, to confound the innocent with the guilty—insomuch, that a sentiment which owed its birth to the noblest attributes of cultivated humanity, has ripened into a monstrous infatuation, carrying in its train multiplying mischiefs of the most alarming character. Under its baleful influence, reason seems to have lost her empire, and charity to have resigned her seat. The peace and harmony of neighbourhoods and of society have been disturbed—mutual confidence has been impaired—in some instances, the ordinary intercourse and relations of social life have been interrupted—brother has been arrayed against brother, and father against son. Churches and religious communities have been distracted—confidence in our judicial tribunals has been weakened—many of our most worthy citizens have been unsparingly vilified and wantonly traduced—honest men in various parts of the state, who have been the ornaments of the church and the pride of our senates—men who have ever been the fast friends of freedom, of science, and of literature, have been denounced as malefactors, and sunk to the level of outlaws. Our popular elections have exhibited a degree of violence, and been conducted with a spirit of acrimony seldom if ever before witnessed.

As might reasonably be expected, unprincipled men have laboured to increase, rather than allay, the popular excitement, and to bend it to their own selfish purposes.

The wonder is, that in this age, and in this country, so much success should have attended so little integrity.

At all times, and in all countries, there are unfortunately some (few in number, we trust, when compared with the great body in civilized communities) whose natural aliment is anarchy and discord, and whose consequence is conspicuous when vice prevails. To such, we do not address ourselves. Our appeal is to the friends of peace and good order; and if the waters of strife are to be poured out without reserve, embittering all the relations of life—if an unrelenting crusade is to be carried on against a numerous and respectable portion of our fellow men; merely on account of their speculative opinions—the responsibility will not rest upon us.

Let it not be supposed that we mean to admit that there is any thing in masonry, as we have severally received and understood it, immoral in its tendency, in any wise dangerous to either civil or religious liberty, or opposed to the christian religion.

We however frankly express our conviction that that religion needs no aid from the institution nor from the arm of civil government. We do most solemnly believe that religion to be of divine origin, and that it will prevail without the aid of secular associations; and we would deeply deplore the occurrence of any contest which should alienate its professors from their relation to the church to become political partisans. The danger that a further continuance of masonick institutions, within what has been called, not inaptly, “the infected district,” might produce such deprecatory result, is not only probable, but apparent.

A leading principle of the order forbids all interference with the political concerns of the country, or intermingling with the same as a political party.

Until the present epoch, the question has never been asked, in relation to a candidate for office, whether he was a mason or not. Politics have never entered within the walls of our lodges. As a matter of history we mention that Washington, Franklin, Hancock, Putnam, Green, Warren, Lee, Jefferson, Hamilton, chancellor Livingston, Tompkins, Clinton, Van Ness, Jackson, Clay, Van Rensselaer, and a vast many other distinguished men whose names have all been before the American people, were masons, enjoying the highest honours of the republic; and yet there is no one but slightly acquainted with past events who does not know that they and their pretensions were violently assailed by masons, who were politically opposed to them.

If this historical fact be not sufficient to put down the false charge of masonry's being a political institution, we shall despair of being able to pierce the veil of bigotted incredulity.

We repeat, until this time the question has never been asked in relation to a candidate for office, whether he was a mason or not.

The ground now assumed by the malcontent portion of an old but fallen party, lately represented at Albany by a convention of disappointed political aspirants, for the purpose of reviving their exploded doctrines under a new name, preparatory to a last desperate effort for power, must, in some measure render the masonick institution, if persisted in, political in its character. One of the prominent obligations taken by that convention, we understand to be, that, “at every future election, general or local, an anti-masonick ticket shall be run.” Let the members of that convention reconcile that vow with their religious professions and civil obligations. We, as masons, cannot take up their gage. As men, however, we will fearlessly rally around the standard of republican truth, to watch the insidious approaches of this “brotherhood of hope” and they, having hoisted the faded banner of their long prostrate party, and put in requisition the scathed and scattered remnants of its oft-defeated troops, must take the risk of again sharing its discomfiture.

We are aware that, from many of our brethren, the course herein indicated, demands a sacrifice of the pride of opinion which will be most reluctantly made; because they feel and know that they are the proscribed and devoted victims of an unholy ostracism; yet, while yielding submission to the imperious judgment which intolerance has pronounced, let them remember that there lies before them a wide field for illustrating practically that wholesome rule (cherished by all good men) which enjoins upon us “to restore harmony to society, when interrupted, if practicable.”

We are equally aware that there are others, unimpeachable and unimpeached, except that they happen to be masons, who are not prepared to make the required sacrifice. It is not for us to condemn the decision of the latter class;—and whilst we respect theirs, have only to regret that they cannot adopt our conclusions. We undertake not to speak for masons residing in other parts of the state; but of those in this county, who are tenacious of their rights and determined to breast the tide of oppression which is swelling around them, we cannot be mistaken when we say that they are ready to render the homage of their gratitude to that portion of the community, not united with the order, who have stood by them “through good report and through evil report.” Will you, then masons—we cannot call you free masons—will you, we ask in the spirit of good will, shrink from the sacrifice of unessential privileges, when that sacrifice must place you in an attitude to co-operate successfully with those who have proved themselves faithful champions of your civil rights in the hour of peril? Permit us to say to you in the same spirit—You may yet, for a brief season, fondly cling to the social bonds which unite your order; but fell suspicion has fastened upon you her jaundiced gaze, is deaf to remonstrance, and has decreed their dissolution. You are hotly pursued by the evil genius of a rapacious prejudice, which nothing can propitiate short of your unconditional submission. Be therefore “wise as the serpent, harmless as the dove.” Repress the indignant ebullitions of your insulted feelings—Take counsel from that calm spirit of patient forbearance which has hitherto marked your deportment, and ere the rod of oppression, which is suspended over you, descends, repair with us to the threshold of conciliation and expostulation. Sit with us openly under the shade of the constitution; and if our common humiliation can in any way aid in rescuing that venerated instrument from the deleterious touch of innovation—if our self devotion shall but partially contribute to the final triumph of principle—we shall find abundant relief in the consolations which always attend conscious rectitude.

That this appeal will be indulgently received by all, or that its object will not be wilfully misinterpreted, and its import wickedly perverted by the minions of faction, we have no reason to hope. In this censorious world, those who aim only to deserve respect for their motives and conduct, are more apt to attain success than those who essay to command it also.

In conclusion, we humbly apprehend that many of the considerations which influence our decision address themselves equally to the patriotism of every mason; for if it shall in any good degree tend to disburse the public credulity, to correct the scattered poison, or to allay the popular ferment which has so long convulsed our prosperous and otherwise happy community, we shall regard the sacrifice and surrender of an undoubted right, thus offered up on the public altar, as amply recompensed; and if it shall in the slightest degree tend to arrest the progress of that fearful despotism which runs riot over our fair land, holding in bondage the minds of fanatics and the purses of dupes, and threatening to engraft upon our statute-book arbitrary acts, at war with the spirit of our political institutions, we shall look upon the sacrifice and surrender as mere dust in the balance, when weighed with the invaluable privileges yet enjoyed by us all, under the benign operation of equal laws, honestly administered, and with the inestimable blessings dispensed by a Republican Constitution.

DELEGATES FROM GATES.

Wm. B. ROCHESTER,	WILLIS KEMPSHALL,
VINCENT MATTHEWS,	WILLIAM ATKINSON,
SIMEON FORD,	JACOB GOULD,
ASHLEY SANSON,	WILLIAM BREWSTER,
ELIAS BEACH,	EBENEZER WATTS,
W. E. LATHROP,	ROBERT MARTIN,
VOLNEY S. ALLCOTT,	M. ELDRIDGE.

HENRIETTA.

JAMES SPERRY,	ROSWELL WICKWIRE,
OZIAS S. CHURCH,	EBENEZER GOODING.
JYMAN HAWLEY,

PITTSFORD.

SYLVESTER WALKER,	JOSEPH S. BEACH.
JOHN ACER,

PENFIELD.

ASAHEL S. BEERS,	ABRAHAM ANDREWS,
FRANKLIN CLARK,	DANIEL DUFFEE,
JACOB B. BRYAN,	HENRY WARD.
SAMUEL H. SGOVILLE,

CLARKSON AND SWEDEN.

ABEL BALDWIN,	JAMES SEYMOUR,
GUSTAVUS CLARK,	SILAS JUDSON,
PELATIAH ROGERS,	DANIEL FREEMAN,
JOSHUA FIELD,	JOHN BOWMAN.

BRIGHTON.

SAMUEL BECKWITH,	ELIAS FOOTE,
ROSWELL HART,	JOSEPH G. WHEELER.
JOHN HATCH,

ODD FELLOWS' DEPARTMENT.

At a meeting of Hope Lodge of Independent Odd Fellows, on Monday evening, March 9, the following officers were duly installed for the ensuing term, by the M. N. G.:—

Murdoch M'Pherson, M. N. G.; Enos Ferrier, V. G.; Alexander Cameron, Secretary; Phillip Johnson, Treasurer.

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

RAIL-ROAD, CANALS,

AND THE ADVANCE OF THE GENERAL WELFARE OF "WE THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES."

There are constructed or now constructing, with all the surveys completed, all the necessary laws passed, and all the funds raised and ready, with enough done to show the whole character and cost of the work, three thousand and five hundred miles of Canal and Rail-road in the U. States. Most of this communication is made by the public authorities; not more than one-fourth by companies; and, as far as experience speaks, we are warranted in saying it will generally yield interest on the expenditure. We deduce from the facts before us the following curious results—that the average cost per mile of our canals is about $13,000, and of our rail-roads $20,000; whilst similar works in England have cost more than four times as much; that our population of twelve millions have attempted more than England with twenty three millions, and infinitely more in proportion than the population on the continent of Europe: that, according to the population, we are doing nearly as much again as England; and that, if we take abstractedly the work of New-York, that State has done, proportionably to her population, eight times as much as England. Notwithstanding that so much is done and doing, we feel that the spirit of the country is just awakened; we speak confidently of doubling more than all this within the next ten years. Already have we actually projected, surveyed, and ascertained the cost and practicability of about four thousand miles more of artificial communication. The Federal and local Governments and individual companies vie with each other in such works. The effect of such emulation in this scattered nation has been remarkable; it has stimulated our whole population; has carried a sort of creative faculty with it into the interior; has brought into notice and given value to numberless articles of agricultural and native productions that never before were estimated or brought into market; it has diffused an activity and enterprise among the people, corresponding with the increased facility of communication afforded; and by canals and rail-roads intelligence has been carried and diffused among some of our most uncultivated settlements—developing our coal, iron, and many other dormant resources, and founding upon new sites those arts and manufactures which create an extensive home market, and enrich our commerce with all kinds of beneficial interchanges. Such new, extensive, and connected means of communication insure that comfort and independence to the great body of the people for which they looked in vain while dependent on foreign commerce for necessities. Already the result it uniting and amalgamating our citizens of different and distant States, imparting to them a unity of design, a community of interest, and a celerity of movement, that must insure to us both refinement and political influence worthy of such a people, the proprietors of such a country. By completing this system of intercommunication by land and water, embracing whole States and communities, a home market will be established that will comprehend a circle of interior commerce infinitely more ample than any which the States of Europe now enjoy; because affording a greater variety of climate and a far richer class of native productions.

The time seems rapidly approaching when, by means of steam and canals, each great district of our extensive country, North and South, East and West, developing its own peculiar riches, shall throw them into the wide circle of interchange, and swell the active current of our internal commerce. Pennsylvania will then widely distribute her iron, coal, marble, lead, glass, lumber, flour, wool, butter, beef, and the result of all her handicraft employments: New York enter the market with her salt, flour, gypsum, and bales of foreign commerce: New England, with her fish, oil, lumber, ships, and manufactures: New Jersey, with her zinck, coppers, and horses: Maryland and Virginia, with their tobacco, flour, Indian corn, herring, and hams: North Carolina, with her gold, cotton, tar, lumber, and wine: South Carolina and Georgia, with their cotton, rice, sugar, indigo, and live oak: Louisiana, Florida, and Mississippi, with their sugar, molasses, rum, cotton, rice, indigo, coffee, olive oil, and wine: Kentucky and Tennessee, with their flour, whiskey, hemp, tobacco, salt, coal, iron, mules, horses, and live stock: Ohio, with her pork, lard, butter, cheese, flour, cattle, wool, horses, salt, and coal: Missouri, and Illinois, with their lead, iron, fur, and lumber: Indiana, with her corn, whiskey, and pork: and Michigan and the Lakes, with their fish, furs and copper. Add to the above all the richness and diversity of form into which our fabricants and artists will elaborate many of their products, and the splendor that foreign ingenuity may throw over some of them—and we shall but anticipate that picture of internal commerce which the enterprise and will of a free people have already begun, and within twenty years, at furthest, must complete. This development, dependent, not upon tariff, but time, a few fleeting years will consummate. Such prosperity—the result of our growth, our wants, our free institutions and well established enterprise—may be calculated upon, now, with moral certainty. No system can retard, nor much accelerate it. [Amer. Quar. Review, No. IX.]

LITERARY.

From the Western Monthly Review.

IMPEDIMENTS OF AMERICAN LITERATURE.

The following plain and unvarnished remarks discard all pretensions to any thing more, than their intrinsic truth and importance.

Reviews have a certain and clearly recognized influence upon public taste and opinion. But still, we think, that of the more respectable newspapers, bears, compared with them, upon our literature, as a hundred to one. We are glad to see, in many of the leading papers, the precept of right management in regard to puffing, although, unhappily, in most instances, their example stands directly opposed to it. Of all the practices of the parent country, there is none, in which we are more servile and base imitators, than in the vile habit of puffing. In most instances editors give in to this abominable practice; and become the servile instruments of authors and booksellers, without the poor apology of any thing, like adequate compensation for it. In England, so rapid is the concentration and interchange of public sentiment, puffing is comparatively an inefficient engine. Opinion there is so summarily pronounced, orally, that an unjust review, or an unmerited puff soon reacts, and injures only the writer. Consequently, public opinion there directs the reviews and journals; whereas here, from causes to be mentioned hereafter, the reviews and journals in a great measure control public opinion. There it is the organ and response. Here it is the engines that influences and procures the announcement of the oracle. But even here, we trust, it will soon work its own cure. Even now the eye of the more wary and experienced readers runs over what is upon literature, with little more exertion of operative faith, than while reading the tales of the "Arabian Nights." The fate of the shepherd's boy, who always cried "Wolf," has already befallen reviewers and puffers. They are not believed, even when they happen to speak the truth.

Besides confounding the talented and the untalented, besides destroying all faith in what is publicly written on books, and laying on precisely the same thick coat of bedazzling upon whatever drops from the press, another very serious evil results from this system. The hundred editors follow each other's suit, as, we believe, the gaming phrase is. Suppose there are some of higher principle, or more enlightened mind, of richer endowment and better taste, who would be glad to say of all, that comes from the press, the simple truth, with as much kindness as the case would admit. What would be the consequence? In such a country as ours, those, who have any motive of interest in operation, cannot stand alone, against general example. If there were one editor, able, and disposed to print at his own charges, and hardy enough to be sustained against the general hiss, by a good conscience, he might speak out righteously, and have the comfort of being his own reader. But, more's the pity, actual editors are neither the one, nor the other. They cannot print, unless the people will buy; and have not the slightest ambition to be buffeted for conscience' sake. To avoid being thought insolent, ill-natured, and assuming to know more than the rest, they are compelled by moral considerations, to chime in with the rest; and are found echoing the same heartless and unmeaning hue and cry. Why will the public countenance this shameless tyranny over intellect?

We were lately favoured with an extract from a paper, purporting to be literary; and in a certain quarter of a country, and with a certain class of people, sustaining no small name, which instructed an author, that they had prepared a review of his books, which they suspended, hoping, that he would send his book; and intimating, that it would be better for him, to be speedy in this courtesy. We omit all the slang of the article, giving only its spirit. This may pass for wit in the Atlantick country. But, thank Heaven! with us of the West, horse, alligator, snapping turtle and all, the writer of such a stupid and vile jest would be thought to have penned it under the influence of intoxication. There never was a man, capable of writing a decent review of a book, who had not more enlargement of mind and generosity of sentiment, than to be influenced, in publishing his judgment of a book, by the vile consideration of the author's having given or withheld a copy of it. We say nothing against a practice of which it is our interest to think well. We only protest against the baseness of being in the slightest degree influenced by such a consideration.

Some authors have an inconceivable industry, to labour for puffing. They will move heaven and earth from Dan to Beersheba, to obtain it. To keep the thing brisk, they will etiam inferos cieunt, stir up even the embers of the lower country. Hence an ephemeral reputation, which answers many of the purposes of true fame, especially upon the point of interest. Hence it is, that abroad, and beyond the seas, our real writers are the last to be known; and the industrious aeronaut authors contrive to navigate their bags of wind over the ocean, and come back upon us in the echo of the trumpet of fame. While they, who in their indolence, or pride, or miscalculation, no matter which, draw themselves up and wait for the progress of enlightened reason and truth, in all probability, instead of fame and bread, will get nothing, but a cold stone; and have, moreover, the backward satisfaction of seeing the eyes of their more successful supplanters stand out with fatness.

Whatever be the cause, it has so happened among us, that the estimate of the million in regard to books and writers has been any thing, rather than just. We wish to be fully understood, and will therefore give some examples. We have no doubt, that a hundred similar instances might be produced, in proof, that our literary tribunals have been either inefficient or unjust.

William C. Bryant, the poet of our country, if we might not say of the age, has been sufficiently lauded by the reviewers; and is known and rightly estimated by the élite of our readers. But we deem that our chances have been uncommon to know the sentiments of the million. Among them we could name a great number of American poets who are much better known. Whence happens it? Probably from the circumstance, that a too fastidious taste inclines him to write too little; the reverse of the crying sin of authors, writing too much. Probably, too—we have not the honour to know him—something of the shrinking pride, usually appended, as a drawback upon high talent, will not allow him to stoop to the labour and industry, which would have procured him a grand hallelujah chorus, cantato fortissimo, and rung his name indelibly on the tympanum of the million. In our country, nothing is more certain, than that the temple of fame is taken by violence. In politics and literature alike, we have neither benediction, nor inheritance of the earth for the meek. A man, who will not blow his own trumpet, or pay, in money, or many gallipots of sweet ointment, for other trumpeters, must make up his mind, to have his banner unlifted, his trumpet unblown.

We feel it to be a duty, to point out another glaring instance of the inefficiency, or injustice of our literary tribunals. Dr. Beasley, of Philadelphia, in his "Search of Truth," has proved at once, that a great book is and is not a great evil. He has produced, unquestionably, the best book, that has been written in our country upon the virgin subject of metaphysics. He defends Locke against Reid, Stewart and the Scottish Savans. His work is one of prodigious labour, patience and research, an encyclopedia upon the subject of metaphysics; and we may confidently add, an eloquent and talented book. It is written, too, in a liberal and philosophic spirit, where the subject of Christianity is introduced, which, in a century to come, every body will be ashamed not to have entertained. Had this work been brought forward, under right circumstances, a reprint of an English or Scottish work, we entertain no doubt, that it would have gone from the booksellers' shelves with acclamations; where it now reposes, covered with inglorious and profitless dust. This Review is the only one in the United States, which has taken any notice of a book, among the first of labour, learning and research, that our country has produced. It cannot be advanced in apology, that the system is erroneous. In that case it should have called for protest and refutation. Whence is it, that such a book has fallen dead-born from the press, under the very eye and purview of the prince of the sanhedrim of reviewers, and withal a fabrick of the city of brotherly love, which takes heed, in general, to extend due protection to its own manufactures?

One happy result follows. Neglected authors may lay to their souls the pleasant unction, that they are not alone in misfortune; nor will it be slight alleviation of their case, to be found in such company as Dr. Beasley, in total neglect. Our thoughts suggest multitudes of similar instances of unworthy neglect. A decided effort has been made, to foster and sustain a real, bona fide American literature. But there are still among our reading people far too great a proportion of literary foplings, who look with disdain upon every thing, but the gauzy, gossamry fabrick of the parent country, as sometimes we see a mannikin, who will wear no clothes but those made in London.

Concluded next week.

THE GATHERER.

MORALIZING.

"We take no note of Time
But by its loss."

No class of people complain more of the shortness of time than the idle. They are never ready for exertion: believing that to-morrow will be more abundant than to-day they procrastinate, and thus lose the moments, that, judiciously employed, might insure them success, in vain expectation of that propitious season when they shall have full leisure to perform some mighty enterprise, or greater facilities to execute some favorite project. But such golden opportunities are awarded only to the minions of fortune—the working-day world must not expect to enjoy them. The majority of those, who have emerged from the crowd, owe their elevation almost solely to the improvement of short intervals, and the employment of apparently trivial means. Perseverance will accomplish what energy alone fails to perform.

It is peculiarly necessary that those who would cultivate a taste for literature should form habits of industrious application, and be careful to fill the blank of existence. The means of education, and the rewards of education are, by our institutions, afforded to all our citizens. Were there a corresponding enthusiasm to be "learned and wise," we might, as a nation, unquestionably soon rank high in scientific attainments, and general literature, and the sarcasms of European writers, when directed against our intellectual achievements, would at least cease to be merited.

[Ladies' Magazine.

SIR RICHARD JEBB

Was very rough and harsh in manner. He said to a patient, to whom he had been very rude, "Sir, it is my way." "Then," replied the patient, pointing to the door, "I beg you will make that your way." Sir Richard was not very nice in his mode of expression, and would frequently astonish a patient with a volley of oaths. Nothing used to make him swear more than the eternal question, "What may I eat? Pray, Sir Richard, may I eat a muffin?" "Yes, Madam, the best thing you can take."—"O dear! I am glad of that. But, Sir Richard, you told me the other day that it was the worst thing I could eat!"—"What would be proper for me to eat to-day?" says another lady.—"Boiled turnips."—"Boiled turnips! you forget, Sir Richard, I told you I could not bear boiled turnips."—"Then, Madam, you must have a d— vitiated appetite."

Sir Richard being called upon to see a patient who fancied himself very ill, told him ingenuously what he thought, and declined prescribing, thinking it unnecessary. "Now you are here," said the patient, "I shall be obliged to you, Sir Richard, if you will tell me how I must live, what I may eat, and what not."—"My directions as to that point," replied Sir Richard, "will be few and simple. You must not eat the poker, shovel, or tongs, for they are hard of digestion; nor the bellows, because they are windy; but any thing else you please."

He was first cousin to Dr. John Jebb, who had been a dissenting minister, well known for his political opinions and writings. His Majesty George III. used sometimes to talk to Sir Richard concerning his cousin; and once, more particularly, spoke of his restless, reforming spirit in the church, in the university, physic, &c. "And please your Majesty," replied Sir Richard, "if my cousin were in heaven, he would be a reformer!"

[Wadd's Memoirs.

"NO TRICKS UPON TRAVELLERS."

Mr. B—, of Bath, a remarkable large, corpulent, and powerful man, wanting to go by the mail, endeavoured to secure a place a short time before it started. Being told it was full, he determined to get admission, and opening the door, which no one near him ventured to oppose, he got in. When the other passengers came, the ostler reported that there was a gentleman in the coach: he was requested to come out; but having drawn up the blind, he remained quiet. Hearing, however, a consultation on the means of making him alight, and a proposal to 'pull him out,' he let down the blind, and, laying his enormous hand on the edge of the door, asked who would dare to pull him out, drew up the blind again, and, waiting some time, fell asleep. About one in the morning he awoke, and calling out to know whereabouts he was on the journey, he perceived, what was the fact, that, to end the altercation with him, the horses had been put to another coach, and that he had spent the night at the inn door at Bath, where he had taken possession of the carriage. [Lb.

BROKER.

The origin of this word is contested; some derive it from the French broyer, "to grind;" others from brocader, to cavil or riggle; others deduce broker from a trade broken, and that from the Saxon broc, "misfortune," which is often the true reason of a man's breaking. In which view; a broker is a broken trader, by misfortune; and it is said that none but such were formerly admitted to that employment. The Jews, Armenians, and Banians are the chief brokers throughout most parts of the Levant and the Indies. In Persia, all affairs are transacted by a sort of brokers, whom they call "delal," i. e. "great talkers." Their form of contract in buying and selling is remarkable, being done in the profoundest silence, only by touching each other's fingers.—The buyer, loosening his pamerin, or girdle, spreads it on his knee; and both he and the seller, having their hands underneath, by the intercourse of the fingers, mark the price of pounds, shillings, &c., demanded, offered, and at length agreed on. When the seller takes the buyer's whole hand, it denotes a thousand, and as many times as he squeezes it, as many thousand pagods or rousees, according to the species in question demanded; when he only takes the five fingers, it denotes five hundred; and when only one, one hundred; taking only half a finger, to the second joint, denotes fifty; the small end of the finger, to the first joint, stands for ten.

PIGS.

One day when Giotto, the painter, was taking his Sunday walk, in his best attire, with a party of friends, at Florence, and was in the midst of a long story, some pigs passed suddenly by, and one of them, running between the painter's legs, threw him down. When he got on his legs again, instead of swearing a terrible oath at the pig on the Lord's day, as a graver man might have done, he observed, laughing, "People say these beasts are stupid, but they seem to me to have some sense of justice, for I have earned several thousands of crowns with their bristles, but I never gave one of them even a ladleful of soup in my life.

SENTIMENT AND APPETITE.

We remember an amiable enthusiast, a worshiper of nature after the manner of Rousseau, who, being melted into feelings of universal philanthropy by the softness and serenity of a spring morning, resolved, that for that day, at least, no injured animal should pollute his board; and having recorded his vow, walked six miles to gain a hamlet, famous for fish dinners, where, without an idea of breaking his sentimental engagement, he regaled himself on a small matter of crimped cod and oyster sauce.

FORTIFICATION.

The walls of Tenchira, in Africa, form one of the most perfect remaining specimens of ancient fortification. They are a mile and a half in circuit, defended by 26 quadrangular towers, and admitting no entrance but by two opposite gates.

THE LEGENDARY.

THE UNDINE OF STAUFFENBERG.

A LEGEND OF THE RHINE.

Never did braver knight break a lance than Prince Drimingen, Count de Stauffen. He was young, accomplished, rich, and handsome: he might have aspired to the favour of the fairest and most noble lady in the kingdom; but this very circumstance seemed to present obstacles to his choice. Like a bee in a garden filled with choicest flowers, he wandered from one to another, never wearying in the pursuit of sweets, but still fickle and doubtful on which to rest. Perhaps had the fair dames of the court paid him less attention, and not allowed him to perceive the high estimation in which he was held, it would have been different; but alas! then, as now, men were apt to be spoiled by adulation, and Pierre was an example of this fact. He had been left to his own guidance, from a very early age, by reason of the death of both his parents. Surrounded, as he was, by every temptation, it would not have been very surprising had he given in to the prevalent vices of the court; but he escaped these, and might have been perfectly happy but for caprice, which was, however, not always uninfluenced by ambition.

One day, returning late from hunting, he was accidentally separated from his companions. Overcome with thirst and fatigue he perceived a fountain, shaded by lofty and beautiful oak trees, at which he dismounted. He had tied up his horse, and was about to drink, when, to his surprise, he saw, seated on the opposite bank of the fountain, a damsel of wonderful beauty. He bowed low to her, and she returned his salutation, at the same time calling him by his name. The astonished count asked who she was and whence she came? "I live near at hand," she replied; "I have frequently seen you, at this fountain, with your dogs and huntsmen, and thus it is that I have learnt your name." They continued conversing for some time, each moment increasing the count's admiration; when, on hearing voices in the neighbouring thicket, she suddenly vanished. The count was surrounded in the next minute by his hunting companions, who had been vainly seeking him for some time, and they hinted that he must have been amusing himself at their expense, as they had been in the neighbourhood of the fountain all the time; and they insisted that they must have been heard before, if he had not been obstinately and wilfully deaf. One of them said jestingly, that perhaps he had been visiting the bottom of the fountain in quest of one of its fair inhabitants, as many of the neighbouring peasants declared positively that females of surprising beauty had been frequently seen on its banks, and that on the approach of footsteps they always disappeared beneath the waters. The count impatiently interrupted them, by asking whether they had not seen a female as they approached the fountain. This, however, only gave new vigour to their jokes; and at length, having sought in vain for the lovely girl, or for some trace of her dwelling, which he said was near at hand, the count, tired with his companions' mirth, and full of surprise and perplexity, returned to his palace.

He could not, however, for one moment, forget the fairy form and angelick countenance of the fountain beauty; his wayward heart now fancied itself fixed, and he impatiently passed the hours, till daylight enabled him to renew his search. But day after day did he vainly hope to meet her. At the hour he had first seen her he repaired constantly to the fountain, but the unknown was never there. At length, one evening, when he was pensively reclining against an oak, he heard a voice of celestial sweetness, which appeared to proceed from the depth of the water. He rose, looked on every side with the utmost anxiety, but no one was visible, and the voice was no longer to be heard. He turned to repeat himself under the oak, in the hopes that he should again hear the voice, when suddenly he beheld the unknown seated on the stone he had just left. She appeared in a most lively humour, and replied to all his questions with a fascinating badinage that captivated the count still more than her former behaviour: he confessed his passion, she instantly became thoughtful and silent: at length, she told him to meet her at the same hour on the following day.

The chevalier was true to the appointment: at break of day the fair unknown appeared from the coppice, and so beautiful she looked, that Pierre thought he beheld an angel. The ringlets of her lovely auburn hair sparkled with the morning dew, and were bound with a wreath of blue-bells. She fixed her innocent and expressive eyes on the enamoured count, who was silent with admiration. At length he ventured to take her hand, and speak of his passion. She made him sit down by her, and thus replied to him:

"I am not a child of earth: the waters gave me being, and in the waters is my home. I am an Undine, and therefore unfit to wed with the Count of Stauffenberg. He should have with his bride, wealth and broad lands: we of the waters have neither gold nor jewels, nor house nor castle. Him we love truly we wed, and when we wed we give hand with heart, and heart with hand. But reflect well, Sir Knight. If you pledge your faith to me, your love ought to be as pure as this limpid water, and as true as the steel of your sword. A single infidelity, after we were united, would inevitably cause your death, and would make me eternally miserable. For it is the fate of our tribe, that our joys and our griefs know no end."

The count swore that it would be equally impossible to him to live without her, or to be unfaithful. The nymph then gave him her hand. He pressed her with tenderness to his bosom, spoke to her of the delightful situation of his castle, and of the happiness by which she would be surrounded as its mistress; and after a long conversation they parted, having first named the day for their nuptials.

On the eve of this day the count found on his table three baskets, most elegantly ornamented, one filled with gold, another with silver, and the third with precious stones of every variety. He perceived that what she had said to him respecting her being without wealth, must have been only to ascertain whether he loved her disinterestedly, for these baskets and their contents would have sufficed for a princess' dowry. She soon afterwards appeared, attended by a numerous suite, and requested to speak in private with the count. He conducted her to another saloon, where she entreated him once more to reflect on what he was about to do, ere it should be too late to retract. "If your love for me," she said emphatically, "cools for one moment, or is transferred to another, you are inevitably lost; and the sign of your approaching death will be, seeing no other part of my person but my right foot."

The chevalier again repeated his protestations of fidelity with all the tenderness and ardour of a first and violent love; and as the lady wished to believe him true, she was not long in giving him credit for all the vows he uttered. The marriage was solemnized with the utmost splendour; days and months passed in a succession of pleasures; the young wife became each day more beautiful and amiable, and the birth of a son seemed to place their happiness beyond a possibility of doubt. But, alas! nothing can be certain. A war broke out on the frontiers of France. Pierre was brave, and now ambition divided his heart with love. The countess did not choose to oppose his desire for fame, but at parting she shed many tears, entreating him not to forget his wife, nor the lovely pledge of their affections.

Pierre passed the Rhine at the head of a small and well-chosen troop, and fought under the banners of a French duke. In every engagement he distinguished himself, and in one saved the duke's life. The peace, which was soon afterwards concluded, was also brought about by his exertions; and the duke, full of gratitude, and thinking he could not pay him too much respect, offered him the hand of his youngest and fairest daughter in marriage, as a reward for his many services. Pierre's inconstancy now showed itself, and his behaviour now offered the most singular contrasts; for at the same time that he meditated the desertion of his lovely and confiding wife, the ingenuousness of his character would not allow him to deceive the duke, by concealing his marriage. He, therefore, faithfully related all that had passed. The duke shook his head; but as he much wished for the count's marriage with his daughter, he obstinately closed his eyes to the injustice of the proceeding, and declared that the whole affair must have been the work of magick, and that the eternal welfare of the count's soul depended on this most dangerous connexion being dissolved. The chaplain, when consulted, assured the chevalier that the whole of this magical delusion would vanish on his receiving the holy benediction of the church. Pierre allowed himself to be persuaded without much difficulty, and the ceremony of betrothing was performed; the nuptials were deferred for a fortnight.

On the eve of the day appointed for the marriage, one of the count's people arrived from Stauffenberg, with the intelligence that his wife and child had disappeared from his palace on the very day of his betrothing. This information confirmed the idea that the whole was the work of magick.

Pierre, believing that he was rid of them now, and thinking of nothing but his young bride, set out with a light heart to a country palace of the duke's, where the marriage was to be celebrated. As they were all seated at table, the count, being not the least merry of the party, accidentally cast his eyes on the wall of the saloon, and beheld starting from it a beautiful foot, the graceful form of which he remembered but too well. In vain did he rub his eyes, and endeavour to persuade himself that his sight deceived him; still, to his horror and dismay, this ominous appearance long remained. At length it vanished. The count emptied goblet after goblet of the choicest wine, endeavouring to drown his gloomy presentiments, and at length partly succeeded. In the evening they had to return to the duke's palace. A small and gently flowing brook crossed their path. All the company, with the exception of Pierre, passed over the bridge, but he chose to ford the stream. None opposed him; but as he reached the middle, the waters, before so placid, seemed agitated by a violent tempest: waves rose as high as those of the vexed ocean, when the north wind tosses it from its very bed. The company gazed in horror from the opposite bank, and saw the count struggling with the raging element. He uttered a shriek of despair; his horse was seen to plunge, and disappear for a moment beneath the waters; in the next he gained the opposite bank; but of the unfortunate count no trace remained.

From this time every one cautiously avoided the stream; but the few who, by chance or necessity, have passed near the spot where the unhappy count disappeared, say that each night, when the moon shines brightly, a lovely female form is seen to glide over the waters. Most true it is, that plaintive notes, of celestial sweetness, are often heard; and all the maidens of Stauffenberg, to this day, devoutly believe in the tale, and cite it as a proof of the fate which attends faithless lovers.

THE REPOSITORY.

SOCIAL PHILOSOPHY.

BY SIR RICHARD PHILLIPS.

All members of the human family should remember, that the human race is, as to time and nature, but as one totality; for, since every man and woman had two parents, each parent two parents, and so on in geometrical progression, hence every individual, high or low, must necessarily be descended from every individual of the whole population as it existed but a few hundred years before, whether they were high or low, virtuous or abandoned; while every precreative individual of the existing race must be the actual progenitor of the entire race which may exist at the same distance of future time. What motives for charity, for forbearing from injuries, for benevolence, for universal love.

The bed of sickness, with its increased sensibility of nerves, is a delicate test of man's conscience, and of self approbation or reprobation. Requiring sympathy himself, he now sympathizes with others; and unable to direct his thoughts to external things, they are forced upon himself.

Great is then his solace, and efficacious his medicines, if he has no other reflections than such as are supplied by his justice, liberality, and benevolence; but accumulated will be his sufferings, and dangerous the result, if crimes and misdeeds force themselves at such a time on his mind; while in any delirium of fever he will rave on those subjects, and, without vision, will often perceive, by the mere excitement of his brain, the spectres of the injured making grimaces before him.

If you are rich, and want to enjoy the exalted luxury of relieving distress, go to the Bankrupt court, to the court for Insolvent Debtors, to the jails, the workhouses, and the hospitals. If you are rich and childless, and want heirs, look to the same assemblages of misfortune; for all are not culpable who appear in the Bankrupt and Insolvent Lists; nor all criminal who are found in jails; nor all improvident who are inmates of workhouses and hospitals. On the contrary, in these situations, an alloy of vice is mixed with virtue enough to afford materials for as deep tragedies as ever poet fancied or stage exhibited; and visitors of relief would act the part of angels descending from heaven among men, whose chief affliction is the neglect of unthinking affluence.

Marriage is a circumstance of life, which, in its actual course, involves the feelings and fortunes of human beings more than any other event of their lives. It is a connexion generally formed by experience, under the blindness and caprice of passion; and, though these conditions cannot be avoided, as forming the bases of the connexion, yet it is so important, that a man is never ruined who has an interesting, faithful, and virtuous wife; while he is lost to comfort, fortune, and even to hope, who has united himself to a vicious and unprincipled one. The fate of woman is still more intimately blended with that of her husband; for, being in the eyes of the law and the world but second to him, she is the victim of his follies and vices at home, and of his ill success and degradation abroad. Rules are useless, where passions, founded on trifling associations and accidents, govern; but much mischief often results from fathers expecting young men to be in the social position of old ones, and from present fortune being preferred to virtues; for industry and talent, stimulated by affection, and fostered by family interests, soon create competency and fortune; while a connexion founded on mere wealth, which is often speedily wasted by dissipation, habits of extravagance, and the chances of life, necessarily ends in disappointment, disgust, and misery.

Wretched is the man who has no employment but to watch his own digestions; and who, on waking in the morning, has no useful occupation of the day presented to his mind. To such a one respiration is a toil, and existence a continued disease. Self-oblivion is his only resource, indulgence in alcohol in various disguises, his remedy, and death or superstition his only comfort and hope. For what was he born, and why does he live? are questions which he constantly asks himself; and his greatest enigmas are the smiling faces of habitual industry, stimulated by the wants of the day, or fears for the future. If he is excited to exertion, it is commonly to indulge some vicious propensity, or display his scorn of those pursuits which render others happier than himself. If he seek to relieve his inanity in books, his literature ascends no higher than the romances, the newspapers, or the scandal, of the day; and all the nobler pursuits of mind, as well as body, are utterly lost in regard to him. His passage through life is like that of a bird through the air, and his final cause appears merely to be that of sustaining the worms in his costly tomb.

The decline of life, and the retrospections of old age, furnish unequivocal tests of worthiness and unworthiness. Happy is the man, who, after a well spent life, can contemplate the rapid approach of his last year with the consciousness that, if he were born again, he could not; under all the circumstances of his worldly position, have done better, and who has inflicted no injuries for which it is too late to atone. Wretched, on the contrary, is he, who is obliged to look back on a youth of idleness and profligacy, on a manhood of selfishness and sensuality, and on a career of hypocrisy, of insensibility, of concealed crime, and of injustice above the reach of law. Visit both during the decay of their systems, observe their feelings and tempers, view the followers at their funerals, count the tears on their graves; and after such a comparison, in good time make your own choice.

Constant change is the feature of society. The world is like a magick lantern, or the shifting scenes in a pantomime. TEN YEARS convert the population of schools into men and women, the young into fathers and matrons, make and mar fortunes, and bury the last generation but one. TWENTY YEARS convert infants into lovers, and fathers and mothers, render youth the operative generation, decide men's fortunes and distinctions, convert active men into crawling drivellers, and bury all the preceding generation. THIRTY YEARS raise an active generation from nonentity, change fascinating beauties into merely bearable old women, convert lovers into grandfathers and grandmothers, and bury the active generation, or reduce them to decrepitude and imbecility. FORTY YEARS, alas! change the face of all society; infants are growing old, the bloom of youth and beauty has passed away, two active generations have been swept from the stage of life, names so cherished are forgotten, and unsuspected candidates for fame have started from the exhaustless womb of nature. FIFTY YEARS! why should any desire to retain their affections from maturity for fifty years? It is to behold a world which they do not know, and to which they are unknown; it is to live to weep for the generations passed away, for lovers, for parents, for children, for friends, in the grave; it is to see every thing turned upside down by the fickle hand of fortune, and the absolute despotism of time; it is, in a word, to behold the vanity of human life in all its varieties of display!

CHARACTER.

From the London New Monthly Magazine.

MR. ABERNETHY.

Of Mr. Abernethy's independence and strict veneration of what is right, we have many examples. Among others, the following is characteristic:—A certain noble personage, now enjoying a situation of great responsibility in the Sister Kingdom, had been waiting for a long time in the surgeon's anteroom, when, seeing those who had arrived before him, successively called in, he became somewhat impatient, and sent his card in. No notice was taken of the hint; he sent another card—another—another—and another; still no answer. At length he gained admission in his turn; and, full of nobility and choler, he asked, rather aristocratically, why he had been kept waiting so long?—"Wh-e-w!" responded the professor; "because you didn't come sooner, to be sure. And now, if your lordship will sit down, I will hear what you have to say."

One thing Mr. Abernethy cannot abide, that is, any interruption to his discourse. This it is, in fact, which so often irritates him, so often causes him to snarl. "People come here," he has often said to us, to consult me, and they will torture me with their long and foolish fiddle-de-dee stories; so we quarrel, and then they blackguard me all about this large town; but I can't help that."

That Abernethy is odd all the world knows, but his oddity is far more amusing than repulsive, far more playful than bearish. Let the reader imagine a snug, elderly, sleek, and venerable-looking man, ap roaching seventy years of age, rather (as novel writers say) below than above the middle height, somewhat inclined to corpulency, and upright in his carriage withal; with his hair most primly powdered, and nicely curled round his brow and temples: let them imagine such a person habited in sober black, with his feet thrust carelessly in a pair of unlaced half boots, and his hands into the pockets of his "peculiar," and they have the "glorious John" of the profession before their eyes. The following colloquy, which occurred not many days since, between him and a friend of ours, is so characteristic of the professor, that we cannot resist its insertion:—

Having entered the room, our friend "opened the proceedings." "I wish you to ascertain what is the matter with my eye, sir. It is very painful, and I am afraid there is some great mischief going on."—"Which I can't see," said Abernethy, placing the patient before the window, and looking closely at the eye. "But—" interposed our friend.—"Which I can't see," again said, or rather sung the professor. "Perhaps not, sir, but—"—"Now don't bother!" ejaculated the other; "but sit down, and I'll tell you all about it." Our friend sat down accordingly, while Abernethy, standing with his back against the table, thus began. "I take it for granted that, in consulting me, you wish to know what I should do for myself, were I in a predicament similar to yourself. Now, I have no reason to suppose that you are in any particular predicament; and the terrible mischief which you apprehend, depends, I take it, altogether on the stomach. Mind,—at present I have no reason to believe that there is any thing else the matter with you." (Here my friend was about to disclose sundry dreadful maladies with which he believed himself afflicted, but he was interrupted with "Diddle-dum, diddle-dum, diddle-dum dee!" uttered in the same smooth tone as the previous part of the address—and he was silent.)—"Now, your stomach being out of order, it is my duty to explain to you how to put it to rights again; and, in my whimsical way I shall give you an illustration of my position; for I like to tell people something that they will remember. The kitchen, that is, your stomach, being out of order, the garret (pointing to the head) cannot be right, and egad! every room in the house becomes affected. Repair the injury in the kitchen,—remedy the evil there,—(now don't bother,) and all will be right. * This you must do by diet. If you put improper food into your stomach, by Gad you play the very devil with it, and with the whole machine besides. Vegetable matter ferments, and becomes gaseous; while animal substances are changed into a putrid, abominable, and acrid stimulus. (Don't bother again!) You are going to ask, "What has all this to do with my eye?" I will tell you. Anatomy teaches us, that the skin is a continuation of the membrane which lines the stomach; and your own observation will inform you, that the delicate linings of the mouth, throat, nose, and eyes, are nothing more. Now some people acquire preposterous noses, others blotches on the face and different parts of the body, others inflammation of the eyes—all arising from irritation of the stomach. People laugh at me for talking so much about the stomach. I sometimes tell this story to forty different people of a morning, and some won't listen to me; so we quarrel, and they go and abuse me all over the town. I can't help it—they came to me for my advice, and I give it them, if they will take it. I can't do any more. Well, sir, as to the question of diet, I must refer you to my book. (Here the professor smiled, and continued smiling as he proceeded.) There are only about a dozen pages—and you will find, beginning at page 73, all that it is necessary for you to know. I am christened "Doctor My-Book," and satirized under that name all over England; but who would sit and listen to a long lecture of twelve pages, or remember one-half of it if when it was done? So I have reduced my directions into writing, and there they are for any body to follow, if they please.

"Having settled the question of diet, we now come to medicine. It is, or ought to be, the province of a medical man to soothe and assist Nature, not to force her. Now, the only medicine I should advise you to take, is a dose of a slight aperient medicine every morning the first thing. I won't stipulate for the dose, as that must be regulated by circumstances, but you must take some; for without it, by Gad, your stomach will never be right. People go to Harrowgate, and Buxton, and Bath, and the devil knows where, to drink the waters, and they return full of admiration at their surpassing efficacy. Now these waters contain next to nothing of purgative medicine; but they are taken readily, regularly, and in such quantities, as to produce the desired effect. You must persevere in this plan, sir, until you experience relief, which you certainly will do. I am often asked—"Well, but Mr. Abernethy, why don't you practise what you preach?" I answer, by reminding the inquirer of the parson and the sign-post: both point the way, but neither follow its course."—And thus ended a colloquy, wherein is mingled much good sense, useful advice, and whimsicality.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, MARCH 26, 1839.

"ALBANY COUNTY, ALL HAIL!" "For the satisfaction of his friends abroad" governor Southwick last week published a paragraph about the Bethlehem election, which is as true as his sayings generally are. The anti-masonick party in this county is made up of the same sort of men as compose it in other parts; and the publick good is the last thing it will be suspected of favouring. The Bethlehem election was not made an anti-masonick question; for be it known, that anti-masonry in that town is mere dust in the balance. The facts are simply these:—Two brothers were nominated, one by some Adams men and the other by some Jackson men, as candidates for the office of supervisor. The majority of each party was naturally enough dissatisfied at this compound of family division and family monopoly; and without reference either to politics or anti-masonry, jointly nominated a third candidate. After the nomination was made, about a dozen anti-masons met and concurred in it. This last candidate was elected, and would have been, had anti-masonry went the other way. He is neither a mason nor an anti-mason, and has too much good sense and respect for himself to be caught in the ranks of a dissolute faction.

The antimasonick party has the faculty of claiming every thing which does not belong to it, and of disclaiming every thing which is its undoubted property. When Gov. Southwick wrote this paragraph he had no hope of obtaining belief here—as he plainly declares, his stuff was calculated for another meridian, where he imagined falsehood would have as much influence as truth. Such a man must be corrupt both in head and heart—the evil principle has possession of his very bones.

MORE LIGHT! A few weeks since the anti-masonick newspapers raised a great hue and cry about the disappearance of a Mr. Murphy, of Pittsburgh. It was said that Murphy was a printer, and had expressed his determination to set up an anti-masonick paper for the purpose of enlightening the good people of the west and south, and that, as a natural consequence, the masons had kidnapped him, Morganized him, &c. The zeal with which the story was circulated, and the display of words made on the occasion, were quite characteristic of the necessities of its authors. Whiskerando pruned the sufferer of all his useless qualities, and dressed him up with a new character; governor Southwick canonized him; and he was duly recognized as a sort of secondary Morgan, by all the anti-masonick authorities, from Lewiston to the Atlantick. But in spite of all endeavours to the contrary, the truth will out, sooner or later; and it is now ascertained that Murphy, instead of being spirited off by the masons, for reasons best known to himself quietly took his departure from Pittsburgh, and is safely pursuing his way in a steamboat on the Mississippi. The idea of Murphy's being taken away for the reasons stated, is ridiculous enough to refute itself, independent of all contradictory facts. Unless anti-masonick newspapers are more respected in and about Pittsburgh than they are here, very little need be apprehended from their influence. Even governor Southwick is not believed by his most egregious dupes more than one time in ten; and those possessed of common sense never believe him, under any circumstances.

From the Fredonia Censor.

Anti-Masonick abductions. It will be recollected that some time last season, a great hue and cry was raised by the anti-masonick papers about one Elisha Adams, who, it was more than intimated in those papers, had been carried off and murdered by the masons; but who was afterwards discovered to be living in Vermont, minding his own business, and not much liking the disgraceful manner in which those papers disposed of him.

Another imposition of this kind has just attempted being played off by the anti-masonick papers, but which has been detected sooner than the other. One Isaac Murphy, it was recently asserted, was suddenly missing from Pittsburgh, and because he had talked of establishing an anti-masonick paper, it was at once intimated that he had been taken off by masons. It now turns out that this Murphy has just been ascertained to be on board a steam boat, with other passengers, on the Mississippi.

By and bye, when the excitement is in danger of dying away, if no other means can be got hold of to keep it alive, some vagabond will be hired to abscond and secrete himself, and the masons will be charged with murdering him. But even this would be more justifiable than again mutilating a dead body to make it pass for that of another person.

ROWLAND STEPHENSON. As this individual has attracted considerable notice for some time past, a summary of the principal facts and events which have given him the celebrity he suffers will not be uninteresting to our readers. We have looked over, we believe, most of the accounts current respecting him, and shall give a summary of their most interesting particulars, without permitting prejudice to guide us out of the batwixt and between course of impartiality. It appears that Stephenson, in his days of prosperity was a very friendly and good sort of man, fond of sociability and good living—the first and the last at the feast. It is not easy to say whether his style of life or imprudent loans to his friends caused his ruin; as, however, he had an unconquerable aversion to gaming, and seems to have been always very willing to accommodate his friends with loans that suited rather their interests than his, there is reason to believe that it was not dissipation, in the common meaning of the term, which made way with the seventy thousand pounds that are missing. The New-Monthly Magazine for February states that Mr. Hunter, the proprietor of the Colosseum at London, has acknowledged that Stephenson made some advances to his undertaking; and the writer thinks that if Mr. Hunter was not prevented by delicacy from stating the amount of those advances, it would be found that they constitute the greatest part of the sum which Stephenson is charged with having improperly appropriated. But the cause of Stephenson's defalcation and the extent of his guilt cannot be guessed at with any certainty, and it is therefore alike illiberal to expatiate his faults or trifle with his character. We shall therefore pass over the thousand and one anecdotes of doubtful truth, and proceed with a summary of what appear to be facts.

On the 26th of December last, about five o'clock in the afternoon, Mr. Stephenson called upon Mr. Thomas Welch, a personal friend, and solicited his protection. In a letter addressed to the London Courier, and dated January 9, Mr. Welch represents himself as being under great obligations to Mr. Stephenson, who was at that time his surety to the amount of 9,000 pounds. The following is an extract from Mr. Welch's letter.

"He assured me that a circumstance had occurred which rendered it impossible for him to return to Lombard-street, for he had used some property of the house during the late run, which, in one fortnight after the payment of the dividends, he could have replaced, but the discovery of his having so used it having taken place at the banking house at 11 o'clock that morning, he had not fortitude to bear the interrogations to which he should be subjected. He had therefore quitted Lombard-street, and if I wished to preserve his life, I should afford him shelter under my roof. I endeavoured to persuade him to allow me to send for his partners, saying that it would be to their own advantage to replace the property so used, and I made no doubt but they might again be friends. He said, rather than see either of them, he would blow his brains out in my parlour, and immediately drew from his pocket a brace of pistols. He then told me that he had already attempted suicide in a pawnbroker's shop in Queen-street, Cheapside, but that the pistols had missed fire. I used every effort to divert him from so horrible a purpose, and to calm his mind, in which I at length succeeded. After a great deal of persuasion, he permitted me to send for his eldest son, and the interview between them being over, I proposed that he should return to his house at St. Bartholomew's Hospital, and abide the consequences of the discovery. Having with much difficulty overcome his scruples to this measure, I said I would send for a coach to convey us, when he put his hand into his pocket, saying "I can not pay for one, as I have but sixpence in the world." I directly went up stairs to borrow Mrs. Welch's purse. We (Mr. Stephenson, Mr. Hunter, of the Colosseum, and myself) then set out and reached the hospital. Unfortunately, however, Mr. Lloyd (entered the room, and told us that the attempt Mr. Stephenson had made upon his life in Queen-street was known to his partners, and that they were ransacking the drawers. This communication led Mr. Stephenson to abandon at once his former resolution, and to determine upon immediate flight. But he exclaimed 'that he had no money.' His eldest son instantly emptied his pockets for his father's service. Mr. Stephenson burst into tears, and rejected the offer, saying he could not use his son's pittance. Mr. Lloyd then said, 'I have money, Sir; I have 800 pounds.' 'Then we will both go,' replied Mr. Stephenson. He ordered a few clothes to be got ready, and his carriage, saying he would go one stage with his own horses. He requested me to accompany him a few miles, that he might, when his mind was more collected, give me directions respecting his children. I consented, and Bristol was the road he determined to take. On my proposing to quit him at Hounslow, he ordered the coachman to proceed to Staines with the same horses, and on the road requested of me, in the name of the mutual and long friendship that had subsisted between us, to give him one and the last proof of it, and to accompany him until he was on board some vessel. I could not refuse, and we arrived at Pill at 9 o'clock on Saturday night, and had an interview with the captain of a pilot yacht when I recommended that the boat should be hired for one month, at two guineas a day, the terms proposed by the pilot. Mr. Stephenson said it would be throwing money away unnecessarily, for no doubt they would meet a vessel bound to America within a fortnight. I advised them, when they were at sea, to disclose to the captain the necessity of their going to America, and if he would take them, he should be amply remunerated.

On Sunday morning, the 28th of December, Stephenson and Lloyd went on board the pilot boat, and put to sea. The Courier relates the shifts and turns which Stephenson and Lloyd were found necessary to practise in order to escape detection, previous to leaving England. It is said that Stephenson played the sick man and Welsh the doctor most admirably. "Now and again would the doctor feel his pulse, examine his tongue, and enquire of the patient whether he still felt that excruciating pain in the region of the stomach. The doctor would then give a most mysterious shake of the head, and urge still stronger the necessity of taking the short sea voyage. Stephenson yielded a reluctant assent, and ultimately the poor infirm man was supported to a boat by Lloyd and his friend the doctor. The boat had not proceeded far from shore when Stephenson began to justify the prediction of his physician—the sea voyage was already working his cure—he raised himself in the boat and astonished the crew by a sudden accession of health and strength. He soon satisfied the doubts and scruples of the boatmen. They sailed to Lundy Island, and there met the Ranger of Bideford, on board which Stephenson and Lloyd got. The Ranger beat about the channel for some time without falling in with a single outward bound ship. Lee, the captain, being unable to continue any longer at sea, offered to take Stephenson and Lloyd to Clovelly, where his brother, who had a fine pilot boat (the Sally) lived, and having assured them that Clovelly was a retired and unfrequented place, they consented to be put on shore there."

They landed at Clovelly on the evening of the 31st of December, and were detained there by high winds for two days. It was not without considerable difficulty that they escaped detection during their stay at Clovelly; and they displayed considerable skill in winning the affections of the hostess and guests of the "King's Arms" by a show of liberality; and in managing to study a newspaper which arrived, (containing an accurate description of Stephenson's person, and offering a reward for his apprehension) so effectually that no one else could get a sight of it. Towards evening, on the second of January, the wind having considerably lulled, they again put to sea. They soon met a ship bound to Savannah, where they arrived on the 1st of March. On the 4th, they left Savannah for the west, but had not proceeded farther than seventeen miles when their carriage was overturned, and being considerably hurt, they took lodgings in the house of a Dr. Garbett, where they remained several days.

Previous to Stephenson's arrival at Savannah, Mr. Perkins, the ex-sheriff of London, to whom Stephenson was indebted to the amount of about 15,000 pounds, arrived at New-York, and offered, in addition to an English reward of 1,000 pounds, $1,500 for his apprehension. It is said that handbills containing an accurate description of Stephenson's person, and offering these two rewards for his detection, were scattered all along the sea board, and arrived in Savannah a few days after Stephenson and Lloyd. Influenced by a desire to obtain these rewards, the deputy sheriff of that city and three other men, repaired to the house of Dr. Garbett, about two o'clock on the morning of the 11th inst., forcibly took Stephenson from his bed, and carried him in secrecy to Savannah, where, early the same morning, he was carried on board a pilot boat which was in readiness, and directly sailed for New-York. The persons who arrested Stephenson did not pretend to have any legal authority to justify their proceedings. They were armed with cutlasses and pistols, and they threatened to shoot him if he made any resistance. The carriage broke down five times in going seventeen miles.

On the arrival of Stephenson at New-York; he was taken into custody by the British consul, a merchant by the name of Goodhue, and High Constable Hays. It was soon discovered however that he had been forcibly removed from Savannah, and that he was detained by those who had him in custody without sufficient authority. An excitement was awakened in his favour; several members of the bar volunteered their services, and procured a writ of habeas corpus against the British consul, Mr. Goodhue, and Mr. Hays, and after some delay Stephenson was brought before the Recorder, and no reason for his detention being given, he was discharged. Mr. Shaw, the Sheriff of New-York, then immediately took him into custody on the suit of Mr. Parkins, and he was committed to the Debtor's Prison. The editor of the New-York Gazette says he was present at an interview between Parkins and Stephenson; it was their first meeting in this country, and the moment Stephenson recognized Parkins he exclaimed, "Hear my story—don't condemn me yet. I solemnly declare I am not the guilty man you suppose me." The editor of the Gazette says—"We were present during the whole interview and heard the conversation between them, and, if the statements made by Stephenson be correct, we feel authorized in saying that his partners are equally guilty as himself. In fact there is not a doubt on our minds that the House was bankrupt some time before his leaving the country."

Stephenson has subsequently been discharged from custody, by the Superior Court of New-York, on a principle of law laid down by Lord Holt and supported by many subsequent decisions, "that if a man is wrongfully brought into a jurisdiction and there lawfully arrested, yet ought he to be discharged; for no lawful thing, founded on a wrongful act, can be supported." Chief Justice Jones delivered the opinion of the Court, which decide "that as he was brought into this jurisdiction illegally, he could not be exposed to any arrest whatsoever, and was entitled to the protection of the Court from any subsequent arrest, until a reasonable time had elapsed for his return to the place whence he was abducted."

Stephenson is about sixty-five years old, of middling stature, and his hair is said to be unusually white. He appears to entertain a strong affection for his family, and says his regard for his children will prevent his doing violence to himself. Measures have been taken in Savannah for the punishment of those guilty of a violation of the laws in his person, and there will probably be some difficulty before the matters growing out of his abduction shall be settled in New-York. He should be punished for his faults; but whatever his crimes may have been in England, they are no excuse for a violation of American laws and American freedom.

§ The following extract would have been inserted some weeks since had it not been mislaid. It is a source of gratification to see men who are as able as they are willing coming thus fearlessly into the field with an honest and firm determination to brave the shafts of calumny. We believe that in ordinary times masonry does not need support from any quarter; but in these days of falsehood and misrepresentation the welfare of the country demands that the people should be undeceived with respect to it. We wish success to The State Palladium from other motives than a friendship towards masonry. We commune with the spirit of the man who can take up the gauntlet in the cause of truth, when it is so generally unpopular.

From the New-London Gazette.

We last week mentioned that a new paper, favourable to the cause Masonry, was about to be established in Norwich.

We have since seen the proposals, by Messrs. Clapp & Co. under the title of "The State Palladium," from which we extract the following:

"Though we claim not the appellation of Mason, (never having arrived to that honour,) yet, we cannot but view with disgust, the vile attempts to hurl the poisoned arrows of slander, at that honourable and virtuous class of society. The index of conviction prompts and guides us in their behalf,—and while the different departments of our Journal, political and moral, are carefully nursed, the main object of our paper, will be, not to advocate a sinking cause (as a few bigoted enthusiasts would have it appear,) but as faithful Sentinels on the Watch Tower of Freedom repel the poisoned darts of calumny, which are now so profusely showered in our land. We believe the cause of Masonry needs no other prop, than that great Power which has so long sustained it—although our feeble efforts are voluntarily put in requisition in its behalf. The benefits resulting from the profession of Masonry, cannot but convince every honourable and candid man, of its utility—and until we see further evidence of its baneful influence on society, than that which has been so lavishly issued by bigotry, malice, and aspiring demagogues, we shall feel justified in supporting a society, which has for ages, been cherished by men, distinguished for virtue, love of order, and regard for the welfare of the human family."

FOREIGN NEWS. London papers to the 2d and Liverpool to the 3d February have been received at New-York, during the past week. Their contents are chiefly of a speculative nature, and consequently sufficiently contradictory to render every thing uncertain. The king of France in his speech to the legislative chambers thinks that notwithstanding the events which have desolated the east, peace will not be disturbed in the rest of Europe; the newspaper speculations, however, support a contrary opinion, which, it will be seen from the following summary, is not ill founded. There is scarcely a spot in Europe at peace with itself and the rest of the world.

EUROPE.—The Paris Constitutionnel charges upon the Duke of Wellington, a disposition to entangle the French Government in a scheme alleged to have been concerted by the Duke with Prince Metternich of Austria, having for its object, the general purpose of trampling down all attempts on behalf of human liberty, with the specific hope of degrading the French people by the progressive overthrow of their liberal institutions. The Editor of the London Times affects to perceive in this attack of the Constitutionnel, the fanatical hatred of England. He supposes the writer to be a Bonapartist who forgets the annihilation of the Emperor; or, that he is friendly neither to England nor France, and is endeavouring to sow the seeds of discord between the only two powers to whom according to the Times, Greece owes her deliverance; and through whose strict alliance only, the equilibrium of Europe menaced by the Russian war, can be maintained. The Constitutionnel has however had no little influence in causing it to be believed in Paris, that M. de Polignac (a candidate for the department of the Foreign Relations of France) has endeavoured to defeat the Treaty of London of the 6th July. The Times does not hesitate to insinuate broadly, that Russia is the instigator of the attacks in the French Journals, and is quite indignant at Le Globe another Paris paper, which declares, that the cause of M. de Polignac's return to Paris "is to enforce upon the French Government the views and policy of that of England—that is, the Austrian Policy;" and the Austrian and English policy are said by the same paper, to be "that which oppresses the Catholics in Ireland and the patriots in Italy—the Greeks in Turkey, and the German Liberals" in other words says the Times, that policy is described to be "the revised system of the Holy Alliance." Whatever else may be the fact, one thing is certain, that the King of France has been obliged to look around for some other candidate than M. de Polignac for Minister of Foreign affairs.

The Pope has appointed Bishops for the South American States, and this is considered at Madrid as conclusive evidence that his holiness has recognized their independence.

The Paris papers state, that the Turks are passing the Danube at every point; that the Pacha of Widin is marching, with 30,000 men, against the principalities; and it is thought, that unless the Grand Duke Constantine arrives in time to stop the invasion, the Russian army will be obliged to recross the Pruth. Toghassan Oglou is said to have notified to the Count Langeron, who was formerly a prisoner in Turkey, his intention to attack him with 12,000 cavalry. The Count immediately took the necessary precaution to resist the attack. There is a general movement of the Turks along the whole line of the Danube, from Widin to Silistria.

Accounts from Navarino of the 4th January state that the French troops were preparing to evacuate the Morea, but that three companies of Engineers had just arrived who it is said, would remain until the forts of the Peloponnesus were in a complete state of defence; the accounts terminate, with some significant expressions, "We are glad to leave in Greece some French soldiers till Fubvier shall have succeeded in organizing the regular national troops, of which he is to be the chief, a title which he justly deserves." We say significant, for while Russia is invading Turkey, Austria scowling on the principalities and holding on to Italy, and England charged with aiding in the dismemberment of Turkey, it is impossible to forget the intimation given more than a year ago that the allies were bent on the acquisition of territory in the East, and France shews a disposition to make sure of her share. This will be more apparent on perusing the article under the Toulon head.

The avowed object of the French Journals is to detach France from Austria and England, in this attempt at aggrandisement. The Times says the real object is to favour Russia. The spirit with which the Sultan continues the war, shews that the attempts of the European powers to negotiate jointly or severally with him have proved fruitless. How far the choice of the Presidents for the French Chambers may be influential on the policy of France, and of course on the peace of Europe, remains to be seen, but if any judgment of the state of public feeling can be formed by reading the French Journals, there is no reason to expect the continuance of a continental peace.

The Archbishop of Canterbury had been to Windsor to confer with the King immediately previous to the last visit of the Duke of Wellington. The Editor of the Times intimates that the object of the interview was connected with the Catholic question.

It was rumoured that the mother of Don Miguel was intriguing to be made Regent during his illness.

Both Houses of Parliament were to meet for the despatch of business on the 5th of February. It was not expected that the King would be able to open the session in person.

The opinion that the Catholic question would be carried by the Duke of Wellington was gaining ground in the metropolis, and the Duke of Northumberland, the new Vice Ray of Ireland, was believed to be in favour of the measure.

CATHOLICK ASSOCIATION.—At a meeting of this body on Thursday, Catholick Rent was received to the amount of 691l, which includes 200l (a thousand dollars) from the Association of the Friends of Ireland in New York. The proceedings of the meeting had very little interest. Mr. O'Connell gave the following as the correct copy of the Duke of Wellington's letter to the Duke of Leinster:—

"My Lord Duke—I received your letter, also a tin case, conveying the declaration of certain Protestants in favour of what is called Catholick Emancipation.—I have the honour &c. WELLINGTON."

On which Mr. O'Connell said—"Why, the man is mad! (laughter.) Did any one before now, ever hear of a statesman acknowledging a tin case. Any money for a statesman in a tin case, (laughter.) Now I think it is a hard case and poor case, (cheers and laughter) it is both, to see a Prime Minister analyzing a tin case, when Europe is shaken with convulsions, and trembling like Etna before a new eruption of lava. I wonder will he send us Emancipation in a tin case?" (laughter.)

The proposed connexion between the Ottoman government and the United States of America has suddenly come to an end. The Americans proposed, as the basis of the treaty, the free passage of the Dardanelles to all nations; but this most republican proposition was instantly rejected, with the dignity befitting Turks. The government of Miguel, or rather the anarchy carried on under his name, has not in the least altered its character, though we trust it is drawing towards its end. The prisons are still full, and a lingering death is the only goal delivery. An English paper says, a plot, we are assured, has been formed for waylaying the unfortunate refugees from this country upon the wide ocean. Several vessels were despatched from the Tagues on the 12th inst. for this purpose, to whose commanders there are said to have been given positive orders to sink the whole of the transports without sparing a single life, or taking a single prisoner. When we consider from what country these poor creatures are sailing, and that neither their departure nor the place of their destination are of their own choice we cannot but hope that orders have been transmitted to all our naval commanders to protect the refugees from so horrible a fate.

A letter from St. Petersburg states that by an Imperial Order of the Emperor, the army is to be increased from 450,000, its number the last year, to 700,000.

We are assured that dispatches brought by an extraordinary express announce that the Emperor of Russia had sent orders to the Grand Duke Constantine to put himself at the head of the Polish army, and to march and occupy the Principalities. Letters from Warsaw add, that the army of the Baltic has also received orders to march to the south.

MARRIED,

At Watervliet, on the 2d inst. by the Rev. Mr. Bronk, Mr. HARVEY NASH, Printer, to Miss ROSILLA MANCIUS REUWER, both of this city.

LADIES' MAGAZINE, conducted by Mrs. Sarah J. Hale, and published monthly by Putnam & Hunt, 41, Washington St. Boston—and by Bourne, at the Depository of Arts, 359 Broadway, New York; & Thomas T. Ash, 139 Chestnut-st. Philadelphia. Each number will contain about 59 pages of original matter, the whole making a beautifully executed octavo volume of 600 pages. Price three dollars per annum, to be paid on delivery of the third number.

The contents of the Ladies' Magazine will be an original miscellany, calculated to improve the taste and foster the talents and virtues of women; at the same time particular regard will be paid to the diffusion of that knowledge of our own country, its scenery and history, and the character and manners of its inhabitants, which Americans, of either sex, should be careful to acquire. But no sectional prejudices shall be admitted to interfere with the spirit of the work, which is intended to be strictly American.

The constantly increasing patronage which this work has received, during the year it has been before the public, is the best criterion of its merits. The Ladies' Magazine is now circulated in almost every city and state in the Union.

§ Contents of No. 3, for March, 1829.—Original Miscellany—The Late Empress Maria Louisa, Moralizing, The Manuscript, No. III.—Frank Cullemore, Two Evenings, An Author's, No. II., Letter to the Editor. Original Poetry—The Graves of Payais, Hope, The Alpine Horn, The Icy Bower, Stanzas, My Mary. Literary Notices—Memoir of Mrs. Judson, Poems, by Mrs. Louisa P. Smith, Guido, and other Poems, by Ianthe, Mary's Visit—James Somers, The American Monthly Magazine, The Western Examiner, To Subscribers and Correspondents.

POETRY.

THE SEPARATION.

"Lorsque l'on aime comme il faut,
Le moindre éloignement nous tue;
Et ce, dont on chérit la vue,
Ne revient jamais assez tôt."

Molière.

He's gone, dear Fanny!—gone at last—
We've said good bye—and all is over;
'Twas a gay dream—but it is past—
Next Tuesday he will sail from Dover.
"Well! gentle waves be round his prow!
But tear and prayer alike are idle;
Oh! who shall fill my album now?
And who shall hold my poney's bridle?"

Last night he left us after tea,—
I never thought he'd leave us—never;
He was so pleasant, wasn't he?
Papa, too, said he was so clever.
And, Fanny, you'll be glad to hear,
That little boy that looked so yellow,
Whose eyes were so like his,—my dear,
Is a poor little orphan fellow.
That odious Miss Lucretia Browne,
Who with her horrid pugs and Bibles,
Is always running through the town,
And circulating tracts—and libels;
Because he never danced with her,
Told dear mamma such horrid scandal,
About his moral character,
For stooping, just to tie a sandal!
She said he went to fights and fairs—
That always give papa the fidgets;
She said he did not know his prayers,—
He's every Sunday at St. Bridget's!
She said he squeezed one's waist and hands,
Where'er he waltzed—a plague upon her—
I danced with him at Lady Bland's,
He never squeezed me—"pon my honour."

His regiment have got the route,
(They came down here to quell the riot,
And now—what can they be about?—
The stupid people are so quiet:)
They say it is to India, too,
If there, I'm sure he'll get the liver!
And should he bathe—he used to do—
They've crossed the river.

There may be bright eyes there—and then!
(I'm sure I love him like a brother?)
His lute will soon be strung again,
His heart will soon beat for another.
I know him well: he is not false—
But when the song he loves is playing,
Or after he has danced a waltz—
He never knows what he is saying.

I know 'twas wrong—'twas very wrong—
To listen to his wild romancing;
Last night I danced with him too long,
One's always giddy after dancing:
But when he begged me so to sing,
And when he sighed, and asked me, would I?
And when he took my turquoise ring,—
I'm sure I could not help it, could I?

Papa was lecturing the girls,
And talked of settlements and rentals;—
I wore a white lace rock—and pearls—
He looked so well in regimentals!
And just before we came away,
While we were waiting for the carriage,
I heard him, not quite plainly, say
Something of Blacksmiths—and of marriage.

He promised, if he could get leave,
He'd soon come back—I wonder can he?—
Lord Hill is very strict, I believe;
(What could he mean by Blacksmiths, Fanny?)
He said he wished he ne'er had met,—
I answered—it was lovely weather!—
And then he had no need to forget
The pleasant days we'd passed together.

He's gone—and other lips may weave
A stronger spell than mine to bind him,
But bid him, if he love me, leave
Those rhymes he made me love, behind him:
Tell him I know those wayward strings
Not always sound to mirthful measures;
But sighs are sometimes pleasant things,
And tears from those we love are treasures.

Tell him to leave off drinking wine,
Tell him to break himself of smoking,
Tell him to go to bed at nine—
His hours are really quite provoking.
Tell him I hope he won't get fat,
Tell him to act with due reflection;

Tell him to wear a broad-leafed hat,
Or else he'll ruin his complexion.

Tell him I am so ill to-day,
Perhaps to-morrow I'll be better;
Tell him before he goes away,
To write me a consoling letter:
Tell him to send me down that song
He said he loved the best of any—
Tell him I'm sure I can't live long,
And—bid him love me—won't you, Fanny?

From the Ladies' Magazine.

HOPE.

BY MRS A. M. WELLS.

There sits a woman on the brow
Of yonder rocky height;
There, gazing o'er the waves below,
She sits from morn till night.

She heeds not how the mad waves leap
Along the rugged shore;
She looks for one upon the deep
She never may see more.

As morning twilight faintly gleams,
Her shadowy form I trace;
Wrapt in the silvery mist, she seems
The Genius of the place!

Far other once was Rosalie;
Her smiles was glad; her voice,
Like musick o'er a summer sea,
Said to the heart—rejoice.

O'er her pure thoughts did sorrow fling
Perchance a shade, 'twould pass,
Lightly as glides the breath of Spring
Along the bending grass.

A sailor's bride, 'twas hers to be:—
Wo to the faithless main!
Nine summers since, he went to sea,
And ne'er returned again.

But long, where all is wrecked beside,
And every joy is chased,
Long, long will lingering Hope abide
Amid the dreary waste!

Nine years, though all have given him o'er,
Her spirit doth not fail;
And still she waits along the shore
The never coming sail.

On that high rock, abrupt and bare,
Ever she sits, as now;
The dews have damped her flowing hair
The sun has scorched her brow.

And every far-off sail she sees,
And every passing cloud,
Or white-winged sea-bird, on the breeze,
She calls to it aloud.

The sea-bird answers to her cry,
The cloud, the sail float on—
The hoarse wave mocks her misery,
Yet is her hope not gone:—

It can not go:—with that to part,
So long, so fondly nursed,
So mingled with her faithful heart,
That heart itself would burst.

When falling dews the clover steep,
And birds are in their nest,
And flower-buds folded up to sleep,
And ploughmen gone to rest,

Down the wide track her feet have worn,
—There scarce the goat may go;—
Poor Rosalie, with look forlorn,
Is seen descending slow.

But when the gray morn tints the sky,
And lights that lofty peak,—
With a strange lustre in her eye,
A fever in her cheek,

Again she goes, untired, to sit.
And watch, the live-long day;
Nor till the star of eve is lit,
E'er turns her steps away.

Hidden, and deep, and never dry,—
Or flowing, or at rest,
A living spring of hope doth lie
In every human breast.

All else may fail, that soothes the heart,—
All, save that fount alone;
With that and life at once we part,
For life and hope are one.

From the New-York Critick.

MIND.

BY WM. LEGGOTT.

Let others praise the hue
That mantles on thy face,
Thine eyes of heavenly blue,
And mein of fruitless grace:
These charms I freely own,
But still a higher find;
'Twill last when beauty's flown—
Thy matchless charm of mind.

The damp of years may quench
The brightness of thine eye;
Time's icy hand may blanch
Thy cheek's vermilion dye;
Thy form may lose its grace;
Thy voice its sweet control;
But naught can e'er efface
The beauties of thy soul.

What's beauty but a flower
That blooms in summer's ray;
When pours the wintry shower,
Its charms will fade away:
The mind's a rich perfume
That winter can not chill;
The flower may lose its bloom,
But fragrance lingers still.

Stars gem the vault of heaven
When day's last hues decline;
As darker grows the even,
With brighter ray they shine:
Thus, in the night of years;
When youth's gay light is o'er,
More bright the soul appears,
Than ere it shone before.

The leaves when autumn blusters,
Forsake the tree and die,
But failing, show rich clusters
Of fruitage to the eye:
Thus time, in flying, snatches
Thy beauty, but displays
One charm that all o'er matches—
A soul that ne'er decays.

TO ARCHITECTS. The Grand Lodge of Ancient Freemasons of South Carolina, being about to erect a MASONICK HALL in the city of Charleston, offer a premium of one hundred dollars for the plan which shall be approved. The lot is about one hundred feet front on Meeting-street, and of sufficient depth from east to west for any required buildings. The front will be to the east, and must present a specimen of the strictest chasteness, simple, but conforming in proportions to the best models. The building must be calculated to contain on the second floor a superb Hall for public purposes, the lower floor for supper rooms, and other conveniences for public parties; the third story must contain a room for the assembly of the Grand Lodge; one or more wings extending from the main building to the west, must contain rooms for the subordinate Lodges, the Chapters, &c. and the lower story to be calculated for kitchens, and other requisite offices. Each plan must be accompanied with an estimate, specifying the value of the materials on which it is founded. To be forwarded to Ed. Hughes, Recording Grand Secretary, on or before the 1st of May next. By order of the Grand Lodge. BENJ FANEUIL HUNT, G M

FINE CUTLERY, &c.—JAMES DICKSON, Cutler and Surgical Instrument Maker, No. 3. Beaver street, (formerly at No. 98 North Market street) Albany, manufactures and repairs all kinds of instruments in the above branches, with neatness, accuracy and despatch, and warranted equal to any article imported, or manufactured in the United States.

Shears, Scissors, Razors and Penknives, ground and finished on an improved plan, and warranted to excel any other in use in this city or elsewhere.

Currier's Steels constantly on hand, and warranted a superior article.

Blades inserted in knife-handles in the most approved style, and most reasonable terms. Locks repaired, N. B. Country orders punctually attended to.

Albany, Feb. 14, 1829.

36

BOOK BINDING. Sign of the Golden Ledger, corner of State and North Market streets, Albany. WILLIAM SEYMOUR, carries on the above business in all its branches; viz: plain, extra, and super-extra—has a first rate ruling machine, and other necessary implements for manufacturing Blank Books of every description, on the most reasonable terms, of the best workmanship.

An assortment on hand. Subscribers to the American Masonick Record can have their volumes handsomely bound in boards, with leather backs and corners, at 62 1-2 cents a volume. Feb 14 3m3

PAINTING AND GLAZING.—The subscriber respectfully informs his friends and the public that he continues the House and Sign Painting and Glazing, at the old stand, No. 299, corner of North Market and Steuben streets, where he will accommodate the public with any article in his line. Paints in pots mixed ready for use, of the first quality, can be had at any time. Personal attention will be paid to all orders. March 9, 1828. JOHN F. PORTER.

THIS PAPER

Is published every Saturday, by E. B. CHILD, AT THE CORNER OF NORTH MARKET AND STEUBEN STREETS, ALBANY, N. Y.

TERMS.—To city subscribers, Three Dollars a year. To subscribers who receive their papers by mail, Two Dollars and Fifty Cents, IN ADVANCE—otherwise, Three Dollars. JOB PRINTING neatly executed at this office.

AMERICAN MASONICK RECORD

AND ALBANY SATURDAY MAGAZINE.

VOL. III.

ALBANY, N. Y. SATURDAY, APRIL 4, 1839.

NO. 10.

MASONICK RECORD.

From the Boston Bulletin.

MASONRY AND ANTI-MASONRY.

At this juncture, when the most shameless and unprincipled attempts to introduce disorder and anarchy among the quietly disposed people of New-England are making in various quarters, it is gratifying to see men of integrity, virtue, patriotism, and intelligence, manfully putting forth their energies to resist the torrent of knavish oppression which certain desperate wretches would fain let loose upon the community.

We are happy, therefore, to be able to present our readers with the substance of the proceedings of a large and respectable meeting of citizens last week, in the town of Randolph, in this vicinity, at which Silas Alden, esq. officiated as moderator, and Aaron Prescott as secretary. The assemblage consisted not only of masons, but of a great portion of individuals not belonging to the fraternity. The subjoined address and resolutions, the spirit of which cannot but meet with the approbation of all honest and enlightened men, were unanimously adopted.

ADDRESS.

The unusual excitement which is now prevailing in this town and vicinity, against a class of men hitherto as respectable in point of talents, wealth, and intelligence, and as peaceable, industrious, and useful citizens, to say the least, as their opposers, seems to call for an expression of unqualified disapprobation from all who have the interest of their country, the peace of society, and the prosperity of religion sincerely at heart. If an opinion were to be formed from the loud and vociferous declamations of many who style themselves anti-masonicks, it must be inferred that all the powers of sin were at work to accomplish some mighty achievement, against which they alone had moral courage to array themselves, and that common honesty and veracity were their exclusive inheritance. We have too much charity to believe that the great majority of them, could they divest themselves of their passions and prejudices, would assert the former, or have the hardihood to claim the latter. Many undoubtedly, through ignorance and timidity, have joined in the hue and cry to hunt down freemasonry; some it is apprehended, have done so from interested and selfish motives; perhaps a few from principle. Whether this excitement has arisen from one or all of these sources, it is firmly believed that the public welfare will not be advanced by it, and that the time has arrived when those who are capable of cool and dispassionate reasoning should pause and reflect upon the consequences likely to follow from such a perturbed state of the public mind. Where did it arise? what cause for its continuance? what character has it assumed? can any good follow from it? are questions that may be, with the strictest propriety, yea, ought to be, asked and answered by every one, satisfactorily to his conscience and the immutable principles of rectitude, before he enlists in its cause.

Of its source, few, who live within the sphere of its rage are ignorant, and nothing more need now be said, than that those who are now so violently assailed, as deeply deplore that event as any of their opponents, and would do as much as they, had they the power or means, to bring to light the deed complained of. More cannot in justice be required of any citizen.

To the second inquiry, the answer is too plain to need arguments to prove. Public justice is not likely to be promoted, and may, yea, most probably will suffer by it. It is a maxim as old as the common-law, that it is better that ten guilty should escape, than that one innocent person should suffer. Let the anti-masonicks be the judges, whether this rule has not been already most grossly violated, and hundreds of individuals, as innocent of any participation in that or any other crime, as themselves, have not been singled out, and all the obloquy heaped upon them that the tongue or the press could utter. Yea, even charges the most revolting to humanity directly or indirectly, alleged against them, without the least shadow of foundation, beyond the vague surmises of an over-heated zeal. There is undoubtedly a cause other than the avowed one, which the leaders of the party could, if they would, assign for their zeal and activity in its ranks. This, it is firmly believed, is no other than political ambition, and is designed to be a ladder for climbing into offices which the aspirant had too much reason to fear he should fail to arrive at, so soon as he wished, if at all, by the influence of his character and the legitimate exertions of his talents. The distinction which can thus be attained is to us no subject of envy; nor does it require the gift of second sight to foresee, that the people could have no cause to rejoice in the end at their success.

Were justice the principle, and candour the guide of the anti-masonicks, there would be no cause of complaint. No such extravagant pretensions would be made, nor sweeping denunciations fulminated, as are now heard in public places, and stand conspicuous in the columns of certain pamphlets. Our religious societies would not exhibit such an appalling spectacle of division and contention, nor the sacred rights of the church be deserted through fear of meeting one whom, but a short time since, those who were accustomed to meet as christian friends and brothers, cheerfully greeted as a worthy disciple of christianity. Our town meetings would not have become the scene of tumult and confusion, nor a portion of our citizens become the object of distrust and hatred. The surest right of enjoying private opinion unmolested, would not have been trampled upon, and denied to any, even the meanest citizen; nor the unalienable right of individuals to form voluntary associations for purposes not repugnant to, or prohibited by, the laws of the land, been cherished. Neither would arguments have been urged against one charitable institution, which were applicable against every other that has ever yet been established. There would have been no need of sending special messages from town to town, to sound the alarm and unfurl the banners of party. The credulous would not have been imposed upon by the false representations, nor the timid alarmed by the array of crimes which were never thought of, much less committed by those on whom they were charged.

But to the shame of our country be it spoken, a far different spirit has actuated them. Individual feelings have been most grossly outraged. Reputation, the dearest of all earthly possessions, has been wantonly assailed, and the foulest epithets and the most malignant aspersions, thrown upon men whose character stood foremost in the ranks of piety and virtue, philanthropy and patriotism. Our judicial tribunals have been stigmatized as violating their most sacred duties by the administration of justice to suit the interests and views of particular men. Our legislatures have been arraigned as betraying their sacred trusts, and lending their aid to secure personal interests by the sacrifice of those of the public. These and similar charges are industriously circulated through the country, with a spirit of zeal and intolerance infinitely better adapted to the meridian of Spain, than to that of a free and enlightened republic; and more suitable for a director of the holy inquisition, than for a sentinel upon the watch-tower of liberty.

If this be the spirit and temper that govern the anti-masonick party, need it be asked what good can be produced by it. Would it not be more proper to enquire what evil it may not entail upon society? Will such spirit cherish friendship and peace between individuals in the social circle, or in neighbourhoods; promote unanimity in towns in the discharge of their corporate duties; lead to a judicious selection of those who are best qualified to fill responsible stations under our state and national government, which every town is called upon to make? Has it the power to unite men in the pursuit of the best means to improve the moral and religious virtues of the people; to instil into the minds of our youth a love of truth, sobriety, honesty, and a regard to the rights and privileges of others? Will it prepare the mind of any one more readily to receive useful instruction, to discriminate between truth and falsehood, and to practise that charity so forcibly inculcated by Christianity? The answer must be in the negative. What then is there in the nature of the case, that can justify the arraignment of so numerous a class of men as is embraced by the Masonick Fraternity and their friends, in the manner that has been done? Is it because they are members and advocates of a society avowedly moral and charitable; whose principles have been published to the world for ages; of a society which has never shrunk from a candid and impartial inquiry into the nature and tendency of its code and whose members have uniformly maintained as high a rank for piety and virtue as any other class of citizens, and have ever been conspicuous for their endeavours to meliorate the condition of their fellow men? No! Is it because they have no right to limit the appropriation of their funds to specific objects, or to prescribe terms of admission, and to exact a solemn promise from a newly admitted member that he will be true and faithful to his engagements? No! Is it because there may be a few among them, who prove to be bad men, whom no tie can bind, and no restraint can keep within the sphere of their duty? If this be the cause, with one fell swoop strike out of existence every civil, religious, and charitable institution on earth—for all in like case offend. Is it because they will not prove faithless to their trust, and declare that to be worthless which they highly appreciate—that to be bad which they are convinced is good—that to be false which they know to be true—and dare to have and maintain an opinion of their own—that they are thus persecuted and proscribed? Let a candid and enlightened public decide who are in the right.

RESOLUTIONS.

Resolved, that the present opposition to masonry has been excited from motives of personal aggrandizement, and political ambition; and that it is now supported with the same views, the ignorant and credulous having been marshalled as recruits necessary for the organization of a force, in their opinion, sufficient for effecting its destruction.

Resolved, that the present opposition to masonry is unmerited; that it is a deadly worm which lies deep at the root of all institutions, either political, moral, or religious; that it threatens the destruction of those rights and privileges guaranteed to us by the federal compact; that it is oppressive to a large, and we may say respectable portion of the community, by placing upon them burdens more heavy and undeserved, than those which induced our fathers to adopt the wilderness as a land of refuge; and that it has already unfurled its banners, and proclaimed to the world that none are worthy of trust or office—none fit for the jury box—none shall preach the gospel, or sit at the communion-table—none shall enjoy any of the rights and privileges of free citizens, under a free, a Republican Government, but such as are enrolled in their ranks, and join in the crusade against this moral, this benevolent institution.

Resolved, "that there are many who, under the predominancy of their religious zeal, are induced to the adoption of measures, and to the utterance of opinions incompatible with the benign and equitable precepts of that religion which they profess;" who do the cause they espouse much injury, and furnish infidelity with one of its most deadly weapons against christianity, viz: that its precepts have no influence whatever, upon the lives, and conduct of its professors.

Resolved, that we deeply regret that Christian professors should be so far deceived by the anti-masonick publications of the day, as to unite with them in decrying masonry;—while one of its most clamorous enemies has had the hardihood to request the Editor of the 'Masonick Record' to publish an atheistical journal, will not the Christian anti-mason pause and reflect for a moment on the company into which he may possibly fall?

Resolved, that we view with deep concern the attempt now making by many to obstruct the operations of a moral and benevolent institution, venerable for its antiquity, and praise worthy for its charities; instead of being induced to aid its efforts in the cause of humanity.

Resolved, that we will use all lawful means and exert our best endeavours to quell the present excitement; that we will hold in estimation all moral, benevolent, upright, and honest men of whatsoever party they may be; either as candidates for any office of trust or profit, or when called into action under our general or state governments, or when chosen or appointed to any station, either civil judicial, or religious; and that we deprecate in the strongest terms the principles of all persons who are not actuated by the same motives: and that we anxiously look forward to that period when like sentiments will be expressed by all, and the peace and harmony of the community, more especially of this our town, will be restored; and those selfish intriguing spirits, who have been the main spring in producing recent difficulties, will be unnoticed and unknown, and be suffered to receive, as a sufficient reward for their services, that silent contempt which they so justly deserve.

SILAS ALDEN, Moderator.

AARON PRESCOTT, Sec'y.

Randolph, March 13, 1829.

LITERARY.

From the Western Monthly Review.

IMPEDIMENTS OF AMERICAN LITERATURE.

Concluded from our last.

Mr. Everett is a generous critic; and writes too well himself, to have any occasion for envy, or injustice towards other writers. We have mentioned him, because we consider him at the head of those, who stand firmly for a genuine American literature. If his leading were followed, we should not only be independent in this respect, but, to say the least, we should equal, if not transcend our model. Let a full experiment be made. It is unfortunate for this desirable consummation, that the fine talents of that gentleman have been enlisted in the arena of politics and ambition. All that can now be hoped, is, that in his new career he will yield his talents to no party; but remain, as he will one day be recognized, as we trust, the man of the nation. We have never doubted, that the people are ultimately and essentially just, both in politics and literature.

But the most material impediment in the way of American talent remains to be mentioned; an impediment constantly increasing in influence. We have no literary metropolis; but instead of it, ten or fifteen provincial capitals. England has but two; and three or four days bring the literary men from the remotest extremities to the common centre. The inhabitants of our different capitals travel too; but it is on journeys of business, health, or pleasure, in which the interests of literature have no concern. The interest of each one of our capitals, whether consciously or not, exerts an influence opposite to that of each other. Nothing can be more miserably unfortunate, than this clashing and competition. An author, the favourite of one capital, and sustained by its whole influence, travels in the flying stage or steam boat, in twelve hours, out of the orbit of his little universe. To his astonishment, he, who was the centre of movement at home, finds himself in another planet, to which he is a lunarian; and he, in turn, knows nothing of the man, who is every thing in this new sphere. Idle and trumpery books multiply in these places, which there is a common interest in the booksellers, and through them among the literary men, to hold in reputation; and an interest equally felt to keep the books of the other capitals out of the market. There is no one of the large and intelligent booksellers, who does not understand this, and endeavour to turn his knowledge to account.

There is no necessity for enlarging upon this theme. Every man, who has surveyed the whole ground, and thought maturely upon the subject, cannot but have perceived, that circumstances, more prejudicial to American literature, can scarcely be imagined. The great mass of purchasers, it is admitted, partake not at all of this feeling, and only inquire whether the book is worth buying. Where shall the buyer obtain the information, but from the town bookseller, who stands strong for the monopoly of his own capital? or the provincial newspaper and review, who still make a part of the same system, and are surrounded by the same atmosphere? Where shall the purchaser find a verdict, that may not be bought for a book, or a stick of molasses candy? No where, until an influence shall be found, to counteract this of so many provincial capitals.

But why not find such a place in Washington? Why not find it, where all the talents meet; and where collision, interest and ambition elicit all, that can be struck out of the aspirants? Whatever may be the reason and the cause, every one knows the fact, that literature is the last thing discussed, or cared for, beyond the mere giving an indifferent opinion upon the books and authors of the day. The members of the national legislature and government have more, than they can accomplish, to manage us, the sovereign people—the outs to get in, and push the ins out; to write letters to their constituents, study speeches, and attend the amusements. Literature! ask any one, how much it is worth at the seat of government! No. They have business of another sort of importance at Washington, to occupy all their time and all their thoughts. What shall we say of our provincial legislatures, if the atmosphere is somewhat Gothick at Washington? It is said, that some members have gone to these places, like the famous Mr. Tenant, tolerable scholars, and have forgotten every thing there, and been obliged, on their return, to go back to their horn book. If the political manual exercise makes them adroit politicians, heaven knows, it has any tendency, rather than to impart any of the generous feeling and liberalizing intellectual enlargement of literature. We could relate a great many very neat anecdotes about literatures, and legislators, and even governors of neighbouring states; but we are admonished not only not to speak evil, but not even to smile at the expense of dignities.

We relate one, however; for the truth of which we vouch not, but only, that we had it, as such, from a very high authority from the state in question. An erudite committee for imposing a name upon the political capital, just voted in an uninhabited position in the wilderness, met for the discharge of their duty. One of their number, it is presumed, a wag, asked, if they would not prefer a name, associated with the noblest recollections of literature? The idea struck them with pleasure. Said he, "There was in the olden time a people, remarkable for their attachment to books, literary institutions, science, the liberal arts, in short, a most polished and Athenian people." "Who were they?" "They were called Vandals." "Let us call our town Vandal." "Perhaps, it were better to soften the word, and give it a vocal termination—Vandalia, for example." It was carried by acclamations; and the charmingly situated metropolis of one of the states of the Union, surpassing in physical beauty and advantages, bears that name.

Could there be such a delegation, as that from the well known writers and editors of the different states and divisions of our country, who should meet annually at Philadelphia, to pass upon the books and other literary productions of the past year, and give counsels for the unborn productions of the coming year, we deem that such a censurate might do something towards breaking down sectional, and building up in its stead a national literature. They could put the veto of public opinion upon hundreds of trumpery books, to the manifest saving of paper and ink; and they would bring to light much talent and capability, that is now as the unwrought gem of the mine. We are aware, that writers are irritable genus; that there would be plenty of rivalry, jealousy, gibes, jokes, and intellectual gladiatorship. It is not so in all associations, where important interests are discussed!

Literary meetings, in fact, have proved in all time proverbial for their amenity. The saying of Cowper, that men grow to the niche which Providence calls them to fill, has as much truth as poetry in it. Men have been found in all countries, and in all time, to imbibe the spirit of their station. These men would feel, that little prejudiced and iliberal views of literature would not become censors, acting in such assumed characters and responsibilities. Honourable men will always strive to act according to their station; and many an officer has fought under epaulettes and an uniform, who would have run away in a common garb. These men, being charged that the republic of letters shall receive no detriment, will call forth generous thoughts and broad principles commensurate to their responsibilities. Why should there not be such a delegation? All other associations have found such regulations necessary—law, physick, divinity, and literature, if we ever have any, must be a distinct profession, as much as either of these.

The books which they patronized, would go, because they would not dare attach their names to such as ought not to go. A genuine American classical literature would finally result from such a system as this, which would be fraught with incalculable benefits. The things we believe, has been attempted in Germany, the most book-making country in the world. But there are a thousand reasons why the provincial capitals of Germany should not have an interest so adverse to the general literature of the country, as ours. The monarchick spirit of the whole consolidated empire of principalities extinguishes in the birth much of that rivalry and opposition and clashing of interests, which exist in our provincial capitals.

There is need enough, even yet, notwithstanding all that is said of our wonderful illumination, that more should be done for the progress of knowledge and taste. Ask any of our editors, who has extensive relations with the publick, if there is not a great deal yet for the community to learn? Look at the bigotry, fury and party rage, that surround us upon every side, and see what kind of march of mind is going on. There is a little light, to be sure, dawning upon the publick mind. Pity one could not return to the earth, after a century or two. There is no doubt, that the waggish historians of that time, while they peruse much of what is now written, and read of what is now publick sentiment, in many of our communities, will talk of this century, as the dark ages, in which a small number of the people, branded as heterodox and infidels, first broached the opinion, that men had an unalienable right from the Author of their being to think for themselves.

THE GATHERER.

YANKEE ENTERPRISE.

The January number of the Oriental Herald, a magazine specially devoted to the affairs of India, published in London, by Mr. Buckingham, author of "Travels in Assyria, Media, Persia," &c. speaks in glowing terms of "the merchant mariners of America."

"To engage in the trade of China, and the eastern islands," says the editor, "with any prospect of advantage, it is necessary to be free from all descriptions of restraint—that every sea should be open to our merchants—every port be familiarized with our flag—that, as far at least as our own law can ensure it, we should have unqualified access to every nation of the earth—be confined to no prescribed routes—detained to no ancient stations, but be at liberty to sail where we will, to return which way we please, and to stay as long as our exigencies may require. Be it remembered that we have not here to compete with the old, worn out nations of the continent. A new people, thirty years ago 'in the gristle,' but now 'hardened in the bone of manhood,' are our bold and adventurous rivals. Distinguished by an energy of character, an indomitable spirit of perseverance, to be dismayed by no difficulties, discouraged by no delay, free as the winds of the immense oceans which bound their coasts, the merchant mariners of AMERICA seem insensible to fatigue, seek no repose, but are engaged in one uninterrupted circumnavigation of commercial enterprise. 'Whilst we follow them,' says Burke, 'among the trembling mountains of ice, and behold them penetrating into the deepest frozen recesses of Hudson's Bay and Davis's Straits—whilst we are looking for them between the arctic circle, we hear that they have pierced into the opposite region of polar cold—that they are at the antipodes, and engaged under the frozen serpent of the South. Falkland Island, which seemed too remote and romantick an object for the grasp of national ambition, is but a stage and resting place in the progress of their victorious industry. Nor is the equinoctial heat more discouraging to them than the accumulated winter of both poles. We know, that, whilst some of them draw the line and strike the harpoon on the coast of Africa, others run the longitude and pursue their gigantick game along the coast of Brazil. No sea but what is vexed by their fisheries—no climate that is not witness to their toils.' Such was the portrait of America in her infancy, while yet in the nursery of Great Britain. Since that time whatever may look like poetry in the description has been more than realized. Not 'squeezed,' as we have been, 'by the restraints of a watchful and suspicious government,' but suffered to take their own way to perfection, the Americans, under cover of our own mischievous restrictions, by the excellence and variety of their assortments, have obtained a preference over us in all the ports of continental Europe, engrossed the better portion of their trade with the immense regions which lie beyond the Cape of Good Hope and the Straits of Magellan, and pushing their successes to the Thames, selected from the warehouses in which our manufactures mouldered, the materials which invigorate their competition, and extend and animate their foreign and domestick commerce."

BABOONS AT THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

On the hills near Simmons Town, at the Cape of Good Hope, (says Lieut. Shipp, in his Memoirs,) whole regiments of baboons assemble. These rascals, who stand six feet high, and are abominable thieves, used to annoy us exceedingly. Our barracks were under the hills, and when we went to parade, we were invariably obliged to leave armed men for the protection of our property: and even in spite of this they have frequently stolen our blankets and great coats, or any thing else they could lay their claws on. A poor woman, a soldier's wife, had washed her blanket and hung it out to dry, when some of these miscreants, who were ever on the watch, stole it, and ran off with it into the hills, which are high and woody. This drew upon them the indignation of the regiment, and we formed a strong party, armed with sticks and stones to attack them, with the view of recovering the property, and inflicting such chastisement as might be a warning to them for the future. I was on the advance, with about twenty men; and I made a detour to cut them off from caverns, to which they always flew for shelter. They observed my movement, and immediately detached about fifty to guard the entrance, while the others kept their post; and we could distinctly see them collecting large stones and other missiles. One old greyheaded one in particular, who often paid us a visit at the barracks, and was known by the name of Father Murphey, was seen distributing his orders, and planning the attack with the judgement of one of our best generals. Finding that my design was defeated, I joined the corps de main, and rushed on to the attack, when a scream from Father Murphey was a signal for a general encounter, and the host of baboons under his command rolled down enormous stones upon us, so that we were obliged to give up the contest, or some of us must inevitably have been killed. They actually followed us to our very doors, shouting in indication of victory; and during the whole night we heard dreadful yells and screaming, so much so that we expected a night attack. In the morning, however, we found that all this rioting had been created by disputes about the division of the blanket; for we saw eight or ten of them with pieces of it upon their backs, as old women wear their cloaks. Among the number strutted Father Murphey. These rascals annoyed us day and night; and we dared not venture out unless a party of five or six went together. One morning Father Murphey had the consummate impudence to walk straight into the grenadier barracks, and he was in the very act of purloining a sergeant's regimental coat, when a corporal's guard (which had just been relieved) took the liberty of stopping the gentleman at the door, and secured him. He was a most powerful brute, and, I am persuaded, too much for any single man. Notwithstanding his frequent misdemeanours, we did not like to kill the poor creature; so, first having taken the precaution of muzzling him, we determined on shaving his head and face, and then turning him loose. To this ceremony, strange to say, he submitted very quietly; and, when shaved, he was really an exceedingly good looking fellow; and I have seen many a "blood" in Bond-street not half so prepossessing in his appearance. We then started him up the hill, though he seemed rather reluctant to leave us. Some of his companions came down to meet him; but, from the alteration which shaving his head and face had made in him, they did not know him again, and accordingly pelted him with stones and beat him with sticks in so unmerciful a manner, that poor Father Murphey actually sought protection from his enemies, and he in time became quite domesticated and tame.

PICTURE OF THE COURT OF CHARLES II.

One nobleman, of great abilities, wanders about as Merry Andrew. Another harrangues the mob stark naked from a window. A third lays in ambush to cudgel a man who has offended him. A knot of gentlemen, of high rank and influence, combine to push their fortunes at Court by circulating stories intended to ruin an innocent girl; stories which had no foundation, and which, if they had been true, would never have passed the lips of a man of honour. A dead child is found in the palace, the offspring of some maid-of-honour by some courtier, or perhaps by Charles himself. The whole flight of panders and buffoons pounce upon it, and carry it in triumph to the royal laboratory, where his Majesty, after a brutal jest, dissects it for the amusement of the assembly, and probably of its father among the rest! The favourite Dutchess stamps about Whitehall, cursing and swearing. The ministers employ their time at the council board in making mouths at each other, and taking off each other's gestures, for the amusement of the King. The Peers, at a conference, begin to pummel each other, and to tear collars and periwigs. A speaker in the House of Commons gives offence to the Court; he is waylaid by a gang of bullies, and his nose cut to the bone. The ignominious dissoluteness, or rather, if we may venture to designate it by the only proper word, blackguardism, of feeling and manners, could not but spread from private to public life. The second generation of the statesman of this reign were worthy pupils of the schools in which they had been trained, of the gaming table of Grammont and the tiring room of Nell. In no other age could such a trifer as Buckingham have exercised any political influence. In no other age could the path to power and glory have been thrown open to the manifold infamies of Churchill (the Duke of Marlborough.) The history of that celebrated man shews, more clearly perhaps than that of any other individual, the malignity and extent of the corruption which had eaten into the heart of the publick morality. An English gentleman of family attaches himself to a prince who has seduced his sister, and accepts rank and wealth as the price of her shame and his own. He then repays by ingratitude the benefits he has purchased by ignominy, betrays his patron in a manner which the best cause can not excuse, and commits an act not only of private treachery, but of distinct military desertion. To his conduct, at the crisis of the fate of James, no service in modern times has, as far as we remember, furnished any parallel. The conduct of Ney, scandalous enough, no doubt, is the very fastidiousness of honour in comparison to it. The perfidy of Arnold approaches it most nearly. In our age, and country, no talents, no services, no party attachments, could bear any man up against such mountains of infamy. Yet even before Churchill had performed those great actions which, in some degree, redeem his character with posterity, the load lay very lightly on him: he had others in abundance to keep him in countenance. Godolphin, Oxford, Danby, the trimmer Halifax, the renegade Sunderland, were all men of the same class. [Edinburgh Review.]

PRIVILEGES OF HERETICKS.

At all the Roman church festivals, the foreign heretick has the privilege of admission, in preference to the native true believer. This preference is particularly obvious at the portal of the Sixtine Chapel, when the celebrated Miserere is performed. On this occasion an English or German physiognomy passes the lances of the Swiss guards more readily than Roman stars, and not from any motives of corruption or complaisance on the part of the military, but by special instructions from the higher powers.

This grievance has suggested the following pasquillo, which lately appeared in Rome.

Pasquino says to Marforio, "Where are you going, brother, with your black dress and your patent swords!"

Marforio.—"I am going to the Sixtine Chapel to hear the Miserere."

Pasquino.—"You go in vain. The Swiss guards will push you back; and the Pope's cavaliers will very politely send you about your business."

Marforio.—"Never fear, brother! I am sure to get in, because I turned heretick yesterday."

ARAB WOMEN.

The Arab Women, on the banks of the Nile, add to delicacy of form and natural elegance, a striking simplicity of dress. The poorest wear nothing but a long blue chemise, with a veil of the same colour,—one corner of which veil they hold in their mouths when they meet any men, especially Europeans. A large mask of black taffeta covers the faces of the richer females, leaving nothing to be seen but the eyes and the forehead. Earrings, several necklaces of shells or paste, intermingled with amulets of silver or of polished copper, bracelets various and multiplied; the chin, the hands, and a part of the arms, tattooed with blue, the eye-lashes tinged with black,—such are the particulars which complete the dress of an Arab female, and which, notwithstanding their apparent fantasticalness, produce an original and graceful ensemble.

GARDEN OF THE HESPERIDES.

Lieutenant Beachey, in his Travels in Cyrene, recently published, has thrown some curious light on the ancient account of these celebrated gardens. It appears, that, like many other wonders, ancient and modern, when reduced to simple truth, they are little more than common occurrences. Baron Humboldt and Mr. Bullock have reduced the floating gardens of Mexico to mud banks, with ditches between; and lieutenant Beachey makes it appear, that the gardens of the Hesperides are nothing more than old stone quarries, the bottoms of which have been cultivated.

PREPARATION OF CINNAMON.

The rough bark is first scraped off with knives, and then, with a peculiar instrument, the inner rind is stripped off in long slips; these are tied up in bundles, and put to dry in the sun, and the wood is sold for fuel. The operation was thus explained to bishop Heber by the cinnamon peelers; but in the regular preparation, the outer bark is not scraped off; but the process of fermentation, which the strips undergo when tied up in large quantities, removes the coarse parts. The peelers are called Chaliers.

ENGLISH INTOLERANCE.

There must be something marvellously bad in our boasted government, if a policy that is safe in states of every description be unsafe here. Prussia, a despotism—France, a limited monarchy—and North America, a democracy, have all set us examples of full religious toleration; and yet we pretend that there is something in our political system, which we baptise "the pride of ages" and "envy of nations," that cannot subsist unless it be buttressed by narrow sectarian feelings, bigotry, and a little persecution. [Scotsman.]

The lean are not less exposed to ridicule than the corpulent. A reverend doctor of divinity, of very ghostly appearance, was one day accosted by a vulgar fellow, who, after eyeing him from head to foot, at last said, 'Well, doctor, I hope you have taken care of your soul!' 'Why, my friend,' said the amiable shadow, 'why should you be so anxious that I should take care of my soul?' 'Because,' replied the other, 'I can tell you that your body is not worth caring for.'

The Calif Merwin II, it is said, could never see a sheep without wrapping his hand in the corner of the robe, and tearing out the kidney, which he instantly devoured. After eating his bonne bouche, he used to call for a clean habit; and, in consequence of this becoming attention to personal neatness, when he died, ten thousand greasy vests were found in his wardrobe. [Wadd's Memoirs.]

THE LEGENDARY.

From the Boston Statesman.

LEWIS AND ELIZA.

BY J. O. ROCKWELL.

It was a delightful day in September; the sky was half lost in the pleasant haze that the sun called up from the earth, and the warm winds were around in the forest, culling the yellow leaves from the branches; and ever as the tall limbs waved, the golden atmospheres would filter through, and drop upon the grass, as they were the waters of another and pleasanter world, which were floating in the air of this. Long had been the journey of the sun, and as he passed on in the blue sky, through the billowy clouds, he seemed to look back with a wishful glance for the majesty he was leaving.

"Dear me! that sun will never go down—I wish it was sunset," said a beautiful blue eyed creature, who was loitering in the forest. She was only seventeen, and the most bewitching creature in a thousand miles; and I pledge my faith, that after having once looked upon her, you would not sleep quietly for a number of weeks—perhaps six or seven. She sat down in the shade of a willow, with flowers strewn around and her yellow hairs waving like sunlight in the wind. At her feet, a pleasant rivulet murmured along to its fall; and as it leaped down into the shadowy cavern below, its whitening sheet struck upon a rock, and incessantly formed itself into diamonds and pearls of the most glowing colours—as transient and as beautiful as the mid-summer rainbow. Eliza would sit for minutes and gaze upon the stream, and trace it through the leaning grass, to a distant elevation, down which it filtered, glittering in the sun, as though the ice of silver were melting, and running out from the bosom of the mountain. And when the tiny waves passed by her, she would sometimes throw to their wishful motion the leaf of a rose, or a honeysuckle, and look with delight on their wrinkle of recognition. At length she became weary: the heat of the sun was oppressive; the music of the waterfall was lulling; the grasshopper sung his drowsy hymn, and she fell off into a slumber as quiet as the lake wave that ceases from its undulations.

I will not tell how beautiful she appeared, as she slept on the mossy bank. I will not speak of the holy movings of her bosom, as the heavy shadowing of blissful dreams at times would wander through it, how deliciously the light and coral were blended in her cheek, nor how the pure coral trembled in her lips,—with what careless grace the favoured winds lifted her sunny tresses, because I cannot. She was holy, and her innocence was a gem for which she might throw down the guantlet to the fairest one in earth or heaven. Yet she slept.

The sun had gone out from the world and a dreamy silence was over all the hills. The still spirit of evening was forth upon the mountains; and filled the woody vales with a mysterious loneliness. The sky was silently blue, and the moon and the stars seemed to have been sheltered in the bosom of heaven, till the gaudy majesty of the sun had entirely failed from the earth. But they came out, one by one, and threw their voiceless language to the beautiful places of the world; to the sea, and the wavering foundations thereof. And then the moon came up, and glimmered over the slumbers of the universe. Voices were heard in the valley, and by the dim light of the moon two lovely beings were seen stealing along the edge of the forest, in earnest conversation.

"No Lewis, not for the world. I would not leave my poor old mother for the world. And father, although he's so cross, and hates you foreigners so, I know 'twould break his heart, if I should run away and leave him now."

"No—do not say so—do not Eliza, for I cannot live without you, and you know we can never get the consent of that surly old fellow to our union."

"Take care, Lewis,—you know I must love my parents, and how can I love those who would teach me disrespect to those who gave me existence?"

"O, fudge, with your morality,—come Eliza, tell me—that you will be mine."

"Yours, why, Lewis—ah—I don't know—I'm sure I don't want to say no, and I dare not say anything else, while father thinks as he does. If you could only contrive to please him once, I don't think he would have any objection; and if he didn't I'm sure I should'nt," said the artless creature, looking into his face with her laughing eyes, Lewis was full of delight, and grasped her hand with more earnestness as she spoke this. He was a generous fellow, and worthily calculated to win the better feelings of a girl like Eliza. He was a bright eyed "waif upon the world," and all that he knew of himself, was that he had been left upon the shores of America while he was yet a child. He remembered a little only of the sea, and the dangers thereof, and he owed his preservation to a noble hearted man who had taken him from the beatings of the "pitiless storm" and given him bread and education. That patron was now dead; and Lewis was left with competence and character, to find his path through life as he would. He had travelled, and it was on a lonely walk, in mid-summer, that he first saw the angelic creature, whose beauty, like loadstone, held him with more than iron bonds. He felt instantly as though seeds of fiery silver had been scattered in his bosom and his blood flew like lightning to the uttermost vein of his body. He found occasion for addressing her, and her engaging manner at once set the seal of adoration on his heart. Her father however was averse to the union; Lewis was a stranger, he knew not whence, and the old gentleman's fastidious notions of birth were so violent as to obscure the young stranger's merits, and cause him to set his face entirely against any connexion whatever. He had even gone so far as to deny to him the common courtesies of society, and endeavoured to prevent their meeting. It is strange, however, how such old churls do but throw sand against the wind to return into their own eyes, when they endeavour to extinguish the unquenchable flame of love. Like any other principle it does but increase from opposition; it laughs at authority; it changes shapes and hues; it may be in the storm, and the earthquake, but the same sun that lit the seas, and threw its colouring to their lonely depths and untrodden halls, before the storm, will still be there when the storm is done. It may by circumstances be stopped, but it does, like the earnest flowing river, only gather strength for a greater flow, and one that shall sweep resistance before it, as clouds before a northern blast. Seldom is it so far delayed as to forget its wonted channels, nor shall the bed thereof become dry and parched, before again the rush of the torrent is heard, and the pleasant murmuring waves again come along to kiss the pebbles, and glad the leaning grass, and embrace the meek lily that stoopeth over their banks.

And so it was in the present case. It needed but few words on the part of Lewis, to convince the amiable and wronged girl, that when parental authority looks not to the happiness of the object of its exercise, it is no longer to be heeded.

It was an afternoon in August, and still and beautiful the bounty of the sun slept upon the earth and sea, and a sweet purple haze hung round the horizon. I was travelling in one of the Atlantic States, by the shore of the ocean, and looking forth where the green waves seemed almost blazing in the earnestness of the sun; and I sat down on a mossy rock to look abroad over its surface, and the grandeur and summer beauty that was visible all over that eternity of rivers. I had been but a few moments in my cogitations, when the sound of a laughing voice fell on my ear, and in a few moments there passed before me two beings whose presence almost persuaded me that I was under the influence of a dream. They however noticed me, and prevailed upon me to accompany them to their residence. It was a sweet retirement, for the summer season, from the turmoils of the city, overgrown with vines and flowers through which the sunlight struggled fitfully, as their foldings were parted by the playful breezes, that came laden with the purity of the sea, to wanton in the home of happiness. I knew them—they were married—and their kind and affectionate deportment told me also that they were happy. They played Grotto Green that very night in which I and my readers left them talking in the moonshiny woods, and the old man, after a suitable season of obstinacy, admitted them to his affection.

MORAL—Let parents beware of obstinacy in the love-affairs of their children.

MISCELLANY.

From the Boston Bulletin.

JOSEPH BONAPARTE.

A long communication has been published in the Courier des Etats Unis, and translated for the National Gazette, purporting to be a defence of Joseph Bonaparte, Count de Survilliers, against the attacks of M. de Norvins, contained in his history of the Emperor Napoleon. As we infer from the defence, M. de Norvins charges the Emperor with impolicy in placing Joseph to be king of Spain; and he charges Joseph with weakness, which caused the loss of that country to France, and the loss of Paris to the allies. To these points the defence is principally directed; and, being written by a person who received the statements mostly from the mouth of Joseph, the whole of which was subsequently revised by him, it bears an interest and authority that must commend it to a careful perusal. We can give only a meagre abstract.

It is asserted, that Joseph received the crown of Spain, through the urgent entreaties of the royal family of Spain. The dissensions in that family, which affected the whole nation, were so irreconcilable, that it was out of the power of Napoleon to replace Charles, who with the Queen had resolved not to return to Spain unaccompanied by Manuel. Every member of the contending party, desired that Joseph should ascend the throne; and it was confidently asserted, and believed, by the most intelligent noblemen of the kingdom, that the several parties of Charles, Ferdinand, and Manuel, could be induced to suspend hostilities, only by the ascension of a foreign lord. The partisans of both father and son, the representatives of the Junta of Bayonne, and the most important Spanish classes, had particular communications with Joseph, and urged an immediate entry into Spain. Under these circumstances no other course seemed left for the Bonapartes, than to concur with the strongly expressed wishes of the royal family and the people.

In reply to the general charge of weakness, and the assertion that "Joseph was the occasion of the loss of Spain," it is stated, that on many occasions he evinced great personal bravery and coolness, especially in visiting every part of the kingdom of Naples, at a time when it was infested by hords of assassins, and with only an inconsiderable escort; and that if he commanded unsuccessfully at Vittoria, historical justice should have induced M. de Norvins to state, that he conquered Andalusia, and triumphed at Talavera, at Almonacid, and Ocana. Spain was lost by circumstances over which Joseph had no controul. The French army was divided, and the different departments did not co-operate; it was not placed under the supreme command of Joseph until it was too late; the letters of Joseph were intercepted and his partisans discouraged; the English government inflamed the jealousy of the Spaniards; and the unfortunate surrender of several important places, by occasioning the concentration of the troops upon Madrid, gave advantage to the enemy. At this crisis the army of Spain was weakened by the withdrawal of the troops and best officers for the expedition to Russia; and in consequence, the partisans of Joseph lost their confidence and either opposed him or remained neuter.

In 1814, he differed with Napoleon on the expediency of removing the Empress and her son from Paris; he also, recommended, that peace should be obtained at any rate, and expressed an opinion in favour of the ancient limits of France; but many of the Emperor's former courtiers had deserted his cause, and it was found impossible to gain even so much in favour of the Imperial family, as to have Napoleon second proclaimed, and the Empress appointed to the regency; and he was obliged to obey the strict injunctions of his brother, to remove them from Paris. The letter conveying these commands was read to the council of twenty-two, convoked by the Empress and obedience was indispensable. Defections in various parts of France, prevented the Emperor from joining his family, as had been intended; and peace being demanded at all hazards, the abdication alone could satisfy the domestick as well as the foreign enemies of Napoleon.

M. de Norvins affirms, that Paris might have been defended; and if we do not misrecollect, Scott asserts the same thing; but it is contradicted by this writer, and letters are given, communicated between Napoleon and Joseph, to confirm the statement, that the only hope of the Emperor was in attacking the rear of the allied army, and cutting off their line of communication. The most implicit confidence seems to have existed between the brothers, and the defence with the letters appended are extremely interesting.

The National Gazette gives information that Joseph is about to publish Memoirs, concerning the affairs in which he was concerned, from documents in his possession. We shall eagerly anticipate such a work, not merely from the authority it must have, but from the high standing and exceedingly good character of this, now, American citizen.

From the London New Monthly Magazine.

A BACHELOR'S JOYS.

In the cathedral city, where I visited a friend some years since, there were forty-five single women, from sixteen to fifty, and only three marriageable men. Let any one imagine the delight of receiving the most flattering attentions from fifteen women at once, some of them extremely pretty and agreeable; or, I should rather say, from forty-five, since the three bachelors, politically avoiding all appearance of preference, were courted equally by nearly the whole phalanx of the sisterhood. One of the enviable men, being only just of age, was indeed too young to excite hopes in the more elderly ladies, but another more fortunate, if he knew his happiness, ("sua si bona norit,") was exposed to the attacks, more or less open, of every unmarried woman. Alas! he was insensible to his privileges; a steady man of fifty-five, a dignitary of the church, devoted to study and shy in his habits, he seemed to shrink from the kind attentions he received, and to wish for a less favoured, a less glorious state of existence. His desires seemed limited to reading the Fathers, writing sermons, and doing his duty as a divine; and he appeared of opinion that no helpmate was required to fulfil them. But still the indefatigable phalanx of forty-five, with three or four widows as auxiliaries, continued their attacks; and his age, as I before observed, was fatally encouraging to the hopes of each.

The youngest looked in their glasses and remembered the power of youth, and beauty; the middle aged calculated on the good sense and propriety of character of their object, and were "sure he would never marry a girl;" and the most elderly exaggerated his gravity, thought of his shovel hat, and seemed to suppose that every woman under fifty must be too giddy for its wearer. Meanwhile what a life he led!—his opinions law; his wishes gospel; the cathedral crowded when he preached; churches attended; schools visited; waltzing calumniated; novels concealed; shoulders covered; petticoats lengthened—all to gain his approving eye. The fact is, his sphere of useful influence was much enlarged by his single state: as a married man, he could only have reformed his wife; as a bachelor, he exercised undisputed power over every spinster in his neighbourhood. He was, indeed, unconscious of, or ungratified by the deference and incense he received; but the generality of men are less insensible, and half the homage he so carefully rejected would have been sufficient to intoxicate with delight and self-complacency the greater part of his fraternity. What object in nature is more pitiable than a London old bachelor of moderate fortune and moderate parts, whose conversational powers do not secure him invitations to dinners, when stiffness of limb and a growing formality have obliged him to retreat from quadrilles. The rich, we know, thrive every where and at all seasons, safe from neglect, secure from ridicule.

I speak of those less strongly fortified against the effects of time; those who, scarcely considered good speculations in their best days, are now utterly insignificant, concealed and jostled by a crowd of younger aspirants; overlooked by mamas except when needed to execute some troublesome commission; and without a chance of receiving a word or glance from their daughters unmarked by that provoking ease and compassionate familiarity, which tell them, better than words, that their day of influence has closed for ever. Let such unhappy men fly from the scenes of former pleasures and power, of former flirtation and gaiety, to the quieter and surer triumphs of a country-town. Here crowds of young women, as certainly devoted to celibacy as the inmates of a nunnery, accustomed from necessity to make beaux out of the most unprecedented materials, and ocncoct flirtations in the most discouraging circumstances, will welcome him with open arms, under-rate his age, over-rate his merits, doubt if his hair is grey, deny that he wears false teeth, accept his proffered arm with an air of triumph, and even hint a wonder that he has given up dancing. To their innocent cheeks his glance will have the long-lost power of calling up a blush; eyes as bright as those which beamed upon his youth will sparkle at his approach; and tender hearts, excluded by fate from palpitations for a more suitable object, must per force beat quicker at his address. Here let him revel in the enjoyment of unbounded influence, preserve it by careful management to the latest possible moment, and at length gradually slide from the agreeable old beau into the interesting invalid, and secure for his days of gout, infirmity, and sickness, a host of attentive nurses, of that amiable sex which delights and excels in offices of pity and kindness; who will read him news, recount him gossip, play back-gammon or cribbage, knit him comfortable, make him jellies, and repay, by affectionate solicitude and unselfish attentions, the unmeaning, heartless, worthless admiration which he bestowed upon them in his better days.

From the London Quarterly Journal.

SLEEP.

A question has been raised how much sleep is required, and how long it is necessary to be in bed, for the purpose of rest and refreshment. Eight hours have been allotted for the labourer, and six for the scholar and gentleman. Very few gentlemen, however, are satisfied with this scale; and a capacity for sleeping makes the greater part of the community inclined to double the period. The capacity for sleeping, like the capacity for eating and drinking, is to be increased by indulgence. Much depends upon habit. Some people can sleep when they will, and wake when they will; and are as much refreshed with a short nap as a long one.—Sea-faring people have this property from education. I have known persons who never indulged in a second sleep. One gentleman, who entertained a notion that a second nap was injurious, invariably got up as soon as he awoke, no matter how early the hour—winter or summer. Others again will sleep for four and twenty hours. The celebrated Quin had this faculty. "What sort of a morning is it, John?" "Very wet, Sir," "Any mullet in the market?" "No, Sir," "Then, John, you may call me this time to-morrow." So saying, he composed himself to sleep, and got rid of the ennui of a dull day in the arms of Morpheus. One gentleman, in the Spectator, used to sleep by weight. "I allow myself, one night with another, a quarter of a pound of sleep, within a few grains more or less; and if upon my rising I find I have not consumed my whole quantity, I take out the rest in my chair." A lazy old woman used to apologize for lying in bed by saying that "she lay in bed to contrive." Strange as this old woman's excuse was, an example followed by one of the most extraordinary geniuses of this country, viz. Brindley, of whom it is recorded, that when any great difficulty occurred in the execution of his works, having little or no assistance from books, of the labours of other men, his resources lay with in himself. In order, therefore, to be quiet, and uninterrupted whilst he was in search of the necessary expedients, he generally retired to his bed; and he has been known to lie there one, two, or three days, till he had obtained the object in view. He would then get up and execute his design without any drawing or model. There are different kinds of sleepers, as well as different kinds of sleep; some cannot sleep from home—others cannot sleep at home; some can sleep on a board, and snore on a carpet; while others tumble and toss on a soft bed, as if the down disconcerted them. Some again cannot sleep in a noise; others cannot sleep out of it. A miller awakens the moment his mill stops; and a tradesman from Cheapside cannot sleep in the country, because "it is so plaguy quiet." Somnambulists, or sleep-walkers, usually sleep with their eyes open, but without vision. Shakspeare, who may be considered a very good medical authority, makes Lady Macbeth a somnambulist with her eyes open—"but their sense is shut." This is not always the case, however, and there is a singular exception, in the instance of Johannes Oporinus, a printer, who being employed one night in correcting the copy of a Greek book, fell asleep as he read, and yet ceased not to read, till he had finished not less than a whole page, of which, when he awoke, he retained no recollection. There are many curious histories of sleeping prodigies on record. The Philosophical Transactions have several; in one, a man slept from August till January. There is a case, read before a Society of Physicians in 1756, of Elizabeth Orvin, who began her sleeping in 1738, by a four days' nap, and for ten years afterwards never slept less than 17 hours out of the four-and-twenty. Dr. Brady relates, that some strange methods were resorted to, to rouse her—such as rubbing her back with honey, and in a hot day exposing her to a hive of bees, till her back was full of bumps—making pincushion of her, and performing acute-puncturation, with pins and needles—flagellation, and "other odd experiments," which the Doctor informs us he thinks better "to pass over in silence," all of which might as well have been spared, for she was very sulky and good for nothing when she was awake. This sulkiness however, should be noticed, as being connected with the complaint. Previously to this somnolent disease, many of the persons have become uneasy, sullen, and surly. In all, the mind has evidently been affected; and in some, where there has been extreme abstinence, their waking hours have been characterised by decided mental aberration.

From the New-England Galaxy.

DEATH AND THE DOCTORS.

Men are foolish animals enough in all conscience; but in nothing is their folly so apparent and unpardonable, as in yielding to disease. Every malady that has turned flesh to clay since men first died, may be deliberately kicked out of doors in this age of nostrums, by the help of any one of at least twenty specifics,—each of which is perfect and absolute, rendering all the rest unnecessary. A while ago we read among the certificates appended to the advertisement of some medicine, one which ran as follows:—"I Timothy Break-tobits, certify that last June as I was travelling on the Newburyport turnpike, I was thrown from my horse into a ditch, and was so completely mashed up, that after strict examination, I found I had but one bone in my body more than an inch long, and that was sticking into my right eye. While in this afflicted condition, my friend, Toby Whistlefort, esq. happened to come along, and taking hold of my nose, to pull me thereby into the road, I found myself at once able to stand! Mr. Whistlefort had that morning lifted from a table with the same thumb and finger, a vial of the inestimable "Chemical and Hydrostatick Concentration of Hornbugs;" and such were the virtues of this invaluable medicine, that my bones immediately resumed their places, the soreness in my flesh left me, and I reached home in good season rather better than I had been for some years." At the time, and since until lately, we thought all this a mere joke! But it must have been true; we only wonder it was not verified by an oath administered by Justice Whistlefort. The last Nantucket Enquirer convinces us. We saw in that paper,—and doubtless might have seen in a hundred others—an advertisement of “him of the Panacea,” setting forth his dealings with a Mrs. Blank; (the advertisement gives the name though we do not.) At eight years old or there away, she began to swell and suppurate about the head, neck &c. and keeping on without stay or stint, in a dozen or fifteen years she became a mere sore;—there was no such thing as finding features, palate, &c. this side of the “receptacle of things lost on earth.” Mr. Adams was not at hand to tell her where that was, and she seemed in a hopeless condition. Lips, tongues &c. mere ulcers, nose boneless and flat, but little voice left, and unable to smell or taste,—having in fact no better organs for these functions than the shoulder-blades, and they seemed to have received “notice to quit”—what could be expected or desired for the little left to such a person, but that it should make haste to go where the rest had gone. But no. The Panacea took hold of her; she was not all dead, and more this wonder of wonders considered quite superfluous; and in eight weeks she returned home in perfect health! Who will henceforth undertake to put bounds to the power of medicine or to human gullibility. If any man hereafter dies till he has seen his descendants of the twentieth generation, let him be buried where four roads meet, with a great stake through his body, as one who has departed this life for no better reason than because he had a mind to.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, APRIL 4, 1829.

TO LET—The rooms now occupied by us as a printing office. Inquire at this office, or of J. F. Porter, in the basement story of the building.

The office of the Masonick Record will be removed to No. 3 Beaver-street, on the first of May.

Those of our subscribers who intend to change their places of residence on the first proximo will please to inform the carrier or leave notice at this office, in order that they may be regularly served with their papers.

In the National Observer of March 18, there appeared an article of nearly three columns length, purporting to be a renunciation of masonry by one Henry F. Yates, of Montgomery county. As we were acquainted with the personal character of this Mr. Yates, we took no notice of his renunciation when it was published, and we should not now intrude it upon the attention of our readers, had not one of its falsehoods been extensively copied into the anti-masonick prints. Mr. Yates says,

“No honest and conscientious mason, who attended the Grand Lodge in 1827, in the city of New-York, can and dare deny the fact, on his corporal oath, that the Grand Lodge did vote and pay to Eli Bruce (one of the conspirators and connivers at the abduction of Morgan) $250, to indemnify him, in part, for his losses and removal by Gov. Clinton, from his office as sheriff of the county of Niagara. This assertion I do not make on slight grounds, and as the offer has been made, from another quarter, I repeat it, and challenge the Grand Lodge to place this question in a tangible shape, by authorizing their Grand Master, Secretary, or any other of their officers, to agree to a feigned issue in the supreme court, and the fact will be proven to their shame, and to the satisfaction of a court and jury.”

Now the Grand Lodge of this state meets but once a year, and that meeting takes place always in June. The G. L. met in June, 1827; Mr. Bruce was not removed from office till in October following, nearly four months after the adjournment of the Grand Lodge. How a man's losses could be valued and paid for before they were even dreamt of, it remains with the sagacity of Mr. Yates to explain. The flourishing challenge offered to the Grand Lodge wears as serious an aspect as it would if sent by colonel Pluck to the President: it is not possible for men to be further removed from each other, then is the Grand Lodge from such fortuitous beings as this Henry F. Yates.

We shall not indulge in needless personalities towards Mr. Yates; but, since he has attempted to make a display of responsibility, it may be beneficial to justice to state, that in addition to other difficulties with the law, while attendant here on the anti-masonick state convention, he was sued by a baker for a debt of eleven dollars, committed to jail, and bailed to the limits by Daniel Shields, after Solomon Southwick, as we have been credibly informed, had been solicited and refused to be such bail. The debt was finally paid by a member of assembly from Montgomery county, who will probably lose the amount, but may ultimately be the gainer by so doing, by getting rid of Yates' importunities here. At home, Yates is without influence, either as a citizen or a politician; the reader can judge what credence should be given to his statements abroad.

GULL TRAPS. There never was a more disgraceful system of speculation invented than is now carried on in one way and another by means of anti-masonry. Turn which way you will, wherever you see half a dozen anti-masons you will find five of them at least resorting to every stratagem to pick the pockets of the multitude. The love of novelty which is inherent in human nature assists them in their unhallooed proceedings, and there are now within our observation men who are reaping enormous rewards for their perseverance in a regular course of villany. Among others, there is an itinerant fellow in and about Boston, by the name of Jacob Allen, who is getting a better salary than the president of the United States, by retailing what he calls the secrets of masonry. He charges twenty-five cents a head, and we are informed by a Boston anti-masonick paper that his last display in that city was attended by five hundred persons! consequently Allen must have received one hundred and twenty-five dollars as the reward of his villany for one night only! Allen is one of those who are continually preaching up the danger of “religion” and boasting of their own superiour patriotism. It is the custom of the antis to drum up an audience for him wherever he goes, and by their help he is enabled thus shamefully to impose upon the multitude. Will not such evils work their own cure? The intelligence of the people has been greatly overrated if it will suffer such barefaced knavery to exist for any length of time. From the following extract it appears that the authorities of Boston have thought the subject worthy of their notice.

“It seems that Mr. Allen, the new mason-maker, has been to work without license; and on Saturday he was served with a notice, that before he again heats his gridiron, he must obtain leave of the proper city authorities.” [Boston Traveller.

“Religion and law are in danger!” says Mr. Allen, “but I will go to work without license, and if I shall be molested by the city authorities, I will raise a hue and cry about Morgan, masonick persecution, and poor Isaac Murphy! And that will be enough to sanctify the Devil!”

FROM EUROPE. London and Liverpool papers to the 7th of February, have been received at Baltimore. They contain nothing of importance respecting the Russians and Turks. Parliament was opened on the 15th February. The king being unable to attend in person, the speech was read by the lord chancellor. The ministry have at last resolved to attempt a settlement of the Catholic question. In reply to some inquiries of the duke of Newcastle, in the house of lords on the 5th February, the duke of Wellington stated, that it was the intention of his majesty's government to “present to parliament, in the course of the present session, a measure for the adjustment of what is called the Roman Catholic question. That measure would tend to the removal generally of all the disabilities under which the Roman Catholics laboured, with the exception solely of that which rested on special grounds: it would be accompanied also by other measures, rendered necessary by the removal of those disabilities.”

An opinion is entertained by some, that Portugal will eventually be invaded by England, with a view to dethrone Don Miguel and restore tranquillity.

The following letter gives a further explanation of the “abduction” of Murphy—we take it from the Rochester Craftsman. The author is a gentleman of the first respectability, and his statements are corroborated by information received from other sources. Really, the purity of anti-masonry is of an odd character.

Pittsburgh, March 16th, 1829.

E. J. Roberts, esq., Dear Sir—I observe an article going the rounds of the Anti-Masonick prints, respecting the absence of one Isaac Murphy, esq. from this city, and intimating that such absence was owing to the vengeance of the Masonick Fraternity. Permit me, sir, to inform you that the said Murphy DECAPPED from this place some three months since, in order, it is confidently believed, to avoid the payment of his debts, and to keep clear of the law's penalties justly incurred by one of the most audacious swindling transactions, on record. He left the place after having swindled the former editor of the Commonwealth out of his establishment, and entrapped one or two of our citizens out of a considerable sum of money in cash and in the way of security, and leaving unsatisfied claims against him to the amount of $1200 and upwards. It is known also that Murphy had just received on behalf of a distant client, per order of court, the sum of 800 dollars of theseabouts, which it is believed he has appropriated to his own use, together with a considerable sum more, that he had borrowed for the ostensible purpose of purchasing the Commonwealth, having succeeded in purchasing that paper chiefly on credit. The fellow must have had at least $1000 in his pocket, when he decamped—a sum probably greater than he ever had previously in possession. This taken into consideration with his heavy debts—his want of professional business—his want of even ordinary talents or attainments—his want of friends here to assist him, and still more—his want of honourable or virtuous principles, (for he was avowedly an infidel) will give you a better idea of the cause of his sudden disappearance than that, urged for effect by the Anti-Masonicks! It is unnecessary to repeat all the arts practised by Murphy to raise money—but the conclusion here is universal that he is an arrant consummate knave and swindler.

Instead of any excitement on the subject of his absence, as is gravely stated in the Cha utauque Phoenix, I have not heard any thing about him for several weeks. No one here believes for an instant, nor ever believed that he was “Morganized” as they are pleased to call it. The idea is superlly ridiculous—Moreover no one knew of his intention to print an Anti-masonick paper. Such an intention not being avowed in his editorial address, and if known, the imbecility of Murphy's character was the best guarantee in the world that he was in no personal danger from any one.

The steamboat Commerce arrived at this city from New-York, yesterday—affording the demonstration that the river is again navigable.

SUMMARY.

DOMESTICK.

Potatoes in Arkansas. We have the authority of a highly respectable correspondent at Cantonment Gibson, for stating, that the United States troops, stationed at that post, have, during the past season, from the cultivation of four and a half acres of ground, gathered eighteen hundred bushels of Irish potatoes—some of which weighed one and a half pounds. [Arkansas Gasr

It is reported that President Jackson will start early in April on an eastern tour.

Mr. Taylor, the contractor to carry the mail between Montgomery and Blakeley, Alabama, finding the rivers impassable for stages, fixed the mail bags upon his shoulders, and swam all the streams from Fort Dale to Rives.

The Washington Telegraph contains the Treaty of Peace, Friendship, Commerce and Navigation, between the United States and Brazil, the ratifications of which were exchanged at Washington on the 18th ult.

A western paper proposes an exchange of lands between the United States and the Mexican government, giving all our territory from the top of the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific Ocean, for that delightful region of country lying between our southwest boundary and the Rio del Norte. This writer supposes that the Oregon will be too distant to compose a part of the Federal Union, while the rich coast lying on the Gulf of Mexico would be quite convenient.

The southern papers mention that general Jackson has been confined to his room for several days past, and that Mr. Monroe, ex-president who has been confined by fever, is convalescent.

The senate of Massachusetts lately amended a bill sent from the house of representatives, by striking out the word larcenary and inserting larceny. The other house agreed to the amendment.

Messrs. Gales & Seaton offer for sale their extensive printing establishment in Washington, except so much of it as will be necessary to publish the National Intelligencer; being deprived of the Congressional printing, they have no further use for it.

An Extraordinary Circumstance.—The New-Orleans Advertiser of Feb. 28 says four months ago, a child two years of age swallowed a needle 21-2 inches long. Yesterday morning the needle was taken out of the right side, just above the hip, where it had forced its way, and was considerably corroded. The child has, for the last three months, taken medicine for the dropsy, her body being much swelled.

The Canadian Giant.—A man is advertised as a curiosity in one the Montreal papers, who is stated to be 6 feet 41-2 inches high, 6 feet 10 inches round the waist, 40 inches round the calf of the leg, and 3 feet 10 round the thigh.—He is 63 years of age, and weighs upwards of 600 lbs. He is to remain only a few days in Montreal on his way to the United States, and thence to Europe.

A REVEREND CONSTABLE.—The Reverend Charles G. Finney, of Reading, Pa. has been elected Constable of that town. He has been for some months zealously engaged in reforming the manners, morals and religion of his people; and they gave him a secular office, by way of experiment, being curious to know, how the word and the precept, the gown and the staff, would work together.

Another Abduction. On Saturday, at Beck's wharf, Philadelphia, a well grown Pig, with a sweet tooth, was feasting on the sugar that had drained from some hogheads. Being rudely driven away, in his hurry to escape, he fell into the river. The owner of a passing boat determined to go the whole hog, grabbed him at once, and bore him away as a lawful prize, despite of the outcries of his owner, and the bye-standers.

The Brewers of Providence (R. I.) are working themselves into quite a foam, and giving vent to immoderate quantities of froth. One firm declares it can produce the best beer, and challenges all others, in a wager of fifty dollars, to make the trial. Another house replies that the wager is insignificant, not worth contending for; and that, owing to numerous orders, it has no time to waste in sporting.

A subscriber of the Kentucky Gazette has written an account of an extraordinary being that appeared in Nicholasville, Kentucky, on the night of the 22d ult. It was in the shape of a man, sixteen feet high. It is probably a traveller from the Ouquaphenoga Swamp, who laid himself down to take a nap in a limestone cave some thousand years since. He has awakened refreshed, and is now prosecuting his journey.

FOREIGN.

India. A law has been made in Canton, condemning those who open shops to sell opium, to death by strangling. Those who are caught smoking, to be exposed two months with wooden collars about their necks, after which they are to be sent to the territories, and given to the soldiers as slaves.

Liberia. By the arrival of the U. States' ship, Shark, at Pensacola, letters are received confirming the death of the Rev. Lot Carey. Prince Abdul Rahman's letter had been received and translated, with the assistance of a Mahometan priest. The Prince and his family have since embarked at Norfolk for their native land; and have probably arrived there by this time.

Mexico. A letter dated at Vera Cruz, on the 16th Feb. says: "We take the opportunity of informing you that this morning's mail brings us the very pleasing news from the interior, (Puebla and Mexico,) that all is perfectly tranquil. Confidence is fast reviving, and business is once more beginning to resume its wonted activity, and our correspondents write us that all sorts of goods are getting very scarce."

A gentleman from Mexico says that one of the first acts of Guerrero's administration was the solemn acknowledgment of the services rendered to the republic by Commodore Porter, who, with his characteristic promptitude and energy, had greatly contributed to the restoration of good order in the city of Vera Cruz.

Colombia.—The Governor of Porto Cabello, on the 1st of March, published the following:—"News has arrived that the inhabitants of Peru have declared themselves unfavourable to the war with Colombia, and in favour of the Liberator, in consequence of which, the march of the Colombian troops towards Peru has been countermanded. It is also said, that part of the officers and soldiers are shortly to receive their discharge, and that there will be no more drafts from the militia. It is not known whether Bolivar intends going to Peru or not. General Padilla has been shot. By a private letter, it was understood that some of the Colombian officers engaged in the affair at Augustura are to be forthwith sent to Caracas." "The police are very watchful—no person can go or come from the city without a passport; and if any householder receives in his house any person, without giving immediate notice thereof to the police, he is fined fifty dollars."

The British have raised the blockade of Tangiers; the only injury done was probably in preventing our old and excellent friend, Consul Mullany, from shooting snipe along shore in the bay. Besieging Tangiers to bring the government of Morocco to their good behaviour, would be like blockading Amboy Bay to bring the authorities at Albany to their bearings—rather a long shot. Tangiers is a miserable, decayed place; fine as a place of residence, being in a cheap and plentiful country; its situation, in view of Gibraltar and Cape Trafalgar, makes it rather desirable as a place to visit, and there is always a plenty of game to be had. To the antiquarian, it is a place of great interest. Riquing, a Mo-viscous historian of the twelfth century, says, that in his time there was a pillar in Tangiers containing the following inscription: "We are the Canaanites who fled from Joshua the son of Nun, that notorious robber." A colony of those people no doubt came down the Mediterranean to that place.

[N. Y. Eng.

From the New-York Journal of Commerce.

BURNING OF YORK MINSTER.—We are indebted to an English gentleman now in this city, for the following description of the York Minster, and its almost total destruction by fire on the 2nd of February:

"This stupendous pile, the magnificent remains of past ages, and one of the most splendid architectural structures in Europe, is now little better than a heap of ruins. It was accidentally discovered to be on fire about seven in the morning, by a chorister who was passing the spacious yard, and on his giving the alarm, the massive doors were thrown open, and the whole cathedral was seen filled with smoke. In the south side of the choir, is a low range of rooms formerly used as oratories, but now occupied as vestries. In one of these the fire had originated, and as the opening of the doors admitted a strong current of air, the flames were communicated to the richly carved case of the organ, and before the engines had arrived, this invaluable portion of the cathedral was entirely destroyed, and its vaulted roof enveloped in flames. However, by the prompt and indefatigable exertions of the populace, the engines were successfully brought to bear upon the devastating element, and by nine o'clock its progress was arrested. At one time the flames burst through the roof near the dome, and were to be seen rearing their awful crest high above the noble edifice, and threatening it with complete destruction. The numerous assemblage who had gained admittance to the yard, gazed upon the scene with an intensity of interest that it is impossible to describe: and the multitude of spectators in the streets, though unable to take an active part, continually cheered those whose exertions had nearly exhausted them. The West and East windows were objects of marked attention. The latter exceeds in dimensions any Gothic window in the world; and for beauty, originality of design, and excellence of colouring stands equally univalled. A strong glare of light was continually falling upon the richly stained glass, and revealed its transparent beauties in more than their wonted attraction.

"The Screen, of which you have often heard, as being of elaborate tabernacle workmanship, decorated with pediments, niches, pinnacles and canopies, and containing the mutilated statues of, I believe, fifteen of the English monarchs, was happily preserved. But the organ, so celebrated in the annals of music, being surpassed in compass and richness of tone only by the one in Harlem, but superior even to that in architectural beauty and mechanical contrivance, was entirely consumed. The famous silver pastoral staff, the gorgeous chalice, massive candelabras, the Verger's insignia, Sub-sacrist's silver chain and keys, together with the whole of the communion plate, were also destroyed. The celebrated chair, so valuable from its having been the throne of several of their Saxon Majesties, which stood within the pale of the altar, was at one time ignited, and those parts which escaped the fire, decayed as they were by age, fell to pieces beneath the pressure of the crowd or the ruthless grasp of the firemen. The damage occasioned to the edifice is estimated at £70,000 to £80,000; and should it prove that the antique horn has been burnt, the greater part of the handed revenues will be entirely lost to the Minster. You will doubtless remember that this is the third instance on record, of the York Cathedral having been burnt. If my memory does not deceive me, so far back as 1069, when the Norman garrison was attacked by the Danes and Northumbrians, the cathedral, with a portion of the town, was reduced to ashes. It was however rebuilt by a rich Norman named Thomas, and in 1157 again fell a prey to the flames, with the Abbey of St. Mary and thirty-nine parish churches. At the end of 150 years it was again rebuilt, and the different periods when it was raised can easily be traced, from the alterations in the style of architecture.

The length of the building from East to West, was 527 1-2 feet; its breadth at the East end 105 feet, and at the West 109. The height of the principal tower was 213 feet, of the two western towers 196. of the body of the edifice 99.—The first information we have of the city being an ecclesiastical establishment is, I think, so far back as 814: and the first bishop, invested by pope Honorius, was Paulinus, who, if I mistake not, figures in history as having converted the queen of Edwin, King of Northumbria, to Christianity. In 1514 the butcher's son arose to the metropolitan dignity, and was installed as arch-bishop of York.

* This window was executed about 1405, at the sole expense of the dean and chapter, and the glass was stained by one John Thornton, who undertook to finish it in three years, at four shillings per week. † There is an antique horn, at least so it is generally termed, though it is believed to have been manufactured from an elephant's tooth. By the possession of this curiosity, the Cathedral holds tracts of lands of immense value, which were granted to the minster by Ulphus, a Saxon prince of Deira.

WHAT NEXT? Some of the anti-masonick presses recommend the establishment of a National Anti-Masonick Tract Society. It cannot longer be denied but what certain leaders of the anti-masonick party are endeavouring to connect the two questions of religion and anti-masonry! How far they will admit of a union any one can easily determine who will take the trouble to examine them separately. One is full of mercy, charity, goodness and universal love to all mankind. The other is full of pride, vindictiveness and hatred. How far such a union will redound to the interests and glory of religion perhaps such men as John Hascall and David C. Miller, can easily foretell. They probably imagine that by connecting the two questions they may be enabled to bring religion into disrepute, and exalt themselves upon the ruin of its altar. [Batavia Times.

A good anecdote is in circulation in this county, which comes pretty well authenticated from Albany. A gentleman in that city met a boy in the street, with a bundle of pamphlets on his arm, crying, "Hazeltime's Speech on the Morgan affair!" The gentleman, curious to know what could come, in the shape of a speech, from such a source, gave the boy a shilling and took one. The boy went on, reiterating his cry, and the gentleman opening his pamphlet, found nothing but a few white leaves. "Here, boy! here's a mistake; this is all blank!" "No mistake at all, sir," replied the boy—"they are all so!" Those acquainted with our assemblyman, cannot fail of seeing the palpable hit.

[Fredonia Censor.

One Lauren Dewy, sometimes publisher of a paper, sometimes schoolmaster in the back towns of this county, sometimes a journeyman printer, is now we perceive exclusively employed as editor of an anti-masonick paper at Union Village, in this state. One of his brightest ideas in his editorial debut is, that "he will oppose the existence of any sect or denomination whose object and design may prove to be the acquisition of political power." Such an editor ought to have a pair of leather spectacles, that he might see the designs of the party whose cause he has espoused.

[Ibid.

The Wayne Sentinel, has renounced anti-masonry, as practiced by the leaders of that party at the present time. The article is well written and deserves a candid perusal.

The Buffalo Republican has also denounced political anti-masonry, and taken a bold and decided stand against the machinations of its corrupt leaders.

The Brockport Recorder has announced its intention of pursuing the same course. Independent presses are multiplying every day.

[Times.

The town of Sheldon, in this county, has elected the liberal ticket throughout, for town officers—the supervisor being a mason. The whole ticket was carried by four to one.

[Ibid.

The editor of the Cleveland News-Letter took one pill of anti-masonry, which appears to have completely satisfied him, and he now seems disposed to throw such 'physick to the dogs.'

[Censor.

¶ The Western Monthly Review, is published in Cincinnati, Ohio, at the close of every month: Each number will contain 56 octavo pages—making annually a volume of 672 pages.

Contents of No. 9:—Impediments of American Literature, Good Society, The Pilgrims, The Greek Revolution, Irving's Orations, Culture of Silk, Changes in Matter, and their Causes. Notices of Periodicals—Mrs. Hale's Ladies' Magazine, The Transylvanian, Sabbath School Visitant, Christian Examiner, Unitarian Advocate, Journal of Education.

Gentlemen disposed to patronize this work, are requested to enclose $3 to the publisher, when the numbers will be regularly forwarded according to the directions given.

ALBANY BRUSH TRUNK AND BANDBOX MANUFACTORY.—NORRIS TARBELL, No. 453 South Market-street, (opposite the Connecticut Coffee-house,) keeps constantly on hand, and for sale, the above named articles, at low prices. Those who wish to purchase, will please to call and examine for themselves. Cash paid for clean combed Hogs' Bristles. Albany, March 4, 1839.

FRANKLIN LETTER FOUNDRY. The proprietors of this Foundry, offer on liberal terms, the following articles, viz:—Roman and Italic. Fourteen, Twelve, Ten, Eight, Seven, Six, Five, and Four Lines Pica, plain, Canon, Meridian, Double Great Primer, Double English, Double Small Pica, Great Primer, English, Pica, Small Pica, Long Primer, Bourgeois, Brevier, Minion, Nonpareil, Pearl.

Two Line Letter. Minion, and all larger, Nonpareil, Pearl. Full Face. English and Pica, Small Pica, Long Primer, Bourgeois, Brevier, Minion.

Borders and Flowers of every kind. Antiques. Ten and Six Lines, Four Lines Pica, Double Great Primer, English and Pica, Long Primer, Brevier, Minion, Nonpareil.

Blacks. Four Lines Pica, Double Great Primer, Double Small Pica, Great Primer, English and Pica, Small Pica, Long Primer.

Open Blacks. Great Primer, Double Great Primer, and Four Lines Pica. Italians. Seven Lines Pica, Five Lines Pica.

Tuscan. Eight Lines Pica, Four Lines Pica. Shaded Letter. Eight Lines Pica, Four Lines Pica, Double Great Primer, Two Lines Brevier, Two Lines Nonpareil, Eight Lines Pica, Ornamented, Six Lines Pica, Ornamented.

Leads. Six to pica and thicker, Seven to pica, Eight to pica. Quotations: Space Rules, from one to eight ems, Long Primer; Astronomical, and other signs; Spanish and French Accents; Fractions; Composing Sticks from twenty to four inches in length; Cases; Chases; Slice, Brass, and common Galleys; Iron and Mahogany Furniture; Press's ink; Skins; parchment; points. Presses also furnished.

Several new founts of letter have been cut; and it has been the aim of the proprietors to combine the beauty of the modern, with the clearness and durability of the ancient style of typography, and to produce types at once handsome, legible, and useful. Specimens of these will be sent to printers. The greatest care has been taken in the composition of the metal with which all their founts of letter are cast.

All orders, either by letter or otherwise, left at their Counting Room No. 41, State-street, or at their Foundry, Eagle-street, south of State street, will receive prompt attention. A. W. KINSLEY & Co. Albany, Feb. 14, 1839.

POETRY.

For the American Masonick Record.

TO MY MUSE.

Come, long neglected muse,
Once more I crave thy aid;
And canst thou longer dare refuse,
Thou Heliconian maid,
To aid me in my deep distress,
To share my pains and make them less?

In former days I sung,
And soothed my cares awhile;
Long has my lyre remained unstrung,
Nor fortune deigned to smile;
Again I tune my rustick lays;
O soothe me as in former days!
What though the classic page
To me has been denied;
Thou canst my woes assuage,
With wholesome truths applied;
Let me not shun the rustick bower
Where Truth and Melody have power.

Not on the lists of Fame
Can I expect to shine;
No title "gilds my humble name;"
A humble rank is mine;
But when I visit thy pure cell,
Celestial maid, O please me well

Randolph, Vt.

G. G.

From the (Boston) American Manufacturer.

THE CHURCH YARD.

FROM AN UNPUBLISHED POEM.

It was a clear, calm night of June;
On mound, and wall, and ivy wreath,
Slept the pale radiance of the moon,
Like beauty in the arms of death.

It was a blessed season—such
As spirits choose for wandering forth,
When trembling to their viewless touch
The lyre of heaven is heard on earth.

The churchyard, with its solemn lines
Of pale gray stones—and crumbled wall—
Its dark green mounds—like sacred shrines,
Where weeping love might yield its all,
Bathed in the solemn moonshine, now
Seemed all unfit for earthly things,
Save as a spot for man to bow
His heart to old remembrings.
Of love that bloomed no more for him,
Of severed hearts and sundered faith—
Of all that makes our morning dim—
The harvest and the spoil of death!

There came a man—with hurried tread
He passed above the peaceful dead—
One long, stern glance around he flung,
As if he feared that man should know
The feelings of despair that wrung
His spirit in its hour of woe.
He knelt him by a mound of earth,
And clear the ghastly moonlight fell
Along the brow that shadowed forth
The anguish and the pride of hell!
'Tis ever thus when misery treads
So closely on the path of crime;
The tortured heart that inly bleeds
Bears up against the evil time.
It would not that the world should gaze
On crime and passion's burning seal—
Nor let the eye of pity trace
The anguish which it could not heal.

I knew him then—though crime had given
A wildness to his wandering eye,
And years of haunting thought had driven
The light from being's troubled sky.
A name was trembling on his lips—
The name of her who slept beneath,
And then I knew the cold eclipse
That gloomy as the pall of death,
Enwrap his soul—I knew that he Had seen her early sun go down—
That fiend-like he had joyed to see
Love tremble at his withering frown.

Contrition, mighty as the wrong,
Came o'er his haunted mind at last,
And phrenzied feelings, smothered long,
O'er heart and brain in lightning passed.

Well might he mourn—a fairer flower
Ne'er bloomed to feed the spoiler's pride,
To be the idol of an hour
Then flung—a worthless weed aside.
She died, as high souls always die—
She asked no pity—no relief;
But veiled from friendship's searching eye
The secret of her early grief.
And thus she faded—life went out,
As vanishes some gentle star
When morning's light is drawn about
The pathway of its golden car.

THE OLD SEA-PORT.

BY DELTA.

I.
When winds were wailing round me,
And Day, with closing eye,
Peeped from beneath the sullen clouds,
Of pale November's sky,—
In downcast meditation,
All silently I stood,
Gazing the wintry ocean's
Unbounded barren flood.

II.
A place more mild and lonely
Was no where to be seen;
The caverned sea-rocks beetled o'er
The billows rushing green;
There was no sound from aught around,
Save 'mid the echoing caves,
The plashing and the dashing
Of melancholy waves.

III.
High 'mid the lowering waste of sky,
The grey gulls flew in swarms;
And, far beneath, the brine upheaved
The sea-weed's tangly arms;
The face of nature in a pall
Dim shrouded seemed to be,
As silently I listened there
The dirges of the sea.

IV.
In twilight's shadowy scowling,
Not far remote there lay
An old dim smoky sea-port,
Within a sheltered bay;
Through for past generations
Its blackened piles had stood,
And, though the abode of human things,
It looked like solitude;—

V.
Of lifeless solitude it spake,
And silence, and decay;
Of old, wild times departed;
Of beings passed away;
Of lonely vessels beating up
Against the whelming breeze;
Of tempest-stricken mariners,
Upon the pathless seas.

VI.
I thought of venerable men,
Whose dust lies in their graves;
Who left that now deserted port,
To breast the trampling waves;
How, in their shallops picturesque,
Unawed, they drifted forth;
Directed by the one bright star
That points the stormy North.

VII.
And how, when swept the tempest blast,
Along the groaning earth,
Pale widows with their orphans
Would cower beside the hearth,
All sadly thinking on the ships,
That, buffeting the breeze,
Held but a fragile plank betwixt
Their sailors and the seas!

VIII.
Yet how, on their returning,
Such wondrous tales they told,
Of birds with rainbow plumages
And trees with fruits of gold;
Of perils in the wilderness,
Beside the lion's den;
And huts beneath the palm trees,
Where dwelt the painted men.

IX.
'Mid melancholy fancies,
My spirit loved to stray
Back through the mists of hooded Eld,
Lone wandering far away;

When dim eyed Superstition
Upraised her eldritch croon,
And witches held their orgies
Beneath the waning moon.

X.
Yes! through Tradition's twilight,
To days hath Fancy flown,
When Canmore, or when Kenneth, dree'd
The Celts' uneasy crown;
When men were bearded savages,
An unlightened horde,
'Mid which gleamed Cunning's scapulaire,
And War's unshrinking sword.

XI.
And, in their rusty hauberts,
Thronged past the plaided bands;
And slanting lay the Norsemen's keels
On ocean's dreary sands;
And, in the moorlands dreary,
The cairn, with lichens grey,
Marked where their souls shrieked forth in blood,
On battle's iron day.

XII.
Waned all these tranced visions;—
But, on my pensive sight,
Remained the old dim sea-port,
Beneath the scowl of night.
The sea mews from their island cliffs
Had left the homeless sky;
And to the dirges of the blast
The wild seas made reply.

From the London Weekly Review.

THE BARK OF DEATH.

In Fancy's world a valley lies
Of dark and fearful hue,
Where, noiseless, viewless, vast of size,
A river oozes through.

Across that river to and fro
A bark still gliding keeps;
Yet stirs it not that wave below,
In silence drear that sleeps.

For spectral as a cloud by night
That bark appears to view;
Nor can the form that guides its flight
Be seen the darkness through.

'T is Death! a shadow huge and dim
He sits, to pilot o'er
Enfranchised ghosts, recalled by him
From Time's spright-haunted shore.

O whither glides that spectral bark?
For 'mid the gloom 't is gone!—
Again, through vista lone and dark,
It comes, with Death alone!

Once more to Time's o'ershadowed coast
It speeds!—once more appears,
Surcharged with many a silent ghost,
And towards the Future steers.

And thus, while Time's dread course shall last,
O'er that dark river's tide,
To fill the Future from the Past,
Death's bark shall ever glide.

FINE CUTLERY, &c.—JAMES DICKSON, Cutler and Surgical Instrument Maker, No. 3, Beaver street, (formerly at No. 98 North Market street) Albany, manufactures and repairs all kinds of instruments in the above branches, with neatness, accuracy and despatch, and warranted equal to any article imported, or manufactured in the United States.

Shears, Scissors, Razors and Penknives, ground and finished on an improved plan, and warranted to excel any other in use in this city or elsewhere.

Currier's Steels constantly on hand, and warranted a superior article.

Blades inserted in knife-handles in the most approved style, and most reasonable terms. Locks repaired, N. B. Country orders punctually attended to.

Albany, Feb. 14, 1829.

311

BOOK-BINDING Sign of the Golden Ledger, corner of State and North Market-streets, Albany. WILLIAM SEYMOUR, carries on the above business in all its branches; viz: plain, extra, and super-extra—has a first rate ruling machine, and other necessary implements for manufacturing Blank Books of every description, on the most reasonable terms, of the best workmanship.

An assortment on hand. Subscribers to the American Masonick Record can have their volumes handsomely bound in boards, with leather backs and corners, at 62 1/2 cents a volume. Feb 14 3m3

THIS PAPER

Is published every Saturday, by E. B. CHILD, AT THE CORNER OF NORTH MARKET AND STEUBEN STREETS, ALBANY, N. Y.

TERMS—To city subscribers, Three Dollars a year. To subscribers who receive their papers by mail, Two Dollars and Fifty Cents, IN ADVANCE—otherwise, Three Dollars. JOB PRINTING neatly executed at this office.

AND ALBANY SATURDAY MAGAZINE.

VOL. III.

ALBANY, N. Y. SATURDAY, APRIL 11, 1829.

NO. 11.

MASONICK RECORD.

PUBLICK OPINION.

BROOME COUNTY.

At a meeting of young men of the town of Windsor, in the county of Broome, and its vicinity, convened at the house of Enos B. Rexford, on the 29th day of January, 1829, pursuant to publick notice given, for the purpose of examining into the merits of the institution of Freemasonry, and the reasons and effects of the present excitement against the institution, in which SENECA DIMOCK was chosen chairman, and OVITT COLE, secretary:—

Resolved unanimously, that in reviewing the institution of Freemasonry, and discussing its merits and demerits, and reviewing its effects as a whole, or its individual members and patrons, we can see no well grounded cause of alarm, or good reasons for opposition to the same.

Resolved, that we view the present excitement against, and opposition to, the institution of freemasonry, and attempts to persecute its members, as improper and unreasonable; and that we will use our utmost exertions and best endeavours to allay and put a stop to the progress of the same.

Resolved, that we view those men who say they are masons, and have renounced the institution, and have undertaken to reveal the mysteries of the order, and have published to the world the oaths that they say they have taken, with distrust and contempt, and do not hesitate to say that they are not entitled to belief, but have set an example bad in principle, of evil example to the rising generation, in destroying all confidence between man and man—destroying the force of arguments, associations, and the most solemn obligations between man and man, and ought to be held in universal contempt by good and virtuous men.

Resolved, that we find amongst the members of the masonick institution men of talents and integrity, and whom the people have delighted to honour; and that our confidence remains in them unimpaired, and that we are led to distrust the motives of those who resolve to withdraw their support and confidence from worthy and respectable individuals in society, merely because they belong to the masonick institution.

Resolved, that those men that are not masons who are actively engaged in exciting and promoting the present opposition, are in our opinion acting upon the faith and declarations of renouncing masons, who have destroyed their own testimony, and will, we trust, sooner or later, see their folly, and despise the traitors.

Resolved unanimously, when we see men prostitute the sacred functions of the ministerial office, and lending their aid and their money to slander an institution and the members thereof; and adding falsehood to calumny, and going from place to place, heading meetings and countenancing resolutions, apparently of a political and mercenary character, as lately witnessed in this place and others adjoining it, we do not hesitate to pronounce them unfit members of civil and religious society, and unworthy of the ministerial character, and ought to be held up to the world in their true character.

Resolved, that this meeting view with ineffable disgust and contempt the assemblages of a set of office seeking demagogues, for the specifick purpose of disfranchising a large class of our fellow citizens, members of the masonick fraternity, men of probity, talents, and high standing in society, and consider that the time will speedily arrive, when such men will find their level, when undue excitement will have subsided, and honest credulity will have returned to a discriminating view of the base and sinister purposes of their leaders.

SENECA DIMOCK, Ch'n.

OVITT COLE, Sec'y.

[The address adopted at the above meeting we shall publish in a future number of the Record.]

RENSSELAER COUNTY.

At a very numerous and respectable meeting of the electors of Stephentown, in the county of Rensselaer, without distinction of parties, at the inn of Ebenezer Bull, for the purpose of nominating town officers, RUFUS SWEET, esq. in the chair, and RANDALL A. BROWN secretary—

On motion of Dr. Elijah Graves, it was unanimously resolved that a committee of five be appointed to draft and report to this meeting resolutions expressive of their views of anti-masonry. Messrs. Alonzo I. Chadsey, Randall A. Brown, Aurelius Webster, John O. Bligh, and Ezekiel Huntington, jr. were chosen to compose said committee.

After the nomination of town officers was completed, Mr. A. I. Chadsey, from the committee, reported the following preamble and resolutions.

Whereas a party denominating themselves anti-masons, composed of the broken down politicians of all parties, have for a few years past been making fearful progress in our country and more particularly in our state, having their origin in the alleged abduction and assassination of one man by a few individuals, of which we have as yet but presumptive evidence: And whereas, this same party has of late become organized in our town, threatening political destruction to not only masons but to those who will not go all lengths in their proscriptive course. We, therefore, the independent electors of Stephentown, members of all former political parties, feel constrained by the duty we owe ourselves and our country here unitedly and publicly to express our views in regard to anti-masonry.

Resolved, that although we are not masons, and may never belong to that ancient fraternity, we cannot as yet but regard that order on whose records are enrolled the names of those who have been the brightest ornaments and fathers of our country with respect, and that although masons may have erred, yet we must believe that what Washington embraced and Clinton avowed and advocated, are not subversive of our liberties or dangerous to our country.

Resolved, that we consider the shuffling course and wild enthusiasm of the leaders of the anti-masonick party, and their exertions to keep the publick mind excited to such an unnatural and unhealthy pitch, as fully evincing their objects to be wholly self aggrandizement, regardless of the consequences or of the claims and sentiments of others, however qualified.

Resolved, that we consider the connexion or union of politics and anti-masonry as extremely dangerous to the liberties of our country.

Resolved, that we consider all men of moral and respectable standing whether masons or not, if qualified for the discharge of official duties, as having equal claims upon our support and the same right to our suffrages.

Resolved, that we conceive it a duty and an obligation strictly binding upon us as citizens of a free country, to oppose the political operations and schemes of the anti-masonick party on the ground that such measures are an infringement of the rights of a free people, extremely dangerous in their tendency and destructive in their consequences.

We, therefore, acting under a strict sense of our duty and in conformity to the above opinions, mutually pledge ourselves to use all fair and honourable exertions for the above objects.

On motion of captain Benjamin Chase, it was then unanimously resolved, that the above preamble and resolutions be adopted as the sense of this meeting, and that a copy thereof be signed by the chairman and secretary and publication requested in the Troy Budget and Troy Sentinel, Albany Argus and Gazette, and all other papers in the state friendly to the principles they avow.

RUFUS SWEET, Ch'n.

RANDALL A. BROWN, Sec'y.

VERMONT.

Pursuant to publick notice given in the Rutland Herald of the 17th of March, a large number of persons opposed to the existing anti-masonick excitement, convened at the inn of T. L. Reed in Wallingford, Vermont, on Tuesday the 24th March. The convention was called to order and its object explained by Mr. Nathaniel Pine—when, Maj. ROBINSON HALL, of Wallingford, was called to the chair, and HARVEY BROWN, of Wallingford, appointed assistant chairman. E. C. PURDY, of Rutland, was appointed Secretary.

Nathaniel Pine, Alfred Hull, Chester Spencer, Harvey Batten and Gilbert Roberts, of Wallingford; E. C. Pudy of Rutland, Henry Ballard, of Tiamouth, and Rufus Crowley, of Mount-Holly, were appointed a committee to draft resolutions expressive of the sense of the convention, and to report order of proceedings.

On motion, the convention was then adjourned, to meet again at the Baptist meeting-house in one hour; and the above named committee proceeded to business.

The convention organized at the meeting-house, pursuant to adjournment, when the order of proceedings was reported, and separate addresses were read by Messrs. Chester Spencer and Nathaniel Pine, agreeable to appointment at a previous meeting.

The committee appointed to draft resolutions, reported the following, which were separately read and adopted:—

Resolved, that as good and peaceable citizens, we consider it our imperative duty to use at all times our best exertions to promote the peace and harmony of society—and especially at the present time, to allay if possible the unhappy excitement on the subject of Freemasonry; without wishing in the least to stifle a free inquiry into the merits of the institution, or to prevent a cool and dispassionate discussion of its principles.

Resolved, that we will patronize such newspapers as we please, unrestrained by "resolves" or party spirit; that we, however, prefer those which encourage the practice of virtue—are guided by just and honourable motives—and do not degrade their columns to the service of unprincipled partisans.

Resolved, that we will encourage such men in office as are best qualified;—that our inquiry respecting a candidate shall be, "Is he honest, is he capable, will he support the best interests of his country?" and not, "Does he belong to this or that society?"

Resolved, that we deeply deplore and sincerely lament that publick confidence has been so much abused, and that the common respect and deference due to the aged should have been so repeatedly disregarded.

[After this resolution was read, a sharp and acrimonious debate was commenced by certain anti-masons, evidently for the purpose of interrupting the proceedings. The resolution was declared adopted, but this not proving satisfactory, the vote was again taken, when it was adopted by a large majority. The anti-masons, a large number being present, now commenced a clamour, which soon heightened into an incessant bawl; whereupon, the chairman, unable to preserve order, promptly adjourned the convention to the inn of T. L. Reed. The more orderly part immediately repaired thither and resumed the business for which they were called together.]

Resolved, that we believe the assertion that all masons who are true to their principles are "sworn cut-throats and assassins," uncandid and untrue; and those who utter such an assertion destitute of that heaven-born charity by which they have publicly professed to be governed.

On motion, Voted, that the proceedings of this convention be signed by the Chairman and Secretary, and published.

On motion, Voted, that the Secretary be requested to publish so much of the addresses this day delivered as he shall find convenient and proper.

ROBINSON HALL, Ch'n.

E. C. PURDY, Sec'y.

[Remarks by the Editor of the Rutland Herald.]

Previous to our attendance at this convention, we had not conceived it possible for beings in the shape of men to step so far from decency and propriety as characterised the conduct of the anti-masons on this occasion. However warm may be the rage of partyism, yet there are bounds over which the most enthusiastick are not apt to leap—bounds which a just sense of common propriety and politeness prescribes to all. Beastly must be that spirit which drives every latent impulse of generosity from the human breast, and reckless the man who yields to its maddening sway.

This convention was called particularly for those who were "neither masons nor anti-masons." It was expected and desired that such would attend as spectators; and it was equally desirable that they should go no farther than was proper for mere passive witnesses of the doings of the convention. So far as the masons were concerned, this principle was, we believe, strictly adhered to—their deportment was marked by the strictest propriety. The deportment of the anti-masons, to their shame be it said, was directly the reverse. Upon the publick annunciation that this convention was forthcoming, the leaders of the anti-masonick cabal became alarmed; they saw that the veil of delusion which they had thrown over the eyes of the weak and the ignorant, would be torn away—the mirror of truth held up to view—and their depraved plottings exposed. They trembled for the consequences. What was to be done? The anti-masonick tocsin was sounded—and the haggard clan was assembled together for the express purpose of voting down what could not be opposed by facts or argument. But here they met with a complete failure. This plan was an abortion—they were a puny minority. Goaded and stung to the quick by this failure, the anti-masons (headed by a swinish “limb [tail] of the law,” with more bristles on his back than brains in his head,) now commenced a deafening, clamorous bawl. Their conduct would have disgraced an Indian poto-wow. Under these circumstances, an immediate adjournment of the convention to another place was deemed absolutely necessary, to preserve order, and answer the ends for which it was called.

We need no more to convince us of the general character of the anti-masonick cabal—no more to convince us that it will soon become like the “baseless fabrick of a vision.” It will soon work its own downfall. There is a redeeming spirit even among the anti-masons. Mr. Nathaniel Pine, who read an address to the convention, (which will probably hereafter be published in this paper,) was, a short time since, a warm anti-mason. But the utter recklessness of spirit which characterised the party, led him to pause and reflect. Reflection brought conviction, and he now acknowledges the strong infatuation under which he laboured. He very justly compares the present anti-masonick excitement to that which existed in the days of “Salem witchcraft.” Deluded beings!

[A sketch of the remarks of Mr. Spencer and Mr. Pine, we intend to publish in a future number of the Record.]

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

VELOCITY OF SOUND.

The last number of the Edinburgh New Philosophical Journal contains a table of the experiments made by Captain Parry and Lieutenant Foster, during the northern expeditions, to ascertain the velocity of sound. These experiments were made at Port Bowen, by means of a brass six-pounder, over a range of 12,892.89 feet. The results given are the mean of four shots in one case, of five in another, and in the rest, of six shots, by each observer. The table gives the points of the wind, its quality, the heights of the barometer and thermometer. For these we refer to the table, contenting ourselves with the mean results, which varied from 12,7617 to 11,7387 and 11,5311 for the time in which the range of 12,892.80 feet was traversed by the sound. At the period of the experiment which gave the first of these results, there was a calm; during the second the wind was light; during the third a strong wind was blowing. The velocity per second in feet, was, in the first instance, 1010.28; in the second, 1090.32; in the third, 1118.10. Omitting the last of the ten results (the last above given) on account of the strong wind, the mean of the other nine give a velocity of 1035.19 feet at the temperature of 17.72 Fahrenheit. The mean of a table of velocities formed from observations made at Fort Franklin by Lieutenant Kendall, who accompanied Captain Franklin in his second journey to the shore of the Polar Sea, gives a velocity of 1069.28 feet per second at the temperature of 9.14 Fahrenheit.

ERIMETRE, OR WOOL MEASURER.

M. Skiadan, land proprietor in the province of Noronege, (Russia,) has lately invented an instrument, the erimetre, for the measurement of bodies so small as to be scarcely visible. It measures the ten thousandth part of an inch. The inventor has already used it in several experiments, in which the aid of the microscope would have given merely approximative results; and by it he has ascertained that the thread of the spider's web is thicker than gold leaf. The Revue Encyclopedique, in expressing an opinion on the invention, says it appears to be free from the disadvantages to be objected against all instruments that have been hitherto used for the same purpose. The measurement is effected with astonishing promptitude, nicest exactness, without fatiguing the eye. The measure is divided into one hundred thousandth parts of an English inch. By the assistance of the erimetre, the breeders of sheep who desire to improve their stock, may choose, by the fineness of their wool, the best rams to breed from; they may even ascertain the different degrees of fineness of the wool, in different parts of the body of the animal, or if a single hair be of the same diameter throughout its whole length.

CONSUMPTION.

A number of experiments have been made in France on ducks and chickens, by M. Flourens, from which he draws the following conclusions:—first, that cold exercises a constant and decided action on the lungs of the animals; secondly, that the effect of that action is more rapid and serious in proportion to the youth of the animal; thirdly, that when cold does not produce an acute pulmonary inflammation, speedily mortal, it produces a chronic inflammation; which is in fact pulmonary consumption; fourthly, that heat constantly prevents the inroad of pulmonary consumption; that when it has actually commenced, heat suspends its progress, and that sometimes heat even leads to a perfect cure; fifthly, that to whatever height it may have arrived, this malady is never contagious.

FLEAS.

Fleas breed and undergo their metamorphosis in a manner somewhat similar to the silk-worm. A number of eggs being collected from a dog, and put into a pill-box, in a few days produced hairy caterpillars, which were fed with dead flies, and which the caterpillars ate in a very voracious manner. It was observed, occasionally, that they cast their skins; and in about ten days after their exclusion from the egg, they spun and wove themselves little cases after the manner of silk-worms, in which they remained enclosed in the chrysalis state about nine days, and then came forth perfect fleas, armed with sufficient powers to disturb the rest or even the peace of an Emperor.

The muscular power of the flea is almost beyond belief. Latreille mentions a circumstance of a flea of a moderate size dragging a silver cannon, mounted on wheels, that was twenty-four times its own weight; and which being charged with powder, was fired, without the flea being at all alarmed. Socrates appears to have measured the leap of a flea, and found it extended to two hundred and fifty times its own length; a most astonishing leap! It was as if a man of ordinary stature should be able at once to vault through the air to the distance of a quarter of a mile! [Technological Repository.]

A SPIDER WITH TEN EYES.

The last number of the Repository just cited, notices having been seen by the editor, under an opaque microscope, a black spider from Africa, with no less than ten eyes. Of these, four were placed in a square cluster in the front of its head; two on each side of the front, affixed in pairs, on raised appendages; and two large ones were placed behind the head.

THE GATHERER.

From the Liverpool Times.

ANECDOTES OF ANTS.

The mischief that the Ants in general occasion, by eating books, papers, silks, or clothes, is nothing when compared with their penetrating the beams of a house or destroying the timbers of a ship; on one occasion they attacked the Albion, a British ship of the line, and, in spite of the efforts of the commander and crew, after having boarded, they got possession of her, and handled her so roughly, that had she not been tightly lashed together it was thought she would have foundered on the way home; as it was, when she was brought into port, she was totally unfit for service, and was obliged to be broken up.

It was stated in a London paper of 1814, that the superb residence of the Governor General at Calcutta, the erection of which cost the East India Company immense sums of money, was rapidly going to decay, owing to the attack of Ants.

Though the mischiefs of the Ants are so great, they are probably counterbalanced by the good they produce, in quickly destroying dead trees, &c. Such is their celerity in this particular, that in a few weeks, they will carry off and destroy the trunks of large trees. The total destruction of deserted towns is accomplished in three or four years, not the least vestige of a house remaining.

Some persons like the taste of these insects so much that after nipping off the heads and wings, they will eat them with the greatest voracity. They say that they are of an extremely agreeable acidity.

Mr. Smeathman (a gentleman who read a paper before the Royal Society, February 15, 1781, on Ants) relates that a party of them once took a fancy to a pipe of fine old Madeira, for the sake of the staves alone, not caring at all for the wine, and completely destroyed the wood of it. Mr. S. divides these insects into three orders: 1st. the working insects or labourers; 2d. the fighters or soldiers; 3d. the winged or perfect insects, which are male and female, and capable of multiplying the species. The last he calls the nobility and gentry, for they neither labour nor fight. The different functions of the labourers and soldiers, or the civil and military establishments, are illustrated in an attempt to examine their nests or city. On making a breach on any part of this structure with an instrument, a soldier appears and walks round the breach, as if to see if the enemy be gone, or to examine whence the attack proceeds. Soon labourers are ordered up in vast numbers to repair the breach, and a soldier over-looks about 500 in the operation. They carry mortar for the repairs and soon are as secure as ever. If the attack is repeated and an attempt made to reach the royal chamber, soldiers and workmen all congregate round it, and will loyally die in the defence of their king and queen.

Dr. Franklin once put a pot of treacle into a closet, to which several ants got. He shook all out but one, and then tied the pot with a thin string to a nail, fastened to the ceiling, so that it hung down by it. As soon as the Ant was satisfied, it wanted to get out, but for some time could not discover the way. At last it found after many attempts the way to the ceiling by going along the string. Then it ran to the wall, and from thence to the ground. It had scarcely been away half an hour, when a great swarm of ants came out, got up to the ceiling, crept along the string to the pot, and began to eat again. This was done till the treacle was gone; one swarm running down the string, the other up it.

I will now conclude with giving you a short account of their buildings. “With regard to man, (says Mr. Smeathman) his greatest works, the boasted pyramids, fall comparatively short, in size alone, of the structures raised by these insects. They are not above a quarter of an inch in length; but the structures they raise are frequently 10 or 12 feet or upwards above the surface of the earth.” If the height of a man was 6 feet, Mr. S. calculates that the buildings of these insects may be considered, relatively to their size and that of man, as raised nearly five times as high as the greatest Egyptian pyramid. Their tunnels would expand to a magnificent cylinder of more than 300 feet in diameter. It may be added, that with respect to the interior construction, and the various members and disposition of the parts of the buildings, they appear greatly to exceed any and every work of human construction.

TRIBUTES TO THE DEAD, &c.

“When our friends we lose,
Our altered feelings alter to our views;
What in their temper, teased or distressed'd,
Is with our anger, and the dead at rest;
And must we grieve, no longer trial made,
For that impatience which we then display'd?
Now to their love and worth of every kind,
A soft compunction turns the afflicted mind;
Virtues neglected then, adored become,
And graces slighted, blossom on the tomb.”

Crabbe.

“It was the early wish of Pope,” says Dr. Knox, “that when he died, not a stone might tell where he lay. It is a wish that will commonly be granted with reluctance. The affection of those whom we leave behind us is at a loss for methods to display its wonted solicitude, and seeks consolation under sorrow, in doing honour to all that remains.

It is natural that filial piety, parental tenderness, and conjugal love, should mark, with some fond memorial, the clay-clod spot where the form, still fostered in the bosom, moulders away. And did affection go no farther, who would censure? But, in recording the virtues of the departed, either zeal or vanity leads to an excess perfectly ludicrous. A marble monument, with an inscription palpably false and ridiculously pompous, is far more offensive to true taste, than the wooden memorial of the rustick, sculptured with painted bones, and decked out with death's head in all the colours of the rainbow. There is an elegance and a classical simplicity in the turf-clad heap of mould which covers the poor man's grave, though it has nothing to defend it from the insults of the proud but a bramble. The primrose that grows upon it is a better ornament than the gilded lies on the oppressor's tombstone.

The Greeks had a custom of bedecking tombs with herbs and flowers, among which parsley was chiefly in use, as appears from Plutarch's story of Timoleon, who, marching up an ascent, from the top of which he might take a view of the army and strength of the Carthaginians, was met by a company of mules laden with parsley, which his soldiers conceived to be a very ill boding and fatal occurrence, that being the very herb wherewith they adorned the sepulchres of the dead. This custom gave birth to that despairing proverb, when we pronounce of one dangerously sick, that he has need of nothing but parsley; which is in effect to say, he's a dead man, and ready for the grave. All sorts of purple and white flowers were acceptable to the dead; as the amaranthus, which was first used by the Thessalians to adorn Achilles's grave. The rose, too, was very grateful; nor was the use of myrtle less common. In short, graves were bedecked with garlands of all sorts of flowers, as appears from Agamemnon's daughter in Sophocles:—

"No sooner came I to my father's tomb,
But milk fresh pour'd in copious streams did flow,
And flowers of ev'ry sort around were strew'd."

Several other tributes were frequently laid upon graves, as ribands; whence it is said that Epaminondas's soldiers being disanimated at seeing the riband that hung upon his spear carried by the wind to a certain Lacedæmonian sepulchre, he bid them take courage, for that it portended destruction to the Lacedæmons, it being customary to deck the sepulchres of their dead with ribands. Another thing dedicated to the dead was their hair. Electra, in Sophocles, says, that Chrysosthemis to pay this honour:—

"With drink off rings and locks of hair we must,
According to his will, his tomb adorn."

It was likewise customary to perfume the grave stones with sweet ointments, &c.

EATING AND WRITING.

Ovid, Horace, and Virgil all frequented the tables of the great; Cato warmed his virtue with wine; Shakspeare kept up his verve with stolen venison; Steele and Addison wrote their best papers over a bottle; Sir Walter Scott is famed for good housekeeping; and I know authors who love to dine like lords. Even booksellers do their spiriting more gently for good fare, and bid for an author the most spiritedly after dinner.

There is not a more vulgar mistake than that of confounding good eating with gluttony and excess. It is not because a man gets twenty or five-and-twenty guineas per sheet for a dashing article, and has taste to expend his well-earned cash upon a cook who knows how to dress a dinner, that he is necessarily to gorge himself like a mastiff with sheep's paunch. On the contrary, if he means to preserve the powers of his palate intact, he must "live cleanly as a nobleman should do." The fat-witted people in the City are not nice in their eating, quantity being more closely considered by them than quality. There is, I admit, something in the good man's concluding conjectures that "the sort of diet men observe influences their style." I should know an "heavy-wet" man at the third line; and I can tell to a nicety when Theodore Hook writes upon claret, and when he is inspired by the over-heating and acrimonious stimulus of Max. Hayley obviously composed upon tea and bread and butter. Dr. Philpots may be nosed a mile off for priestly port and the fat bulls of Basan; and Southey's Quarterly articles are written on an empty stomach, and before his crudities, like the breath of Sir Roger de Coverley's barber, have been "mollified by a breakfast."

[New Monthly Magazine.]

SACRED POETRY.

Songs and hymns, in honour of their Gods, are found among all people who have either religion or verse. There is scarcely any pagan poetry, ancient or modern, in which allusions to the national mythology are not so frequent as to constitute the most copious materials, as well as the most brilliant embellishments. The poets of Persia and Arabia, in like manner, have adorned their gorgeous strains with the fables and morals of the Koran. The relics of Jewish song which we possess, with few exceptions, are consecrated immediately to the glory of God, by whom, indeed, they were inspired. The first Christians were wont to edify themselves in psalms and hymns, and spiritual songs; and though we have no specimens of these left, except the occasional doxologies ascribed to the redeemed in the Book of Revelation, it cannot be doubted that they used not only the psalms of the Old Testament, literally, or accommodated to the circumstances of a new and rising Church, but that they had original lays of their own, in which they celebrated the praises of Christ, as the Saviour of the world. In the middle ages, the Roman Catholic and Greek churches steadily adopted singing as an essential part of public worship; but this, like the reading of the Scriptures, was too frequently in an unknown tongue, by an affectation of wisdom, to excite the veneration of ignorance, when the learned, in their craftiness, taught that "Ignorance is the mother of devotion;" and Ignorance was willing to believe it. At the era of the Reformation, psalms and hymns, in the vernacular tongue, were revived in Germany, England, and elsewhere, among the other means of grace, of which Christendom had been for centuries defrauded.

[Montgomery.]

THE TRIAL.

In Sir J. Malcolm's History of Persia, we read the following anecdote of the great Shah Abbas: "Abbas being one day riding with the celebrated Meer Mahomed Bauker Damad on his right hand, and the equally famed Shaikh Bahaudeen Aumilee on his left, desired to discover if there lurked any secret envy or jealousy in the breasts of these two learned priests. Turning to Meer Mahomed Bauker, whose horse was prancing and capering, he observed, "What a dull brute Shaikh Bahaudeen is riding; he cannot make the animal keep pace with us." "The wonder is, how the horse moves at all," said the Moollah, "when we consider what a load of learning and knowledge he has upon his back." Abbas, some time after, turned round to Shaikh Bahaudeen, and said to him, "Did you ever see such a prancing animal as that which Meer Mahomed Bauker rides? Surely that is not the style for a horse who carries a grave Moollah." "Your majesty will, I am assured," said the Shaikh, "forgive the horse, when you reflect on the just right he has to be proud of his rider." The monarch bent his head forward on his saddle, and returned thanks to the Almighty for the singular blessing he had bestowed on his reign, of two wise and pious men, living at a court, and yet untainted by envy and hatred."

SHAVING GRATIS.

During the late war, a barber, who kept a little shop on the Hard, at Portsmouth, exhibited the following notice in his window:—"Broken-down sailors shaved gratis." A poor tar, whose beard was of a week's growth, and who had not a single shot in his locker, seeing this benevolent invitation, entered the shop, described his state, and claimed the performance of the promise. The barber immediately complied; and having lathered his unproductive customer, proceeded to shave him with a razor which he had selected for the purpose, and the edge of which was in no danger of being easily turned. At every rasp the tears were ready to rush into poor Jack's eyes, and the blood to start upon his chin. In the midst of the operation a dog began to howl most piteously in the street. "What the devil's the matter with the dog?" exclaimed Strap. "Oh!" observed his tortured patient, "I dare say some rascally flinty-hearted barber is shaving him gratis!"

LAUGHTER.

"Laugh and grow fat," is an old adage; and Sterne tells us, that every time a man laughs, he adds something to his life. An eccentric philosopher, of the last century, used to say, that he liked not only to laugh himself, but to see laughter, and hear laughter. "Laughter, Sir, laughter is good for health; it is a provocative to the appetite, and a friend to digestion. Dr. Sydenham, Sir, said the arrival of a merry-andrew in a town was more beneficial to the health of the inhabitants than twenty asses loaded with medicine." Mr. Pott used to say that he never saw the "Tailor riding to Brentford," without feeling better for a week afterwards.

SAGACITY OF A DOG.

A remarkable instance is given in the Edinburg Scotsman of the sagacity of a dog. At a farmhouse near Falkirk, during the late frost and snow, the hens were all missing from their roost, and could no where be found. In the evening the dog brought into the house in his mouth a hen apparently dead, which he laid down before the fire; he then departed, and brought all the hens successively, laying them before the fire. It turned out that they had been benumbed by the frost, and in that situation had been discovered by the dog, who instantly applied the proper remedy. The warmth of the fire soon brought them all to life and motion.

ERROURS EXCEPTED.

The Alabama Telegraph, under the head of "Mistakes Rectified," states, that "It having been shown to the satisfaction of the Legislature of Alabama, that sundry females of this State had committed mistakes, and married men, who were not originally intended for them, (though it is said that matches are made in Heaven!) acts have been passed declaring eleven of such marriages void, and giving the parties an opportunity of correcting the errors of their youth."

GRAMMATICAL LEARNING.

An author left a comedy with Foote for persual; and on the next visit asked for his judgement on it, with rather an ignorant degree of assurance. "If you looked a little more to the grammar of it, I think," said Foote, "it would be better."—"To the grammar of it, Sir! What! would you send me to school again?" "And pray, Sir," replied Foote, very gravely, "would that do you any harm?"

SWEARING BY PROXY.

Cardinal Dubois used frequently, in searching after any thing he wanted, to swear excessively. One of his clerks told him, "Your eminence had better hire a man to swear for you, and then you will gain so much time."

SUPERSTITION.

Grievously are they mistaken who think that the revival of literature was the death of superstition—that ghosts, demons and exorcists retreated before the march of intellect, and fled the British shore along with monks, saints, and masses. Superstition, deadly superstition, may co-exist with much learning, with high civilization, with any religion, or with utter irreligion. Canidia wrought her spells in the Augustan age, and Chaldean fortune tellers haunted Rome in the skeptical days of Juvenal. Matthew Hopkins, the witch finder, and Lilly, the astrologer, were contemporaries of Selden, Harrington, and Milton. Perhaps there never was a more superstitious period than that than that which produced Erasmus and Bacon.

[Blackwood's Magazine.]

THE LEGENDARY.

From the London New Monthly Magazine.

THE LOVERS' LEAP.

In a part of France not a hundred miles from the fine port of St. Malo, stands a town containing some eight thousand inhabitants. Anciently a fortified place of considerable strength; it is pitched on the pinnacle of a high hill, with its antique battlements, covered with time's livery, the green ivy and the yellow lichen, still frowning over the peaceful valleys around, and crowning the rocky ridge which confines the river Rance. That valley of the Rance is as lovely as any in Europe; now spreading out for miles, it offers a wide basin for the river, which, extending in proportion, looks like a broad lake; now contracting to a narrow gorge, it confines the stream between gigantic rocks, that rise abruptly from its edge, and sombre woods, that dip their very branches in its waters. But it is where the town which I have just mentioned first bursts upon the sight, that the scenery is peculiarly picturesque. Winding through a deep defile of rocks which cut off the neighbouring view, and throw a dark shadow over the stream the river suddenly turns a projecting point of its shores, and a landscape of unequalled beauty opens on the sight. Rich wooded valleys with soft green sloping sides, broken with crags, and diversified with hamlets, are seen diverging in every direction, with the Rance winding forward in the midst of them; while high in air, lording it over all around, rises the stately rock on which the town is placed, with wall, and battlement, and tower, hanging over its extreme verge.

In front, and apparently immediately under the town, though in reality at about two miles distance from it, lies a high craggy piece of ground, which the water would completely encircle were it not for a narrow sort of isthmus, which joins it to its parent chain of hills. This is called the Courbure, from the turn which the river makes round it: and I notice it more particularly from being the exact scene of my story's catastrophe.

In the town which I have above described, lived, some time ago, a very pretty girl, whom we shall designate by the name of Laure. Her mother was well to do in the world—that is to say, as things go on in Brittany, where people can live splendidly for nothing at all, and do very well for half as much. However, Madame could always have her pot au feu and her poulet à la broche, kept two nice country lasses, one as cook and the other as fille-de-chambre, and had once a year the new fashions from Paris, to demonstrate her gentility. Laure's father, too, had left the young lady a little property of her own, amounting to about eighty pounds per annum; so that being a fortune and a belle, all the youth of the place, according to the old Scotch song, were—

"Wooring at her,
Pu'ing at her,
Wanting her, but could nae get her."

However, there was something about Laure, which some called pride, and others coldness, but which, in truth, was nothing more nor less than shyness, that served for some time as a complete safeguard to her maiden heart. At length the angel who arranges all those sort of things, singled out a young man at Rennes, called Charles —, and gave him a kick with his foot which sent him all the way from Rennes to the town in which Laure abode. It is but thirty miles, and angels can kick much farther if we may believe the Normans. [I cannot stop for it now; but, my dear reader, put me in mind by and by to tell you that story of St. Michael and the Devil, and you shall hear how the saint kicked him from hill to hill for forty leagues or more.]

However, Charles's aunt lived not far from Laure's mother, and many a time had she vaunted the graces of her nephew's person. According to her account, he was as tall and as straight as a gas lamp-post, as rosy as a ribstone pippin; with eyes as bright as a red hot poker, teeth as white as the inside of a teacup, and his hair curling like the leaves of a Savoy cabbage. In short, he was an Adonis, after her idea of the thing; and Laure, having heard all this, began to feel a sort of anxious palpitating sort of sensation, when his coming was talked of, together with sundry other symptoms of wishing very much to fall in love.

At length his arrival was announced, and Madame — and Mademoiselle Laure were invited to a soiree at the house of Charles's aunt. Laure got ready in a very great hurry, resolving, primo, to be frightened out of her wits at him; and secundo, not to speak a word to him. However, the time came, and when she got into the room she found Monsieur Charles quite as handsome as his aunt had represented; but to her great surprise, she found him to be quite as timid as herself into the bargain. So Laure took courage upon the strength of his bashfulness, for though it might be very well for one, she saw plainly it would never do for two. The evening passed off gaily, and Laure, as she had determined from the first, went away over her head and ears in love, and left the poor young man in quite as uncomfortable a condition.

I need not conduct the reader through all the turnings and windings of their passion. Suffice it to say, that both being very active, and loving each other very hard, they had got on so far in six weeks, that their friends judged it would be necessary to marry them. Upon this Laure's mother and Charles's aunt met in form to discuss preliminaries. They began a few compliments, went on to arrange the money matters, proceeded to differ upon some trivial points, grew a little warm upon the subject, turned up their noses at each other, quarrelled like Turks, and abused each other like pickpockets. Charles's aunt called Laure's mother an old cat—or something equivalent; and Laure's mother vowed that Charles should never have her daughter; she'd be —. Fie! what was I going to say!

The two young people were in despair. Laure received a maternal injunction never to speak to that vile young man again; together with a threat of being locked up if she was restive. However, the Sunday after Paques, Laure's mother was laid up with a bad cold; and from what cause does not appear, but Laure never felt so devout as on that particular day. She would not have stayed away from mass for all the world. So to church she went, when, to her surprise and astonishment, she beheld Charles standing in the little chapel of the left aisle. "Laure," said he, as soon as he saw her, "ma chere, let us go out of the town, by the back street, and take a walk in the fields." Laure felt a good deal too much agitated to say her prayers properly, and looking about the church, she perceived that, as she had come half an hour before the time, there was nobody there; so, slipping her arm through that of her lover, she tripped nimbly along with him down the back street, under the Gothick arch and high towers of the old town gate, and in five minutes was walking with him in the fields unobserved.

Now, what a long, sad, pastoral dialogue could I produce between Laure and Charles as they walked along; but I will spare my reader that at least. The summary of the matter is, that they determined that they were very unhappy—the most miserable people in existence;—now that they were separated from each other, there was nothing left in life worth living for. So Laure began to cry, and Charles vowed he would drown himself. Laure thought it was a very good idea, and declared that she would drown herself too,—for she had been reading all Saturday a German romance which taught such things; and she thought what a delightful tale it would make if she and Charles drowned themselves together, and how all the young ladies would cry when they read it, and what a pretty tomb they would have, with "Ci gessant Charles et Laure, deux amans, malheureux!" written upon it in large black letters; and in short, she arranged it all so comfortably in her own mind that she resolved she would not wait a minute.

As the Devil would have it, they had just arrived at that rocky point which I have before described, called the Courbure, when Charles and Laure had worked each other up to the necessary pitch of excitement and despair. The water was before them, and the only question was who should jump in first; for the little landing-place from which they were to leap would hold but one at a time. Charles declared that he would set the example—Laure vowed it should be no one but herself. Charles insisted, but Laure, being nearest the water, gained the contested point, and plunged over.

At that moment the thought of what he was going to do came over Charles's mind with a sad qualm of conscience, and he paused for an instant on the brink. But what could he do? he could not stand by and see the girl he loved drowned before his face, like an intruding rat or a supernumerary kitten. Forbid it Heaven! forbid it Love! So in he went too—not at all with the intention of drowning himself, but with that of bringing Laure out; and being a tolerable swimmer, he got hold of her in a minute.

By this time Laure had discovered that drowning was both cold and wet, and by no means so agreeable as she had anticipated; so that when Charles approached, she caught so firm a hold of him as to deprive him of the power of saving her. It is probable that under these circumstances her very decided efforts to demonstrate her change of opinion, might have effected her original intention and drowned them both, had not a boat come round the Courbure at that very moment. The boatmen soon extricated them from their danger, and carried them both home, exhausted and dripping, to the house of Laure's mother. At first the good lady was terrified out of her wits, and then furiously angry; but ended, however, by declaring that if ever they drowned themselves again, it should not be for love, and so she married them out of hand.

MISCELLANY.

From Irving's Life of Columbus.

ABORIGINES OF HAYTI.

Columbus had also at first indulged in the error that the natives of Hayti were destitute of all notions of religion; and he had consequently flattered himself that it would be the easier to introduce into their minds the doctrines of Christianity; not aware that it is more difficult to light up the fire of devotion in the cold heart of an atheist, than to divert the flame to a new object when it is already enkindled. There are few beings, however, so destitute of reflection, as not to be impressed with the conviction of an overruling deity: a nation of atheists never existed. It was soon discovered that these islanders had their creed, though of a vague and simple nature. They believed in one supreme being, who inhabited the skies, who was immortal, omnipotent and invisible, to whom they ascribed an origin, having a mother but no father. They never addressed their worship directly to him, but employed inferior deities, called Zemes, as messengers and mediators. Each cacique had his tutelary deity of this order, whom he invoked and pretended to consult in all his public undertakings, and who was revered by his people. He had a house apart, as a temple to this deity, in which was an image of his Zemi, carved of wood, of stone, or shaped of clay or cotton, and generally of some monstrous and hideous form. Each family and each individual, had likewise a particular Zemi, or protecting genius, like the Lares and Penates of the ancients. These were placed in every part of their houses, or carved on their furniture. Some had them of a small size, and bound them about their foreheads when they went to battle. They believed their Zemes to be transferable, with all their powers, and often stole them from each other. When the Spaniards came among them, they often hid their idols, lest they should be taken away. They believed that these Zemes presided over every object in nature, each having a particular charge or government. They influenced the seasons and the elements; causing sterile or abundant years, stirring up hurricanes and whirlwinds, and tempests of rain and thunder, or sending sweet and temperate airs and fruitful showers. They governed the seas and forests, the springs and fountains; like the Neriedes, the Dryads, and the Satyrs of antiquity. They gave success in hunting and fishing. They guided the waters of the mountains into safe channels, and led them down to wander through the plains, in gentle brooks and peaceful rivers; or, if incensed, they caused them to burst forth into rushing torrents and overwhelming floods, inundating and laying waste the valleys.

The natives had their Butios, or priests, who pretended to hold communion with these Zemes. They practised rigorous fasts and ablutions and inhaled the powder, or drank the infusion of a certain herb, which produced a temporary intoxication or delirium. In the course of this process, they professed to have trances and visions, and that the Zemes revealed to them coming events, or instructed them in the treatment of maladies. They were in general great herbalists, and well acquainted with the medical properties of trees and vegetables. They cured diseases through their knowledge of simples, but always with many mysterious rites and ceremonies and supposed charms, chanting, and burning a light in the chamber of the patient, and pretending to exercise the malady, to expel it from the mansion, and to send it to the sea or to the mountain.

Their bodies were painted or tattooed with figures of the Zemes, which were regarded with horror by the Spaniards, as so many representations of the devil; and the butios, esteemed as a kind of saints by the natives, were abhorred by the former as necromancers. These butios often assisted the caciques in practising deceptions upon their subjects, speaking oracularly through the Zemes, by means of hollow tubes, inspiring the Indians to battle by predicting success, or dealing forth such promises or menaces as might suit the purposes of the chieftain.

There is but one of their solemn religious ceremonies, of which any record exists. The cacique proclaimed a day when a kind of festival was to be held in honour of his Zemes. His subjects assembled from all parts, and formed a solemn procession; the married men and women decorated with their most precious ornaments, the young females entirely naked. The cacique, or the principal personage, marched at the head, beating a kind of a drum. In this way they proceeded to the consecrated house, or temple, in which were set up the images of the Zemes. Arrived at the door, the cacique seated himself on the outside, continuing to beat his drum, while the procession entered; the females carrying baskets of cakes ornamented with flowers, and singing as they advanced. These offerings were received by the butios, or priests, with loud cries or rather howlings. They broke the cakes after they had been offered to the Zemes, and distributed the morsels to the heads of families, who preserved them carefully throughout the year, as dreventives of all adverse accidents. This done, at a signal the females danced, singing songs in honour of the Zemes, or in praise of the heroic actions of their ancient caciques. The whole ceremony finished by invoking the Zemes to watch over and protect the nation.

Besides the Zemes, each cacique had three idols or talismans which were mere stones, but which were held in great reverence by themselves and their subjects. One they supposed had the power to produce abundant harvests; another to remove all pain from women in travail; and the third to call forth rain or sunshine when either was required. Three of these were sent home by Columbus to the sovereigns.

The ideas of the natives with respect to creation, were vague and undefined. They gave their own island of Hayti priority of existense over all others; and believed that the sun and moon originally issued out of a cavern in the island, to give light to the world.

This cavern still exists, about seven or eight leagues from Cape Francois. It is about one hundred and fifty feet in depth, and nearly the same in height, but very narrow. It receives no light but from the entrance, and from a hole in the roof, from whence it was said the sun and moon issued forth to take their places in the sky. The vault was so fair and regular, that it appeared a work of art rather than of nature. In the time of Charlevoix, the figures of various Zemes were still to be seen cut in the rocks, and there were remains of niches, as if to receive statues. This cavern was held in great veneration. It was painted and adorned with green branches, and other simple decorations. There were in it two images or Zemes. When there was a want of rain, the natives made pilgrimages and processions to it, with songs and dances, bearing offerings of fruits and flowers.

They believed that mankind issued from another cavern; the large men from a greater aperture, the small men from a little cranny. They were for a long time destitute of women; but, wandering on one occasion near a small lake, they saw certain animals among the branches of the trees, which proved to be women. On attempting to catch them, however, they were found to be as slippery as eels, so that it was impossible to hold them. At length they employed certain men, whose hands were rendered rough by a kind of leprosy. These succeeded in securing four of these slippery females, from whom the world was peopled.

From the London Observer.

LORD BYRON.

The fierce and sullen spirit that characterised Lord Byron's pen, was death to all the graceful conceptions under which poetry had won our worship so long. She was no more in the lovely and fantastick youth of the muse of the "Last Minstrel," nor in the full and fine proportioned beauty of the riper time that followed. When Byron threw open the valves of the temple, she was the Pythia on the tripod, haggard and wild, with her youth stricken into premature age, and with the words of fate and scorn burning on the lips of a being made at once proud and miserable by the conscious inspiration.

The style became instantly popular for it told of wrong—a tale in which every judge of his own cause feels sudden sympathy; it exaggerated the delights of that life of adventure, for which all men have a lurking fondness; it talked with rapture of the power of beauty, and with enthusiasm of the resistless empire of passion: all popular with the multitude. It harrangued loftily on the glories of holding human opinion in contempt, and of following the impulse of that contempt through all hazards; of fame, as a prize to be sought through good and evil; and of enjoyment, as to be cheaply purchased, by trampling down the irksome duties of common life; of crime, as finding, not simply its palliative, but its authority, in intellectual pre-eminence, and of that pre-eminence, as finding its native distinction in the magnitude, boldness, and firmness of its tread into that world of darkness, where Crime and Confusion sit twin despots on the same fiery throne. Doctrines like those must find partizans in the common corruption and insolence of spirit that make so large a portion of living society; even if they were transmitted from the lips of children.

But Byron uttered them with the power of a true poet. The sternest vigour of language was condensed into his words; the richest, and sometimes the most touching illustrations diversified the sullen fervour of his poetry; and, like the story of the hearers of the Athenian Orator, who were awed at a distance by the majesty of his gesture; nearer still, charmed by the melody of his voice; and nearer still, subdued by the force of his language; the great poet had grasp and captivation for all.

But he produced no followers; his dynasty was cut off with himself: and this, for the obvious reason, that his power was urged to its extreme. He went to the farthest limits at which scorn, spleen, and the rending open of private sufferings and sensibilities, could be tolerated. In him they were endured for the sake of their presumed reality; yet even in him they had begun to be tiresome. But in another, had that other possessed Lord Byron's faculty of verse, or a higher faculty still, the same strain of continual querulousness would have been burlesque, and the tragedy must have closed in laughter. The rejection of society, or by society; the sickly and bilious frame; the domestick quarrel; the insults given and received in an unlucky connexion with an alienated and strangely unconciliating kindred, were essential to Lord Byron's authorship—were the living stimulants of his mental epicurism. They were more, they were its only food. Like the Theriaki of Constantinople he lived solely upon doses, of which the slightest would have extinguished the career of others. He diversified surcharges of opium by surcharges of corrosive sublimate. And, like the Theriaki, his life was a dream, and that dream alternately of the magnificent and the miserable—a vision of Paradise, and of sorrow unassuaged, remorseless exile, and consuming flame. But while the popularity of this style remained alive upon the publick mind, none other could be attempted with a prospect of success. The human heart loves tragedy. The English are eminently fond of deep and fierce emotion; and after having "supped full of horrors" with the noble bard they could not easily turn to the lighter banquet. But who could be in a condition to follow the career in which this man of misfortune and fame had so long rode at the head of English poetry?—or in what writer, however furnished with domestick evils, could the same compound of ill luck be gathered once more, with any tolerable credibility? Thus sank into its long sleep the poetry of England. The attempts since made to awake it, have been made chiefly by female writers, some of whom have done the female genius honour, by the grace and purity of their pens. But after all, poetry is a masculine art, and is made for something more than the celebration of the birth of the "first rose," or the death of the "last leaf." It is a stately and superb thing, like nature itself; and rejoices in the display of great powers on a great scale. It may not be without its pleasure in the minor beauties of the glorious landscape that lies within the range of its vision: it can enjoy the colouring of flowers and the song of birds; but its true elevation is in the grander features and powers; in the moral storm; in the development of those awful materials of good and ill, which lie hidden in clouds and darkness until the appointed hour; in the discovery of the mighty influences by which the whole moral atmosphere is loaded with sudden gloom chased away by new-born, and scarcely less awful splendour.

From Historical Literary Anecdotes.

MUSICK.

With a view to prove the wonderful power which musick possesses in calming the human passions, Segnoir Martinelli, in his Letters on Italian Musick, offers us the two following examples:

One day when Stradella, the celebrated violin player of Naples, was playing a piece of musick at Naples, he made such a strong impression on a young lady that he gained her heart, soon afterwards her person, and went off with her to Rome.

The young lady's guardian, very much enraged at her conduct, persuaded a young gentleman who had wished to marry her to wash away, with the ravisher's blood, an injury which was equally poignant to them both.

The lover followed Stradella; and on arriving at Rome he inquired where he could meet his rival. He was informed he was to play in a church on that day; he went there, heard Stradella perform, and forgot his revenge. He wrote to the lady's guardian, that on his arrival at Rome, Stradella had quitted the city.

The second example is of Palma, who was also a Neapolitan musician. He was surprised in his house by one of his creditors, who demanded his money, and threatened to arrest him in the most injurious manner. Palma made no answer to his abuse and threats but by singing a tune. The creditor listened to it. Palma sung another air, and accompanied it with his harpsichord; and observing those parts which made the most impression on the heart of his creditor, he at length subdued him; payment of the money was no longer demanded; he asked him to lend him a considerable sum to extricate him from some pecuniary embarrassments, and it was immediately granted.

"If Stradella, with a simple sonata on the violin," adds Segnoir Martinelli, "could tranquillize the furious transports of a justly irritated rival, and who travelled more than a hundred leagues to obtain revenge; if Palma, with a coarse voice, gained the heart of an avaricious creditor, and obtained an additional loan, what could not the melody of the philosophick poet Orpheus effect, who played his own compositions?"

It has been asserted by many writers that music and the sound of instruments contribute to the health of body and mind, by aiding the circulation of the humours, accelerating the motion of the blood, dissipating the vapors, dilating the vessels, and promoting insensible perspiration, so absolutely necessary for the maintenance and preservation of health. The disease of Saul was appeased by David's harp.

Saxon, the grammarian, speaks of a king of Denmark who, on the sound of a flute, would become furiously mad. We are informed by authors of undeniable credit, that the poison of the tarantula is dissipated by music and dancing.

I have read of a person who was subject to a periodical delirium, and on every attack, instead of having recourse to medicine, some violins were played in his chamber. The disease would immediately become less, and in a few hours be totally removed.

Hermophilus, an old medical writer, has advanced this fanciful opinion—"As there is an harmonious motion of the blood, and other humours, it is by no means astonishing that harmony should produce effects on our bodies conducive to health. The movements of the pulse," continues he, "are to certain measures, as poets compose their verses to certain feet; and it may be said that the knowledge of the pulse, and the action of the arteries, which is the pleasantest and most necessary part of physick, depends in some measure on being acquainted with the various musical notes. And those who are accustomed to play the flute or other instruments, have a more sure and delicate feel, and judge better of the pulse of passionate and sick people, than others who are not in such habits."

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, APRIL 11, 1829.

TO LET—The Rooms now occupied by us as a printing office. Inquire at this office, or of J. F. Porter, in the basement story of the building.

The office of the Masonick Record will be removed to No. 2, Beaver-street, on the first of May.

Those of our subscribers who intend to change their places of residence on the first proximo, will please to inform the carrier or leave notice at this office, in order that they may be regularly served with their papers.

PUBLIC OPINION. We refer the reader to our masonick department for extracts from the proceedings of meetings held by the friends of civil freedom in various parts of the country. There never was a time when the publick interests called more loudly for an unequivocal and independent expression of the opinions of honest men, and we hail the masculine energy displayed in the extracts which we publish to-day, as the sure evidence of principles and firmness which can and will, in every emergency, preserve the institutions of our country from the unhallowed grasp of unprincipled and dissolute men. The present is not a contest between masonry and its enemies; but between the honest, reflecting yeomanry of the country, and the broken down, disappointed, ambitious and reckless of every political, moral, and religious creed. The privileges of masons are not alone menaced; but the dearest rights of citizenship—all, in fact, that makes life valuable, or even tolerable, is threatened with subversion by the new-fangled inquisitors. Were the destruction of masonry the real object of those who have arrayed themselves in pretended hostility to the institution, we should have some evidence of the fact in their willingness to encourage peaceable measures tending to that end. Instead of this being the case, however, every thing which is not of the most violent and swEEPING character, is ridiculed and misrepresented in every possible way. Those masons who, with more respect for the publick peace than for their own private rights, yielded up their charters in the hope of tranquilizing the publick mind, have not only met with the abuse usually thrown out against members of the fraternity, but, if possible, with misrepresentations still more fulsome and slanderous. The evidence is clear, that not moral evils, but political rights, are contended against. Masonry, whether it continues or ceases to exist, cannot decide the question which is raised. Were masonry to die to-day the same cry of "crucify them! crucify them!" would continue; and nothing can check its rioting march, but the firmness and moral energy of the people.

FRENCH VOYAGE OF DISCOVERY The London Literary Gazette of January 31, states that the voyage round the world, performed by captain Duperrey, in La Coquille, during the years 1822, 1823, 1824, and 1825, is now in a course of publication, at Paris. The work will be in four divisions, each edited by different gentlemen of high scientific attainments. The divisions will be, 1, Zoological, in two volumes quarto, with an atlas of about 140 coloured plates; 2, Botanical, in one volume quarto, with an atlas of about 115 plates, of which twenty six will be coloured; 3, The History of the Voyage, in two volumes quarto, with an atlas of sixty coloured plates, to which will be annexed vocabularies of many savage languages; 4, Hydrographical, Nautical and Physical, in one volume quarto, with an atlas of fifty colomblent plates. The work is publishing in numbers, and the Gazette says "Judging from those which have appeared, this will be a publication of great value. The History of the Voyage will be the more interesting, as the navigators had the opportunity of successively visiting and comparing the two opposite coasts of South America; and, farther, of comparing New-Zealand and New-Holland, as well as Oceania with Polynesia. The numerous vocabularies will afford abundant matter for philological study. The Zoological and Botanical numbers which have appeared are exceedingly curious: and the plates are excellent.

WASHINGTON IRVING. An advertisement appears in the New-York papers, signed by this gentleman, and dated Seville, December, 1828, announcing that he has completed an abridgement of his "Life and Voyages of Columbus." It seems that Mr. Irving was informed that some persons in this country had undertaken to fabricate an abridgement, for the purpose of forestalling the market, and reaping themselves the reward which justly belongs to him. In speaking of this ungenerous attempt he observes,

"I have felt the more hurt at this attempt to supercede my work with the publick, from having always considered it as a peculiar offering to my countrymen, whose good opinion, however the contrary may have been insinuated, has never ceased to be the leading object of my ambition, and the dearest wish of my heart, and I must confess that, in assiduously labouring at this history of the first discovery of our country, I have been chiefly animated by the hope, that the interest of the subject would cause the work to remain among my countrymen, and with it a remembrance of the author, when all the frail productions of his fancy might have perished and been forgotten.

FIRE! The Lafayette Theatre, in Laurens street, New-York, with several adjacent buildings, was entirely destroyed by fire yesterday morning. The whole damage occasioned by the fire is estimated at $200,000. The Theatre was owned by Henry Yates, Esq. and was not insured.

Solomon Southwick has turned missionary—not christian—but anti-masonick. He goes east, west, north, or south; any where and any way to accommodate his friends and get an "honest penny." There should be a new order of priesthood created for the especial benefit of anti-masonry, and Solomon should be made chief—his profound veneration for sacred things would enable him to exercise a powerful influence in favour of religion!

The house of representatives of Pennsylvania legislated a little lately on Webster's dictionary, Cobb's spelling book, and the Bible. Attempts were made to buy some of each, at the publick expense, for the use of the members, but they failed. We wish the legislature of New-York would buy Cobb's book and the Bible for the benefit of the anti-masonick "Spartans" belonging to their "honourable body." The spelling book would be of great service to their logick; and the Bible would no doubt prove very satisfactorily that "anti-masonry sprung from the throne of God."

VARIETIES.

Denmark. It appears from the last census of the population of Denmark, at the close of 1828, that the number in the old Danish provinces was 1,521,278; in Holstein 374,745; in Launberg, 35,640; in Iceland, 49,826; in the Faroe Islands and Greenland, 11,240—in the West India Colonies, 46,290—making a total of 2,049,350. If to this be added the population of Danish Guinea and the East India settlements, it will amount to 2,100,000. Copenhagen contains a population of 104,674. The number of priests in Denmark Proper is 1,600, and about 800 more are scattered in the Faroe Islands, Iceland, Greenland, and the Colonies.

The French Scientific Expedition to Egypt. Letters have been received at Paris from different persons who form part of this expedition, to the middle of November; but we do not find that they contain accounts of any new discoveries of interest. In addition to the letters already published some of the French papers contain communications of less pretension, from other gentlemen, who appear to have been equally struck with the wonders of Egypt. It would seem from their descriptions of Cairo, that the gaieties and amusements of the French Palais Royal fall far short of the festivities of the Egyptian city.

Freedom of Education. Several societies in Paris have combined to offer a prize of 1500 francs for the best essay in favour of freedom of education. The principal topics to which they wish the competitors to direct their attention are, the right or expediency of the legislative, the executive, or any other publick authority intermeddling with education; the necessity for any precautions or regulations upon the subject; the evils which such supposed necessity has hitherto occasioned; and the best means by which those evils may henceforth be avoided.

Geneva. The following comparative table of the average duration of life at Geneva (Switzerland) during the last two hundred and sixty years, is very remarkable. The growing improvement affords a striking proof of the benefits resulting from the progress of civilization and the useful arts.

		Average duration.
From 1500 to 1600	- - - -	18 years	5 months.
1601 - 1700	- - - -	28	5
1701 - 1760	- - - -	32	8
1761 - 1800	- - - -	33	7
1801 - 1814	- - - -	38	6
1815 - 1826	- - - -	38	10

Commercial Enterprise. During the domination of Bonaparte, sugar, coffee, tobacco, cotton-twist, &c. were sent by sea from London to Salonica (in European Turkey,) whence these goods were carried on horses and mules, across Servia and Hungary, into the whole of Germany, and even into France; so that goods were consumed at Calais, coming from England, only seven leagues distant, which goods had made a circuit equivalent, as far as expense went, to a voyage twice round the world!

English Language in Germany. The best proof how much the English language is now liked and understood in Germany is, that there was published, for this year, at Heidelberg (Grand Duchy of Baden,) an English Almanack, under the following title: the English Fireside upon the Banks of the Rhine: an Almanack for the year 1829; exhibiting a Choice of English and German Tales, Poems, and Historical Anecdotes, selected by J. Hedmann, M. A.; embellished with superb Engravings. Besides this, most of the best English classicists, old and new ones, have been reprinted in Germany at very low prices.

Constantinople. It appears by a calculation made so recently as August last, that the population of Constantinople, including all the suburbs which had been variously estimated at from 400,000 to 600,000,—does not exceed 380,000; and that the number of houses, of every description, is about 85,000. The number of persons capable of bearing arms in Constantinople, in proportion to the entire population, is said to be very small.

Fishing in Winter. It is the opinion of two celebrated French ichthyologists, M. M. Bloch, and Lacepede, that the mackarel, and some other gregarious fishes, do not, as is commonly believed, migrate from their respective seas, but merely quit the vicinity of the shores at the approach of winter, and lie amongst the mud, at the bottom of deep winter, till revived by the warmth of the ensuing spring.

STATE TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

At a meeting of gentlemen from different parts of the state, held at the Supreme Court room in the Capitol, on Thursday the 2d of April, for the purpose of organizing a State Temperance Society—

The meeting was called to order by the Rev. Dr. Proudfit, of Salem, and after a few appropriate remarks, on his motion, the Hon. John Woodworth, of the city of Albany, was appointed chairman. On motion of Mr. John T. Norton, B. P. Johnson, esq. was appointed secretary.

On motion of Mr. Hubbell, of the assembly, seconded by the Rev. Mr. Hewett, Resolved, that it is expedient to form a State Temperance Society, on the principles of the American Temperance Society.

Both of the above gentlemen made able and eloquent addresses in support of this resolution.

On motion of S. M. Hopkins, esq. of Albany, seconded by Mr. Skinner, of the assembly, a constitution which he presented to the meeting, was adopted.

On motion of Mr. Mather, of the senate, seconded by Mr. Beach, of Auburn, a committee was appointed to nominate suitable persons for officers.

The committee retired a short time, and on their return, Dr. Proudfoot, from said committee, reported the names of the following gentlemen for officers, which report was unanimously agreed to.

Hon. Reuben H. Walworth, of Albany, President.

John Watts, jr. M. D., of New-York, William Jay, of Westchester, David Buel, jr. of Troy, Asa Fitch, of Salem, Henry Huntington, of Rome, Ben Johnson, of Ithaca, Henry Dwight, of Geneva, Ashley Sampson, of Rochester, Vice Presidents.

John F. Bacon, E. C. Delavan, Ananias Platt, Henry Trowbridge, Friend Humphrey, Richard V. De Witt, Archibald Campbell, Executive Committee.

T. W. Olcott, of Albany, Treasurer,

William C. Miller, Recording Secretary.

Israel Smith, Auditor.

Chancellor Walworth rose and signified his acceptance of the office of president, to which he had been appointed.

JOHN WOODWORTH, Ch'n.

B. P. JOHNSON, Sec'y.

Substance of Chancellor Walworth remarks on accepting the office of president.

He expressed his regret, that other duties would prevent him from bestowing much of his time upon the important objects for which the society had been organized. But he said he would take that occasion to express his entire concurrence in what had already been stated by those who addressed the meeting. That the immoderate use of ardent spirits was the direct cause of disease and suffering, in a great variety of cases; no one could doubt but he could testify from experience, that even a moderate use was not necessary either for comfort or health. He said he had not drank a gill of ardent spirits of any kind for five and twenty years; that during a considerable part of that time, he had resided in the cold climate of the North; that he had also travelled in the warmer regions of the South and West, and inhaled the noxious vapours which arise from the sluggish streams of the Illinois, the Oakaw, and the Wabash; that he had frequently been subjected to great bodily fatigue, and exposed to the inclemency of the weather; but in none of these situations had he found it necessary to resort to the use of ardent spirits, even as a medicine. He added, that he had travelled in that part of the United States where the use of ardent spirits is carried to the greatest excess, in a sickly season, when disease and death were found in nearly every house, and he was told it would be impossible to preserve his health unless spirits were mixed with the water he drank; but that the contrary was the fact. He would not say that ardent spirits were never useful as a medicine; but he had no hesitation in expressing his belief that the use of them was never absolutely necessary, and he had no doubt it was generally deleterious to health. He said he could also testify as to the demoralizing effects of ardent spirits: that during the five years in which he presided in the higher criminal courts of this state, it had been his painful duty to consign many of the unfortunate victims of intemperance to the state prison, and some to the gallows: that from the facts disclosed in the course of judicial investigations, he had been able in at least three-fourths of all the cases of convictions before him, to charge the commission of the crime, directly or indirectly, to the use of ardent spirits. And he concluded by saying, that he considered it the duty of every friend of humanity, to exert whatever influence he possessed to stay this physical and moral pestilence, which is spreading through the land, and filling the country with disease and crime.

FOREIGN NEWS. By late arrivals at New-York, Liverpool papers to the 3d of March have been received. The following are the principal items of interest.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer in answer to a question put to him by Lord John Russell in the House of Commons on the 27th of February, stated, that it was the intention of some one member of his Majesty's Government to make an explanation on the FIFTH OF MARCH of the nature of the measure which his Majesty's Government had in contemplation with respect to the removal of the Catholic disabilities.

Both Houses of Parliament were daily occupied for a considerable portion of time in receiving petitions for, and against the Catholic claims. A warm election had taken place at Oxford for a member of Parliament from the University—Sir Robert Inglis succeeded against Mr. Peel, whose defeat is attributed to the fact of his favouring the Bill intended to be introduced for the relief of the Catholics, and so warm was the election on that ground that the neighbours of Sir Robert Peel (the father of the Cabinet Minister) voted against Mr. Secretary Peel by request of Sir Robert, and the Clergy and other strong personal friends of the Secretary voted against him, expressing their confidence in his integrity, but considering him under the irresistible influence of the Duke of Wellington and a majority of the Ministry. The result of this election it was thought would have an effect on the provisions of the bill to be introduced for removing the Roman Catholic disabilities. The death of His Holiness Pope Leo XII was announced at Vienna on the 16th February. The Russians and Turks were busily employed in preparing for a vigorous campaign.

Russia insists on her original terms, viz: The freedom of the Black Sea; the observance of treaties by the Porte, and compensation for her expenses.

The Greek towns were said to be rising from their ruins. Mr. O'Connell and the English Catholics had been reconciled.

He was about setting out for Calais to evade a call to the House of Commons.

The borough of Westbury had been resigned to Mr. Peel after he lost his election at Oxford. Sir Manasse Massé Lopez had resigned in his favour.

NAPLES, Feb. 5. The Ambassadors of the three Powers now in this city have frequent conference, and are said to have sent a report to their Courts a few days ago. It is affirmed that they propose in it not to unite Candia with the Greek territory. A Courier is sent every week from this city to Greece, and some also arrive from that country.

The Catholic Association was dissolved on the 12th of February.

LIMITS OF GREECE. On the continent the line is to run from Arta to Volo, the Greeks are to keep the Cyclades Islands.

The King of England is to decide who shall hold Candia and Samos. Greece is to pay 40,000 sterling annual tribute in lieu of the Turkish property which will thus come into its possession.

The President of Greece has ordered an assembly of the Panhellenion.

Fire at York Minster. Jonathan Martin is fully committed to take his trial for having wilfully set fire to York Minster. After the depositions of the witnesses had been taken, he made the following confession in the most cool and collected manner possible: "I set fire to the Minster in consequence of two remarkable dreams. I dreamt that one stood by me with a bow and a sheaf of arrows, and he shot one through the Minster door. I said I wanted to try to shoot, and he presented me the bow. I took an arrow from the bow and shot, but the arrow hit the flag, and I lost it. I also dreamt that a large thick cloud came over the minster, and extended to my lodgings. From these things I thought that I was to set fire to the Minster. I took them things away with me, for fear somebody else should be blamed. I cut off the fringe and tassels from the pulpit and the Bishop's throne, or what you call it, for I don't know the names, as a witness against me to show that I had done it by myself." He delivered this explanation in a tone and manner which seemed to bespeak the absence of all feeling on the subject. After it had been reduced to writing and read over to him, he with the utmost readiness pointed out a trifling deviation from his statement, saying, "That's wrong, sir." Upon suggesting his correction, and the altered document being read, he said, "That is all right," and on being asked to come to the table to sign it, he did so with great firmness. The several witnesses were then bound in their own recognizances to prosecute and give evidence, and Martin was committed to the city jail under the provisions of Act 60th, Geo. III. at 1st Geo. chap. 14.—Hull Packet.

Colonel William King, who has been absent since the commencement of the winter, arranging his concerns in Arkansas, whither he went by the advice and consent of his bail, has returned, and is now awaiting his trial, at his residence in Youngstown. Let this be compared with the infamously slanderous assertion which has gone the round of the anti-masonic papers, that this gentleman had fled the country, and left his bail in the lurch. [Craftsman.]

ANTI-MASONICK SAYINGS. The bombast of the scribblers about anti-masonry is as ridiculous as a Spanish proclamation. One of them says that "glory and triumph await them—that Connecticut has started up as if a great bugle had sounded—that political Anti-masonry in Massachusetts is like a fire in a forest—that Vermont is crackling, thinking and seeing."—Southwick says that "Anti-masonry sprung from the throne of God!" and Whiskerando declared that the corpse of poor Timothy Monro would make "a good enough Morgan till after election!" These sayings are all of a piece. [Rochester Republican.]

HARD NAMES. The political Anties are extending their plan of attack. They have now pointed their artillery at the Odd Fellows and Phi Beta Kappa societies. This may create some trouble in the camp, as it is rumoured our trusty village treasurer, (Dr. "F. F. B.") that pillar of Anti-masonry, is himself a brother of the Phi Beta Kappa tribe. It is expected that he will "renounce" forthwith, and "excitement" be raised against the Phi Beta Kappatarians, as, whether their society be diabolical or not, it certainly has a very "hard name." (Vide the speech of Bates Cooke, "the happy man," in the Anti-masonic Convention.)

We learn that governor Southwick held forth at Union Village last week; and that previous to the delivery of his speech, several printed copies which he had brought along with him for sale, were hawking about the town at fifty cents each. It consisted of the usual tirade against all who were not his followers. [Saratoga Sentinel]

DIED,

In this city, on Thursday, the 9th inst., ELIZA, consort of JOHN M. NEWTON, aged 23 years.

From the Albany Argus of yesterday.

DEATH OF MR. GROSS.

At the opening of the House yesterday, immediately after prayer, Mr. EDEKATON announced the death of the Hon. EZRA C. GROSS, member of that body from Essex county. Mr. E. accompanied the announcement with a brief but appropriate sketch of the character of the deceased. This having been unanimously passed, and a committee of arrangements appointed, the House adjourned.

Mr. Gross expired at his room in the Albany Coffee House, at half past 8 o'clock yesterday morning, after a few days illness of delirium tremens. He was in his seat in the house on Saturday, and temporarily occupied the speaker's chair for a short time on that day.

Mr. G. was in the 39th year of his age. At the early age of 26 he was elected to the Congress of the U. S. from the district comprising the counties of Essex, Clinton, &c. There he distinguished himself, and gave the promise of a brilliant and useful career. He has been returned to the Assembly of this state from Essex for the two past years. He possessed great intellectual powers. He was a debater of rare talent and originality; and seldom rose in the house without arresting entire attention. But the tongue of eloquence is mute; and talent and wit have gone down prematurely to the tomb!

THE IRISH SHIELD, FOR MARCH.

Contents.—History of Ireland, Chapter III. and IV. Ossianick Fragments, No. I. (translated from the ancient Irish of M'Dairry, for the Shield.) Literary and Biographical Notices of Irish Authors and Artists, No. VI. (The Rev Arthur O'Leary.) Irish Topography, No. III. (Local and Historical Sketches of the Islands of Scattery.) Ecclesiastical Edifices of Dublin, No. III. (St. Andrew's, and other Churches.) Essay on the Ancient Architecture of Ireland, No. I. Grecian Females and Manners, No. III. (translated from the French.) Desultory Thoughts on the Poverty and Prosperity of Poets, Extract from Kathleen O'Neil, an Irish Historical Play, Grand Celebration of St. Patrick's Day, by the Friends of Civil and Religious Liberty in the city of New-York, Irish Affairs—Part of a Speech of Mr. O'Connell, at a meeting of the Catholic Association. Mr. Steele, Mr. Shiel, Postscript; Original Patch Work, The Drama.—(Madame Feron and Madames Knight and Austin.) Poetry.—An Ossianick Garland, Translation from the Italian of a Sonnet by Milton, A Sentimental Sonnet.

Published monthly, by Caleb Bartlett, 76, Bowery, New-York. Terms, $3.50 a year, in advance.

ALBANY TYPE FOUNDRY.—The subscribers, successors to R. STARR & Co. in the above foundry, continue the business in its various branches, and are prepared to execute orders for the following type, at the regular prices, on a credit of six months, or at a discount of 7 1/2 per cent, for cash, viz:

Roman and Italics—Twenty, Fourteen, Ten, Eight, Seven, Five and Four lines Pica, Canon, Double Pica, Double Great Primer, Double English, Double Small Pica, Great Primer, English, Pica, Small Pica, Long Primer, Bourgeois, Brevier, Minion, Nonpareil, Pearl.

Two line letters—Pica, Small Pica, Long Primer, Bourgeois, Brevier, Minion, Nonpareil, Pearl.

Full face capitals—Small Pica, Long Primer, Bourgeois, Brevier, Minion.

Antiques—Ten and Eight lines Pica roman, Five line Pica italic, Four line Pica, Double Great Primer, Double Small Pica, Great Primer, and Pica with lower case; and Long Primer, Brevier and Nonpareil.

Books—Five line Pica, Double Small Pica, Two line Brevier, and Two line Nonpareil.

Tables—Double Small Pica.

Checks—Five line Pica, Double Small Pica, Great Primer, Pica Long Primer.

Open Blacks—Five line Pica, Double Small Pica, Great Primer.

Head letters—Six line Pica ornamented, Two line Brevier and Two line Nonpareil double shade; Two line Nonpareil meridian shade; Double Great Primer, Two line Brevier, Two line Nonpareil, and One line Brevier, single shade; Two line Minion and Two line Pearl italic single shade; Double Small Pica roman, and One line Brevier italic Antique shaded.

Script—English, on inclined body, (cast on a new plan.)

Greek—Pica.

Borders and Flowers—From Six line Pica to Pearl, all cast in copper matrices.

Checks—Canon and Double English, plain and opened.

Fractions and Leaders of all sizes, from English to Pearl, English, Pica and Long Primer Pica Fractions; Spanish and French Accents, and Accented Vowels, Figure Vowels, Superior Figures, Dashes, and Astronomical and other Signs, of various sizes; Long Primer Space Rules. Also, Leads ten to Pica, and thicker; Quotations; Brass Rules, &c. and Ornaments and Cuts, in great variety.

Printing materials of every description, and of the first quality, at the lowest prices—Cases, Stands, (an improved pattern,) Galleys, Composing sticks, Chases of all sizes, improved newspaper Chases, in two parts Ball, stocks and skins, Bodkins, Furniture, &c. and, Prout's and Johnson's Printing Ink, constantly on hand. Presses of all kinds furnished at the manufacturers' prices. Wells' Improved presses will be kept constantly on hand, and may be examined at the foundry.

Large additions in the variety of type have been made since the specimen of this foundry was published of which specimens are now nearly completed and will soon be sent to printers; the punches of which are cut by the senior partner of this firm, whose reputation as a superior setter and well established; and the whole business being managed under immediate superintendence, no pains is spared to make our type in every way worthy the attention of printers. An important improvement in the composition of the type-metal has also been made, by adding some other ingredients being added, which render it both stronger and lighter, and of a finer grain. Type cast at this foundry is warranted to be as solid as any cast in the country, and that they will not settle in height from the pressure in using. Particular care is also taken to have the type well dressed, and the founts regularly put up.

Old type is received in exchange for new, at 10 cents per lb. Orders, by mail, or left at the foundry, No. 8 Liberty-st, will receive prompt attention.

STARR & LITTLE.

The type upon which this paper is printed was cast at the above foundry.

POETRY.

From Grol's T. of the Great St. Bernard.

THE GITANA'S* SONG.

No! tell me not of lordly halls—
My minstrels are the trees;
The moss and the rocks are my tapestried walls,
Earth's sounds my symphonies.

There's musick sweeter to my soul
In the weed by the wild wind fanned,
In the heave of the surge, than ever stole
From the mortal minstrel's hand.

There's musick in the city's hum,
Heard in the noon-tide glare—
When its thousand mingling murmurs come,
On the breast of the sultry air.

There's musick in the forest stream,
As it plays through the deep ravine,
Where never summer's breath or beam,
Has pierced its woodland screen.

There's mighty musick in the roar
Of the oaks on the mountain's side,
When the whirlwind bursts on the foreheads hoar,
And the lightnings flash blue and wide.

There's mighty musick in the swell
Of the winter's midnight wave—
When all above is the thunder peal,
And all below is the grave.

There's musick in the dawning morn,
When the lark his pinion dries—
In the rush of the breeze through the dewy corn,
In the garden's perfumed sighs.

There's musick on the twilight cloud,
When the clanging wild swans spring,
And homeward the screaming ravens crowd,
Like squadrons on the wing.

There's musick in the solemn sweep
Of the mountain water-fall,
As its billows struggle, and foam and leap,
From the brow of its marble wall.

There's musick in the depth of night,
When the world is still and dim,
And the stars flame out in their pomp of light,
Like thrones of the cherubim.

There's musick in all, earth, ocean, air;
From the tempest's thunder roll,
To the breath of the evening prayer—
'Tis the musick of the soul!

* Spanish word for Gipsy.

THE FISHER GIRL.

BY BERNARD BARTON.

"Let not ambition mock their useful toil,
Their homely joys, or destiny obscure;
Nor grandeur hear with a disdainful smile,
The short but simple annals of the poor."

My home is on the ocean's shore,
My father's cot beside the wave;
Where winds of winter loudest roar,
And crested billows hoarsest rave.
My brothers, beautiful and brave!
At Trafalgar, by Nelson's side,
Too early won a watery grave,
And fell in boyhood's pride.

Ill could my mother's heart sustain
A blow so sudden and severe;
She died! and I alone remain
My Sire's else childless home to cheer:
I wept, but he could shed no tear,
Though I might hear his stifled groan,
When slowly from my mother's bier
He turned to me—alone!

But poverty, whate'er its grief,
Must labour for its daily bread;
Its hours of mourning must be brief
However dear the humble dead.
And childhood's tear, though freely shed,
Is soon forgotten—day by day,
As o'er our lowly roof it sped,
Some sorrow stole away.

And now I would not change my lot
For that of wealth's most splendid home;
More dear to me our sea-side cot
Peace than for grandeur's proudest, loftiest dome;
Where, hour by hour I roam,
Not only met with the aboriginal foam,
Members of the fraternity, but and free.
Sensations still more fulsome and on high
Is clear, that not moral evils, with the breeze,

Are lovelier to my partial eye
Than verdant clumps of leafy trees;
The solemn sound of tossing seas,
The Fisher's song, the Gull's loud cry,
My childish fancy better please
Than inland melody.

Then think me not of hope forlorn,
Or weighed by toil and sorrow down;
With basket on my arm, each morn
I gaily seek the market town:
None greet me with an angry frown,
But all my humble labours aid;
Pity the king who wears a crown,
But not the fisher maid.

From the London New Monthly Magazine.

THE PARTED YEAR.

I stood upon the sunless shore
Beside oblivion's sea,
And saw its sluggish waves break o'er
The by-gone yesterday—
The last of the departed year
Join in the lapse of time's career,
The passed eternity.

It was a melancholy sight
To see it part from day,
And dim among the depths of night
Fade with its dreams away,—
And dark and shapeless with it go
A thousand hopes, once rich in glow,
Born in its hour's decay.

A cold thrill to my feeling taught
How much there was of mine
Gone with that year, of perished thought,
And ill delayed design,
A part, too, of the vital flame
Quenched beneath time's incessant stream,
A march towards decline.

From out these waves no palmy isle
Uphears its sunny head,
Where shipwreck Hope may light her smile,
Boundless, and drear and dead,
The billows break without a roar,
"Nameless" is stamped upon the shore,
And "Death"—there all is dead!

And Love turns trembling from the sight,
Hiding his face with fear,
And beauty shrinks in pale affright,
And Fame stands silent near,
And Glory's laurels shrink and die,
Changeless alone one brow and eye,
But they are of Despair.

All watch the last skirts of the year,
The wreck of minutes done,
In those deep waters disappear
For ever from the sun,
Leaving a dead tranquility,
As when a mighty ship at sea
Has just gone wildly down.

From the New-York American.

SULIOTE WAR SONG.

I.
'Twas morn! and the mountain peaks
Were vizzored with purple light,
When the deep glen rung,
And the war shout sprung,
Unbroken from height to height.

II.
Each Suliote knew the sound
That summoned his ready band
And they rushed along,
To their battle song,
Like waves to a stormy strand.

III.
The Arnaut host had neared
A pass of the guarded glen,
When the loud steel clashed,
And the hot blood plashed,
In the trample of Suli's men!

IV.
Through the Albanese reeling ranks
The mountain men came down,
As wild winds sweep
Through the forest deep,
When the autumn leaves are brown.

V.
And the countless crescents that shone
Through billows of boiling blood,
Seemed—so broken and bright—

Like reflected light,
On the eve-empurpled flood.

VI.
There were blood-filled turbans there,
And many a broken brand
Lay scattered around
The bleeding ground,
Fast clenched in the lifeless hand!

VII.
Then shout for the conquering men,
Besprent with that gory rain,
As lions appear
When the slaughtered deer
Lie strewed on the smoking plain.

VIII.
They stood like their own wild hills,
Unhurt while tempest rides,
While the lightnings flash
And the thunders crash
Around their mighty sides.

SIGMA.

ALBANY BRUSH TRUNK AND BANOBOX MANUFACTORY.—NORRIS TARBELL, No. 453 South Market street, (opposite the Connecticut Coffee-House.) Keeps constantly on hand, for sale, the above named articles, at low prices. Those who wish to purchase, will please to call and examine for themselves. Cash paid for clean combed Hogs' Bristles. Albany, March 4, 1829.

FRANKLIN LETTER FOUNDRY. The proprietors of this Foundry, offer on liberal terms, the following articles, viz:—
Roman and Italic. Fourteen, Twelve, Ten, Eight, Seven, Six, Five, and Four Lines Pica, plain, Canon, Meridian, Double Great Primer, Double English, Double Small Pica, Great Primer, English Pica, Small Pica, Long Primer, Bourgeois, Breveir, Minion, Nonpareil, Pearl.

Two Line Letter. Minion, and all larger, Nonpareil, Pearl. Full Face. English and Pica, Small Pica, Long Primer, Bourgeois, Breveir, Minion.

Borders and Flowers of every kind.

Antiques. Ten and Six Lines, Four Lines Pica, Double Great Primer, English and Pica, Long Primer, Breveir, Minion, Nonpareil.

Blacks. Four Lines Pica, Double Great Primer, Double Small Pica, Great Primer, English and Pica, Small Pica, Long Primer.

Open Blacks. Great Primer, Double Great Primer, and Four Lines Pica.

Italians. Seven Lines Pica, Five Lines Pica.

Tuscan. Eight Lines Pica, Four Lines Pica.

Shaded Letter. Eight Lines Pica, Four Lines Pica, Double Great Primer, Two Lines Breveir, Two Lines Nonpareil, Eight Lines Pica; Ornamented, Six Lines Pica, Ornamented.

Leads. Six to pica and thicker. Seven to pica, Eight to pica.

Quotations; Space Rules, from one to eight ems, Long Primer; Astronomical, and other signs; Spanish and French Accents; Fractions; Composing Sticks from twenty to four inches in length; Cases, Chases; Slice, Brass, and common Galleys; Iron and Mahogany Furniture; Presses; and Skins; parchment; points Presses also furnished.

Several new founts of letter have been cut; and it has been the aim of the proprietors to combine the beauty of the modern, with the clearness and durability of the ancient style of typography, and to produce types at once handsome, legible, and useful. Specimens of these will be sent to printers. The greatest care has been taken in the composition of the metal with which all their founts of letter are cast.

All orders, either by letter or otherwise, left at their Counting Room No. 41, State-street, or at their Foundry, Eagle-street, south of State street, will receive prompt attention. A. W. KINSLEY & Co.

Albany, Feb. 14, 1829.

FINE CUTLERY, &c.—JAMES DICKSON, Cutler and Surgical Instrument Maker, No. 3 Beaver street, (formerly at No. 98 North Market street) Albany, manufactures and repairs all kinds of instruments in the above branches, with neatness, accuracy and dispatch, and warranted equal to any article imported, or manufactured in the United States.

Shears, Scissors, Razors and Penknives, ground and finished on an improved plan, and warranted to excel any other in use in this city or elsewhere.

Currier's Steels constantly on hand, and warranted a superior article.

Blades inserted in knife-handles in the most approved style, and most reasonable terms. Locks repaired.

N. B. Country orders punctually attended to.

Albany, Feb. 14, 1829.

BOOK BINDING. Sign of the Golden Ledger, corner of State and North Market-streets, Albany. WILLIAM SEYMOUR, carries on the above business in all its branches; viz: plain, extra, and super-extra—has a first rate ruling machine, and other necessary implements for manufacturing Blank Books of every description, on the most reasonable terms, of the best workmanship.

An assortment on hand. Subscribers to the American Masonick Record can have their volumes handsomely bound in boards, with leather backs and corners, at 62 1/2 cents a volume. Feb 14

PAINTING AND GLAZING.—The subscriber respectfully informs his friends and the public that he continues the House and Sign Painting and Glazing, at the old stand, No. 299, corner of North Market and Steuben streets, where he will accommodate the public with any article in his line. Paints in pots mixed ready for use, of the first quality, can be had at any time. Personal attention will be paid to all orders. March 9, 1829. JOHN F. PORTER.

THIS PAPER

Is published every Saturday, by E. B. CHILD,

AT THE CORNER OF NORTH MARKET AND STEUBEN

STREETS, ALBANY, N. Y.

TERMS—To city subscribers, Three Dollars a year. To subscribers who receive their papers by mail, Two Dollars

and Fifty Cents, in ADVANCE—otherwise, Three Dollars

JOB PRINTING neatly executed at this office.

AMERICAN MASONICK RECORD

AND ALBANY SATURDAY MAGAZINE.

VOL. III.

ALBANY, N. Y. SATURDAY, APRIL 18, 1829.

NO. 12.

MASONICK RECORD.

THE PROTEST

Of Members of the Masonick Institution in the county of Ulster, and their APPEAL TO THE PUBLICK.

Fellow Citizens—The time has arrived when it has become our duty to address you. High and unfounded charges have been preferred against us as masons, as men, and as christians. These we design to repel. We address you in defence of our reputations and our rights; which are dear and sacred to us, as individuals and as members of this community. We ask not to array you under our banners; nor do we desire to enlist passion or prejudice in our favour. We ask only to be dispassionately heard, while we appeal to your judgement in the language of candour and truth.

For a long time—perhaps too long—we have witnessed in uncomplaining silence, though with extreme regret and mortification, that these charges have been forced into extensive circulation, with the most unexampled zeal and untiring perseverance. Of the motives of those who, at this time, are carrying on a war of extermination against Freemasonry, we shall not speak. Doubtless they are various.

We regret that our opposers have not adhered to the lofty pretensions to "honesty of purpose and fairness of investigation" with which they started; and to the assurances they gave, that "while they combatted" what they called "the errors and follies of a useless institution, private character and individual rights should be sacredly regarded." These assurances have not been realized. It is obvious to the most common observer, that the warfare is carried on against us, by heated and inflammatory appeals to ignorance and prejudice, rather than by cool and rational investigation; until at last it is resolved, that every man belonging to this order is unworthy of public confidence and trust. In the illusive work of fancied reform, they are endeavouring to bind down freedom of opinion, and are trampling under foot even the rights of those in no way connected with the institution, because they hesitate or refuse to support their measures of questionable origin and purpose, and of doubtful tendency and expediency. None are allowed to look back at the institution, and enquire if it is right and proper to array themselves against the order or against its members. The right of inquiry is denied. All who do not conform to their views are denounced, and nothing short of unconditional submission can suffice.

We shrink not from investigation. We do not object to decent and rational discussion. We have no wish to abridge the rights of others. We seek not to restrain any one in the full enjoyment of his privileges and immunities. We war not with private or public opinion, whatever it may be. Yet having, as we trust, ever manifested in all our relations in life, our solemn sense of our accountability to God and our country, we do not thus merit indiscriminate denunciation and proscription. The institution of freemasonry has existed long, and has eminently received the sanction of the great and good. Its precepts enjoin us to bear, with unresisting patience, the reproaches of its enemies, from whatever cause their opposition may proceed. But we are assailed not only as masons but as men. Our rights as citizens are sought to be taken from us. Our moral and religious principles are questioned. Our characters are daily and openly assailed. It is declared that our meetings are a "shield and cover to crime"—our arms "the weapons of death"—our practice "impiety and sacrilege;" and that with us "murder is a duty, defamation a system, and vengeance a sworn obligation!"

We have therefore thought it a solemn duty that we owe not only to ourselves, our families, our friends and our posterity, but also to you, to enter our protest against such charges, and to make this appeal. The senseless, vulgar and unmeaning abuse with which we are pursued, we leave to correct itself. We are furnished with a sufficient protection against its malignity by the very absurdity in which it is enveloped, and which must render it disgusting and loathsome to every well regulated and candid mind. Many things are alleged against us which are neither tangible nor definite, and which can, therefore, neither be proved nor disproved. "Much has been exhibited to the world, purporting to be disclosures of the secrets of masonry, which is shocking to the feelings of the christian and philanthropist, and which, if true, would have driven from its pale long ere this every member possessing the least moral principle or refinement." To answer every particular of these charges would be an endless task, exceeding all reasonable bounds and limits, and which, therefore, we think cannot be required of us. But to all those which have been thus directly brought against us, we give an absolute and unqualified denial. The prominent ones shall receive a more particular notice.

We are charged with holding principles at variance with religion and virtue. This, in the sincerity of our hearts, we declare to be unfounded. The principles of the institution inculcate pure morality and virtue—peace on earth and good will towards men—devotion to God, and fervent charity. Not, as is ignorantly affirmed, a charity limited in its exercise; but embracing all mankind. A charity which forbids us to shut up our bowels of compassion to the entreaties even of our foes. Which teaches us not to "execute vengeance," but to exercise forbearance; not to "defame" friends or enemies, or to speak evil of any. A charity which requires us to do good to ALL, but more especially to the brotherhood.

Nor does masonry inculcate any new doctrines. It does in no respect pretend to supersede the word of God, or to set up claims to equality with the christian religion. We know not, nor have we ever heard or known of the existence of such doctrines amongst masons. Nor do we believe that they now do or ever have existed. Many eminently pious men have heretofore been, and still are connected with this society, who would never have countenanced or supported any thing opposed to the pure principles of christianity.

It is also charged upon us that the institution has an undue influence in politics. This we also deny. Political subjects are not allowed even a discussion within the walls of lodges. Our members belong to the various political parties. This, of itself, would render it impossible to bring its influence to the aid of either. And on this subject also we would appeal to your own observation. Have you not known members of the same lodge politically opposed to each other? Have you not known them, at all times, to enjoy, as freely as others, their political opinions and rights in opposition to those who belonged to their order? Have you not observed them, not only to vote, but also to exert all their political influence against candidates who were members of the institution, and at the same time warmly to support in opposition to them those who were not masons? Reflect for a moment; and we presume you will yourselves pronounce this charge unfounded.

It is also charged that masonry interferes with and obstructs the administration of justice, and the execution of the laws, and that it has a controlling influence even in the jury box. We most solemnly declare that we have never known or heard of any instance of the kind; nor is such conduct warranted by any principle of the order. And we further declare that the principles of the institution require of every member, that he should not only be a peaceable and orderly subject of the government under which he may live, but enjoins it upon him to render a cheerful and ready obedience to its laws. In accordance with these principles we could never countenance crime, or lend our protection to its perpetrators. On the contrary, we have always considered it our imperious duty to bring to justice every offender against the laws of our country. And according to our knowledge of the institution, we unhesitatingly declare that it affords no protection to murder or treason, and is in no respect a sanctuary for crime of any grade or degree. What corruptions may have crept in elsewhere we know not; and we trust that we cannot be held responsible for the abuse or corruption which designing men in any particular place, may have committed or introduced for their own sinister purposes. The true principles of the order we believe to be the same now as they were centuries ago—as they were when the institution was first founded. To these principles we adhere. Let the institution be judged accordingly, and let its members accordingly be acquitted or condemned. But let not the innocent suffer because bad men may have crept in unawares, and have been guilty of a flagrant violation of the laws. No society, civil or religious, could exist on any other principle, or could stand a test as severe as that which our opposers apply to us.

In relation to the abduction of William Morgan, and the violence committed on his person and against the laws, we possess no other information than yourselves. We have never received any information, directly or indirectly, except through the same channel with the publick at large. From what we have thus obtained, we are, however, constrained to believe, that a lawless outrage has been committed; but by whom—to what extent—under what circumstances, or when or where, we know not more than yourselves. We trust that we will be credited when we say that it has been committed contrary to every known principle of our Order; that we reprobate and deplore the act as sincerely as any other members of this community, and that we do as anxiously hope that the offenders, although they may be of our Order, may yet be brought to justice.

As to the allegation that the most important offices in our government have been held by Masons, we will only say they have been filled by virtuous citizens. We have reason to rejoice that so many of our Order, have, at all times, been deemed worthy to fill places of high trust and responsibility; and that, under the favour and guidance of a kind Providence, they have been the instruments of carrying out our beloved country safe through all perils and dangers; and of advancing her to prosperity and glory.

In her glory and prosperity we have a common interest with you all. We have like yourselves an interest in the stability and perpetuity of her institutions. We are fathers; We are husbands; We are brothers; We also are sons. Like yourselves, we have sprung from those, some of whom fought and bled for the blessings we enjoy: Some of whom have entered into their rest—but, of whom, others yet remain to admonish us that we are the descendants of FREEMEN, of pious and virtuous ancestors; and that we were born in a land of civil and religious liberty.

We have now spoken. We have addressed you as citizens, as men, and as christians. By your judgement we are willing to abide. We have not, nor shall we seek a controversy with any. We have spoken that we might be heard. We are men of like passions with yourselves. Our reputations are as dear to us, and our sensations are as acute when wrongfully accused. Judge then what would be your feelings, if you were placed in our situation, conscious of your innocence, and assailed with most unfounded calumny.

(Signed.) Peter A. Overbarg, R. A. and K. T., John Sudam, R. A., Lewis Mason, R. A., Chaucey Mason, R. A., Herman M. Romeyn, R. A., Edward Greene, R. A., Pierce Catlin, R. A., Henry J. Davis, R. A., Lewis Hale, R. A., John Beekman, R. A., Seth Couch, R. A., Ebenezer Hall, R. A., William Woodworth, R. A. and K. T., Joseph Castle, R. A., Henry S. Backus, R. A., Abraham Elmendorf, R. A., Isaac Levet, R. A., Peter R. Decker, R. A., Thomas M. Holt, R. A., Samuel Elmore, R. A., William Wise, R. A., Casparus Winfield, R. A., Reuben H. Hine, R. A., James Edmonds, M. E., Peter W. Short, M. M., William I. Kerr, F. C., Joseph Peet, M. M., Elias Stout, M. M., Lewis Edson, M. M., Joel Babcock, M. M., David S. McKinstry, William W. Gerow, D. A., Hartshorn, Daniel Hunt, Samuel S. Freer, M. M., Philip B. Masterson, David Demarest, Henry H. Clapp, Thomas Fowler, Isaac B. Bloom, James Holden, John Van Gaasbeck, jr., William M. Eckert, William N. McDonald, James Emenendorf, R. A., John Van Buren, W. M., Peter Elmendorf, F. M., John Chipp, F. M., Benjamin Schepmoes, M. M., Isaac Dubois, M. M., Matthew Stiles, M. M., Garret De Witt, James W. Baldwin, Philip Newkerk, Hiram Dubois, Cornelius I. Elmendorf, M. M., John C. Van Kuren, M. M., Caleb Meritt, M. M., William Swart, Jacob Snyder, John Trumpbour, John Kiersted, John T. Romeyn, M. M., Daniel A. Devo, Jacobus Hardenbergh, M. M., Derick Dubois, M. M., Samuel R. Reding, M. M., Martin M. Nor, M. M., John Tappen of Rhinebeck, George I. Peltz, Stephen McCarty, Lemuel Wheeler, William Kipp, Abram Persons, Egbert Dederick, Nottingham Ostrander, William S. Burhans, Jonathan Farrington, Alexander H. Smith, John I. Dumond, M. M., James Chipp, M. M., Hiram Green, R. A., Birdall Coruelli, R. A., Abraham Rose, R. A., John Howell, Wells Lake, M. M., William Waring, M. M., Samuel Johnson, W. Watkins, Jacob J. Schoonmaker, Alexander Cameron, William L. Jennings, John Relyea, Benjamin Relyea, Gilbert Mulford, Benjamin Aldriei, Lewis C. Dubois, Daniel A. Dayo, Albert Anderson, Daniel

Fowler, Henry Darling, R. A., David Wilklow, jr., Lewis Atkins, Philip Yapple, Ira Munson, Stephen S. Adece, Nathaniel Roos, Joel Hoorbeck, John L. Barnes, Peter P. Ockerman, Joseph Yapple, John Fuller, Samuel Aldrich, John Young, Jacob Ockerman, Ezekiel Deyo, Abraham G. Munson, Jabez Munson, Evert Decker, jr., Daniel R. Bond, Daniel Tuthill, jr. Simon Mullen, Jonathan, Baird, Frederick D. W. Atkins, Derick Rosa, Daniel N. Deyo, Matthew Rea, Nathan Harlow, John Vanderbergh, Abiel H. Hand, Jacob J. Hasbrouck, James Perrine, L. M. H. Butler, Jeronimus A. Secord, William Slater, Daniel Lefever, Philip S. Hasbrouck, Stephen I. Martino, Philip Dubois, Angus Cameron, James Hasbrouck, jr. Philip Hasbrouck, Constant Church, John Degroot, Abraham Jansen, Abraham Teller, Abraham J. Hardenbergh, David M'Kinstry, David M. Wherry, Henry M. Dupuy, Philip Van Keuren, Jacob Wiggins, Jacob R. Hardenbergh, Nicholas Hardenbergh, David Birch, Benjamin B. Hasbrouck, Henry Adece, Abraham T. Van Keuren, James N. Mitchell, Thomas Hart, Jacob Decker, Daniel Taylor, Henry Van Ness, Dubois Bruyn, Jacob H. Deyo, Benjamin R. Van Keuren, Isaac D. Terwilliger, William Hixon, R. A., Jacob E. Bogardus, M. M., Jacob A. Law, M. M., Charles Hartshorn, M. M., A. I. Gilchrist, M. M., David Patchin, M. M., Samuel N. Rockwell, M. M., Daniel Martin, jr. M. M., Benjamin R. Sevier, M. M., Milton L. Edson, M. M.

MASONICK CALENDAR.

[Regular meetings in the city of Albany, at the Masonick Hall.]
Temple Encampment, 2d Friday in each month.
Temple Chapter, 2d and 4th Tuesday in each month.
Temple Lodge, 1st and 2d Tuesday in each month.
Mount Vernon Lodge, 1st and 3d Thursday in each month.
Masters Lodge, 1st and 3d Wednesday in each month.

ODD FELLOWS' DEPARTMENT.

ODD FELLOWS' CALENDAR.

[Regular meetings in the city of Albany.]
Hope Lodge, Monday evening in each week, at Montgomery Hall.
Philanthropic Lodge, Wednesday evening in each week, corner of Lodge and State-streets, over Osborn and Grays.
Clinton Lodge, Friday evening in each week, Masonick Hall.

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

REMARKABLE PHENOMENON.

We have just conversed with a gentleman from Cumberland county, who informs us that, in boring through rock for salt water, a fountain of Petroleum, or volatile oil, was struck, at the depth of 130 feet. When the augur was withdrawn, the oil rushed up 12 or 14 feet above the surface of the earth, and it was believed that about 75 gallons were discharged per minute, forming quite a bold stream from the place to the Cumberland river, into which it discharged itself. The fountain or stream was struck four or five days previous to the departure of our informant, at which time the quantity of Petroleum discharged had not perceptibly diminished. Falling into Cumberland river, the volatile oil covered a considerable portion of the surface of the stream, for many miles below. If ignited, it would present a magnificent, if not an appalling spectacle.

British oil, which is extensively used as a medicine, is manufactured of Petroleum.

We have seen a specimen of this oil—it ignites freely, and produces a flame as brilliant as gas light.

Our informant states, that in the same neighbourhood in which this immense fountain of Petroleum has been discovered, Dr. John Croghan has succeeded, by boring, in obtaining an abundant supply of salt water, at a depth of more than 200 feet, which now rises about 25 feet above the ordinary level of the Cumberland river. The works, we are assured, will prove highly beneficial to the surrounding country, and profitable to the enterprising proprietor.

We add the following from Quincy's Lexicon Physico-Medicum:

[Petroleum, or oleum Petros. Rock Oil; a fluid bitumen or mineral oil, exuding from the clefts of rocks, or from the earth, or found floating on the surface of waters in different parts of Europe, and more plentifully in warmer countries; similar in its general properties to the oils extracted by distillation from bit coal, amber and solid bituminous members of the ore fluid Petrolea have been distinguished still more, name of Naptha, and the thicker by asphaltum, or Pisseltum. Their general virtues are those of stimulants, externally, in rheumatic pains, palsies, &c., and are sometimes prescribed internally in nervous complaints, and as diuretics.] [Louisville (Ky.) Advertiser.]

OHIO OIL STONE.

A committee of the Lancaster Mechanick's Beneficent Society, appointed to examine specimens of the Ohio Oil Stone, report that the quarry from which the stone is taken, contains a variety in colour and quality. One is like that found in the vicinity of Namur, but decidedly superior for the same purposes. Other specimens are of a finer quality. The committee express unanimously the opinion that the Ohio oil stone generally possesses "a peculiar uniformity of quality, which renders it decidedly preferable to the generality of Turkey oil stone thrown into our market."

FRICTION OF SCREWS AND SCREW-PRESSES.

An examination of the friction in screws having their threads of various forms, has led M. Poncelet to this very important conclusion, namely, that the friction in screws with square threads is to that of equal screws with triangular threads, as 2.90 to 4.78, proving a very important advantage of the former over the latter, relative to the loss of power incurred in both by friction. [Brande's Journal.]

FULMINATING POWDER.

According to M. Landgerbe, a mixture of two parts nitre, two parts neutral carbonate of potash, one part of sulphur, and six parts of common salt, all finely pulverized, makes a very powerful fulminating powder. M. Landgerbe adopts the extraordinary error of supposing that these preparations act with more force downwards, than in any other direction. [Bull. Univ.]

MATURATION OF WINE.

M. de St. Vincent, of Havre, states, from his own experience of long continuance, that when bottles containing wine are closed by tying a piece of parchment or bladder over their mouths, instead of using corks in the ordinary manner, the wine acquires, in a few weeks only, those qualities which is only given by age in the ordinary way after many years. [Nouveau Jour. de Paris.]

MANNERS AND CUSTOMS.

From General Miller's Memoirs.—Second edition.

BULL-FIGHTS AT LIMA.

The taste for bull-fights, introduced by the early Spaniards, is retained by their American descendants with undiminished ardour. The announcement of an exhibition of this kind produces a state of universal excitement. The streets are thronged, and the population of the surrounding country, dressed in their gayest attire, add to the multitudes of the city. The sport is conducted with an eclat that exceeds the bull-fights in every other part of South America, and perhaps even surpasses those of Madrid. The death of the bull, when properly managed, creates as much interest in the ladies of Lima, as the death of the hare to the English huntress, or the winning horse to the titled dames at Newmarket or Doncaster. Nor can the pugilistic fancy of England take a deeper interest in the event of a prize-fight, than the gentlemen of Lima in the scientific worrying of a bull. It is curious to observe how various are ideas of cruelty in different countries. The English, for instance, exclaim against the barbarity of the bull-fight, as compared with the noble sport of cock-fighting, badger-baiting, &c. But their enlightened horror could not exceed the disgust shown by a young South American, who witnessed a casual boxing-match between two boys in Hyde Park, surrounded and encouraged, as he expressed himself, by well-dressed barbarians. It is amusing to witness the complacency with which one nation accuses another of cruelty, without taking a glance at customs at home. The bulls destined for the ring are obtained principally from the woods in the valleys of Chincha, where they are bred in a wild state. To catch and drive them to Lima, a distance of sixty leagues, is a matter of no inconsiderable expense. A bull is given by each gremio, or incorporated trading company of the city. The gremios vie in decorating their donation, which is bedizened with ribbons and flowers; across its shoulders are suspended mantles richly embroidered with the arms of the gremio to which it belongs, all of which become the perquisite of the Toreador or Matador who slays the bull. The price of admission is four reals, or two shillings; but an additional charge is made for seats in the boxes; and the managers pay a considerable tax to government on every performance. Early in the afternoon of the day fixed upon for a bull-fight, every street leading to the amphitheatre is crowded with carriages, horsemen, and pedestrians. All are in the highest state of excitement, the highest glee, and in full dress. The business of the ring commences about two o'clock in the afternoon by a curious sort of prelude. A company of soldiers perform a despejo, or a military pantomime. The men having been previously drilled for that purpose, go through a variety of fanciful evolutions, forming the Roman and Greek crosses, stars, and figures, so describing a sentence, such as viva la patria, viva San Martin, or the name of any other person who happens to be at the head of the government. As a finale, the soldiers form a circle, face outwards, then advance towards the boxes, preserving their circular order, which they extend, until they approach close enough to climb up to the benches. Every movement is made to the sound of the drum; the effect is exceedingly good. A band of musick is likewise in attendance, and plays at intervals. The prelude being over, six or seven toreador enter the arena on foot, dressed in silk jackets of different colours, richly spangled or boarded with gold or silver lace. One or two of these men, and who are called matadores, are pardoned criminals, and they receive a considerable sum for every bull they kill. About the same time various amateurs, well mounted on steeds gaily caparisoned, fancifully and tastefully attired, present themselves. When all is prepared, a door is opened under the box occupied by the municipality, and a bull rushes from a pen. At first he gazes about, as if in surprise, but is soon put upon his mettle, by the waving of flags and the throwing of darts, crackers, and other annoyances. The amateur cavaliers display their horsemanship and skill in provoking and in eluding his vengeance, in order to catch the eye of some favourite fair one, and to gain the applause of their friends and the audience. They infuriate the animal by waving a mantle over his head, and when pursued they do not allow their horses to advance more than a few inches from the horns of the angry bull. When at full speed, they make their horse revolve upon his hind legs, and remain in readiness to make a second turn upon the animal. This operation is several times repeated with equal agility and boldness, and is called capear. The amateurs then promenade around to acknowledge the plaudits bestowed. The species of sparring on horseback with the bull, is practised only in South America. Indeed in no other part of the world is the training of the horses, or the dexterity of the horseman, equal to the performance of such exploits. Effigies made of skin and filled with wind, and others made of straw, in which are live birds, are placed in the arena. The bull tosses them in the air, but being made heavy at the base, they come to the ground always retaining an upright posture. The straw figures are furnished with fire-works, which are made to take fire when the birds escape from within, and it sometimes happens that the bull has the flaming and cracking figure upon his horns. Sometimes the bull is maddened by fire-works being fastened on him, which go off in succession. The crackers being expended, the animal usually stands gazing around with rolling tongue, panting sides, and eyes sparkling with rage. He is then faced by the principal matador, who holds a straight sword in one hand and a flag in the other; as the bull runs at him with full speed, the matador coolly, but with great celerity, takes one step to the left, holding the flag just over the spot he occupied when the bull took aim. Being foiled, the bull wheels round, and charges his tormentor a second time, who again skilfully eludes being caught on the horns: this is repeated about three times, to the great delight of the audience. At length the matador assumes a sort of fencing attitude, and at the critical moment, plunges his sword into the bull's neck, near to its shoulders, when it falls dead at his feet. Handkerchiefs are waved, and applauding shouts resound from every side. Four horses richly harnessed then appear. The dead bull is quickly fixed to traces, and dragged out at a gallop, cheered by continued acclamations.

"Four steeds that spurn the rein, as swift as shy, Hurl the dark bulk along, scarce seen in dashing by."

Other bulls are killed in the same way by successive matadores. One is generally despatched by means of a long knife grasped by the matador, so that when his arm is extended, the blade is perpendicular to the wrist. The bull being worried for a time, the matador, instead of receiving him on the point of a sword as before, steps one pace aside as the bull runs at him, and adroitly plunges the knife into the spinal marrow behind the horns, and the animal drops dead instantaneously. Another bull is next attacked by mounted picadores, armed with lances. Their legs are protected by padding. Their horses are of little value, and cannot easily get out of the way of the bull. Neither do the riders often attempt it; to do so being considered cowardly. The consequence is, the horses generally receive a mortal gore; part of their entrails are frequently torn out, and exhibit a most disgusting spectacle. The riders run considerable risk, for their lances are inadequate to killing the bull, which after being gored and mangled, is finally despatched by a matador.

The next bull, as he sallies from the pen, is encountered by six or eight Indians with short lances, who kneel down like the front rank of a battalion to receive a cavalry charge. One or two Indians are usually tossed; the others follow up the bull, and when he turns upon them, they drop on one knee and receive him as before. They are seldom able to despatch him, and a matador steps forward to end his sufferings. Some of the Indians are often much hurt: they invariably make themselves half drunk before they enter the circus, alleging that they can fight the bull better when they see double. Again, another bull is let into the ring for the lanzada, or trial of the lance, the handle of which is very long and strong, fixed into a wooden socket secured to the ground, and supported by an Indian torero. The head of the lance is a long blade of highly tempered steel; and made sharp as a razor. Before the bull is permitted to leave the pen; he is rendered furious by a variety of torments. When he has been sufficiently maddened, the doors are thrown open, and the animal makes a rush at the Indian, who is dressed in scarlet, and directs the lance as he kneels on the ground. The raging bull runs at him; but he steadily points the lance, so as to receive the bull on its point. Such is the force with which he plunges at his opponent, that the lance generally enters at the head, and breaking through skull and bones, comes out at the sides or back. Finally, a bull with tail erect, comes bellowing and bounding in, with a man strapped on his back. The animal jumps and capers about, making every effort to rid himself of his burthen, to the no small amusement of the spectators. The rider at length loosens the straps, and the bull is attacked on all sides by amateurs and matadors on foot and on horseback. When a matador has killed a bull, he bows to the government box, then to the municipality, and then all around, receiving plaudits in proportion to the skill he has shown, and the sport he has afforded. Advancing then to the box of the municipality, he receives his reward from one of the members, who is appointed as judge on the occasion, which consists of a few dollars thrown into the arena. When the spectators are particularly gratified by the performance, they also throw money into the ring.

M. Tissot, a celebrated French physician, who was the intimate friend of Zimmerman, relates the case of a literary gentleman, who would never venture near a fire, from imagining himself to be made of tatter, and being fearful he should melt.

CHARACTER.

From the "Second Judgement of Babylon the Great;" by the author of "Babylon the Great."

APPEARANCE OF ROTHSCHILD.

Sepectick, go to the Royal Exchange almost any morning you please, and among some score of persons, whose appearance will not very greatly elevate your notions of the dignity and grace of human nature, you will see some one, whose face and figure alike baffle your powers of description; and his whole man and manner make you instinctively repeat the vulgar tetrastich.

"I do not like thee, Doctor Fell,
The reason why, I cannot tell;
The fact itself I feel full well—
I do not like thee, Doctor Fell."

The thing before you stands cold, motionless, and speculationless as the pillar of salt into which the avaricious spouse of the patriarch was turned; and while you start with wonder at what it can be or mean, you pursue the association, and think upon the fire and brimstone that were rained down. It is a human being of no very Apollo-like form or face. Short, squat, with its shoulders drawn up to its ears, and its hands delved into its breeches pockets. The hue of its face is a mixture of brick-dust and saffron, and the texture seems that of the skin of a dead frog. There is a rigidity and tension in the features, too, which would make you fancy, if you did not see that were the fact, that some one from behind was pinching it with a pair of hot tongs, and that it were either ashamed or afraid to tell. Eyes are usually denominated the windows of the soul; but here you would conclude that the windows were false ones, or that there is no soul to look out at them. There comes not one pencil of light from the interior, neither is there one cintillation of that which comes from without reflected in any direction. The whole puts you in mind of "a skin to let;" and you wonder why it stands upright, without at least something within. By and by another figure comes up to it. It then steps two paces aside, and the most inquisitive glance that ever you saw, and a glance more inquisitive than you would have thought of, is drawn slowly out of the erewhile fixed and leaden eye, as if one were drawing a sword from a scabbard. The visiting figure, which has the appearance of coming by accident rather than design, stops but a second or two; in the course of which looks are exchanged, which, though you cannot translate, you feel must be of most important meaning. After these, the eyes are sheathed up again, and the figure resumes its stony posture. During the morning, numbers of visitors come, all of whom meet with a similar reception, and vanish in a similar manner; and last of all the figure itself vanishes, leaving you utterly at a loss as to what can be its nature or functions.

That singular figure is Nathan Myres Rothschild, the Jew, who holds the purse to all the kings on the continent, and opens or closes it just as he lists: and who, upon certain occasions, has been said to have more influence in this country than the proudest and most wealthy of its nobles—perhaps more influence than the two Houses of Parliament taken together. He takes that post, to be in the midst of his scouts; those visitors who appear to come casually, are all there by appointment. They communicate their information, receive their instructions, and hasten to act; and probably at each application of them to the grand calculating machine, it was willed that a million of money should change masters, or that a potentate who calls himself absolute, should alter his purpose, dismiss his minister, or change the system of his politics. Ungainly as his external man is, and detached as it seems from business, and incapable of thought, it is the case perhaps of the most curious, and certainly the most powerful calculating machine that ever existed.

The prodigies of calculation which have from time to time been exhibited, all sink into nothing before this one. They could play with numbers, in a manner wonderful enough, no doubt; but their play was unproductive, was nothing but a meteor marvel to be soon forgot; but this wields the purse of the world, and by means of that, all the powers in it. Along, too, with the intuitive magick of numbers which this singular being possesses, there must be a magick over the passions of men: but what it is, or how it works, the possessor will not tell, and nobody else can.

Even this secrecy, however, forcible and fell as it is, cannot last forever. The former high priests of Mammon have suffered reverses, have been swept of all their wealth, driven to despair, and perished by their own hands; and therefore the man who lives upon the produce of his daily industry, must be more happy, and may be more secure than Rothschild the Jew, amid all his wealth and power. So much for the very acme of the remnant of Jacob.

THE GATHERER.

DAUPHIN OF FRANCE.

The heir apparent of the crown of France derives his title of Dauphin from the following very singular circumstance. In 1349, Hubert, second count of Dauphiny, being inconsolable for the loss of his heir and only child, who had leaped from his arms through a window of his palace at Grenoble into the river Isere, entered into a convent of Jacobins, and ceded Dauphiny to Philip, a younger son of Philip of Valois (for 120,000 florins of gold each of the value of twenty sols, or ten pence English,) on condition that the eldest son of the king of France should be always after styled "the Dauphin," from the name of the province thus ceded. Charles V., grandson to Philip of Valois, was the first who bore the title in 1530.

Sir Joseph Banks used to tell a story of his being at Otaheite with Capt. Cook, when it was accidentally discovered to be the king's birth-day, on which it was suddenly agreed to have a jollification; every soul on board got fuddled, except three men who were on duty. The next day they came on deck, and begged to speak to the captain. "Well," said the captain, "what have you got to say?" "Please your honour, you were all drunk yesterday, all except we three; will your honour be pleased to allow us to get drunk to-day?" Sir Joseph, who was standing by, was so tickled with the oddity of the request, that he begged they might be indulged, and that he would subscribe two bottles of rum and two bottles of brandy. The boon was granted, and in less than three hours, these messmates balanced accounts, being as drunk as their hearts could wish. [Mr. Wadd.

Some years ago the following inscription, engraved on the fragment of a stone, was discovered amongst the relics of an antiquarian, and was considered by him as a great curiosity, and enhanced in value by its translation having puzzled the best scholars of the age:—

BENE.
A.T.H. T.H. I.S.S.T.
ONERE. POS. ET
H. CLAUD. COSTER. TRIP
E. SELLERO
F. IMP
IN. GT. ONAS. DO
TH. HI
S. C.
ON. SOR.
T. I. A. N. E.

Some supposed it to refer to the Emperor Claudian, till a lad one day spelt it out: "Beneath this stone repositeth Claud Coster, tripe-seller, of Lunington, as doth his consort Jane."

TIME.

It is the remark of a sensible authoress, (Miss Hawkins,) that every day resembles a trunk which has to be filled; and when we fancy that we have packed it to the uttermost, we shall find that by good management it might, and would, have held more. Our quotation is from memory, but correct as to simile and substance; and we consider the remark not less striking than quaint.

CORPORATION LEARNING.

The mayor of a country town, conceiving that the word clauses was in the plural number, would often talk of a claw in an act of parliament.

THE LEGENDARY.

EL BORRACHO.*

Not long since, a couple resided in the suburbs of Madrid, named Perez and Juana Donilla; and a happy couple they might have been, had not Perez contracted a sad habit of drinking, which became more and more confirmed after every draught of good wine; and such draughts were certainly more frequent than his finances were in a state to allow. Night after night was spent at the tavern; fairly might he be said to swallow all that he earned by his daily labour; and Juana and himself (fortunately they had no children to maintain) must have been reduced to absolute mendicancy, but for the exemplary conduct of the former, who contrived to support her spouse and herself upon the scanty produce of her unwearied industry. It ever a sentiment of gratitude for undeserved favours animated the bosom of Perez Donilla, he took, it must be confessed, a strange method of declaring it; not only would he, upon his return from his lawless carousals, grumble over that humble fare, the possession of which at all he ought to have considered as scarce less than a miracle, but, in his madness, unmerciful strappings were sure to be the portion of his miserable wife. Poor Juana bore these cruelties with a patience that ought to have canonized her under the title of St. Grizzle: she could not, indeed, forbear crying out, under these frequent and severe castigations; nor could she refrain from soliciting the aid of three or four favourite gentlemen saints, who, little to the credit of their gallantry and good-nature, always turned a deaf ear upon her complaints and entreaties, not a word, however, of the inhuman conduct of her worse half did she breathe to mortal ear. Neighbours, however, have auricular organs like walls and little pitchers, tongues like bells, and a spice of meddling and mischief in them like asses; so that no wise person will suppose the conduct of Perez Donilla to his wife was long a secret in Madrid. Juana had two brothers and a cousin resident in the city—Gomez Arias, chief cook to his reverence the Canon Fernando; Hernan Arias, head groom to Don Miguel de Corcoba, a knight of Calatrava; and Pedro Pedrillo, a young barber-surgeon, in business for himself. Gomez and Hernan, hearing of Juana's misfortunes, said, like affectionate brothers, "God help our poor sister, and may her own relations help her also; for if they do not, nobody else will, and she certainly can't help herself." The like words they repeated to Pedro Pedrillo, until he, being a sharp, handsome young fellow, and particularly fond of showing forth his fine person and finer wit, agreed to visit his cousin, and contrive some plan to extricate her from the cruelty of Perez. Making himself, therefore, as fascinating as possible, he marched directly to the house, or rather cabin, of Juana Donilla, and stood before her, smiling and watching her small thin fingers plaiting straw for hats, some minutes ere she was aware of his presence. "Pedro!" exclaimed she, with a countenance and voice of pleasure, as she recognized the intruder. "Ay, Pedro it is, indeed, Juana; but, improved as I am, O, mercy upon me, how black you are looking!" "Black, cousin? Nay, then, I'm sure 'tis not for want of washing. Come, come, Pedro, no jokes, if you please." "By St. Jago, fair cousin, I'm as far from a joke as I am from a diploma; and my business in this house, as in most houses, is no jest, I assure you. In a word, the cries which you utter when suffering from the insane fury of your sottish husband have reached even me, and I'm come to offer you a little advice and assistance. No denial of the fact, Juana; those black bruises avouch it without a tongue."—Juana held down her head, colour mounted into her cheeks, tears suffused her eyes, her bosom heaved convulsively, and for some moments she was silent from confusion, shame, grief, and gratitude. At length, withdrawing her hand from the affectionate grasp of Pedro, and dashing it athwart her eyes, she looked up and said mildly, "Thanks, many thanks, dear cousin, for your kindness. I cannot dissemble with you; what would you have me do? I could not beat him in return; and, oh! save him from the arm of my brothers!"—"What have you always done?"—"Borne his stripes, and called for help upon St. Jago, St. Francis Xavier, St. Benedict, and St. Nicholas!"—"And did you never invoke the three holy Maries?"—"Never." Then that's what you ought to have done," returned Senor Pedrillo, with the utmost gravity. "Now mind me,—call upon them for aid next time your husband maltreats you."—"Alas!" sighed the afflicted wife, "that will most surely be to-night. I've not much faith in your remedy, Pedro; but may be there's no harm in trying it."—"Farewell, then, my poor, pretty, patient, black-bruised cousin," cried Pedrillo; "next time you see the doctor, let him know how his remedy has sped;" and with a comical expression of countenance, half melancholy, have mirthful, the "trustful and well-beloved cousin" departed.

Late that night, Perez Donilla entered his own habitation as intoxicated and belligerent as ever. "Where's my supper?"—"Here," said his wife, trembling, as she placed before him a few heads of garlick, a piece of salted trout, a little oil, and a crust of barley bread. "What's all this, woman?" exclaimed Perez, in a voice of thunder; and with glaring eyes and demoniacal fury he dashed the fish at her head, and the rest of his supper upon the floor. "Wretch! how durst you fatten upon olives and ragouts, and set trash like this before your husband?"—"My dear," replied Juana, meekly, "I am starving; nothing have I tasted since breakfast."—"Don't lie, you jade! Where's the wild-fowl and the Bologna sausage sent you by that rogue, Gomez? Stolen were they from the canon's kitchen, and you know it! And where's the skin of excellent Calcavella, from the Caballero's overflowing vaults? Give it to me this instant, you hussy, you vixen, you—"—"Indeed, indeed," cried the unfortunate wife in deep anguish, "I take all the saints in heaven to witness—"—"That, and that, and that," interrupted the furious tyrant, lashing her severely, according to custom, with a thick thong of leather, and now and then adding a blow with his fist; "let's see if that will bring me a supper fit for a Christian, and a draught of Don Miguel's Calcavella!" Juana remembered Pedrillo's advice, and after roaring out more loudly than usual for aid from St. Jago, St. Francis, St. Benedict, and St. Nicholas, shrieked at the highest pitch of her voice, "May the three blessed Maries help me!" No sooner were the words uttered, than in rushed three apparitions, arrayed in white, but so enfolded in linen, that it was impossible to determine whether they represented men or women; of their visages, only their eyes were visible, peering frightfully from the white covering of their heads; each brandished a good stout cudgel, and each, without uttering a word, falling quick as thought upon Perez Donilla, repaid him the blows he had lavished on his unhappy wife with such interest, as would have sealed his fate indubitably, had not she interposed; but upon the entreaties of that exemplary wife, the three holy Maries remitted the remainder of their flagellation, and retired, leaving Perez senseless on the floor. Poor Juana was agonized at beholding the state to which her graceless partner was reduced, and hauling him, as well as her own exhausted strength would permit, upon his miserable pallet, washed the blood and dust from his wounds, and watched his return to consciousness with unexampled tenderness and dutiful fidelity. Perez at length opened his eyes, and said, in the mild voice which was natural to him when sober, "My Poor Juana, I wish you could fetch your cousin Pedro to see me; I think I shall die." Juana was half distracted at this speech; and running to the next house, bribed a neighbour's child by the promise of a broad-brimmed straw hat, to shade his complexion from the sun, to run for Doctor Pedrillo. Pedro soon arrived, and was evidently more puzzled respecting his deportment than the case of his patient. Sundry "nods, and becks, and wreathed smiles," and sundry eloquent glances of his bright black eyes, were covertly bestowed upon his fair cousin; anon, with ludicrous solemnity, he felt the pulse of Perez, shook his head, and, in short, imitated with inimitable exactness all the technical airs and graces of a regular graduate of Salamanca. "Cousin," cried he at length, with a sly look at Juana, "I pity your plight—from my soul I do; but your case is, I am grieved to say, desperate, unless I am informed of the cause of these monstrous weals, bruises, slashes, and chafings, in order that my prescription may—"—"The cause of them," said Perez, almost frightened to death, "is, having to my cost a saint of a wife."—"How! that a misfortune? explain yourself, my poor fellow."—"Readily," replied Donilla, "if that will help to heal me." He then explained minutely the circumstances of the case, concluding thus:—"Not but what I am, after all, remarkably indebted to Juana, for had she only called the eleven thousand Virgins to her assistance, their zeal would undoubtedly have divided my body amongst them; since, then, my wife has such friends in heaven, I shall henceforth be careful how I enrage them again." Perez Donilla kept to his resolution, and the Three Maries, whom, without doubt, the intelligent reader has recognized through their disguise, lived for many years to rejoice in the blessed effects of a severe, but merited infliction.

MISCELLANY.

AFRICA AND SLAVERY.

We extract the following article from a notice of Clapperton's Travels, in a late London Weekly Review.

We are not yet in possession of sufficient materials for a complete picture of the moral condition of the people of Africa. The relations of travellers, composed with different views and with different feelings, frequently contradict each other; and the speculations of naturalists and philosophers, necessarily based upon those relations, are equally at variance. Upon one point—the religion of the negroes—the diversity of opinion is extraordinary; some imagining the black man of central Africa to be a brutal, godless savage; while others, and among these, the unsophisticated author of the work before us, describe him as under the influence of very strong religious feelings, although these feelings are disguised and perverted by superstition and ignorance. Capt. Clapperton, it is true, remarks in one passage, that the negro never prays, except when he is in fear, or in want of something; but, as man's fears and wants are numerous, and of continual recurrence, more especially in the state of society in which the negro is placed, we should infer from this, that his devotions must be frequent. Perhaps, could we discover the real history of the human heart in more civilized countries, the greater number of men would at least be found to be more fervent in their prayers, and more assiduous in the outward demonstrations of religious feeling, when want or affliction has visited them, than on ordinary occasions.

Virey and Bory de St. Vincent, who differ on most points, agree in describing the African negro as an irreligious savage; while the former, at the same time, infers from the extreme superstition of this unhappy race, a degree of intellect inferior to that possessed by the whites. Their gods, he tells us, are certain little grotesque figures, called fetiches; or mere animals, as serpents, crocodiles, lizards, birds, &c.; and he adds, that for a bottle of brandy, a native of Senegal will make profession of any religion, and forswear it next day for the same price. But what does all this prove? That the negro is naturally destitute of the religious feeling? Quite the reverse. The poor uninformed savage, experiencing the necessity of paying worship to something, and wanting that force of mind, by which the Deity is discovered through the multitudinous forms and operations of nature, bows down before those material beings or substances which exhibit the most powerful or useful qualities. The ancient Egyptians, who are said by many writers to have numbered rats and onions among their deities, have never been denominated an irreligious people; nor are the Hindoos, whose gods are often of a nature equally invulnerable, suspected by these naturalists of the stupid sort of atheism with which they reproach the negroes. There is in fact no nation without religion.

* The Drukkard; the Spanish origin of this story is thus endeavoured to be recognized in its title.

though, it must be allowed, that a rational, pure, and undefiled worship exists among but very few of the tribes of mankind.

The unfavourable opinions that prevail respecting the morals of the negroes are better founded. The institution of marriage, the basis upon which the whole social system is erected, is contemned, or, rather, unknown, throughout the greater part of Pagan Africa—which, to speak the truth, appears to be nothing but one boundless brothel, chastity being altogether unknown, or not respected. Hence that monstrous absence of natural affection, which allows parents to track their own offspring, and coolly to see the child from their knee carried away into slavery in a foreign land. Lying, cheating, thieving, are not considered disgraceful in many parts of Africa; and murder is not punished with death.

Capt. Clapperton is not, however, one of those who deny to the negroes the possession of estimable qualities. On the contrary, he more than once repeats his expressions of gratitude towards them for their kindness and generous hospitality; and during his last illness, when his faithful servant expressed suspicion that he had been poisoned, he earnestly repelled the insinuation. The suspicion, however, does not appear to have been altogether extravagant; and, although the imprudent conduct of the traveller himself, in lying down to sleep, after great bodily fatigue, in a damp, swampy place, may be quite sufficient to account for the disorder that carried him off, the character of the wretches who composed Sultan Bello's court would induce us to think it at least very possible that some kind of poison may have been employed to hasten the progress of the disease.

But, with whatever other vices we may reproach the negro, it is the trafficking in human beings that is the damning sin of Africa; and of this the negroes themselves appear to be secretly conscious, for the slaves that were passing towards the coast, or elsewhere for sale, during the period of the mission, were seldom visible to the strangers, being, it is supposed, hurried along by night, chained neck to neck, and compelled to carry heavy burdens. Such of these degraded wretches as remain in the country are often treated with less rigour than, from the general habits and character of the African, we should have been led to expect; but the reports of their attachment to their masters, and their reluctance, while in this condition, to betray any trust reposed in them, which would appear to mark them out as creatures born for servitude, are far from being correct, as not a night passed, while Capt. Clapperton was in the country, during which many of these poor wretches did not run away, taking with them whatever they could conveniently bear in their flight.

It is not a little extraordinary that mankind should generally have associated the idea of blackness with slavery. The ancient Huns were divided into the white and the black; not that they really differed from each other in colour, but that the former were free, the latter enslaved. The same terms have been metaphorically applied to countries: whence White Russia, White Wallachia, have been used to signify Free Russia, Free Wallachia.

The advocates of slavery maintain, that, in creating us superior in intelligence to the negroes, nature herself justifies our assuming dominion over them, in the same manner as we assume it over the inferior animals. Bernardin de Sainte-Pierre, a curious observer both of man and nature, observes, that in the Isles of France and Bourbon, the dogs of the negroes, conforming themselves to the condition of their owners, or discovering their inability to protect them effectually, yield the superiority to the dogs of the whites. The argument of Grotius, that persons born in servitude ought not to escape from their condition until they repay their masters the price of their education and maintenance during childhood, would justify our kidnapping a man in the street, shutting him up in our houses, and refusing to let him go until he had paid for his lodgings. For that which we are compelled to receive, we can owe nothing.

From time immemorial Africa, however, has been the nursery of slaves. The Phenicians purchased slaves from thence, and the Egyptians, Assyrians, and Persians, had their black eunuchs.

The Carthaginians employed blacks in the commercial expeditions and in working their mines; and from the Periplus of Hanno, a Carthaginian navigator, who was commissioned to make discoveries in Southern Africa, we learn that the condition of the negroes was exactly the same in those remote times as it is now. The Greeks and Romans brought home slaves and gold from their African conquests; and the Arabs, whose victories followed on the heels of those of Rome, converted the whole continent of Africa into one vast store house, where men were enclosed; like bales of merchandize, to be removed at the pleasure of their masters.

About the close of the fourteenth century, and in the beginning of the 15th, the Portuguese commenced their conquests with the little islands on the coast of Africa, whence they carried away slaves to be employed in agriculture at home, or in the Canary Islands. The fortress of Almina was built on the coast of Africa by the Portuguese in 1481, and, forty years afterwards, the regular trade in human beings, which has been carried on to the present time, was begun by Alonzo Gonzales. Anderson, in his History of Commerce, observes, that it was in 1508, that the first negro slaves were transported from Africa to St. Domingo. Ferdinand the Catholic, King of Spain, was the first who introduced negro slaves into Peru, in 1510, soon after the conquest of the country. The discovery of America, and the introduction of the sugar-cane and the cotton-tree into that country, were fatal to the African race, who, it was soon found, were better able to endure heat, and perform severe manual labour, than the Aborigines of America. From that period to the present, Africa has been yearly drained of her population to supply the sugar plantations of the West Indies and America, notwithstanding the Christian exertions of the government of England; but to describe this traffick, and the evils to which it gives birth, is not at present our object.

The Fellatas, according to Capt. Clapperton, are nearly white; in fact, quite as fair as the Portuguese or Spaniards. They have neither the thick lips, nor the woolly hair of the negroes; and some of their young women are described, in Lander's Journal, as "graceful and beautiful." This seems to prove that climate is not the cause of blackness, woolly hair, and peculiar anatomical conformation of the negro; for the Fellata race endure the same degree of heat, subsist upon the same food, and conform to the same manners as the negroes. Blumenbach, in his Essay on the Varieties of the Human Species, asserts that the woolly hair is not peculiar to the negro, but is found among the copper-coloured inhabitants of the Duke of York's Island, in the Pacific Ocean; while many black races possess long and flowing hair. This opinion appears to require confirmation. It is true that certain natives of India, who all have long, flowing hair, are exceedingly dark; but the colour of the Hindoos is very different from that of the negro, being a deep bronze—in producing the lighter or darker shades of which, the sun seems to have no influence. The opinion of the same great naturalist, that there are negroes with red hair, appears also to be somewhat disputable; though we cannot doubt that many mulattos may be found with hair of that colour.

From the Banquet of Xenophon.

RICHES.

"Don't you pray heartily against riches!" says Callais; "and if you should happen to dream you were rich, would you not sacrifice to the gods to avert the ill-omen?" "No, no," replied Garnides; "but when any flattering hope presents, I wait patiently for the success." Then Socrates, turning to Antisthenes—"And what reason have you," said he, "who have very little or no money, to value yourselves upon your poverty?" "Because," replied Antisthenes, "I am not in the coffers of those we call rich or poor, but in the heart only; for I see numbers of very rich men, who believe themselves poor, nor is there any peril or labour they would not expose themselves to, to acquire more wealth. I knew two brothers, the other day, who shared equally their father's estate. The first had enough, and something to spare; the other wanted every thing. I have heard likewise of some princes so greedy of wealth, that they were more notoriously criminal in the search of it than private men: for though the latter may sometimes steal, break houses, and sell free persons to slavery, to support the necessities of life, yet these do much worse; they ravage whole countries, put nations to the sword, enslave free states; and all this for the sake of money, and to fill the coffers of their treasury. The truth is, I have a great deal of compassion for these men, when I consider the distemper that afflicts them. Is it not unhappy condition to have a great deal to eat, to eat a great deal and yet never be to be satisfied? For my part, though I confess I have no money at home, yet I want none; because I never eat but just as much as will satisfy my hunger, nor drink but quench my thirst. I clothe myself in such a manner that I am as warm abroad as Callais, with all his great abundance. And when I am at home, the floor and the wall, without mats or tapestry, make my chamber warm enough for me. And as for my bed, such as it is, I find it more difficult to awake than to fall asleep in it. But don't mistake me, gentlemen, for governing my passion in this and in other things, I am so far from desiring to have more pleasure in the enjoyment, that I wish it less; because, upon due consideration, I find those pleasures that touch us in the most sensible manner, deserve not to be esteemed the most worthy of us. But observe the chief advantage I reap from my poverty; it is, that in case the little I have should be taken entirely from me, there is no occupation so poor, no employment in life so barren, but would maintain me without the least uneasiness, and afford me a dinner without any trouble. For if I have an inclination at any time to regale myself and indulge my appetite, I can do it easily; it is but going to market, not to buy dainties (they are too dear) but my temperance gives that quality to the most common food; and, by that means, the contentedness of my mind supplies me with delicacies that are wanted in the meat itself. Now, it is not the excessive price of what we eat that gives it a relish, but it is necessity and appetite. Of this I have experience just now, while I am speaking; for this generous wine of Tharsos, that I am now drinking, the exquisite flavour of it is that I drink it now without thirst, and consequently without pleasure. Besides all this, I find it is necessary to live thus in order to live honestly. For he that is content with what he has, will never covet what is his neighbour's. Further, it is certain the wealth I am speaking of makes men liberal. For Socrates, from whom I have all mine, never gave it me by number or weight, but, whenever I was willing to receive, he loads me always with as much as I can carry. I do the same by my friends; I never conceal my plenty. On the contrary, I show them all I have, and at the same time I let them share with me. It is from this, likewise, I am become master of one of the most delightful things in the world: I mean that soft and charming leisure, that permits me to see every thing that is worthy to be seen, and to hear every thing that is worthy to be heard. It is, in one word, that which affords me the happiness of hearing Socrates from morning to night, for he, having no great veneration for those that can only count vast sums of gold and silver, converses only with them whom he finds are agreeable to him, and deserve his company.

From the American Manufacturer.

LIFE.

"Oh! why should we seek to anticipate sorrow—
Or why should we dark-rolling clouds of to-morrow
O'er-h-dow the sunshine and joys of to-day?"

Thus sung Henry Neele, one of England's gifted spirits; and, if we were to judge from the above quotation—a jovial, good natured fellow, who made the most of the present time, without troubling his head about the future. Yet, how was the fact? Henry Neele ended with his own hands a miserable existence, and rushed, uncalled for, into the presence of his Maker. People may say what they will, this life of ours is a rough-and-tumble sort of business—and the fact ought to be generally known, that no disappointment may be felt—where little or nothing is expected. Those who imagine they can pass on in the great thoroughfare of life, as smoothly and easily as the car of a modern railway, will find themselves most egregiously mistaken. The world is not what painters and poets would make it. There is nothing dreamy and visionary about it. It is palpably real, and far—very far from romantick.

There is nevertheless something melancholy in the reflection that the visions of our early years must fade one after another, until nothing but the cold and substantial reality is left us—nothing but the remembrance of having passed over a land of flowers, crushing them under our feet, and bending forward to catch a glimpse of something beyond—until the enchanted region was left behind, and the spirit, which presides over the past, like the angel at the gates of Paradise, had barred our return thither. Well, it is a lesson we must all learn, and the sooner we are acquainted with it, so much the better for our pilgrimage. It is wiser by far to look out on the rising tempest, when it comes growling and muttering up the horizon, than to veil our eyes until the earth is quaking to the stroke of its thunderbolts, and the red pathway of its lightning becomes visible above us.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, APRIL 18, 1829.

TO LET—The Rooms now occupied by us as a printing office. Inquire at this office, or of J. F. Porter, in the basement story of the building.

The office of the Masonick Record will be removed to No. 2, Beaver-street, on the first of May.

Those of our subscribers who intend to change their places of residence on the first proximo, will please to inform the carrier or leave notice at this office, in order that they may be regularly served with their papers.

THE TABLES ARE TURNED! The recent town elections at the west have played the deuce with anti-masonry. It has been met and conquered in its very camp. In Monroe, Genesee, Livingston, Chautauque, Ontario, Wayne, Niagara, Erie, Orleans, Seneca, Cayuga, Saratoga, &c. making up the noted infected district, the spirit of regeneration has swept all before it. In the village of Batavia, the residence of the famous Col Miller, the toleration ticket has succeeded by a handsome majority. In Warsaw, the residence of Elder Barnard, an anti-masonick book maker, and one of the most zealous of the faction, the toleration ticket has been elected by large majorities. The truth is, the friends of equal rights are rousing into action in every part of the state and country. Prejudice is dying away in all quarters; the spirit of truth is abroad, and every thing declares, that anti-masonry (as Myron Holly said of Masonry) will ere long be "nupbered with the past evils of our country."

Such affairs as the Munchausen story of Henry F. Yates may, according to the old saying that "every dog has his day," live for a week or two; but the common discernment of mankind will eventually detect their falsity, and punish those who have made use of them to support anarchy and persecution. Considering the "signs of the times," we think it would be advisable for the editor of the Elucidator not to be too hasty in swearing to lies merely because he imagines they may serve his present interests. Governour Southwick once said that Morgan, being set adrift by the masons upon Niagara river, stemmed the tide and mounted the cataract, but, strange as it may seem, nobody believed him. Henry F. Yates now says that the Grand Lodge of this state paid a certain individual two hundred and fifty dollars to indemnify him against losses which were not sustained until four months after the Grand Lodge closed its session; and the editor of the Elucidator may rest assured that the people will not believe Mr. Yates any more than they did governour Southwick. Masons do not, more than others, possess the power of foretelling events; and we believe it is not customary for men deliberately to provide against unexpected reverses, four months before they happen. Yates' story, independent of the refutation which it meets with in the high and honourable character of the Grand Lodge, is such a one as should not, from its palpable absurdity and contradiction, be believed; and it is matter of astonishment that men in their senses should countenance it, or that an editor who plumes himself upon his christianity, as we understand Mr. Hotchkins does, should so far forget truth and his duty to his fellow beings, as to make use of it to blind the eyes of the people, in order to cheat them of their rights and destroy individual character.

A man who calls himself Avery Allyn is trying to immortalize himself by swearing about sundry items of the Morgan affair. He seems to be very anxious to hang a Mr. Howard; and we don't know whether to wish him success, or not. Mr. Allyn has heard some one say that Morgan was murdered, and his conscience is so very tender, that he is determined to be an accessory till somebody is hanged. Now, in the course of our life we have discovered that those who talk so much about their conscience in the newspapers have generally little or no conscience at all, and we are inclined to the belief that Mr. Allyn has not a great deal of the article; if he had, he would not be so willing to swear to things of which he is confessedly ignorant. If some one must be hanged, we don't know of any one who has a better right to submit to the necessary personal inconvenience, for the particular gratification of Mr. Allyn, than the gentleman himself. We therefore advise him to think of Judas, and take the matter into consideration.

His Excellency of the National Observer tells what a Yankee would call "a whapper," while speaking of the late Mr. Gross in his yesterday's paper. Mr. Gross did hear the "blood and thunder" speech of the Observer gentleman, but so far from making use of the language which the orator attributes to him, we know, from the best evidence in the world, that he turned to a friend who stood near him and expressed the most decided contempt for Solomon Southwick, the matter of his speech, and the character and objects of the convention. Mr. Gross was elected to the house in opposition to an anti-masonick candidate; and had he lived, would not only not have been an anti-mason, but he would have been among those who have so nobly declared themselves opposed to faction and misrule. It is insulting the memory of the dead to class him with those who were not worthy to brush the dust from his shoes while living. None but a vain and shallow egotist would stoop to the system of self puffing which Mr. Southwick has uniformly pursued. It seems to be half the business of his life to collect plasters for his reputation. How mean and despicable does such a being appear, when compared to a man like Mr. Gross! The deceased will be remembered as an honour to the state until his name shall be lost in the mazes of events:—the living will be despised while living, and when dead, be in charity forgotten or remembered only as an evidence of the degradation to which man may be reduced, when his mind is perverted from its healthy and sane course.

DONATION. The editor of the New-York Commercial Advertiser, says, we have received the sum of $38 60, by the hands of a committee of charity of the Boyer Lodge of Freemasons, No. 1, in that city, (composed of people of colour,) with a request that one half of the sum should be appropriated to the Female Assistance Society, and the other half to the Dorcas Society of females of colour, whose business is to make up wearing apparel to enable destitute children to attend the African schools under the charge of the Manumission Society.

LITERARY SUMMARY. S. G. Goodrich & Co. of Boston, have in press a Life of Bolivar, written by "General H. L. V. Ducoudry-Holstein, ex-chief of the staff of Bolivar, and now professor of Modern Languages at Geneva college," in this state. The editor of the New-England Galaxy, judging from a perusal of a few chapters already struck off, thinks "the work will be highly interesting to the publick, and give a more intimate, connected, and satisfactory account of the affairs of Columbia since the commencement of the revolution, than any that has been hitherto published."

A correspondent of the National Intelligencer says he lately met with a manuscript Life of Washington, in Latin, written in Ohio, by Mr. Francis Glass, A. M., professor of languages. The writer in the Intelligencer says the biography is written in an easy and flowing style, and "discovers a nice acquaintance with the best Roman authors, as well as a perfect familiarity with more modern Latin;" and, as he understands it is to be sent to Messrs. Carey and Lea for publication, he hopes that "some of the learned Thebans of Philadelphia will cast their eyes upon it and introduce it into their schools, if in their opinion it should merit such distinction."

A life of the great philanthropist Howard, is preparing for publication in Boston. The author is the Rev. Lewis Dwight, Secretary of the Prison Discipline,—a man whose talents and benevolent feelings eminently qualify him for such an undertaking. The work will be in about 300 pages 12mo.; accompanied by a copperplate engraving of the great man whose deeds it commemorates, and probably also by one of the second Mrs. Howard, who co-operated in his benevolent designs, till her death.

An edition in six volumes of Walter Scott's miscellaneous prose works is in the press at Boston. The contents are, volume I, Life of Dryden; volume II, Life of Dean Swift; volume III, Memoirs of Samuel Richardson, Henry Fielding, Tobias Smollett, Richard Cumberland, Oliver Goldsmith, Samuel Johnson, Laurence Sterne, Henry Mackenzie, Horace Walpole, Clara Reeve, Mrs. Anne Radcliffe, Alain Rene Le Sage, Charles Johnstone, Robert Bage; volume IV, Memoirs of Charlotte Smith, Sir Ralph Sadler, John Leyden, Miss Anna Seward, Daniel Defoe, The late Duke of Buccleugh and Queensberry, Lord Somerville, King George III, Lord Byron, The Duke of York; volume V, Letters. Battle Ligny. Battle of Waterloo, &c. &c.; volume VI, An Essay on Chivalry, Romance, The Drama. It is not true that Sir Walter is writing an Autobiography. The late London papers state, that he is to write a preface for a new edition of his Novels, now in press, giving an account of various interesting circumstances connected with their origin.

We have received the first three numbers of the Virginia Souvenir and Ladies Literary Gazette, published semi-monthly at Richmond, Va. It is edited by Mr. Stephen F. Mitchell, who recently distinguished himself as the conductor of that unique affair, the "Spirit of the Old Dominion."

Irving's Columbus and Cooper's Novels have been lately translated and published in Germany.

Count Philip de Segur, author of a History of Napoleon's Expedition to Russia, is about to publish a History of Russia, from the Earliest Period to the Reign of Catharine. An English translation is to appear simultaneously at London.

A translation of Milton's Private Correspondence, with notes by John Hale, esq. is in the press and will soon appear at Philadelphia. It is to make a volume of about one hundred and sixty pages.

If we had time we would manufacture a few words of condolence for our very small and particular friend of the Niagara Courier. We are afraid the little fellow will be for packing up his duds unless they treat him better at Lockport. His party was completely routed at the late election. We should be sorry to hear of his departure, for he is quite harmless where he is, and there is no telling what a dust he might kick up if he should get farther west, among the mountains and the indians.

EUROPE. The ship Grecian arrived at New-York from Liverpool on Monday evening last. She sailed on the 5th ult. bringing advices two days later than the former arrival: but nothing of much interest had transpired, if we except the movements in relation to the Catholic question. A great excitement pervades all England against that bugbear of the imagination, called Papery; which seems to be a monstrous a thing on the other side of the waters as masonry is on this. The royal family is split on the subject, an the "noble brothers" spit words at each other quite courageously in the House of Lords. The ministry is made up of Jack Catholics; and the king and the heir apparent, who were on the fence for a long while, have both jumped off on the Irish side. But notwithstanding the support of the government, there is much reason to doubt whether emancipation will be granted, to the extent demanded by the Catholics. If it be not granted there is but one alternative; the nature of which can not be mistaken by any one who is acquainted with the Irish character. There will be either freedom or fighting.

Russia and Turkey continue their preparations for another campaign.

Portugal is in its old uneasy state.

DOMESTICK. Gold Mines. The number of gold mines in N. Carolina is daily increasing. A letter from Charlotte, in that state, says, "Every farmer in the neighbourhood of this village that has a little barren hill on his plantation, is sure to find gold. The sign of gold is by its having white flint rock on it; so that when a farmer finds one of these on his land, what he formerly asked five hundred dollars for, he will ask as many thousands for, and actually gets it. There are several rich companies from the north and south, and even foreigners, who are very busy purchasing. They are working by steam, horse, and water power, to pretty good advantage."

Tailoring. A Mr. Chabot, of Baltimore, has lately published a book on this art, from which it appears that he has greatly simplified the system of measuring. He requires only three measures to enable him to make a full suit, and occupies but one minute in taking them. The editor of the Baltimore Chronicle says he was not a little amused to see Mr. Chabot stretch a measure over a friend's arm to fit him with a pair of pantaloons.

Muscadel Grapes. The muscadel grape vine has been raised, near Adamsville, South Carolina, from the seed of the raisin. A late paper from that quarter says, "the vines are apparently thrifty and flourishing, and bid fair to produce fruit this season. We sincerely hope that the attempt to naturalize this delicious exotick may be crowned with success, and at the same time recommend to our agricultural readers a further trial of the experiment."

The best Castor oil now used is made in this country. Several years since this medicine was a very nauseous one: it not unfrequently caused the throats of patients to smart by reason of its rancidity. It is now sold destitute of every unpleasant smell, and as transparent as water. Old associations still cause many persons to shudder at its name, yet we hear of some who regard the flavour of it as similar to that of walnuts, and one in particular declares that he could relish it on bread. No disputing tastes like these.

A correspondent of the N. Y. Statesman says, although he has never seen Wooden Nutmegs, or Bass-wood pumpkin seed, he was lately favoured with the sight of Wooden Combs, so well done as almost to escape detection. The vender of them, he says was a "tall straight and sleek" fellow, who, when asked if he had any wooden pumpkins, replied that he "hadn't neither, but he had down aboard the schooner, some Wooden Pomatum." [Am. Man.]

The Macon Telegraph relates that there is an old gentleman living in Monroe county, Georgia, aged 104 years, who oversees his farm, works, reads without spectacles, hears well, retains most of his teeth, is married to his third wife, and has 18 or 20 children, the youngest not yet fourteen years old.

Contempt of Court. The editor of the New Orleans Mercantile Advertiser made some remarks relating to a criminal trial; for this he was arrested, brought before Court and summarily sentenced to six hours imprisonment. This power exercised by courts of denying to an individual the trial by jury, and above all constituting themselves judges in their own cases is, of all errors, the most extravagant and dangerous. [Philadelphia Aurora.]

Decrease of Slaves in South Carolina. It appears from the Reports of the Comptroller of S. Carolina, that the number of slaves in that State decreased in one year, from 1824 to 1825, thirty-two thousand seven hundred and twenty-seven; and in the next year, one thousand one hundred and twenty-nine. Total decrease in two years, 33,856; being more than one eighth of the whole number, (260,282) in 1824. All this is attributed, by Mr. Seabrook, of S. C. to the Tariff of 1824. [Journal of Commerce.]

An Anti-Masonick Meeting was recently held at Coatsville, Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, at which several resolutions, &c. in the usual strain, were agreed to. The name of the Secretary was Richard Pin—he means undoubtedly to stick a pin in all the masons of that county.]

MEXICO. Advices from Mexico to the 9th March, state that since the election of Guerrero to the presidency, every thing has been quiet in that republic. Pedraza had embarked at Tampico in the British Packet, for England. It was thought that in consequence of the departure of Pedraza the law for expelling the Spaniards, which had passed the house of representatives, would not be adopted by the senate. Many Spaniards are emigrating to Vera Cruz but without any obligations on the part of the government Guerrero was to enter into the discharge of the executive duties on the 1st inst.

WEST INDIES. Kingston (Jamaica) papers have been received to the 17th February. Great distress prevails among the coffee growers in the island of Dominica; and at a meeting of the legislature, a petition was presented on the 24th January, praying that body to endeavour to obtain from the British government permission to export all their slaves to some other colony. The sugar planters presented a counter petition, asking the legislature not to entertain that of the coffee planters, as it would occasion ruin to the last petitioners. From these documents may be learnt in one view, says the Kingston paper, the progress to ruin to which all the West India colonies are rapidly approaching. The cultivation of coffee will not remunerate the growers. In 1812, the slave population of Dominica exceeded 27,000, but on the last of December, 1828, that number had become reduced to 12,200.

UPPER CANADA. Returns have been made to the parliament of the Upper Province, from which it appears the population of that province is 220,897, viz. Midland district 30,969; Western district, 11,972; London district, 19,813; Niagara district, 20,175; Home district, 22,927; Gore district, 31,544; Newcastle district, 13,836; Johnstown district, 18,214; Bathurst district, 29,332; Ottawa district, 3,732; Eastern district, 19,159. There are 308,508 acres under cultivation; 1,628,956 acres uncultivated; the rateable property amounts to $5,840 04; the number of horses, 13,848; horned cattle, 75,256; grist and saw mills, 488.

EAST INDIES. Calcutta papers to December 9 have been received at Boston. The Bengal Hurkaru of Dec. 9th, laments the inaccuracy of some portions of the late lamented Bishop Heber's Journal—and says, "it is much to be regretted that his amiable widow had not submitted his manuscript to the revision of judicious, experienced and well informed friends. Every statement published on the authority of a name so revered, on account of the worth and talent of him who bore it, must carry great weight with it among thousands who may never see the proof of its inaccuracy, and an injury may thus be inflicted on public rights and private feelings, which the departed Prelate would have been the last man in the world to have been the intentional cause of."

It was reported at Calcutta that the King of Ava had sent Envoys to Siam, to form a treaty of alliance, with a view to drive the British from the Burman Territory. The King apologised for the success of the English formerly, by referring to a prophecy that he should be overcome by a nation wearing hats! The Envoys were ordered away from Siam, and their overtures rejected.

A powerful pamphlet is in circulation in India, on the subject of Free Trade, and a Colonization of India with Europeans. Against this it is said, the measures would have the tendency to raise and carry forward a spirit of independence.

There is a censorship of the press established at Madras. The Bengal Hurkaru, of Dec. 8, speaking of it, says:—

"The Madras Gazette of the 19th ult. received on Saturday, again displays in sundry places evidence of the censor's vigilance. One article of two columns is entirely struck out, and their white space seems to plead with eloquent silence against these cruel mutilations. The Editor should in future adopt for his motto, we think, the following couplet:—

In mercy spare us when we do our best
To make as much waste paper as the rest, for upon his devoted head the visitations of censorial power appear to fall most frequently and most heavily. [Pal.]

THE LATE LEO XII. Late Paris papers inform us, that on the evening of the 11th of March last, according to ancient usage, and a special bull of the late Pope, the bowels of the defunct Pontiff Leo XII. were inclosed in an urn and carried to the Church of St. Vincent and St. Anastasius. The next day the body was embalmed, dressed, and exposed upon a state bed in the Sixtine chapel, to which the people were all admitted. On the 18th the Cardinals assembled at the Vatican, and held their first general assembly. The pontifical ordinances relative to the conclave were read, and sworn to by all present. Cardinal Zucchi, master of the ceremonies, broke the fisherman's ring, which was handed to him by the Cardinal Camerlinguisi. He then sealed up the seal of the Apostolic chancery; the box of petitions (cassete de supplicibus) and that of briefs were also sealed up. Monseigneur Capelletti was confirmed in his function as Governor of Rome, and M. Angelo Mai, the librarian of the Vatican, was chosen to pronounce the funeral oration of the deceased pontiff. Three Cardinals were appointed to make the necessary constructions for the Conclave which is to be held in the Quirinal palace. The Cardinals then went to the Sixtine chapel, where the body of his Holiness was lying. The clergy of the basilisk of the Vatican also went there and the absolution of the body was then made. Afterwards, the mortal remains were adorned with the pontifical ornaments, and transported to St. Peters. The clergy of that church preceded the corpse, which was borne by eight almoners, and followed by all the Cardinals. The body passed along the scala regia, and was placed on a bed under the grand dome; the mortuary absolution having been repeated, the Cardinals retired—the body was afterwards carried into the Chapel of the Holy Sacrament, and placed near the iron grating, in order that the people might approach to kiss its feet.

MASONICK PERSECUTION. There is in this city one anti-mason. This man, who, by the by, keeps store, and sometimes sells "blue ruin" by the small glass, without license, was, we are informed, complained of for disposing of "the creature," on account of his want of a license, and will perhaps be mulcted in the sum of $25. This personage is now making a piteous story about being persecuted by the masons; because, having himself, broken "the law in such case made and provided," he is made to suffer the consequence. [Hudson Gazette.]

Kamschatka. The Russian government has sent a skillful gardener to Kamschatka, to instruct the inhabitants in the art of cultivating the earth to the greatest advantage. The climate of Kamschatka is not so severe as is generally supposed; and many vegetable productions may be raised there, with proper management.

Warts and Corns. It is stated that the bark of the willow tree, burnt to ashes, mixed with strong vinegar, and applied to the parts, will remove all warts, corns, or excrescences, on any part of the body.

AMICUS was received too late for insertion this week. He shall have a place in our next.

There is a communication in the postoffice in this city directed to us and post marked Sackets Harbour, for which the P. M. demands ninety-five cents. As its contents are unknown to us, we decline buying it.

DIED.

In Downingtown, Pennsylvania, on the 19th inst. Doct. GEORGE A. FAIRLAMBS, senior editor of the Independent Journal, aged 42 years. Dr. Fairlamb was a native of Chester county, Pa., and for the last twenty years he practiced medicine in that vicinity; his science as a physician was of the first character, and his benevolence as a man will ever be remembered by the public. His talents were not of an ordinary kind; he was remarkable for the natural vigour of his mind, the correctness of his judgement, and the firmness and inflexible honesty which distinguished him in his passage through life. At the request of the deceased his body was interred, on the 18th inst. in the burying ground attached to the masonick hall, in the village of Downingtown. Many of his masonick brethren, and a very numerous circle of relatives and friends, attended, to testify their respect and friendship for his memory.

In Salem, Massachusetts, on the 1st inst., EDWARD AUGUSTUS HOLYOKE, L. L. D., the learned Philosopher, the active Philanthropist, and the good man, in the one hundred and first year of his age. The beloved and venerated man was born at Marblehead, in 1728. The house in which he was born is still standing. He was graduated at Harvard University, in 1746, and settled in this place in 1749, where he has ever since, for a period of 80 years, resided, useful, beloved, and honoured. He was married, the first time in 1755, and a second time in 1759. He had by the second marriage 12 children, of whom only two survive. His only child he had by his first wife died in infancy. He has lived in his mansion house in Essex-street, for the last 66 years, and at one period of his practice, he has stated, there was not a dwelling house in Salem which he had not visited professionally. For a long period he nearly engrossed the medical practice of the place, and is known to have made an hundred professional visits in a day. This was in May or June of 1783, at which time the measles prevail epidemically. He passed his long life in almost uninterrupted health, without any of those accidents and dangers which his skill was exerted to remedy and remove in others, and his old age has been almost without infirmity, and literally without decrepitude. [Salem (Mass.) Gazette.]

POETRY.

CHANGE.

BY MISS L. E. LANDON.

I would not care, at least so much, sweet Spring,
For the departing colour of thy flowers—
The green leaves early falling from thy boughs—
Thy birds so soon forgetful of their songs—
Thy skies, whose sunshine ends in heavy showers;
But thou dost leave thy memory, like a ghost,
To haunt the ruined heart, which still recurs
To former beauty; and the desolate
Is doubly sorrowful when it recalls
It was not always desolate.

When those eyes have forgotten the smile they wear now,
When care shall have shadowed that beautiful brow—
When thy hopes and thy roses together lie dead,
And thy heart turns back pining to days that are fled—

Then wilt thou remember what now seems to pass
Like the moonlight on water, the breath-stain on glass:
Oh! maiden, the lovely and youthful, to thee,
How rose-touched the page of thy future must be!

By the past, if thou judge it, how little is there
But flowers that flourish, but hopes that are fair;
And what is thy present? a southern sky's spring,
With thy feelings and fancies like birds on the wing.

As the rose by the fountain flings down on the wave
Its blushes, forgetting its glass is its grave;
So the heart sheds its colour on life's early hour,
But the heart has its fading as well as the flower.

The charmed light darkens, the rose-leaves are gone,
And life, like the fountain, floats colourless on.
Said I, when thy beauty's sweet vision was fled,
How wouldst thou turn, pining, to days like the dead!

Oh! long ere one shadow shall darken that brow,
Wilt thou weep like a mourner o'er all thou lovest now;
When thy hopes, like spent arrows, fall short of their mark;
Or, like meteors at midnight, make darkness more dark;

When thy feelings lie fettered like waters in frost,
Or, scattered too freely, are wasted and lost:
For aye cometh sorrow, when youth has past by—
What saith the Arabian? Its memory's a sigh.

THE CHUCHYARD.

BY MISS L. E. LANDON.

The shadow of the church falls o'er the ground,
Hallowing its place of rest, and here the dead
Slumber, where all religious impulses,
And sad holy feelings, angel like,
Make the spot sacred with themselves, and wake
Those sorrowful emotions in the heart
Which purify it, like a temple meet
For an unearthly presence. Life, vain life,
The bitter and the worthless, wherefore here
Do thy remembrances intrude?

The willow shade is on the ground,
A green and solitary shade;
And many a wild flower on that mound
Its pleasant summer home has made.

And every breath that waves a leaf
Flings down upon the lonely flowers
A moment's sunshine, bright and brief—
A blessing looked by passing hours.

Those sweet, vague sounds are on the air,
Half sleep, half song—half false, half true,
As if the wind that brought them there
Had touched them with its music too.

It is the very place to dream
Away a twilight's idle rest;
Where Thought floats down a starry stream,
Without a shadow on its breast.

Where Wealth, the fairy gift, 's our own,
Without its low and petty cares;
Where Pleasure some new veil has thrown
To hide the weary face she wears.

Where hopes are high, yet cares come not,
Those fellow-waves of life's dear sea,
Its froth and depth—where Love is what
Love only in a dream can be.

I can not muse beside that mound—
I can not dream beneath that shade—
Too solemn is the haunted ground
Where Death his resting-place has made.

I feel my heart beat but to think
Each pulse is bearing life away;
I can not rest upon the grave,
And not feel kindred to its clay.

There is a name upon the stone—
Alas! and can it be the same—
The young, the lovely, and the loved?—
It is too soon to bear thy name.

Too soon!—oh no, 'tis best to die
Ere all of life save breath is fled:
Why live when feelings, friends, and hopes,
Have long been numbered with the dead?

But thou, thy heart and cheek were bright—
No cheek, no soil had either known;
The angel natures of yon sky
Will only be to thee thine own.

Thou knew'st no rainbow-hopes that weep
Themselves away to deeper shade;
Nor Love, whose very happiness
Should make the wakening heart afraid.

The green leaves e'en in spring they fall,
The tears the stars at midnight weep,
The dewy wild-flowers—such as these
Are fitting mourners o'er thy sleep.

For human tears are lava-drops;
That scorch and wither as they flow;
Then let them flow for those who live,
And not for those who sleep below.

Oh, weep for those whose silver chain
Has long been loosed, and yet live on—
The doomed to drink of life's dark wave,
Whose golden bowl has long been gone!

Ay, weep for those, the wearied, worn,
Dragged downward by some earthly tie,
By some vain hope, some vainer love,
Who loathe to live, yet fear to die.

From the London Literary Gazette.

THE LAMENT OF ONE WHO "CAN GET NO EMPLOY."

So woe-begone a gentleman

I'm sure you never knew,
I am a wretch that has not got
A single thing to do!

I never drink,—for I have not
A grain of sense to spare;
I never smoke; poor earthly joy!
It all dissolves in air!

I never swear,—I reckon that
The stupidest of sins;
I will not game, I've nought to lose,
And no one ever wins!

I can not swim,—my system has
A tendency to cramp!

I never sail,—that getting drowned
Does always strike so damp!

I will not skait,—besides, in June
I could not if I chose;
I take no snuff—for trugamine
Is not a hungry nose.

I can not study,—for my head's
The worst of thoroughfares;
I never hunt,—I hold my life
Worth thirty thousand hares.

I never shoot,—my poultterer's boy
Does all that dirty work;
I hate all politicks,—the Greek,
The Russian, and the Turk.

I can not talk from morn till night,
What have I got to tell?
Nor hear another! better lodge
Next door to old Bow Bell!

I never dance; what! bob my legs,
And bounce about the floor!
I never sing,—a singing man's
A nuisance and a bore.

I play no fiddle, squalls and squeals
Will not repay one's labours;
Nor whining flute, what right have I
To tantalise my neighbours?

I can't compose,—I can not see
Where lies an author's bliss;
Compose! why, bless my foolish pen!
Why only look at this!

WINE.

BY BUTLER.

'Tis pity wine, which Nature meant
To man in kindness to present,
And gave him kindly to caress
And cherish his frail happiness,
Of equal virtue to renew
His wearied mind and body too,
Should (like the cider tree in Eden
Which only grew to be forbidden)

No sooner come to be enjoyed,
But the owner's fatally destroyed.

FINE CUTLERY, &c.—JAMES DICKSON, Cutler and Surgical Instrument Maker, No. 3, Beaver street, (formerly at No. 98 North Market street) Albany, manufactures and repairs all kinds of instruments in the above branches, with neatness, accuracy and despatch, and warranted equal to any article imported, or manufactured in the United States.

Shears, Scissors, Razors and Penknives, ground and finished on an improved plan, and warranted to excel any other in use in this city or elsewhere.

Currier's Stools constantly on hand, and warranted a superior article.

Blades inserted in knife-handles in the most approved style, and most reasonable terms. Locks repaired.

N. B. Country orders punctually attended to.
Albany, Feb. 14, 1823.

36

BOOK BINDING. Signs of the Golden Ledger, corner of State and North Market streets, Albany. WILLIAM SEYMOUR, carries on the above business in all its branches; viz: plain, extra, and super extra—has a first rate ruling machine, and other necessary implements for manufacturing Blank Books of every description, on the most reasonable terms, of the best workmanship.

37 An assortment on hand. Subscribers to the American Masonic Record can have their volumes handsomely bound in boards, with leather backs and corners, at 12 1/2 cents a volume. Feb 14 3m3

PAINTING AND GLAZING.—The subscriber respectfully informs his friends and the public that he continues the House and Sign Painting and Glazing, at the old stand, No. 299, corner of North Market and Steuben streets, where he will accommodate the public with any article in his line. Paints in pots mixed ready for use, of the first quality, can be had at any time. Personal attention will be paid to all orders. March 9, 1823. JOHN F. PORTER.

ALBANY BRUSH TRUNK AND BANDBOX MANUFACTORY.—NORRIS TARBELL, No. 433 South Market street, (opposite the Connecticut Coffee-House,) keeps constantly on hand, and for sale, the above named articles, at low prices. Those who wish to purchase, will please to call and examine for themselves. Cash paid for clean combed Hogs' Bristles. Albany, March 4, 1823.

ALBANY TYPE FOUNDRY.—The subscribers, successors to R. STARR & Co. in the above foundry, continue the business in its various branches, and are prepared to execute orders for the following type, at the regular prices, on a credit of six months, or at a discount of 7 1/2 per cent, for cash, viz:

Roman and Italic—Twenty, Fourteen, Ten, Eight, Seven, Five and Four lines Pica, Canon, Double Paragon, Double Great Primer, Double English, Double Small Pica, Great Primer, English, Pica, Small Pica, Long Primer, Bourgeois, Brevier, Minion, Nonpareil, Pearl. Two line letters—Pica, Small Pica, Long Primer, Bourgeois, Brevier, Minion, Nonpareil, Pearl.

Full face capitals—Small Pica, Long Primer, Bourgeois, Brevier, Minion.

Antiques—Ten and Eight lines Pica roman, Five line Pica italic, Four line Pica, Double Great Primer, Double Small Pica, Great Primer and Pica, with lower case: and Long Primer, Brevier and Nonpareil. Italians—Five line Pica, Double Small Pica, Two line Brevier, and Two line Nonpareil.

Tuscan—Double Small Pica.

Black—Five line Pica, Double Small Pica, Great Primer, Pica Long Primer.

Open Blacks—Five line Pica, Double Small Pica, Great Primer. Shaded letters—Six line Pica ornamented, Two line Brevier and Two line Nonpareil double shade: Two line Nonpareil meridian shade: Double Great Primer, Two line Brevier, Two line Nonpareil, and One line Brevier, single shade: Two line Minion and Two line Pearl italic single shade: Double Small Pica roman, and One line Brevier italic Antique shaded.

Script—English, on inclined body, (cast on a new plan.)

Greek—Pica.

Borders and Flowers—From Six line Pica to Pearl, all cast in copper matrices.

Checks—Canon and Double English, plain and opened. Fractions and Leaders of all sizes, from English to Pearl, English, Pica and Long Primer Piece Fractions; Spanish and French Accents, and Accented Vowels, Figure Vowels, Superior Figures, Dashes, and Astronomical and other Signs, of various sizes; Long Primer Space Rules. Also, Leads ten to Pica, and thicker; Quotations; Brass Rules, &c. and Ornaments and Cuts, in great variety.

Printing materials of every description, and of the first quality, at the lowest prices—Cases, Stands, (an improved pattern,) Gallies, Composing sticks, Chases of all sizes, improved newspaper Chases, in two parts Ball, stocks and skins, Bodkins, Furniture, &c. and, Prout's and Johnson's Printing Ink, constantly on hand. Processes of all kinds furnished at the manufacturers' prices. Wells' Improved presses will be kept constantly on hand, and may be examined at the foundry.

Large additions in the variety of type have been made since the specimen of this foundry was published of which specimens are now nearly completed, and will soon be sent to printers: the punches of which are cut by the senior partner of this firm, whose reputation as a superior letter-cutter is well established; and the whole business being under our immediate superintendence, no pains is spared to make our types in every way worthy the attention of printers. An important improvement in the composition of the type metal has also been made—copper and some other ingredients being added, which render it both harder and tougher, and of a finer grain. Type cast at this foundry are warranted to be as solid as any cast in the country, and that they will not settle in height from the pressure in using. Particular care is also taken to have the type well dressed, and the fonts regularly put up.

Old type is received in exchange for new, at 10 cents per lb. Orders, by mail, or left at the foundry, No. 8 Liberty-st, will receive prompt attention. STARR & LITTLE.

38 The type upon which this paper is printed was cast at the above foundry.

THIS PAPER

Is published every Saturday, by E. B. CHILD, AT THE CORNER OF NORTH MARKET AND STEUBEN STREETS, ALBANY, N. Y.

TERMS—To city subscribers, Three Dollars a year. To subscribers who receive their papers by mail, Two Dollars and Fifty Cents, IN ADVANCE—otherwise, Three Dollars JOB PRINTING neatly executed at this office.

AMERICAN MASONICK RECORD

AND ALBANY SATURDAY MAGAZINE.

VOL. III.

ALBANY, N. Y. SATURDAY, APRIL 25, 1829.

NO. 13.

MASONICK RECORD.

TO THE CHRISTIAN PUBLICK.

The subscribers, being members of the Congregational Church, and of the lodge of Freemasons, in this place, are desirous of giving their testimony to the perfect compatibility and harmony of the two institutions:

We have most of us been members both of the lodge and of the church for a series of years; and although we lament our want of perfect conformity to the principles inculcated in both institutions, yet we trust that in both our hearts and lives have been amended, and brought nearer to that standard which in both is received as the rule and guide of our faith. We do not regard freemasonry as being equal to christianity in importance; but we do regard it as a charitable and moral institution of which a christian may avail himself to very great advantage.

Our lodge is opened and closed with prayer, and instruction is always given, relating in a greater or less degree to the principles contained in the Sacred Scriptures; and it is believed that in these respects a great uniformity prevails among all the lodges in this country. With these facts before us, we cannot but be exceedingly grieved and astonished at the course pursued by some of our brethren of different religious denominations. We are constrained to believe that some of the individuals who have renounced masonry, have at least believed themselves to be actuated by honest motives; and we should be wholly at a loss to account for this, if we did not know that some of the most unhappy scisms that have rent the christian church, have originated from the most frivolous causes; and that minds apparently well balanced and firm, have in all ages been known to yield to the impulse of popular phrenzy.

But to the great majority of seceding masons, we fear that even this limited charity cannot be extended; and that prospects of personal or sectarian advancement have more influenced their minds than that pure and undefiled religion that seeketh not her own. We believe that both the church and the lodge would be the better for being rid of members whose principles sit so loosely upon them, that they are willing to violate the sanctity of an oath, because they can do so without being called to answer for the perjury at a human tribunal.

THOMAS P. TURNER, ORANGE HUBBARD, T. P. BARTHOLOMEW, WILLIAM H. LATHAM, GEORGE O. STRONG, LOVED GABEY, JARED HOSFORD, THOMAS KENDRICK, THEODORE CUSHING, SYLVESTER SLAFTER, HEZEKIAH PORTER, SAMUEL FARNSWORTH, JOHN TYLER, WILLIAM TAYLOR, ORANGE HEATON.

MEMBERS OF THE BAPTIST CHURCH.

EZRA HUTCHINS, JOHN ROSS, OLIVER CARLTON, Thetford, Vermont, April, 1829.

From the Craftsman.

RENOUNCING MASONS.

Demagogues have succeeded in destroying the peace of society, and in producing domestic and fraternal discord in the most revolting forms. Slander and falsehood have become the great engines in the operations of the faction which every friend of virtue and good order must regret to acknowledge, the dominant one, around us. The characters of good men, in all ranks, have been traduced—the press, which should enlighten our understandings and stand the faithful sentinel, not only of our liberties, but of our morals and our manners, has become the vehicle of slander, of cant, and of the lowest slang that ever disgraced the fish markets of Billingsgate. In proof of the last we need only remind our readers, that while masons are assailed with specific charges, conveyed in the vilest language, respectable and by far the most numerous class of our citizens, for no other reason than that they choose to hold themselves aloof from the present excitement, are stigmatized in ridiculous slang, by the wretched nicknames of "Jacks" and "Bats," and other similarly indecent and indecorous appellations. Our legislature has been harassed by petitions to enact laws which are contrary to our constitution and to the spirit of our institutions: but of all the melancholy consequences of the present excited state of feeling in the community of the western part of the state, none is more to be deplored than the obliquity with which crimes are regarded; such as would in a wholesome state of the public mind, carry with them infamy, reprobation and punishment. The degraded (and for the honour of the country, we add, small) number of abjuring masons are particularly obnoxious to this last remark.

Let us calmly look at the predicament in which these men have placed themselves; they assert that they have voluntarily most solemnly sworn, invoking their God to witness their truth, to perform certain acts, and never to disclose certain things; that now, believing they committed a sin in so doing, they hasten to violate this solemn oath and promise; to make reparation for one crime by committing a far greater one. On their own confession must we not regard them in one of two lights, either as wantonly asserting a deliberate falsehood in saying they have taken such oaths, or as guilty of gross perjury in violating them?

In using the word perjury, we do not imagine that in a legal point of view that epithet can be applied to these persons; but in a moral sense it undoubtedly can. Though these individuals are not liable to be sent to the state prison for their crime, we solemnly ask them—is the sacrifice of their consciences in this world, and the jeopardy in which they place their eternal souls, in the next, any the less? Is not truth every where enjoined in the book of life? "Let your yea be yea, and your nay, nay." Will a just and impartial Deity, in judging the awful crimes of falsehood and perjury, ask whether the violated oath was offered on the altar of a lodge, or in the presence of a civil magistrate? We cannot believe he will. In each case God has been called on to witness the sincerity of the promise, and a violation in either case is "taking his name in vain," and treating his power with lightness and disrespect.

But, it is said, that these men have made promises which they now see were wrong, and they are justified in violating them. Fellow citizens! can you extend the band of friendship towards, or acknowledge as an associate, the man who shelters himself behind such a plea? What is to become of truth and good faith if such a subterfuge is admitted? Is not your bosom friend entrusted with your secrets which he promises to keep? Does not your debtor promise to pay you? Has not the wife of your bosom vowed love and fidelity to you? and may not all these ties be broken on the same inducement? Not one of all these promises was more solemnly or more voluntarily made than the abjuring Mason asserts his own to have been, the violation which he asks you to sanction and approve. He asserts the promise itself to have been wrong and therefore not binding. Admit this position, and the man who owes you shall fancy he committed a crime in promising to pay you the money which he wants for other uses: your wife shall imagine that she might have made a better or more profitable marriage, and therefore her vow is not binding: your friend shall, on the same plea, violate your confidence: in short, the ties of society will be broken, and the inducements to truth, rectitude and honour for ever destroyed. We ask Thurlow Weed, or any of his fellow labourers, to say, conscientiously, would they or could they believe (in conversation or under oath) a man who asserts, in the same breath, that he has sworn to do one thing while he has done another—has called his God to judge him as he performed his promise, which promise he afterwards unnecessarily, deliberately and wantonly violated?

It is the fashion of the day to cant of "public opinion." Where is that stern virtue, shunning communion with guilt, that should crush beneath it, with the load of abhorrence and ignominy, the unblushing infidel, who openly avows his participation in a foul murder, and heightens his guilt by the most unblushing falsehoods? Where slumbers that just and virtuous indignation which should hurl from the pulpit the hypocrite, who can, while owning himself the falsest of the false, dare to continue his province as a teacher of the word of the God of truth? Alas! an unjust and fanatical excitement, increased by the exertions of demagogues for their own unholy purposes, has diverted public opinion from the just view of crimes like these, and blinded it to the awful consequences which follow moral degradation, and want of truth and virtue.

Many who style themselves anti-masons are doubtless such from principle. Such of these as have never been masons, though we regret the extent and probable consequences of the delusion into which they are fallen, nevertheless we respect while we oppose them. And of such we boldly prophecy, that when the feverish excitement under which they are now acting, shall have passed, as it surely will pass, they will regret most deeply their misjudging violence: they will again view crime as it should be viewed: they will again refuse communion and intercourse with the liar or the perjurer, (be he the avowed infidel, the hypocrite profaning the pulpit, or the weak man deluded to crime) whom they will regard with the loathing and disgust we must ever feel for them. The time is not far distant when the abjuring mason shall be the bye-word to all, and even anti-masons shall treat him (as many even now feel towards him) as unworthy of regard, confidence, office or credit.

TO THE PUBLICK

At a regular communication of Olive Branch Lodge, No. 215, held in the Lodge Room in Bethany, in the county of Genesee, March 18, A. L. 5829, the subject relative to the expediency of returning the charter of said Lodge was brought up, and a full and ample discussion had thereon: Whereupon it was unanimously.

Resolved, that the Lodge view with deep regret, the unprincipled cause which has led to the present excitement; which has caused such divisions, not only in a political point of view, but that it has been permitted to take a still wider range and far more distressing to community. The Holy Sanctuary has not been exempted—in that sacred tabernacle where the wings of the dove were wont to hover around the altar of God, nothing is now to be heard but the harsh voice of extermination, anarchy and confusion. The members of churches have become so disaffected towards each other, that the union which had been so fondly believed to have been cemented by the blood of Christ, has been broken to a degree perhaps never heretofore witnessed. And although the Lodge view with contempt that part of community, who are willingly led by a gang of infidels, who revere neither God nor the religion of his son—who are continually fanning the coals of anti-masonry for the most contemptible purposes, they at the same time feel willing to make any sacrifice consistent with their republican and religious sentiments, to appease the feelings of that part of community, who, from honest motives, have laid their hands on masonry. Notwithstanding we are sensible that this honest part of community, are acting from mistaken ideas relative to our institution—yet we are willing to bend to their opinions, provided that such bending shall not interfere with our civil and religious rights. But we are of the opinion, that the returning of our charter and withdrawing ourselves from the institution without legal authority, would be unmasonic and unprincipled in the extreme; and that public opinion can never demand this sacrifice to be made. Therefore this Lodge recommend to their sister Lodges, the propriety of retaining their charters, with a strict and regular attention on all communications, as the strongest testimonials of their attachment to the craft.

Resolved, that we regret with sorrow, the course which some of our Ontario brethren have lately taken, in absenting themselves from masonry, and recommending the same to be done by others, in returning of charters, &c.; and, although we entertain opinions of the highest value for those of this class with whom we are acquainted, yet we can never approve their measures, however pure their motives may have been.

Resolved, that as the religion of our Saviour and the principles of masonry, teach us to submit to whatever form of government we may chance to fall under, and as we feel and enjoy in common, with our fellow citizens, the blessings which flow from a republican government, we shall ever view with contempt, all such demagogues who style themselves anti-masons for the purpose of destroying our republican union. That such is the character of the principal leaders in the present excitement, we are aware; and we are not sensible that the returning of our charters, and ab-sending from the institution of masonry will add a two-fold strength to this unprincipled faction, and will in the end have a greater tendency to overthrow our republican government than any other means that has been resorted to by the enemies thereof, since the United States became a free and independent nation.

Resolved, that the foregoing be signed by the secretary and published.

BLANCHARD POWERS, Sec'y.

THE SURRENDER OF CHARTERS.

From the Farmers' (Steuben co.) Advocates.

In times of excitement like the present, difference of opinion must and will always exist. It may be that we are in error, but we do look upon the measure adopted and recommended by the Monroe masons, as in itself wrong, and as a precedent fraught with much danger to our republican institutions. Without going into a full expose of our feelings on the subject, we barely state, that whenever any set of individuals are called upon by coercive measures, to yield up any part of their constitutional privileges, (however unimportant those privileges may be) and in obedience to that call, they do so yield them up, we cannot but believe that it establishes a precedent, highly dangerous to society, and to the perpetuity of our present form of government. The Phi Beta Kappa Society is, we believe, an institution altogether literary in its objects, without any reference to principles or professions of masonry. It is still, however, a "secret society." Now, if masons will yield up their rights, the precedent is at once established, and the members of this literary society are in consequence compelled to a similar sacrifice. There are also numerous other secret societies, all of which, by virtue of this one precedent, would be driven to a surrender of their constitutional privileges. After these triumphs, is it not more than probable, that the same spirit of persecution and proscription will become so strengthened as to extend its revolutionizing influence to the religious and political institutions of our country? If a few men are allowed to say what shall not be, they may also dictate what shall be. They may say (as some have said) that there shall be an established national religion. They may say that none but the professors of that religion shall be elected to office, as they say now, masons shall not be. They may then say with truth, We will have a King to rule over us. And then the King, and the Crown, and the Coronation will form the closing scene—and the freemen of the earth—where are they?

Political Anti-masonry seems to be on the decline every where. Southwick still raves, and brags that the strength of the party is now greater in Albany than it was last fall. It was then about eighty strong. [People's Press.]

ELECTION OF OFFICERS.

STATE OF NEW-YORK.

Officers of Solon Lodge, in Athens, Greene county, for the present year:—

Henry White, Master; Dudley Demming, Senior Warden; Peter G. Coffin, Junior Warden; Nathan Clark, Treasurer; William H. Spencer, Secretary; Abraham Spoor, Senior Deacon; Henry Van Loon, Junior Deacon; Alfred Allen and William Fraser, Stewards; Lyman Wait, Master of Ceremonies; Isaac Everts, Tyler.

Officers of Herschell Lodge, in Hartford, Washington county, for 1829:—

Slade D. Brown, Master; Benj. Carter, Senior Warden; Daniel M. Brown, Junior Warden; Aaron Ingalsbee, Treasurer; John Carlisle, Secretary; John Norton, Senior Deacon; John Dickson, Junior Deacon; Richard Allen, Tyler.

Officers of Phoenix Lodge, in Lansingburg, Rensselaer county, for 1829:—

Alexander M'Call, Master; Samuel H. Mulford, Senior Warden; Gershom F. Holmes, Junior Warden; David Fanchier, Treasurer; Samuel S. Bingham, Secretary; Eriq Morey, Senior Deacon; Enoch Lamb, Junior Deacon; Sylvanus Travis and Daniel King, Stewards; Robert Snell, Tyler.

ODD FELLOWS' DEPARTMENT.

ELECTION OF OFFICERS.

Officers of Clinton Lodge, No. 7, of Independent Odd Fellows, in the city of Albany, elected and installed April 3, 1829:—

Daniel P. Marshall, M. N. G.; John F. Porter, V. G.; John O. Cole, Warden; Jacob Henry, Treasurer; Eli Perry, Secretary.

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

NUTRITIOUS SUBSTITUTE FOR FLOUR.

Amongst the most useful and nutritious substitutes for wheat, and which has the advantage of correcting the unwholesome properties of bad flour, is rice. During the scarcity of wheat in July, 1795, one of the measures adopted at the foundling Hospital, with a view of lessening the consumption of flour, was the substitution of rice puddings, for those of flour; which, by the table of diet, were used for the children's dinner twice a week. The flour puddings, for each day, had taken about 168 lbs. weight of flour; the rice puddings, substituted in their place, required only 21 lbs. of rice, to make the same quantity of pudding: the result of the experiment being that if a baked pudding made with milk, one pound of rice will go very near as far as eight pounds of flour. Rice contains a great deal of nutriment in a small compass, and does not pass so quickly off the stomach as some other substitutes for wheat do. It is a good ingredient in bread. Boil a quarter of a pound of rice till it is quite soft; then put it on the back part of a sieve to drain it; and when it is cold, mix it with three quarters of a pound of flour, a tea-cup full of yeast, a tea-cup full of milk, and a small table-spoonful of salt. Let it stand for three hours; then knead it up, and roll it in about a handful of flour, so as to make the outside dry enough to put into the oven. About an hour and a quarter will bake it and it will produce one pound fourteen ounces of very good white bread. It should not be eaten till it is two days old. [Companion to the Almanack.]

COLOUR OF THE EYES.

It is a remarkable fact, and no less so, as having remained so long unnoticed, that in Britain the dark-coloured eye is always found to prevail in the neighbourhood of a coal mine, and where coal is used as the general fuel: while, on the other hand, the light or blue eye belongs to those districts, in which that mineral is not used; and notwithstanding the number of persons continually pouring into the coal districts, from other parts of the country, in consequence of the demand for labour, yet the prevalence, in the former, of the dark eye, especially among the children, is so evident, that whoever will take the trouble to make the observation will most assuredly acknowledge the accuracy of this statement. In what way the sulphurated hydrogen, &c. occasioned by the coal fire, affects the pigment of the iris, it is not now my intention to inquire. I consider it sufficient, for my present purpose, to establish the connexion between the use of coal and the dark colour of the eye; though, from repeated observations, I feel assured, that there are more curious facts connected with the subject than have yet come under the notice of physiologists; and which, when properly developed, will considerably alter the bearing of many opinions, hitherto entertained.

[Rev. T. Price, on British Phisiology.]

OLD FEATHERS BETTER THAN NEW.

If the feathers become dirty, matted, or have lost their elasticity, by age or use, they should be emptied into a hog'shead, and washed with warm soap suds, agitated by means of a rake or garden hoe, and afterwards rinsed in clear water. Then press them dry with the hand, and put upon the floor of an empty and well lighted room, and now and then be whipped and stirred up; and when thoroughly dry, put again into ticks. They are better than new feathers, deprived of the oil, which abounds in the latter. [Am. Farmer.]

TEST OF PERFECT VACCINATION.

All persons should insist on the family surgeon using the test discovered by Dr. Bryce, of Edinburgh. It consists in vaccinating on the other arm, from the first one vaccinated. If the first had been perfect, both pustules will ripen precisely at the same time, if this does not take place, the constitution has not been properly affected, and vaccination must be repeated. This simple and easy security ought never to be neglected.

THE GATHERER.

THE BIBLE.

From a volume entitled Mnemotika, by F. G. Coale, of Baltimore, just published.

Bible history ceases 340 years B. C. Septuagint version made 284; first divided into chapters, 1253. The first English edition was in 1536; the first authorized edition in England was in 1539; the second translation was ordered to be read in churches, 1549; the present translation finished, September, 1611; permitted by the Pope to be translated into all the languages of the Catholic states, Feb. 28, 1759. The following is a dissection of the Old and New Testament:

	In the Old Testament.	In the New.	Total.
Books	89	27	66
Chapters	929	260	1,189
Verses	23,214	7,959	31,173
Words	592,493	181,253	773,746
Letters	2,728,100	838,380	3,566,480

The Apocrypha has 183 chapters, 6081 verses, and 125,185 words. The middle chapter, and the least in the Bible, is the 117th Psalm; the middle verse is the 8th of 118th Psalm; the middle line is the 2d book of the Chronicles, 4th chapter, and 16th verse; the word and occurs in the Old Testament 35,535 times; the same word in the New Testament occurs 10,684 times; the word Jehovah occurs 6855 times.

Old Testament.—The middle book is Proverbs, the middle chapter is the 29th of Job; the middle verse is in the 2d book of Chronicles, 20th chapter, and 18th verse; the least verse is the 1st book of Chronicles, 1st chapter, and 1st verse.

New Testament.—The middle is the Thessalonians, 2d; the middle chapter is between the 13th and 14th of the Romans; the middle verse is the 17th of the 17th chapter of the Acts; the least verse is the 35th verse of the 11th chapter of the Gospel by St. John.

The 21st verse of the 7th chapter of Ezra has all the letters of the alphabet in it.

The 19th chapter of the 2d book of Kings, and the 37th chapter of Isaiah, are alike.

The book of Esther has 10 chapters, but neither the words Lord nor God in it.

The following is a chronological list of different versions and editions of the scriptures: First translated into the Saxon language 939. Hebrew—first printed Hebrew Bible done at Soncinum in Italy, at Naples, 1487; complete of the whole Bible, at Soncinum, 1488; at Venice, by Bomberg, 1518—and at the same epoch in Spain, under Cardinal Ximenes; in 1526—28, the first edition of B. Chaim; Basil, 1534; in 1549, by B. Chaim; in 1572, the Royal of Spanish Polyglott, 8 vols. at Antwerp; third edition of B. Chaim's Bible, 1618; in 1623, at Venice; Amsterdam, 1724-27; Paris 1641, 10 fol. vols. Polyglott; London, Polyglott, 1757.

Bibles, Hebrew, in quarto—Paris, R. Stephens, 1539—1534; Antwerp, 1571; Geneva 1619; Amsterdam 1635, and again 1639; Venice 1639, Amsterdam, by Athias, 1661 and 1667; Frankfurt 1677; Berlin 1699; Leusden's last edition of 1705; Dr. Kennicott's, 1776—1780; Parma, by De Rossi, 1784—1785—1786.

Bible, Greek, first printed was the Complutarian in Spain, 1514, Venice 1518; Strasburg 1526; Hamburg 1596; Frankfurt, 1597; Rome 1587—1588; Paris 1628; Oxford 1707; Franeker 1709.

Bibles, Latin, see Vulgate. Bibles in the modern language of Europe were first printed in Holland 1478; French 1498, German 1524; Italian 1530; English, by Tindall, 1534—by Miles Coverdale, 1535; Swedish 1546; Spanish at Ferrara, 1553; Welsh 1588.

Bibles, Oriental, are Samaritan, Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, Coptic, Sahidic or Upper Egypt, Ethiopic, Armenian, Georgian, Persian, &c.

Bibles, Indian, by the Society for propagating the Gospel in New England, at Cambridge, 1661-1664; in the Natick language; by Elliott at Cambridge, in 4to 1685.

Bibles, first printed in the United States. In consequence of the revolutionary war, Bibles became scarce and dear. Robert Aitkin, printer of Philadelphia, September 12th, 1782, published an edition. The Reverend Dr. William White, and the Reverend Mr. Duffield had been appointed to examine it, and reported favourably. Congress itself recommended the book to the people, but neglected to provide for competition in the sales; made peace, and British Bibles coming into the market, the meritorious publisher was severely injured.

From the Yankee and Boston Literary Gazette.

SINCERITY.

I will never consent, while I breathe, to treat a scoundrel with deference, at the expense of an honest man; to disappoint a friend—to spare the feelings of a fool, because he is a fool, and a stranger—no, not even a stranger—an intruder.

Now, you are in earnest—now, I believe you.

That I am. I see friendship, love, common sense, and common honesty sacrificed, every hour, to what is called politeness. I see women, every day—out of respect, as they say, to their husbands—tricked out with better dress, with better looks—and with better humour, to receive strangers, than to receive a husband—the rogues—persuading the good, easy fool, when they give other men a cleaner table cloth, and a better dinner, that they do it out of love and respect to him!

Abominable!—they treat the lord of their affections, the partner of their bed, the father of their children, worse than any other man—they do indeed—there's no denying it:

'Tis all a wicked, profligate, cold-hearted lie, and they know it. They call it hospitality. Worse and worse. Hospitality is not ostentation. Hospitality is simple and sincere. No—they want to please a stranger—to deceive him, even for an hour; to appear better off in the world, richer, and more comfortable than they really are. They are secretly tired of home—of that plain, quiet, comfortable, beautiful decency, which makes home so dear to a man. Such women are sure to be sluts and hypocrites, just in proportion to the difference they make between their household and the world—the stranger and their husband. They go slipshod, about the house—their caps o' one side—hair flying loose—and themselves fitter for a horse-pond, than a marriage bed, or a dinner table,—till, in mercy to their husbands, some stranger knocks at the door.

Oh, but if you ask a man to dinner with you, you must give him something better than pork and beans.

Not if I eat pork and beans myself.

But he'll be offended.

Let him. He's a fool, if he expects to be treated at my own house, by my own wife, better than myself am. Sir, I can tell, by looking at the plate of a man, exactly how he is esteemed by the woman at the head of the table.

Of course. The higher she esteems him, and the more she loves him, the better he will be helped.

Exactly the reverse. The husband will be worst off; and if there be any particular, dear friend—who comes often—somebody to whom the family are under great obligation, you may know him by the drumsticks in his plate—the muddy cider—and the small claws of the lobster.

But, after all, if we can't be free and easy with our friends, with whom can we be so?

Free and easy!—Codfish and potatoes! Is that what you call being free and easy. Make your friends eat pudding and goose out of the same plate. But so it ever is—we always treat them worst, who treat us best—a man will borrow money of his best friend, to pay the rascal that has put him in jail—and then, let his friend whistle for the money—or come to a downright quarrel with him, if he should refuse to lend him any more for the same purpose.

GERMAN SCHOOLS.

A law respecting schools has existed, more or less, in the states of the south of Germany, for above a century, but which has been greatly improved within the last thirty years. By this law, parents are compelled to send their children to school, from the age of six to fourteen years, where they must be taught reading, writing, and arithmetic, but where they may acquire as much additional instruction in other branches as their parents choose to pay for. To many of the schools of Bavaria large gardens are attached, in which the boys are taught the principal operations of agriculture and gardening in their hours of play; and, in all the schools of the three states, the girls, in addition to the same instructions as the boys, are taught knitting, sewing, embroidery, &c. It is the duty of the police and priest of each commune or parish, to see that the law is duly executed, the children sent regularly, and instructed duly. If the parents are partially or wholly unable to pay for their children, the commune makes up the deficiency. Religion is taught by the priest of the village hamlet; and where, as is frequently the case in Wurtemberg, there are two or three religions in one parish, each child is taught by the priest of its parents; all of which priests are, from their office, members of the committee or vestry of the commune. The priest or priests of the parish have the regular inspection of the school-master, and are required by the government to see that he does his duty, while each priest, at the same time, sees that the children of his flock attend regularly. After the child has been the appointed number of years at school, it receives from the schoolmaster, and the priest of the religion to which it belongs, a certificate, without which it cannot procure employment. To employ any person under twenty-one, without such a certificate, is illegal, and punished by a fixed fine, as in almost every other offence in this part of Germany; and the fines are never remitted, which makes punishment always certain. The school-master is paid much in the same way as in Scotland; by a house, a garden, and sometimes a field, and by a small salary from the parish, and by fixed rates for the children.

A second law, which is coeval with the school law, renders it illegal for any young man to marry before he is twenty-five, or any young woman before she is eighteen; and a young man, at whatever age he wishes to marry, must show, to the police and the priest of the commune where he resides, that he is able, and has the prospect, to provide for a wife and family.

[Louden's Mag. Nat. Hist.

PERSIAN STORY-TELLERS.

In the court there is always a person who bears the name of 'story-teller to his majesty;' and the duties of his office require a man of no mean acquirement. Though passionately fond of public exhibitions, the Persians have none that deserve the name of theatrical entertainments: but though strangers to the regular drama, their stories are often dramatick, and those whose occupation is to tell them, sometimes display so extraordinary a skill, and such varied powers, that we can scarce believe, while we look on their altered countenances, and listen to their changed tones, that it is the same person who at one moment tells a plain narrative in his natural voice, then speaks in the hoarse and angry tone of offended authority, and the next subdues the passions he has excited by the softest sounds of feminine tenderness. The art of relating stories is attended both with profit and reputation. Great numbers attempt it, but few succeed. It requires considerable talents, and great study; none can arrive at eminence except men of cultivated taste and retentive memory. They must not only be acquainted with the best ancient and modern stories, but be able to vary them by introducing new incidents, which they have heard or invented. They must also recollect the finest passages of the most popular poets, to aid the impression of the narrative by appropriate quotations. The person whose office it is to amuse his majesty with these stories is always in attendance, it is equally his duty to beguile the fatigues of a long march, and to sooth the mind when disturbed by the toils of public affairs, and his tales are artfully made to suit the disposition and momentary humour of the monarch. Sometimes he recites a story of the genii, at others he speaks of the warlike deeds of former sovereigns, or of the love of some wandering prince. Often the story is of coarser materials, and the king is entertained with low and obscene adventures.

[Malcolm's History of Persia, New edition.

CITIES OF PERSIA.

Persia has, in all ages, been remarkable for the magnificence of its cities. Ispahan, which was for several centuries the capital, though it has ceased to be the royal residence, is still the most populous of them. When seen from a distance, the lofty palaces, and the domes of the numerous mosques and colleges, derive additional beauty from being half-veiled by shady avenues and luxuriant gardens. Though the first impressions be weakened by a nearer view, and by contemplating the ruins of former grandeur, enough remains to excite great admiration. The fine bridges over the Zainderood are still in good repair. Almost all the colleges have been preserved. Many of the former palaces are yet perfect, and some new ones have been erected by the governor, Hajee Mahomed Houssein Khan, as if to tempt the monarch to make this city once more his residence. No buildings can be more striking than some of these palaces. The front room, or hall, is in general open, and supported by pillars, carved and gilded in the most exquisite manner; while the large glass windows, through which it receives a mellow light, are curiously stained with a variety of colours. Before each there is an open space, with a fountain, near which the domesticks stand to watch the looks and words of their lord, who is generally seated at one of the windows. [Ib.

GENERAL JACKSON.

The following anecdote of President Jackson is taken from a London military magazine, the United Service Journal, for March. We are by no means willing to answer for the truth of it, and publish it merely as a specimen of the tough stories which sometimes gain credit abroad. Who can wonder that such stories are told, as long as our electioneering campaigns are so productive of materials?

One day a person was placed at the bar for some pretty considerable number of murders—a very common species of delinquency in Kentucky; who, on being sentenced, contrived, by a vigorous use of his arms and legs to get out of court and make off. The Sheriff instantly invoked the aid of the surrounding citizens to retake the criminal, and several bounded forth for that purpose. Judges in America are not encumbered with wigs and gowns; and Jackson, who had started with the rest, soon headed the chase. The fellow, finding himself hard pressed by "Hickory," (the nick name by which Jackson was known) turned short round and offered fight; when the Judge, having first summoned him to surrender, and he having refused, Jackson coolly drew one of his pistols from his pocket and shot him through the head. He then returned to the court, and resumed his seat, and heard with imaginable gravity the report of the Sheriff of the attempted evasion of the criminal, how he was pursued and, refusing to submit to lawful authority, was shot through the head by a certain citizen, Andrew Jackson, whose aid the Sheriff had legally called for.

INVENTION OF THE GUILLOTINE.

The invention of the instrument used for capital punishment in France is usually attributed to a French physician, Dr. Guillotin, who was prompted by the humane object of shortening the sufferings of felons condemned to forfeit their lives. The guillotine was invented some years before the commencement of the French Revolution; but it was not employed until the events of that disastrous period led to its introduction. It would, however, appear that the guillotine is an older invention than is generally supposed. Historical records of the kingdom of Saxony state, that in the year 1343, five thieves were beheaded at Zittau by an axe, which, by some mechanical contrivance, descended on the necks of the culprits; and in the village church of Mildenan, in Saxony, there is an altar-piece representing young Isaac bending his head beneath a decapitating machine. It has also been frequently remarked, that a similar instrument, called the Maiden, was used in Scotland for decapitation.

THE LEGENDARY.

THE FIRST AND THE LAST DINNER.

From the Atlas.

[In the well-wrought and highly interesting composition that we here condense from the London Magazine, a correspondent gives a valuable and striking lesson. Thousands who might pass heedlessly over a sober essay designed to inculcate the same reflections, will have them irresistibly impressed on their minds by such a picture as is here spread before them. Its most affecting display, and darkest shades, may all be found in the realities of life.]

Twelve friends, much about the same age, and fixed by their pursuits, their family connexions, and other local interest, as permanent inhabitants of the metropolis, agreed, one day when they were drinking their wine at the Star and Garter at Richmond, to institute an annual dinner among themselves, under the following regulations: That they should dine, alternately, at each other's houses on the first and last day of the year; that the first bottle of wine uncorked at the first dinner, should be recorked and put away, to be drunk by him who should be the last of their number: that they should never admit a new member; that when one died, eleven should meet, and when another died, ten should meet, and so on, and that, when only one remained, he should, on those two days, dine by himself, and sit the usual hours at his solitary table; but the first time he so dined alone, lest it should be only one, he should then uncork the first bottle, and, in the first glass, drink to the memory of all who were gone.

There was something original and whimsical in the idea, and it was eagerly embraced. They were all in the prime of life, closely attached by reciprocal friendship, fond of social enjoyments, and looked forward to their future meetings with unalloyed anticipations of pleasure. The only thought, indeed, that could have darkened those anticipations, was one not very likely to intrude itself at this moment—that of the hapless wight who was destined to uncork the first bottle at his lonely repast.

It was high summer when this frolick compact was entered into; and as their pleasure yacht skimmed along the dark bosom of the Thames, on their return to London, they talked of nothing but their first and last feasts of ensuing years. Their imaginations ran riot with a thousand gay predictions of festive merriment. They wanted in conjectures of what changes time would operate; joked each other upon their appearance when they should meet—some hobbling upon crutches after a severe fit of the gout—others poking about with purblind eyes, which even spectacles could hardly enable to distinguish the alderman's walk in a haunch of venison—some with portly round bellies and tidy little brown wigs, and others decently dressed out in a new suit of mourning, for the death of a great-grand-daughter or a great-grand-son.

"As for you, George," exclaimed one of the twelve, addressing his brother in law, "I expect I shall see you as dry, withered, and shrunken as an old eel-skin, you mere outside of a man!" and he accompanied the words with a hearty slap on the shoulder.

George Fortescue was leaning carelessly over the side of the yacht, laughing the loudest of any, at the conversation which had been carried on. The sudden manual salutation of his brother-in-law threw him off his balance, and in a moment he was overboard. They heard the heavy splash of his fall, before they could be said to have seen him fall. The yacht was proceeding swiftly along—but it was instantly stopped.

The utmost consternation now prevailed. It was nearly dark, but Fortescue was known to be an excellent swimmer, and, startling as the accident was, they felt certain he would regain the vessel. They could not see him. They listened. They heard the sound of his hands and feet. They hailed him. An answer was returned, but in a faint gurgling voice, and the exclamation "Oh God!" struck upon their ears. In an instant, two or three, who were expert swimmers, plunged into the river, and swam towards the spot whence the exclamation had proceeded. One of them was within an arm's length of Fortescue—he saw him —he was struggling and buffeting the water; before he could be reached, he went down, and his distracted friend beheld the eddying circles of the wave just over the spot where he had sunk. He dived after him, and touched the bottom—but the tide must have drifted the body onwards, for it could not be found!

They proceeded to one of the nearest stations where drags were kept, and, having procured the necessary apparatus, they returned to the fatal spot. After the lapse of above an hour, they succeeded in raising the lifeless body of their lost friend. All the usual remedies were employed for restoring suspended animation, but in vain; and they now pursued the remainder of their course to Loudon, in mournful silence, with the corpse of him who had commenced the day of pleasure with them in the fulness of health, of spirits, and of life! Amid their severer grief, they could not but reflect how soon one of the joyous twelve had slipped out of the little festive circle!

The months rolled on, and cold December came with all its cheering round of kindly greetings and merry hospitalities; and with it came a softened recollection of the fate of poor Fortescue; eleven of the twelve assembled on the last day of the year, and it was impossible not to feel their loss as they sat down to dinner. The very irregularity of the table, five on one side, and only four on the other, forced the melancholy event upon their memory.

There are few sorrows so stubborn as to resist the united influence of wine, a circle of select friends, and a season of prospective gaiety.

A decorous sigh or two, a few becoming ejaculations, and an instructive observation upon the uncertainty of life, made up the sum of tender posthumous "offerings to the manes of poor George Fortescue," as they proceeded to discharge the more important duties for which they had met. By the time the third glass of champagne had gone round, in addition to sundry potations of fine old hock, and "capital madeira," they had ceased to discover any thing so very pathetic in the inequality of the two sides of the table, or so melancholy in their crippled number of eleven.

[The rest of the evening passed off very pleasantly in conversation, good humoured enjoyment and conviviality, and it was not till towards 12 o'clock that "poor George Fortescue" was again remembered.]

They all agreed, at parting, however, that they had never passed such a happy day, congratulated each other upon instituting so delightful a meeting, and promised to be punctual to their appointment the ensuing evening, when they were to celebrate the new year, whose entrance they had welcomed in bumpers of claret, as the watchman bawled "past twelve o'clock!" beneath the window.

They met accordingly, and their gayety was without any alloy or drawback. It was only the first time of their assembling, after the death of "poor George Fortescue," that made the recollection of it painful: for, though but a few hours had intervened, they now took their seats at the table as if eleven had been their original number, and as if all were there that had been ever expected to be there.

It is thus in every thing. The first time a man enters a prison—the first book an author writes—the first painting an artist executes—the first battle a general wins—nay, the first time a rogue is hanged—(for a rotten rope may provide a second performance, even of that ceremony, with all its singleness of character)—differ inconceivably from their first repetition. There is a charm, a spell, a novelty, a freshness, a delight, inseparable from the first experience, (hanging always excepted, be it remembered,) which no art or circumstance can impart to the second. And it is the same in all the darker traits of life. There is a degree of poignancy and anguish in the first assaults of sorrow, which is never found afterwards. In every case, it is simply that the first fine edge of our feelings has been taken off, and that it can never be restored.

Several years had elapsed, and our eleven friends kept up their double anniversaries, as they might aptly enough be called, with scarcely any perceptible change. But alas! there came one dinner at last, which was darkened by a calamity they never expected to witness, for on that very day their friend, companion, brother almost, was hanged! Yes! Stephen Rowland, the wit, the oracle, the life of their little circle, had, on the morning of that day, forfeited his life upon a public scaffold, for having made one single stroke of his pen in a wrong place. In other words, a bill of exchange which passed into his hands for £700, passed out of it for £1700; he having drawn the important little prefix to the hundreds, and the bill being paid at the banker's without examining the words of it. The forgery was discovered—brought home to Rowland—and though the greatest interest was used to obtain a remission of the fatal penalty, poor Stephen Rowland was hanged. Every body pitied him: and nobody could tell why he did it. He was not poor; he was not a gambler; he was not a speculator; but phrenology settled it. The organ of acquisitiveness was discovered in his head, after his execution, as large as a pigeon's egg. He could not help it.

It would be injustice to the ten to say, that even wine, friendship, and a merry season, could dispel the gloom which pervaded this dinner. It was agreed beforehand that they should not allude to the distressing and melancholy theme: and having thus interdicted the only thing which really occupied all their thoughts, the natural consequence was, that silent contemplation took the place of dismal discourse; and they separated long before midnight.

* * * Some fifteen years had now glided away since the fate of poor Rowland, and the ten remained; but the stealing hand of time had written sundry changes in most legible character. Raven locks had become grizzled—two or three heads had not as many locks altogether as may be reckoned in a walk of half a mile along the Regent's Canal—one was actually covered with a brown wig—the crow's feet were visible in the corner of the eye—good old port and warm madeira carried it against hock, claret, red burgundy, and champagne—stews, hashes, and ragouts, grew into favour—crusts were rarely called for to relish the cheese after dinner—conversation was less boisterous, and it turned chiefly upon politicks and the state of the funds, or the value of landed property—apologies were made for coming in thick shoes and warm stockings—the doors and windows were more carefully provided with list and sand bags—the fire more in request—and a quiet game of whist filled up the hours that were wont to be devoted to drinking, singing, and riotous merriment. The rubbers, a cup of coffee, and at home by eleven o'clock, was the usual cry, when the fifth or sixth glass had gone round after the removal of the cloth. At parting, too, there was now a long ceremony in the hall, buttoning up great coats, tying on woollen comforters, fixing silk handkerchiefs over the mouth and up to the ears, and grasping sturdy walking canes, to support unsteady feet.

Their fiftieth anniversary came, and death had indeed been busy. One had been killed by the overturning of the mail, in which he had taken his place in order to be present at the dinner, having purchased an estate in Monmouthshire, and retired thither with his family. Another had undergone the terrific operation for the stone, and expired beneath the knife—a third had yielded up a broken spirit two years after the loss of an only surviving and beloved daughter—a fourth was carried off in a few days by a cholera morbus—a fifth had breathed his last the very morning he obtained a judgment in his favour by the Lord Chancellor, which had cost him his last shilling nearly to get, and which, after a litigation of eighteen years, declared him the rightful possessor of ten thousand a year—ten minutes afterwards he was no more. A sixth had perished by the hand of a midnight assassin, who broke into his house for plunder, and sacrificed the owner of it, as he grasped convulsively a bundle of Exchequer bills, which the robber was drawing from beneath his pillow, where he knew they were every night placed for better security.

Four little old men, of withered appearance and decrepit walk, with cracked voices, and dim, rayless eyes, sat down, by the mercy of Heaven, (as they themselves tremulously declared) to celebrate for the fiftieth time, the first day of the year; to observe the frolick compact, which, half a century before, they had entered into at the Star and Garter at Richmond! Eight were in their graves! Yet they chirped cheerily over their glass, though they could scarcely carry it to their lips, if more than half full; and cracked their jokes, though they articulated their words with difficulty, and heard each other with still greater difficulty. They mumbled, they chattered, they laughed, (if a sort of strangled wheezing might be called a laugh); and when the wines sent their icy blood in warmer pulse through their veins, they talked of their past as it were but a yesterday that had slipped by them—and their future, as if it were a busy century that lay before them.

They were just the number for a quiet rubber of whist; and for three successive years they sat down to one. The fourth came, and then their rubber was played with an open dummy; a fifth, and whist was no longer practicable; two could play only at cribbage, and cribbage was the game. But it was little more than the mockery of play. Their palsied hands could hardly hold, or their fading sight distinguish, the cards, while their torpid faculties made them doze between each deal.

At length came the last dinner; and the survivor of the twelve, upon whose head four score and ten winters had showered their snow, ate his solitary meal. It so chanced that it was in his house, and at his table, they had celebrated the first. In his cellar, too, had remained, for eight and fifty years, the bottle they then had uncorked, re-corked, and which he was then to uncork again. It stood beside him. With a feeble and reluctant grasp he took the "frail memorial" of a youthful vow; and for a moment memory was faithful to her office. She threw open the long vista of buried years; and his heart travelled through them all: Their lusty and blithsome spring,—their bright and fervid summer,—their ripe and temperate autumn,—their chill, but not too frozen winter. He saw, as in a mirror, how, one by one, the laughing companions of that merry hour, at Richmond, had dropped into eternity. He felt all the loneliness of his condition, (for he had eschewed marriage, and in the veins of no living creature ran a drop of blood, whose source was in his own); and as he drained the glass which he had filled, "to the memory of those who were gone," the tears slowly trickled down the deep furrows of his aged face.

He had thus fulfilled one part of his vow, and he prepared himself to discharge the other, by sitting the usual number of hours at his desolate table. With a heavy heart he resigned himself to the gloom of his own thoughts—a lethargic sleep stole over him—his head fell upon his bosom—confused images crowded into his mind—he babbled to himself—was silent—and when his servant entered the room, alarmed by a noise which he heard, he found his master stretched upon the carpet at the foot of the easy chair, out of which he had slipped in an apoplectic fit. He never spoke again, nor once opened his eyes, though the vital spark was not extinct till the following day. And this was the LAST DINNER!

MISCELLANY.

From Brander's Journal.

WINE DRINKING.

Use a little wine, for thy stomach's sake. 1 Tim. v. 23.

So says St. Paul—and this seems to have been the opinion of the most ancient philosophers and physicians. A moderate use of it has been sanctioned by the wise and good in all ages. Those who have denied its virtues are those who have not been able to drink it. Asclepiades wrote upon wine, the use of which he introduced with almost every remedy, observing, that the gods had bestowed no more valuable gift on man; for it is said of him, that he liked that wine best, which he drank at other people's cost—a notion adopted by the oinopholous Mosely, who, when asked, "What wine do you drink, doctor?" answered, "Port at home—claret abroad!"

Hippocrates, the father of physick, recommends a cheerful glass; and Rhases, an ancient Arabian physician, says, no liquor is equal to good wine. Reineck wrote a dissertation "De Potu Vinoso;" and the learned Dr. Shaw lauded the "juice of the grape." But the stoutest of its medical advocates was Tobias Whitaker, physician to Charles II., who undertook to prove the possibility of maintaining life, from infancy to old age, without sickness, by the use of wine!

It must, however, be remembered, that Whitaker was cordially attached to wine, and a greater friend to the vintner than to the apothecary, having as utter a dislike to unpalatable medicines, as the most squeamish of his patients; therefore, Dr. Toby's evidence must be taken with caution, independently of the courtly spirit that might have led him to adapt his theories to the times.

It has been questioned whether the use of wine was known to the antediluvian world; but there can be no doubt, in the corrupt state of man, that wine would have its share in his debasement, and it may be very strongly inferred, from the circumstance that Noah planted a vineyard, and, moreover, "that he drank of the wine, and was drunken," (Gen. ix. 20.)—a sad stain in the character of a man who was "perfect in his generation;" and which also proves that, in the earliest period of the world, the very best of men were liable to fall into error and excess.

But the antiquity and propriety of wine-drinking is not matter of question. The archbishop of Seville, Antonio de Solis, who lived to be 110 years old, drank wine; and even that wonderful pattern of propriety, Cornaro, did the same; but the question is about quantity. Sir William Temple was pleased to lay down a rule, and limit propriety to three glasses. "I drink one glass," says he, "for health, a second for refreshment, a third for a friend; but he that offers a fourth is an enemy."

As in eating, so in drinking, in the question of quantity—much depends on the capacity of the stomach. A very abstemious friend of mine, not long since, dined tete-a-tete with a gentleman well known for his kindness and hospitality, and not less so for his powers of bibulation. After dinner, at which a fair share of many excellent wines was taken, Port and Madeira were put on the table, and before the host, a magnum of Claret. My friend drank his usual quantum; three glasses of Madeira, during which time a great portion of the magnum had disappeared; and soon afterwards, being emptied, the host said, "I think we can just manage a bottle between us." The bottle was brought and very shortly disappeared, without the aid of the visitor.

We have nothing, however, in modern times, at all equal to the account given of some of the ancients. The elder Cato, we are told, warmed good principles with a considerable quantity of good wine.* But Cicero's son exceeds all others; so much so, that he got the name of Bicongius, because he was accustomed to drink two congii at a sitting. Pliny, and others, abound in grand examples, that prove we have degenerated at any rate in this respect, for these convivia were neither sick nor sorry. Even that eminent debauchee, Nero, was only three times sick in fourteen years. "Nam qui luxuriæ immoderatissimæ esset, ter omnino per xiv, annos languit; atque ita, ut neque vino, neque consuetudine reliqua abstereretur."

The Abbe de Voisenon, a very diminutive man, said to his physician, who ordered him a quart of ptisan per hour, "Ah! my friend, how can you desire me to swallow a quart an hour! I hold only a pint."

Wine has not only been considered good for the body, but has, from the earliest period, been thought invigorating to the mind. Thus we find it a constant theme of praise with poets. Martial says—

Regnat nocte calix, voluuntur bibula mane,
Cum phœbo Baccus dividit imperium
All night I drink, and study hard all day;
Bacchus and Phœbus hold divided sway.

Horace has done ample justice to it; and even Homer says—

*Cato allowed his slaves, during the Saturnalia, four bottles of wine per diem.

†Two congi are seven quarts, or eight bottles!

The weary find new strength in generous wine.

Upon the principle, no doubt, of expanding the imagination, we find, so early as 1374, one Geoffrey Chaucer had a pitcher of wine a day allowed him. Ben Jonson, in after times, had the third of a pipe annually; and a certain share of this invigorating aliment has been the portion of Laureates down to the present day.

Nor are the poets the only eulogists of wine. Some of the greatest names in history are to be found in the list. We find Mr. Burke furnishing reasons why the rich and the great should have their share of wine. He says, they are among the unhappy—they feel personal pain and domestic sorrow—they pay their full contingent to the contributions levied on the mortality in these matters; therefore they require this sovereign balm. "Some charitable dole," says he, "is wanting to those, our often very unhappy brethren, to fill the gloomy void that reigns in minds which have nothing on earth to hope or fear; something to relieve the killing languor and over-laboured lassitude of those who have nothing to do."

This observation of Mr. Burke's introduces it to our notice as a remedy—as a medicine, in the hands of a physician. Thus we find particular wines recommended by particular doctors, having a fashionable run as specifics—at one time all the gouty people were drinking Madeira; and many a man persuaded himself he had a fit of flying gout, for the sake of the remedy.* Somebody, however, found out that Madeira contained acid, and straight the cellars were rummaged for old Sherry. This change was attributed to Dr. Baillie, who had no more to do with it than Boerhaave, as he has been known to declare. Sherry, and nothing but Sherry, however, could or would the Podagres drink.

Dr. Reynolds, who lived and practised very much with the higher orders, had a predilection for that noble and expensive comforter, Hoc! which short word, from his lips, has often made the doctor's physick as costly as the doctor's fee.

Wine has also been recommended, by the highest medical authorities, as alleviating the infirmities of old age.

A Greek physician recommended it to Alexander as the pure blood of the earth.

Though an excess in wine is highly blamable, yet it is more pardonable than most other excesses. The progressive steps to it are cheerful, animating, and seducing; the melancholy are relieved, the grave enlivened, the witty and gay inspired—which is the very reverse of excess in eating: for, Nature satisfied, every additional morsel carries dulness and stupidity with it. "Every inordinate cup is unblessed, and the ingredient is a devil," says Shakspeare.

"King Edgar, like a king of good fellows," adds Selden, "or master of the revels, made a law for Drinking. He gave orders that studs, or knobs of silver or gold (so Malmesbury tells us,) should be fastened to the sides of their cups, or drinking vessels, that when every one knew his mark or boundary, he should, out of modesty, not either himself covet, or force another to desire, more than his stint." This is the only law, before the first parliament under king James, that has been made against those swill-bowls,

Swabbers of drunken feasts, and lusty rowers,
In full brimmed rummers that do ply their oars,

"who, by their carouses (tippling up Nestor's years as if they were celebrating the goddess Anna Perenna,) do, at the same time, drink others' health, and mischief and spoil their own and the publick."

An argument very much after this fashion was held by the learned Sir Thomas More. Sir Thomas was sent ambassador to the Emperor by king Henry the Eighth. The morning he was to have his audience, knowing the virtue of wine, he ordered his servant to bring him a good large glass of Sack; and, having drunk that, called for another. The servant, with officious ignorance, would have dis-

*An eminent London painter in London, a governor of St. Bartholomew's Hospital, got a receipt for the Painter's Cholick (cholera pictorum) which contained all sorts of comfortable things—the chief ingredients being Cogniac brandy and spices. It did wonders with the first two or three cases; but he found the success of the remedy so increased the frequency of the complaint, that he was compelled to give up his medical treatment, for as long as he had the Specific, his men were constantly making wry faces at him.

sued him from it, but in vain; the ambassador drank off a second, and demanded a third, which he likewise drank off; insisting on a fourth, he was over-persuaded by his servant to let it alone; so he went to his audience. But when he returned home, he called for his servant, and threatened him with his cane. "You rogue," said he, "what mischief have you done me! I spoke so to the emperor, on the inspiration of those three glasses that I drank, that he told me I was fit to govern three parts of the world. Now, you dog! if I had drunk the fourth glass, I had been fit to govern all the world."

The French, a very sober people have a proverb—

Qu'il faut, a chaque mois,
S'enivrer au moins une fois.

Which has been improved by some, on this side the water, into an excuse for getting drunk every day in the week, for fear that the specifick day should be missed. It would, however, amuse some of our sober readers, to find this made a question of grave argument—yet, "whether it is not healthful to be drunk once a month," is treated on by Dr. Car in his letters to Dr. Quincy.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, APRIL 25, 1829.

☞ The office of the Masonick Record will be removed to No. 3, Beaver-street, on the first of May.

☞ Those of our subscribers who intend to change their places of residence on the first proximo, will please to inform the carrier or leave notice at this office, in order that they may be regularly served with their papers.

Regeneration continues its salutary course in the west, bearing down corruption and anti-masonry in all quarters; and notwithstanding the endeavours of the faction to smooth over its own reverses, and collect its fragments together again in the shape of a party, the symptoms of its approaching dissolution can not be concealed. Its miserable and desperate dupes may cling to it as their only hope; its hired libellers may rave and misrepresent the truth, and affect to make light of its losses; but the fact can not with any consistency be denied, that the honest and intelligent people have proclaimed it the evil of the day and the scourge of the land, and resolved as such to sweep it from this fair portion of the earth. Its weakened majorities in some, and its total discomfiture in other portions of the infected district, would be sufficient evidence of this fact, did none other exist; but, besides, we have further proof in the effectual check it has met with in places where it has recently for the first time attempted to rear "its serpent crest." This change in the publick mind is not the effect of momentary passion or extraordinary zeal: it is the wholesome fruit of sober and calm reflection, and of that feeling of patriotism and universal toleration which gave us our liberties and which has preserved them inviolate to the present day. The same reflection and the same patriotic feeling, true to themselves and the land of their birth, will pursue their glorious victory until every remnant of prejudice and persecution, however specious its claims upon existence, is buried in the unfathomable depths of oblivion.

CATHOLICK EMANCIPATION. The advices received from England during the past week have removed all doubt as to a speedy compliance on the part of the British government with the claims of the Irish Catholics. The relief bill is supported in the House of Commons by a majority of more than two to one; and though much excitement throughout the kingdom has been caused by the projected plan of concession, the opposition does not appear to be sufficiently formidable to create any fears as to the final success of the measure. In the House of Commons on the 5th of March, Mr. Peel delivered a brilliant speech, of several hours duration, in favour of the Catholics, and it is supported by a majority of the learning and ability, as well as numbers, in the House of Lords. The following is a sketch of the relief bill which has probably ere this passed into a law:

1. its basis is the removal from the Roman Catholics of civil disabilities, and the equalization of political rights.

2. Roman Catholics are to be admitted into both houses of parliament.

There are to be no restrictions as to numbers.

Catholics becoming members of either House are to take an oath, to support and defend the succession of the Crown—abjuring the sentiment that Princes excommunicated by the Pope may be deposed and murdered by their subjects—denying the right of the Pope to any civil jurisdiction in the British Kingdom,—disclaiming, disavowing, and solemnly abjuring any intention to subvert the present Church Establishment as settled by law, &c. &c.

3. Roman Catholics are to be incapable of holding the office of Lord Chancellor, or of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

4. They may hold all Corporate Offices—may be Sheriffs and Judges.

5. But they are not to hold places belonging to the Established Church, the Ecclesiastical Courts, or Ecclesiastical foundations, nor any office in the Universities, the Colleges of Eton, Winchester, and Westminster; nor any School of Ecclesiastical Foundation. The laws relative to Roman Catholic right to presentations are to be retained. In cases where any Roman Catholic shall hold an office with which Church patronage is connected, the Crown is to have the power of transferring the patronage. No Roman Catholic to hold any office to advise the Crown in the appointment of Offices connected with the Ecclesiastical Church of England and Ireland.

6. The existing Penal Laws affecting Roman Catholics are to be repealed.

7. Roman Catholics are to be put with respect to property, on a footing with Dissenters.

8. Catholic Members of Parliament are not to be obliged to quit the House upon any particular question. (Mr. Wilmot Horton's suggestion upon this subject is held to be objectionable.)

9. There is to be no Declaration required against Transubstantiation.

10. Upon the subject of Ecclesiastical Securities, the Roman Catholics are to be placed on the footing of all other dissenters.

11. There is not to be any vote, nor is there to be any interference with the intercourse in spiritual matters between the Roman Catholic church and the See of Rome.

12. The Episcopal titles and names, now in use in the Church of England are not to be assumed by the members of the Roman Catholic church.

13. When Roman Catholics are admitted to corporate and other offices, the insignia of such offices are in no case to be taken to any other place of worship than the Established church. No robes of office are to be worn in any other than the English church.

14. The Jesuits and Monastick communities—The names and numbers of the individuals belonging to the existing communities are to be registered—Communities bound by religious or monastick vows, are not to be extended, and provision is to be made against the future entrance into this country of the order of Jesuits—The Jesuits are now to be registered.

15. Elective Franchise—Forty Shilling Freeholders. The Elective franchise is proposed to be raised from Forty Shillings to Ten Pounds.

Freeholders are to be registered, and the registry is to be taken before the Assistant Barrister of the Irish counties, with power of an appeal, in certain cases, from his decision, to a higher tribunal.

☞ Thurlow Weed came to this city on Sunday last, [very christian-like] and remained here for two or three days. The object of his visit was to oust Solomon out of the Observer. A secret meeting of the managers was held, (all opposed as they are to such dark proceedings) when it was discovered that His Excellency would work a little the cheapest, and poor Weed was compelled to throw himself upon the charity of the Bisselites again. We cannot but compassionate the modest barber to Timothy Munroe on the many reverses to which he seems to be subject; but the mutability of human affairs is sometimes very unaccountable. His friends at Rochester have tried every means to get rid of him, for more than a year past. One attempt was made upon Troy, another upon Utica, and now a third, (for aught we know, a fiftieth) upon Albany. But all will not do; he's bad coin—he won't pass abroad, and is destined to remain a dead weight upon the charity of the leaders at Rochester.

☞ We have had upon our table for two or three weeks, a quarter of a sheet, entitled Annals of Liberty, Generosity, Publick Spirit, &c.—a compilation of instances of publick and private liberality, collected and published "for the purpose of exciting, by force of examples, a spirit worthy of this age, and this thrice blessed country." We shall hereafter publish an abstract of these Annals, and in the mean time inform our readers that, if they are acquainted with any instances of generosity worthy of being recorded, communications on the subject will be thankfully received by M. Carey, Esq. of Philadelphia.

☞ The Rev. Mr. B. B. Hotchkiss says "the day for the triumph of hypocrisy is past" and "principle has found devout worshippers in the land." Nothing is more evident from the recent expression of the publick opinion, and this doctor of anti-masonick divinity will be still better convinced of the fact by the middle of November next.

☞ Mr. Avery Allyn anticipates "future events" from "the measures he has taken with regard to masonry," but he does not say whether a total eclipse and a comet are to be among them. Some of these anti-masons are more powerful than Archimedes. If we are to credit their own words, moving the universe is mere pastime.

☞ The attention of the miscellaneous reader is directed to the advertisement, in another column, of the Ladies Magazine. There are several publications in the United States, of a similar character, but we know of none so worthy of support from the Ladies as Mrs. Hale's Magazine.

☞ The Duke of Wellington and the Earl of Winchelsea fought a duel on the 21st of March. Its real, but remote cause, was the Catholic question. The Earl accused the Duke of improperly favouring the cause of emancipation in encouraging the establishment of the King's College, London. After a good deal of talk, their Lordships met in Batsea-fields, at eight o'clock in the morning of the above day. The distance was twelve paces; the Duke fired at the Earl, but did not hit him, and the Earl fired in the air; an apology from the Earl followed, and the Duke set off for Windsor, and the affair thus ended—very much as affairs of the same kind sometimes end between striplings, at Hoboken.

PORTUGAL. On the 20th March despatches were received by the British Government from Lords Strangford and Porsonby, at Rio Janeiro. They contain the particulars of an interview between the Emperor of Brazil and the Portuguese deputation. The Emperor assured the deputation that "he had resolved to act in such a manner as to show the world his determination to fight for the rights of his daughter (the young Queen of Portugal) and to enter into no compromise with the usurper of the crown of Portugal." From this declaration it was supposed the Emperor would immediately declare war against Don Miguel.

LITERARY ITEMS. A catalogue of the graduates of colleges in New-England, and the state of New-York together with the names of their presidents, is proposed to be published by Mr. George Haugh, of Concord, N. H. It will make an octavo volume of 300 pages, and be sold for $1.50.

A Mr. Kendall, author of "Letters on Ireland," is preparing for the English press A General History of America. A History of the Huguenots of the Sixteenth Century, containing a Narrative of the sufferings of the French Protestants during that period will be shortly published in England.

A volume of poems entitled The Rivals of Este, and other Poems, by James G. Brooks and Mary E. Brooks, has just been published in New-York. Mr. Brooks is one of the editors of the Morning Courier, and Mrs. Brooks is the writer who has figured so creditably under the signature of Norna. The volume is well spoken of by those who have read it.

Dr. T. Romeyn Beck's work on Medical Jurisprudence has been translated into German, and published at Weimar, in two volumes, octavo.

The first volume of Mr. Jefferson's works has just issued from the press.

The first number of the American Monthly Magazine, edited by N. P. Willis, was published at Boston on the 15th instant. The papers of that city speak of it in high terms. We believe it has not yet appeared in this quarter.

A bundle of manuscripts in the hand writing of the illustrious John Locke, containing the original MS. of his Essay on the human Understanding, with all its corrections, and many letters written during his banishment in Holland, as well as some letters of Algernon Sydney, Lord Shaftesbury, and others, has lately been discovered in England.

For the Masonick Record and Saturday Magazine.

A "LIGHT" IN CHENANGO. The first number of the "Anti-Masonick Telegraph," a passing neatly printed hebdomodal, recently arrived in this city from Norwich, Chenango county, where it was ushered into this breathing world under the guardianship of Messrs. E. P. Pellet & B. T. Cooke.

One of the above named gentlemen lately resided in this city, where he was respected and esteemed by all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance, and where he has left many to wish him prosperity and happiness, but few who can conscientiously extend their charity to the cause which now owns him for a champion. We will, however, do his sound judgement the justice to say, that we believe him to be about as deeply interested in the existence or downfall of Freemasonry, as any other sensible person totally ignorant, and consequently totally indifferent on the subject. He has "cast his bread upon the water" in the hope of pecuniary gain; but we forewarn him that he will find "the excitement" a troubled sea—and if his store does not return to him diminished, rather than increased, we shall give him joy. Friendship for his person would lead us to regret the unfavourable issue of any enterprise in which he is concerned, but a regard for correct principle, and commiseration for a deceived portion of the community, forbid that we should give him "God speed" in this his undertaking.

AMICUS.

DOMESTICK ITEMS. The Albany Times and Literary Writer closed its brief existence on Saturday last. The complaint—want of patronage—by no means a new disease.

A Massachusetts schoolmaster, who was lately indicted for beating one of his scholars with a cart rope till he fainted; very piously requested that the trial might be opened with prayer! Ten to one, that he is an anti-mason, and as much of a christian as most of his brethren.

A company for the cultivation of the wine in Maryland incorporated by the legislature of that state with a capital of twelve thousand dollars, was to go into operation in the early part of the present month.

Nearly seven millions of the publick debt are to be paid off on the 1st July next.

At a meeting of the members of the Bar in the city of New York, on the 17th inst. "it was resolved that the present delays in the prosecution of causes in the Court of Chancery, notwithstanding the distinguished abilities, of the Chancellor, amount to a denial of justice—and that in the view of the meeting the appointment of a Vice Chancellor would remedy this evil. A committee was appointed to transmit the sentiments of the meeting to the Legislature."

Louis McLane, of Delaware, has been appointed, by the president Minister to England, in room of James Barbour the present incumbent, who has been removed.

Henry Lee, of Virginia, has been appointed Consul General of the United States, at Algiers.

The celebrated Robert Owen arrived at Cincinnati, Ohio, about the first inst. The object of his visit is said to be, to discuss the merits of the Christian religion with the Rev. Mr. Campbell, agreeably to an engagement entered into a year since.

A man who was a few years since blessed with 20,000 dollars lottery money, lately applied to the editor of the Portsmouth Journal for twelve and a half cents to pay for a nights lodging!

It may be well for the Morganites to bear in mind the case of Chandler vs. Petit, recently tried before the Superior Court in the city of New-York, in which the plaintiff recovered twelve thousand five hundred dollars, from the defendant, for a malicious prosecution.

The Kennebec Journal, Augusta, states that fortunately for the world, the proper use of N. E. Rum has been discovered at last, and that is to kill lice upon calves!

Herr Cline, who is performing on the corde elastique at Washington, danced a paddy doo with his grandmother, on the 12th inst. The heels and heads of some old people says a Boston editor, are growing wonderfully light: they must take heed, lest a cloven foot should trip them up in some of their pigeon-wings.

"Rough and tumble play" seems is no more lawful than it is agreeable. A stage driver in Delaware has been condemned to pay one hundred dollars, for injury caused to another carriage by his improper attempts to drive past it. And a stage owner was condemned at Catskill, a few days since, to pay three hundred and fifty dollars, and the costs of two prosecutions, for personal injury and inconvenience caused by the upsetting of a stage between this city and Catskill about six months since.

A celebrated group, by the sculptor Canova, of the Graces, has been purchased by Doct. J. Y. Clarke, at Rome, and presented to the Pennsylvania Academy of the Fine Arts. This modern work forms a valuable addition to the extensive collection of that valuable association.

The Legislature of Louisiana have incorporated a company to light New-Orleans, and the suburbs, with gas. Increase of physical as well as of intellectual light, tends to preserve good order in every community.

There is now living in Providence, (R. I.) a man aged about fifty-eight years, who was never out of the State of Rhode Island, never sick, or took medicine; never shaved by any but himself; never sued or was sued; has been up before sunrise every day in the last forty years; and has not tasted any kind of inebriating liquor for thirty years.

FOREIGN ITEMS. Bombay papers received at London state that a part of a mountain in the district of Ryrghar fell on the 28th July last, and destroyed a whole village, containing eighteen houses, sixty-five persons, eighty-six head of cattle, and twenty goats.

Dr. Louis, who was sent to Gibraltar by the French government, for the purpose of observing the fever there, has written letters to the French Royal Academy of Medicine, affirming that the fever which some months since raged at Gibraltar was really the Yellow fever of America and the West Indies.

It is said the petition to parliament, of the Devonshire anti-catholics, which was signed by 25,800 persons, measured ninety yards in length, thirty in breadth, and weighed seventy-two pounds. According to a new statistical account of the existing Jews their number throughout the world is at least 2,700,000, belonging to the different sects.

In Inverness, Scotland, at the Martinmas market, a woman bought 14 pounds of butter, and on reaching her home in Ross-shire found one third of her purchase was mashed potatoes.

In a case lately tried in Dublin, a gentleman, called as a witness, was asked whether his brother, the plaintiff, lived happily with his wife. He replied that they seemed to live "as happily as any couple of married people could."

A writer in a late Cayuga [anti-masonick] Republican says, "A good many years ago I read a story of a circumstance that took place somewhere in Germany or Switzerland—I am not very certain which"—and goes on to relate a story of a band of robbers that had certain signs and obligations—and very charitably concludes that they were masons. Not satisfied with this, he abuses the masons for returning their charters and discontinuing their meetings—represents them as "banditti," and nothing short of confessing themselves such, will satisfy him—they must confess that they are knaves before they are to be trusted. Now, we call on all men of sense and intelligence to ponder and reflect on what is to be the state of society when such incendiary publications are circulated in the newspapers. Will not all the social relations be severed asunder by such inflammatory publications. If one portion of our fellow citizens are taught to view another portion as bandits and robbers, think what must be the feelings of the accused and the accusers!—Such things are calculated to set every man against his neighbour, and turn this fair portion of our country into a perfect hell of discord and violence. And will sober thinking men encourage such a state of things? We believe they will not. At least we know that the respectable citizens of this town, without regard to sect or party, masons, or not masons, are determined to act together in opposing the overbearing and persecuting spirit of political anti-masonry.

[Cayuga Patriot.]

The loathsome contagion of Anti-masonry has spread itself to the once happy and very delightful place called Union Village, in Washington county, N. Y. An anti-masonick meeting was held in one of the churches, on All Fools day, whereat the worthy Elder Barber, premeditated to hold forth—but "want of time" prevented, and his sermon thereafter appeared in the columns of a print established there by the faction, in order to "scatter firebrands, arrows and death" among a peaceable and harmonious people. His Excellency Governor Solomon Southwick, edited the gaping throng with one of his stock harangues—so long, that the devout Elder could not, as we learn, "get in a word edgewise." Deacon Parker presided, assisted by Doctor Corliss and Justice Hyatt; and by the help of all this law, physick, and divinity, a resolution was adopted, certifying that Solomon was bold and patriotic, that his address was able and eloquent, and that he has stood by to defend "the people's rights since the excitement!" What a barbarous quiz!

[Boston Bulletin.]

At an anti-masonick meeting, held at the Mansion House, in Rochester, on the evening of the 11th instant, for the purpose of making arrangements for town election, Mr. H. B. Pierpont, an elder in Bissell and Parker's Church, made his appearance and formally renounced masonry. He did not, however, communicate the fact that he had been several years since, expelled from the lodge for immoral conduct.

[Craftsman.]

Renunciation of Anti-Masonry. The Rochester Republican, of the 7th inst., contains a renunciation of Anti-Masonry, signed by seventy-two individuals, all of the town of Greece. The Republican observes of the subscribers, that they will be recognised as among the best citizens and most substantial farmers of Greece—some of whom have been elected to office by the anti-masons in that town.

DIED,

At Troy, on Sunday evening last, after an illness of three days, ESAIAS WARREN, esq. in the 58th year of his age, an old and highly respectable inhabitant of that city, and for many years its Mayor. Mr. Warren was also President of the Bank of Troy since its establishment in 1808. That community has lost a valuable member, one who was looked up to as the principal founder of the place, and the parental guardian of its interests.

From the Portland Yankee.

Mr. BENJAMIN TITCOMB, Jr. a preacher of the Gospel, a man of extraordinary talents and worth, is just dead—aged forty two; leaving behind him one fact in his biography, of so much value at this particular time, that every paper of our country should assist in giving it circulation. It is this—for six or eight years of his life, he was a helpless and hopeless drunkard. But he grew ashamed of wallowing with the beasts that perish—got up—shook off the indurated filth of eight long years—returned to life, as it were—became a preacher of the Gospel, and to the last hour was an example of perfect and severe temperance. Let no man be discouraged therefore. At one time, while he was studying law with the present Chief Justice of Maine he was regarded, as beyond all comparison, the cleverest young man here. But he was a drunkard. After this, he studied law with somebody at the Eastward—he continued to rise in reputation—but he was still a drunkard. It was about this time that I knew him: and I never knew a more hopeless case. There appeared to be no way of reaching him. His pride was no more, his dignity, his self-respect, his moral courage—hope itself, was extinguished. Yet he awoke; and, after years of heroic self-denial, died, sober and virtuous, and generally respected man. After all, however, his death proceeded from intemperance. The reformation, though it came in season for his character, came too late for his health; and he has gone down to a premature grave, under the blasting and withering curse that he voluntarily fastened upon himself at a period when, if he had not gone astray from the rocky paths of high and peculiar virtue, he might have been just what he pleased.

LADIES' MAGAZINE, conducted by Mrs. Sarah J. Hale, and published monthly by Putnam & Hunt, 41, Washington-st. Boston—and by Bourne, at the Depository of arts, 359 Broadway, New York; & Thomas T. Ash, 130 Chesnut-st. Philadelphia. Each number will contain about 50 pages of original matter, the whole making a beautifully executed octavo volume of 604 pages. Price three dollars per annum, to be paid on delivery of the third number.

The contents of the Ladies' Magazine will be an original miscellany, calculated to improve the taste and foster the talents and virtues of women; at the same time particular regard will be paid to the diffusion of that knowledge of our own country, its scenery and history, and the character and manners of its inhabitants which Americans of either sex, should be careful to acquire. But no sectional prejudices shall be admitted to interfere with the spirit of the work, which is intended to be strictly American.

The constantly increasing patronage which this work has received, during the year it has been before the public, is the best criterion of its merits. The Ladies' Magazine is now circulated in almost every city and state in the Union.

Contents of No. 4, for April, 1829.—Original Miscellany—The Intellectual Character of Woman, Alexander Standish, or, Love in Olden Times, Recollections, No. I.—Our Village School, Fancy's Flight, The Warning, Letter to the Editor, Empress Maria Louisa, Young Ladies' Seminars, The Blind. Original Poetry—The Gifts of Spring, Heart's Ease, The Daughter, The Tamed Eagle, The Dying Girl, Song of a Swiss Peasant, To Woman, 'Elegant Leisure.' Literary Notices—The Family Monitor, The Village Choir, Thatcher's Treatise of Bees, To Readers and Correspondents.

W. C. Little, Agent Albany.

THE WESTERN MONTHLY REVIEW, is published in Cincinnati, Ohio, at the close of every month: Each number will contain 56 octavo pages—making annually a volume of 672 pages. Gentlemen disposed to patronize this work, are requested to enclose Three Dollars to the Publisher, when the numbers will be regularly forwarded according to the directions given.

Contents of No. 10.—Revolution of the Republic of Columbia, The Keys, a Vision of Samaritanus, Duke of Saxe-Weimar's Travels in North America, Life of Erasmus, Origin of Rhyme, Malte-Brun's Universal Geography, Address before a Peace Society, Society in India—Institution of Castes, Philosophy of Human Knowledge, Eulogy on the late Timothy Pickering, The Requiem.

POETRY.

For the Masonick Record and Saturday Magazine.

GOOD-NIGHT.

"One sweet face floateth Sleep's misty sea."

When the watch lights of Heaven
Their starry vigils keep;
And to wearied man is given
The blessed boon of sleep;

Then Lady, as thine eyelids close,
And veil their light in mild repose;
Think, (and the thought will make me blest)
Think that my kiss is on them prest.

The trav'ler as he mourning leaves
His loved, his native land,
As pledge of kindest wish receives
The parting, out stretched hand.

So as thy spirit hastes away
From frowns and cares of busy day,
My mental kiss shall wish for thee
Bright dreams of thrilling ecstasy.—

Albany, April, 1829.

YOU'LL COME TO OUR BALL.

"Comment! c'est lui? que je le regarde encore!—c'est que vraiment il est bien change; n'est-ce pas, mon papa?"Les premiers Amours.

You'll come to our ball;—since we parted,
I've thought of you, more than I'll say;
Indeed, I was half broken-hearted
For a week, when they took you away.
Fond Fancy brought back to my slumbers
Our walks on the Ness and the Den,
And echoed the musical numbers
Which you used to sing to me then.
I know the romance, since it's over,
'Twere idle, or worse, to recall;—
I know you're a terrible rover;
But, Clarence,—you'll come to our Ball;

It's only a year, since at College
You put on your cap and your gown;
But, Clarence you're grown out of knowledge,
And changed from the spur to the crown:
The voice that was best when it faltered
Is fuller and firmer in tone;
And the smile that should never have altered,—
Dear Clarence,—it is not your own;
Your cravat was badly selected,
Your coat don't become you at all;
And why is your hair so neglected?
You must have it curled for our Ball.

I've often been out upon Haldon
To look for a covey with Pup;
I've often been over to Shaldon,
To see how your boat is laid up.
In spite of the terrors of Auntie,
I've ridden the filly you broke;
And I've studied your sweet little Dante
In the shade of your favourite oak:
When I sat in July to Sir Lawrence,
I sat in your love of a shawl;
And I'll wear what you brought me from Florence;
Perhaps, if you'll come to our Ball.

You'll find us all changed since you vanished;
We've set up a National School;
And waltzing is utterly banished;
And Ellen has married a fool;
The Major is going to travel;
Miss Hyacinth threatens a rout;
The walk is laid down with fresh gravel;
Papa is laid up with the gout;
And Jane has gone on with her easels,
And Anne has gone off with Sir Paul;
And Fanny is sick with the measles,—
And I'll tell you the rest at the Ball.

You'll meet all your Beauties;—The Lily,
And the Fairy of Willowbrook Farm,
And Lucy, who made me so silly
At Dawlish, by taking your arm;
Miss Manners who always abused you
For talking so much about Hock;
And her sister who often amused you,
By raving of rebels and Rock;
And something which surely would answer,
An heirress quite fresh from Bengal;—
So, though you were seldom a dancer,
You'll dance, just for once, at our Ball.

But out on the world!—from the flowers
It shuts out the sunshine of truth:
It blights the green leaves in the bowers,
It makes an old age of our youth:
And the flow of our feeling, once in it,
Like a streamlet beginning to freeze,
Though it can not turn ice in a minute,
Grows harder by sullen degrees.
Time treads o'er the grave of Affection;
Sweet honey is turned into gall;—
Perhaps you have no recollection
That ever you danced at our Ball.

You once could be pleased with our ballads;—
To-day you have critical ears;
You once could be charmed with our sallads;—
Alas! you've been dining with Peers;
You trifled and flirted with many;
You've forgotten the when and the how;
There was one you liked better than any;
Perhaps you've forgotten her now.
But of those you remember most newly,
Of those who delight or enthrall,
None love you a quarter so truly
As some you will find at our Ball.

They tell me you've many who flatter,
Because of your wit and your song;
They tell me (and what does it matter?)
You like to be praised by the throng:
They tell me you're shadowed by laurel,
They tell me you're loved by a Blue;
They tell me you're sadly immoral,—
Dear Clarence, that cannot be true!
But to me you are still what I found you
Before you grew clever and tall;
And you'll think of the spell that once bound you;
And you'll come—won't you come?—to our Ball!

LIFE.

What art thou, Life? pale Vanity!
Dim shadow of the things to be;
Weak as the wind, and sightless as the wave:
Thy gold but yellow dross; thy fame,
The rattling chain that binds the slave;
Thy pomp and pride a dreaming idiot's game.

What art thou, Life? Time's trumpet-tone
Echoes o'er glory's work undone;
Breaks down the haughty city's battled wall,
Buries in dust the chieftain's sword;
Bids throne and solemn altar fall,
Till Ruin sits o'er all, resistless lord.

What art thou, Life? Thy richest wreath
Soon plucked by that pile conqueror Death;
Thy softest winds soon chilled by winter snows.
Deluder of young eyes. Thy summer morn
Scarce lightning in the East the rose,
When from its cloud the thunder-peal is born.

What art thou, Life? A showery Spring
Of Paradise! An angel's wing
Still shrouded in our garniture of clay,
Yet to the stars to be unfurled;
A moment of eternal day;
An atom of God's new-created world!

NEW-ENGLAND MEN.

The following stanzas of the poet HALLECK will be recognized as a fair and faithful picture, as far as it goes, of New-England independence.

A justice of the peace, for the time being,
They bow to, but may turn him out next year;
They reverence their priest, but disagreeing
In price or creed, dismiss him without fear:
They have a natural talent for foreseeing,
And knowing all things;—should Park appear
From his long tour in Africa, to show
The Niger's source, they'd meet him with—"we know."

They love their land, because it is their own,
And scorn to give aught other reasons why;
Would shake hands with a King upon his throne,
And think it kindness to his majesty;
A stubborn race, fearing and flattering none,
Such are they nurtured, such they live and die;
All—but a few apostates, who are meddling
With merchandize, pounds, shillings, pence and peddling.

But these are but their outcasts. View them near
At home, where all their worth and pride is placed;
And there their hospitable fires burn clear,
And there the lowliest farm-house hearth is graced,
With many hearts, in piety sincere,
Faithful in love, in honour stern and chaste,
In friendship warm and true, in danger brave,
Beloved a life, and sainted in the grave.

And minds have there been nurtured, whose controul,
Is felt even in their nation's destiny;
Men who swayed senates with a statesman's soul,
And looked on armies with a leader's eye:
Names that adorn and dignify the scroll,
Whose leaves contain their country's history,
And tales of love and war—listen to one,
Of the Green mountaineer—the Stark of Bennington.

When on that field his band the Hessians fought,
Briefly he spoke before the fight began—
"Soldiers! those German gentlemen are bought
For four pounds eight and seven-pence per man,
By England's King—a bargain as is thought.
Are we worth more? Let's prove it now we can—
For we must beat them, boys, ere set of sun,
Or Molly Stark's a widow!—It was done.

VIRGIL'S TOMB.

BY THE REV. GEORGE CROLY.

Beneath the shelter of a mighty hill,
Whose marble peaks were garlanded with vine,
And musical with many a sunny rill,
That through its purple clustered shades did twine,
Bright as a summer serpent's golden spine,
Leaned a low temple, in the sweet, gray gloom,
Hoary with moss, like Age in calm decline,
With, here and there, a rose's lingering bloom,
Wreathed loving round its brow;—that temple is a tomb!

There sleeps the Mantuan! There the subtlest hand,
That ever wakened Passion's lyre, is laid.
Oh! Master Genius of thy glorious land!
When—when shall Italy her tresses braid!
With the bright flowers that round thy forehead played:
When flash to Heaven the ancient sword of Rome?
Come from thy rest, and call her, mighty Shade?
No! Vice, the worm, has fed upon her bloom!
Look not upon the slave; sleep, Virgil, in thy tomb!

BOOK BINDING Sign of the Golden Lodger, corner of State and North Market-streets, Albany. WILLIAM SEYMOUR, carries on the above business in all its branches; viz: plain, extra, and super-extra—has a first rate ruling machine, and other necessary implements for manufacturing Blank Books of every description, on the most reasonable terms, of the best workmanship.

An assortment on hand. Subscribers to the American Masonick Record can have their volumes handsomely bound in boards, with leather backs and corners, at 62 1/2 cents a volume. Feb 14 3m3

PAINTING AND GLAZING.—The subscriber respectfully informs his friends and the public that he continues the House and Sign Painting and Glazing, at the old stand, No. 322, corner of North Market and Steuben streets, where he will accommodate the public with any article in his line. Paints in pots mixed ready for use, of the first quality, can be had at any time. Personal attention will be paid to all orders. March 9, 1829. JOHN F. PORTER.

FRANKLIN LETTER FOUNDRY. The proprietors of this Foundry, offer on liberal terms, the following articles, viz:—Roman and Italic. Fourteen, Twelve, Ten, Eight, Seven, Six, Five, and Four Lines Pica, plain, Canon, Meridian, Double Great Primer, Double English, Double Small Pica, Great Primer, English, Pica, Small Pica, Long Primer, Bourgeois, Brevier, Minion, Nonpareil, Pearl.

Two Lines Letter. Minion, and all larger, Nonpareil, Pearl. Full Face. English and Pica, Small Pica, Long Primer, Bourgeois, Brevier, Minion.

Borders and Flowers of every kind. Antiques. Ten and Six Lines, Four Lines Pica, Double Great Primer, English and Pica, Long Primer, Brevier, Minion, Nonpareil.

Blacks. Four Lines Pica, Double Great Primer, Double Small Pica, Great Primer, English and Pica, Small Pica, Long Primer.

Open Blacks. Great Primer, Double Great Primer, and Four Lines Pica.

Italians. Seven Lines Pica, Five Lines Pica.

Tuscan. Eight Lines Pica, Four Lines Pica.

Shaded Letter. Eight Lines Pica, Four Lines Pica, Double Great Primer, Two Lines Brevier, Two Lines Nonpareil, Eight Lines Pica.

Ornamented, Six Lines Pica, Ornamented.

Leads. Six to pica and thicker, Seven to pica, Eight to pica.

Quotations: Space Rules, from one to eight ems, Long Primer, Astronomical, and other signs; Spanish and French Accents; Fractions; Composing Sticks from twenty to four inches in length; Case Chases; Slice, Brass, and common Galleys; Iron and Mahogany Furniture; Prout's ink; Skins; parchment; points. Presses also furnished.

Several new founts of letter have been out; and it has been the aim of the proprietors to combine the beauty of the modern, with the clearness and durability of the ancient style of typography, and to produce types at once handsome, legible, and useful. Specimens of these will be sent to printers. The greatest care has been taken in the composition of the metal with which all their founts of letter are cast.

All orders, either by letter or otherwise, left at their Counting Room No 41, State-street, or at their Foundry, Eagle-street, south of State street, will receive prompt attention. A. W. KINSLEY & Co.

Albany, Feb. 14, 1829. 3m

THIS PAPER

Is published every Saturday, by H. B. CHILD, AT THE CORNER OF NORTH MARKET AND STEUBEN STREETS, ALBANY, N. Y.

TERMS.—To city subscribers, Three Dollars a year. To subscribers who receive their papers by mail, Two Dollars and Fifty Cents, IN ADVANCE—otherwise, Three Dollars. JOB PRINTING neatly executed at this office.

AMERICAN MASONICK RECORD

AND ALBANY SATURDAY MAGAZINE.

VOL. III.

ALBANY, N. Y. SATURDAY, MAY 2, 1829.

NO. 14.

MASONICK RECORD.

PROTEST OF BINGHAMTON LODGE.

At a regular meeting of Binghamton Lodge, No. 77, holden in the village of Binghamton, in the county of Broome, on the 18th day of February, 1829—

“Resolved, that a committee of five persons be appointed to take into consideration the present excitement on the subject of Masonry, and report to this Lodge, at an extra meeting, on the 5th day of March next.”

[The committee appointed by the above resolution met, and drew up the following remarks. It will be perceived that the communication was not intended for publication, but at the special request of the lodge, it is now offered to the public.]

The committee appointed by the lodge at their last meeting, to take into consideration the present excitement against the institution, have taken an attentive and serious view of the subject; and in common with all good men, deeply deplore the effects which have resulted from this unholy attempt to prostrate masonry. So far as it has had the effect to bring masonry itself into disrepute, we regret it as masons; but as men and as citizens, we deplore its demoralizing consequences on the state of society.

It has destroyed all confidence betwixt man and man.

It has broken asunder the cords by which christians are bound.

It has separated pastors from their flocks, and broken up churches.

It has introduced discord into families and neighbourhoods, where hitherto nothing but harmony prevailed.

It has weakened, if not annihilated the ties of kindred—alienated the parent from his child, the wife from her husband.

It has prostrated the best feelings of the human heart; eradicated the principles of love and friendship, and implanted in their stead, the baleful passions of hatred, malice and all uncharitableness.

This is a terrific picture of the effects of this unexampled excitement, and yet it is short of the truth. Where it will end, no man can predict; the contagion is spreading with unabated fury, and what will be its final consequences is known only to Him who can say to the raging sea of human depravity—“Peace, be still.”

The history of all the revolutions, ancient and modern, which have desolated and disgraced the world; the annals of the inquisition, so famous, or rather infamous, for its persecutions and cruelties, cannot produce instances of blacker malignity, than have characterized this warfare against masonry.

The leaders of this faction (for it is a faction in every sense of the word) have discarded all principles and feelings, which ennoble and elevate man in the scale of creation,—lost sight of all the generous and dignified characteristics of honourable warfare, and have, in this crusade against our order, “displayed hearts made up betwixt the venomous malignity of a serpent, and the spiteful imbecility of an in-feriour reptile.”

They have wrought themselves and their followers up to such a pitch of feverish and preternatural frenzy, that many of them could exclaim with Suffolk, in the play—

“I could stand naked on some mountain’s top,
Where pinching cold ne’er suffered grass to grow,
And curse away a stormy winter’s night,
And think it but a moment spent in sport.”

The spirit of persecution which prevails against masons, seems to be of a fascinating and contagious character. Is it strange that it should be so? Experience proves that men embark with more avidity in a bad cause than in a good one—more zeal and perseverance mark their steps when engaged in the service of the devil, than when employed in works of righteousness. “It requires more talent and labour to become a thief than an honest man, while one leads to the gallows and the other to respectability.” Cardinal Wolsey seems to have acted from this principle; and when he fell from the favour of his prince, became sensible of his error, and exclaimed—

“Oh! Cromwell, Cromwell,
Had I but served my God with half the zeal
I served my king, he would not in mine age
Have left me naked to mine enemies.”

The first burst of indignation against masonry was perfectly natural. A fellow citizen had been carried off from his family, as was then believed, against his will, and his subsequent fate was involved in mystery. This high-handed and unjustifiable violation of the liberty of the citizen—of the laws of God and man—was proved to have been committed by masons! Deluded and guilty men, how can you atone for the mischief you have done?

Without reflection, the whole was ascribed to the influence of masonic principles. Political desperadoes seized upon this circumstance to turn the current of popular opinion to their own advancement. They applied the incendiary torch to the inflammable combustibles of passion, which always follow in the train of popular delusion—the political hacks mounted the hobby, on which they calculated to ride to promotion, and the work of proscription began.

To effect their unhallowed objects it is necessary that masons should be proscribed, slandered, persecuted, exterminated. Blandishments, sophistry, threats and promises are profusely scattered in a disaffected community; ignorant, ambitious, and designing men join the cry in full chorus, and the incendiary leaders mentally exclaim—

“Now, by St. Paul, the work goes bravely on.”

With such men the end always sanctifies the means. That is to say, in plain, practical language, threats and promises, sophistry and arguments, daggers and death, are alike subservient, and alike justifiable to accomplish their nefarious purposes.

In their scramble for popularity the original cause of the excitement has been lost sight of; and the anti-masonic party care no more now for the fate of Morgan, than they do the fate of Judas Iscariot.

So long as the clamor was confined to the principles of masonry, its votaries looked on with calm and stoical indifference. The thunders rolled unheeded at their feet. They know that the principles of masonry are immutable; they challenge investigation; masons are willing their principles should be tried, investigated and analysed in the crucible of honest scrutiny, and if found wanting, thrown over among the rubbish.

The anti-masonic party, in their unholy attempts to exterminate masonry, have abandoned the field of argument, and descended to slanders and personalities, which would put a blackguard to the blush, and disgrace the veriest fish-draw of Billingsgate.

Incendiary priests have been hired and let loose upon society, to sow the seeds of discord under the mask of that religion which inculcates “peace on earth, good will to man.” Their hypocritical cant and crocodile tears have induced a few ignorant and unprincipled renegades, pretending to be masons, to attest to the truth of their infamous and infernal falsehoods—may God reward them according to their works.

If this hasty and imperfect view of the subject be correct, the question then naturally occurs—what is the most prudent course for us, as masons, to pursue. Caution and circumspection are the watchwords of our order.

It is repugnant to the feelings of poor human nature, to bear patiently the contumely which we hear daily heaped upon masonry. It is next to impossible to hear with any degree of complacency, insinuations the most base, and slanders the most vile, hourly uttered against our institution; yet the fundamental principles of the institution enjoin it upon us as a duty not to enter into disputes and quarrels with those who through ignorance or prejudice ridicule and despise it.

It is better to suffer wrong than to do wrong; and a dignified forbearance best comports with our principles and profession. It is not contended that we should relax in our exertions to convince our adversaries of the error of their opinions; a manly, dignified vindication of our principles is demanded at our hands, in self defence, but quarrels and wranglings are by all means to be avoided.

The principles of masonry can never be subverted. You might as well attempt to unhinge creation or remove the earth from her sphere, with the fancied lever of Archimedes. It is so firmly based upon the eternal principles of justice and morality, that any such attempt must be worse than fruitless.

“Masonry has existed through ages, while states and empires, even tongues and languages, have passed away without a trace behind; and will still exist while the sun opens the day, to gild its cloud-capt towers, or the moon leads on the night to embellish its stately pillars. The current of things may roll along its base, the tide of time and chance may beat against its walls, the stormy gusts of malice may assault its lofty battlements, and the heavy rains of calumny may descend upon its spacious roof; but in vain—till our Supreme Grand Master shall come to reward his workmen, will the masonic building stand impregnable, and can only be dissolved when the pillars of the universe are shaken, and the great globe itself, yea, all which it inherit, shall, ‘like the baseless fabrick of a vision,’ pass away before the Almighty Architect. Appearances will then vanish at the touch-stone of truth—then will be the triumph of righteous judgment.”

PROTEST OF PHEBUS LODGE.

TO MICAH BROOKS, BOWEN WHITING, LEMUEL MORSE, AND OTHERS.

Gentlemen—At the last regular meeting of Phœbus Lodge, the W. M. laid before the members thereof, a printed communication, under your signatures, bearing date Ontario county, 20th February, 1829, in the form and style of a circular, addressed to the various lodges of freemasons in the western part of this State, accompanied by an address to the public in general, signed with the same signatures, and as members of the Masonick fraternity; but bearing no evidence from which we might infer, that it was ever sanctioned by the officers or members of any regularly constituted Lodge of Freemasons. The subject, nevertheless, was taken up in full Lodge; acted upon with all due deliberation, and rejected by a unanimous vote. A committee, composed of the undersigned brethren, was then appointed to draft an answer, and transmit to you the views and feelings of the officers and members of Phœbus Lodge, on the occasion.

In complying with this duty, the committee would remark, that they shall be governed by no other motives or feelings than what will comport with the rights and privileges of the fraternity, under a strict observance of the laws of our country; and, in conformity thereto, we would further observe, that the views and feelings expressed, in the outset of your address, are in perfect accordance with our own, but to your conclusions, we can never subscribe.

The members of Phœbus Lodge have not been inattentive or unconcerned spectators of the events which have agitated community, for two years past; but, they have viewed them with much feeling and with deep concern; and we do, most devoutly, join with you in the asseveration, that “we have never considered ourselves under any obligation to act otherwise than in accordance with the strictest rules of morality, and in observance to the laws of our country.” We are free to admit, however, that the Masonick Institution, like all other human Institutions, is susceptible of abuse, and like all others, subject to corrupt and vicious members; and we further admit, and most deeply deplore the fact, that in the abduction of Morgan, the laws of our country were most wantonly and wickedly violated; and that, too, by men professing to be Freemasons; and it has ever been, and still is, our fervent desire, that strict and severe justice might be rendered to the perpetrators of the crime, in obedience to the laws of our state. Sensible as we are, however, of the unlimited veneration we entertain for the public will and the equal distribution of justice, under the laws of our common country, and our deep solicitude for the perpetuity of those liberal institutions, for the more general diffusion of knowledge and education; and our readiness at all times to co-operate with community in general, for their maintenance and support; and notwithstanding what may have been said of us to the contrary, in town, county, and state conventions, by clamorous and designing individuals, yet charity forbids the idea, that a generous, enlightened, and impartial publick does now, or ever will demand of the masonick fraternity, the surrender of their charters and the transfer of their funds to common school districts; thereby diverting them from their natural and proper purposes of hospitality, in order to atone for the crimes of a few individual members.

Let offended justice call over the catalogue of human institutions, religious, as well as moral, and should any be found, whose members have not offended against the majesty of the law, by committing crimes—crimes of the deepest hue and most revolting in their nature; then, would the officers and members of Phabus lodge most cordially join with you in opinion, that the publick voice does, most emphatically call on us, for the surrender of our charter and our funds.

But if, in truth, you are masons; we are induced to believe you are actuated by mistaken views. It is not the publick voice, to which you give heed, but the voice of faction! the voice of persecution! an organized and systematic persecution! breathing the same spirit which has hitherto drenched the christian world in blood and carnage, and bearing on its front, in characters too legible to be misunderstood, that it hath for its object power and political ascendancy—and permit us here to remark, that the grounds you have taken to allay this persecuting spirit, and to restore order and tranquility to society, are wholly untenable. Give up your charters and your funds, and for what purpose? will that satisfy the enemies of Freemasonry? no! you are masons still, and so they will consider you; something more serious and still more degrading in its nature will be required of you; the same disfranchising spirit which has driven you to this extreme, will hunt you down in the other; something in the nature of a religious (or rather political) test, will be required of you, before you can be taken into fellowship, or admitted to favour with this modern uncharitable, disfranchising brotherhood; you will have to renounce and abjure the principles of Freemasonry; you will have to protest in the most solemn manner, that the tender and affectionate ties which have hitherto linked you together in the bonds of charity and brotherly love, are broken off, and that all connection with the fraternity is forever dissolved.

And are you prepared for all this? if you are masons, in very deed, as well might you close your eyes against the bright luminaries of heaven, and reject their influence, or turn a deaf ear to the solemn admonitions of truth and justice, as to erase from your recollection and embrace, the beauty and excellence of the various orders, and the moral principles inculcated by their several lectures.

Finally, we would recommend to the brethren of all lodges of freemasons, to remain steadfast and unshaken in their professions; let your daily walk and conversation be such as will comport with the strictest principles of our ancient and honourable institution; and wherever duty to ourselves, to our fellows, and to mankind in general, shall mark the way, there, by the help of God, let us all endeavour, fearlessly to be found. But give up your charters and your funds, and what next? will your condition be amended, or society improved? We answer, no! Whilst the wise and the good may pity your condition, the untired and unrelenting arm of persecution will be renewed against you, and, when driven to the last extremity, they will laugh at your calamity, and mock, when your fear cometh.

SAMUEL CAMPBELL,
ABEL DE FOREST,
JOSHUA LAMB,
ROUSE CLARK,
PHILO BENNET,
ABRAHAM BAKER.

Columbus, April, 1829.

ELECTION OF OFFICERS.

STATE OF VERMONT.

Officers of Temple Royal Arch Chapter, No. 4, in Bennington, Vermont, for the present year:—

Nathan Bowen, High Priest; Elijah Buck, King; Samuel Scott, Scribe; H. Hall, Captain of the Host; T. Hendryx, Principal Sojourner; Oliver Abell, Royal Arch Captain; George Card, J. Beebe, and Samuel H. Blackmer, Masters of Veils; F. Breckenridge, Secretary; D. Henry, Treasurer; A. J. Haswell, Tyler.

Officers of Mount Anthony Lodge, in Bennington Vermont, for the present year:—

David Henry, Master; Lodwoick Stanton, Senior Warden; Hymen Tuttle, Junior Warden; Samuel Scott, Treasurer; Samuel H. Blackmer, Secretary; J. A. French, Senior Deacon; H. Hall, Junior Deacon; Almon Marsh, and J. B. Chandler, Stewards; Anthony J. Haswell, Tyler.

Officers of Bennington Council of Select Masters, attached to Temple Chapter, No. 4, for the present year:—

Nathan Bowen, T. I. G. Master; Zacheus Hovey, D. I. G. Master; Truman Hendryx, P. Conductor; H. Hall, Captain of Guard; Samuel Scott, Treasurer; Samuel H. Blackmer, Recorder; Sentinel, vacant.

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

INSANITY.

A correspondent of the American Sentinel (Philadelphia) furnishes a very interesting article on Dr. Burrows' Treatise on Insanity. That this malady is hereditary, in eight cases out of ten, we have no doubt, and these cases it is next to an impossibility to cure. Accidental insanity may, in many instances, yield to judicious medical treatment. The Monthly Review, in commenting upon Dr. Burrow's work, remarks that Dr. Knight denies the transmission of insanity in persons whose predecessors have been free from the disorder. It is a well ascertained and remarkable fact, that hereditary insanity is most common among the highest ranks of society, in consequence, it is supposed, of intermarriages being common among family relatives, and it has accordingly been found most prevalent where the system of clanship has been strictly preserved. In ancient Scottish families, where such intermarriages are frequent, hereditary insanity is common.

The correspondent of the Sentinel states, that a brave general of the revolutionary army, used to express a wish to die suddenly, die without children, and die before he was fifty years old. His request was granted—he fell fighting our battles, without issue, and before he was fifty years of age. The reasons he gave for this request were, that at the age of fifty, some of his predecessors had been attacked with insanity. He wished no children, to run the chance of inheriting the malady, and he wished to die suddenly, for reasons equally obvious.

The French and English authors differ materially with respect to insanity, as caused by religion. In the Bicetre, at Paris, the average reports for six years, give fifty-five cases out of four hundred and nine, of religious insanity—in La Salpêtrière, twenty out of five hundred and eight. The English Dr. Knight states, that out of five hundred cases, only one was clearly ascertained to have been produced by religious or moral causes, and that he has uniformly found that devoteism is an effect, not a cause of derangement.

HYDROPHOBIA IN FOXES.

Foxes become mad occasionally, and there have been examples of dogs, which having been bitten by mad foxes, have not caught the disease. In these cases it has been proved that the stomachs of the foxes were filled with wood, earth, stones, leaves, hair, and other substances improper for nourishment. On the contrary, when the madness has been communicated, the stomach and intestines have been found completely empty. From this difference, it is concluded that hunger is the cause of madness in foxes; and this agrees with the results which occurred during and after the rigorous winter of 1826-7, when these animals, with many others, suffered from want of nourishment. [From the French.]

THE REPOSITORY.

From the London Encyclopædia.

THE POPE.

The Pope is elected by the College of Cardinals, being seventy-two in number, including the six suburban Bishops, whose principal and most honourable privilege is that of electing the Pope, and it is easy to conceive that their dignity and importance increased with that of the Roman See itself; and that they shared alike its temporal and its spiritual pre-eminence. As the Cardinals are the counsellors, so they are the officers of the Pontiff, and are thus entrusted with the management of the Church at large, and of the Roman State in particular. The grand assembly of the Cardinals is called the Consistory, where the Pontiff presides in person. Here they appear in all the splendour of the purple, and form a most majestic Senate.

Here, therefore, publick communications are announced, foreign Ambassadors received, Cardinals created, formal compliments made and answered; in short, all the exterior splendour of Sovereignty is displayed. But the principal prerogative of a Cardinal is exercised in the Conclave, so called because the members of the sacred college are then confined within the precincts of the great halls of the Vatican Palace; where they remain immured: till they agree in the election of a Pontiff. As soon as the holy father has expired, the Cardinal Chamberlain, in a purple dress, presents himself at the door of his chamber, and knocks three times with a golden hammer, calling each time the Pope by his Christian, family, and papal names. After a short time he says, in the presence of the Clerks of the Chamber and his apostolical votaries, who take account of that ceremony, "He is then dead." The fisherman's ring is then brought to the Cardinal, who breaks it with the same hammer. He then takes possession of the Vatican, in the name of the Apostolical Chamber. After having established his authority in that palace, he sends guards to take possession of the gates of the city, and of the Castle of St. Angelo; and when he has provided for the safety of Rome, he quits the Vatican in a carriage, preceded by a Captain of the Pope's guard, and having by his side the Swiss who generally accompany his Holiness. When this march begins the great bell of the Capital is tolled, and, as it only tolls on this occasion, announces to the whole city the death of the Sovereign Pontiff. The body, having been embalmed, is clad in its pontifical dress, and, with the mitre on its head, lies in state during three days on a bed of parade. It is next carried with great pomp to the Church of St. Peter, where it remains nine days exposed to publick view, after which the burial takes place. The next day the Cardinals assemble in the same Cathedral, where the oldest of them celebrates the Mass of the HOLY GHOST for the election of a new Pope. Another Prelate, in a Latin oration, exhorts the Cardinals to choose an individual worthy of so eminent a station; after which they all march in procession behind the Papal cross, the musicians singing the hymn Veni Creator! to the Hall of the Conclave, which occupies a large portion of the Vatican. The large rooms are divided by temporary partitions into what are called cells, which are subdivided again into little rooms and closets. Every Cardinal has his own, for him and his assistants, and it is only large enough to hold a bed, five or six chairs, and a table. The hour of holding the Conclave being come, a bell is rung to cause the Ambassadors, Princes, Prelates, and other persons of distinction who may be present, to retire. When they are all gone out, the doors and windows are walled up, with the exception of one, which throws but a dim light upon the Conclave. The only communication with the exterior is by the means of towers, in the same shape as those used in convents of nuns. One door is also kept for the removal of any Cardinal who may be ill, but who loses the right of giving an active vote if he retires. The mode of election now in use is by a secret ballot. Two chaises stand on a long table in the Chapel of Sixtus, into which the Cardinals deposit their bulletins, containing the name of the individual for whom they vote. One of the Scrutators reads it aloud, while two others mark the number of votes for each individual, by the side of his name, on the large tablet where all those of the Cardinals are inscribed. Whoever obtains two-thirds of the votes present is canonically elected. His name is immediately proclaimed aloud, and the Cardinals sitting on his right and left rise and quit their places. His consent is asked, and, when it is given, the Cardinals, beginning by the oldest, perform the first adoration; that is to say, kiss his foot, and then his hand. The first Cardinal Deacon now announces the election to the people, and the artillery of the Castle of St. Angelo and the bells of the city spread the news afar. The people are then allowed to break into the Conclave, and to carry off all they can.

No person is eligible to the Papacy under 55 years of age, or that is not an Italian by birth, having already obtained a place in the College of Cardinals, or who is a Prince by birth, or allied to a reigning house, lest such a Pope should diminish the patrimony of St. Peter, or 'abandon th neutrality which a common father should observe towards all Christian Princes; or, finally, should treat the Cardinals with too much hauteur: thirdly, no one promoted to the degree of Cardinal at the nomination of some Crown, especially that of France or Spain, or being a natural-born subject of either of those Powers, lest gratitude or national attachment should render him too devoted to the interest of one or the other, is eligible. Even youth, and a good complexion and figure, are considered as obstacles. But all these maxims and rules vary and change according to the inconstant and precarious impulse of policy and faction. Hence it often happens that, in the numerous College of Cardinals, a very small number are permitted, upon a vacancy, to aspire to the Papacy, the greatest part being generally prevented by their birth, their character, their circumstances, and by the force of political intrigues, from flattering themselves with the pleasing hope of ascending the towering summit of ecclesiastical power and dominion.

THE GATHERER.

TIM MARKS AND THE WALKING SKULL.

From Legends of the Lakes, by T. Crofton Crocker.

"A fine extensive prospect this," said I to General Pickett, so was my guide called.

"That's the good truth for your honour," he replied, "only it's haunted by spirits, though Tim Marks says there's no such thing. May be your honour wouldn't know Thicus Morckus; he's a long stocah of a fellow, with a big nose, wears knee breeches, corderoy leggings, and takes a power of snuff. And, if your honour would like to see him, he lives at Corrigmalvin, at the top of High Street, in the town of Killarney. To be sure, some people say, all that comes from Tim isn't gospel, but that's neither here nor there; so, as I was saying, 'I don't believe in spirits,' says he to me, of a day he was mending the road here, and I along with him.—'The dickins you don't,' says I, 'and what's your raison for that same?'—'I'll tell you that,' says he; 'it was a could, frosty night in the month of December, the doors were shut, and we were all sitting by the side of a blazing turf fire. My father was smoking his dooden in the chimney corner, my mother was overseeing the girls that were tinging the flax, and I and the other gossoons were doing nothing at all, only roasting praties in the ashes. 'Was the colt brought in?' says my father. 'Wisha, fakes then! I believe not,' says I. 'Why, then, Tim,' says he, 'you must run and drive him in directly, for it's a mortal could night.' 'And where is he, father?' says I. 'In the far field, at the other side of the ould church,' says he. 'Murder!' says I, for I didn't like the thoughts of going near the ould church at all, at all. But there was no use in saying agen it, for my father (God be merciful to him!) had us under as much command as a regiment of soldiers. So away I went, with a light foot and a heavy heart. Well, I soon came to bounds' ditch between the farm and the berrin ground of the ould church. Then I slackened my pace a little, and kept looking hither and over, for fear of being taken by surprise. The moon was shining clear as day, so that I could see the gray tombstones and the white skulls; all at once, I thought one of them began to move. I could hardly believe my two eyes; but, fakes, it was true enough; for presently it came walking down the hill, quite leisurely at first, then a little faster, till at last it came rolling at the rate of a fox hunt. 'Twill be stopped at the bounds' ditch,' thinks I; but I was never more out in my reckoning, for it bowled fair through the gap, and made directly up to me. 'By the mortal frost,' says I, 'I'm done for; and away I scampered as fast as my legs could carry me; but the skull came faster after me, for I could hear every lump it gave against the stones. It's a long stretch of a hill from the berrin ground down to the road; but you'd think I wasn't longer getting down than whilst you'd be saying 'Jack Robinson.' Sure enough I did make great haste; but if I did, 'the more haste the worse speed,' they say, and so by me any how, for I went souse up to my neck in a dirty Lochaune by the side of the road. Well, when I recovered a little, what would I see but the skull at the edge of the Lochaune, stuck fast in a furze brush, and grinning down at me. Oh, you're there,' says I; 'I'll have one rap at you any how, for worse than die I can't; so I up with a lump of a blackthorn, I had in my fist, and gives it a rap, when what should it be after all, but a huge rat, which had got into the skull, and, trying to get out again, it made it to roll down the hill in that frightful way. To be sure,' said Tim, 'to be sure it was mighty frightful, but it wasn't a ghost after all; and, indeed, (barring that) I never saw any thing worse than myself, though we lived for a long time near the ould church of Aghadoe.'"

"A WOMAN OF PARTS."

From the Living and the Dead, Vol. II. Just published

Mrs. Dysart was a "woman of parts." She aspired to this character, and did her best to support it. "I'm no French scholar," was her daily exclamation, "and I scorn deceit. Education has done nothing for me. I'm a literal woman. But Providence has blessed me with parts, and I feel I can use them." Often did I wish, and hundreds, I can vouch for it, have done the same, that she had not been quite so literal, and that education had done more for her. She would ask such excruciating questions, and talk at times, notwithstanding her parts, such ineffable nonsense, that it was almost martyrdom to listen to her. She was fond of asserting that the climate of Devonshire and India was "much the same," and that she had "a brother who died at Torquay, on the fifth of February, of a coup de l'isle." "So you were born at Morpeth," said she to a gawky Northumbrian; "pray did you know my father?" "No." "Well! I am amazed! Why, he was the encumbrance of the living for upwards of forty years!" Moreover, she had the most unfortunate memory imaginable. Any family misfortune, mis-alliance, divorce, elopement, any blot in a noble escutcheon, any event or occurrence, death or duel, which, from its nature, or consequences, was better forgotten, was faithfully treasured up in her memory, and produced, "time, place, and occasion fitting." Thus I heard her ask a Mr. Shirly whether it was true that Earl Ferrers was hung in a silken cord, and went in his own coach to Tyburn! because "as one of the family, you must know; so tell me all about it."—"Marlow! Marlow!" said she, on being introduced to a gentleman of that name; "why, there was a Lady Marlow that went off with a Colonel Clavering: a very pretty woman she was; and mightily was the affair canvassed at the time. Pray, sir, are you any relation?" She was addressing the son.—"Manesty! Manesty!" said she, at a large dinner; "I've heard that name, before I'm sure." She looked full in the face of an unfortunate man who owned it. "I have some recollection connected with that name, if I could but hit upon it. Oh! I have it. Manesty—ay, it is no common name. There was a very s-h-o-c-k-i-n-g fellow of that name at Cambridge in my brother's time. He used to cry fire at one o'clock in the morning, in the midst of the quadrangle, and to alarm the master and fellows of his college beyond measure. Then as to his principles, no girl who had any pretensions—but, however, he was rusticated." Coughs went round the table. Every body seemed on a sudden to have taken cold. But the woman of parts elevated her voice, and proceeded: "He was rusticated twice, and finally expelled. Pray, sir, can you give me any intelligence as to what ultimately became of him?—not that any family would care to own him!" The unhappy object of her inquiries, with a face the colour of scarlet, and in a state of most pitiable confusion, fronted her.

SNEEZING AMONG THE ANCIENTS.

Among the Greeks sneezing was reckoned a good omen. The practice of saluting the person who sneezed, existed in Africa among nations unknown to the Greeks and Romans. Brown, in his "Vulgar Errors," says, "We read in Godignus, that, upon a sneeze of the emperor of Monumota, there passed acclamations successively through the city." The author of the "Conquest of Peru" assures us, that the cacique of Guachoia having sneezed in the presence of the Spaniards, the Indians of his train fell prostrate before him, stretched forth their hands, and displayed to him the accustomed marks of respect, while they invoked the sun to enlighten him, to defend him, and to be his constant guard. The Romans saluted each other on sneezing. Plutarch tells us, that the genius of Socrates informed him by sneezing when it was necessary to perform any action. The young Parthenis, hurried on by her passions, resolved to write to Sarpedon an avowal of her love: she sneezes in the most tender and impassioned part of her letter. This is sufficient for her; this incident supplies the place of an answer, and persuades her that Sarpedon is her lover. In the Odyssey we are informed that Penelope, harassed by the vexatious courtship of her suitors, begins to curse them all, and to pour forth vows for the return of Ulysses. Her son Telemachus interrupts her by a loud sneeze. She instantly exults with joy, and regards this sign as an assurance of the approaching return of her husband. Xenophon was harranguing his troops; when a soldier sneezed at the moment he was exhorting them to embrace a dangerous but necessary resolution. The whole army, moved by this presage, determined to pursue the project of their general; and Xenophon orders sacrifices to Jupiter the preserver. This religious reverence for sneezing, so ancient and so universal even in the time of Homer, always excited the curiosity of the Greek philosophers and the rabbins. These last spread a tradition, that, after the creation of the world, God made a law to this purport, that every man should sneeze but once in his life, and that at the same instant he should render up his soul into the hands of his Creator, without any preceding indisposition. Jacob obtained an exemption from the common law, and the favour of being informed of his last hour. He sneezed and did not die; and this sign of death was changed into a sign of life. Notice of this was sent to all the princes of the earth; and they ordained that in future sneezing should be accompanied with forms of blessings, and vows for the persons who sneezed. Thus the custom of blessing persons who sneeze is of higher antiquity than some authors suppose; for several writers affirm that it commenced in the year 750, under Pope Gregory the great, when a pestilence occurred in which those who sneezed died; whence the pontiff appointed a form of prayer, and a wish to be said to persons sneezing, for averting this fatality from them. Some say that Prometheus was the first that wished well to sneezers. For further information on this ticklish subject, the reader is referred to Brand's "Observations on Popular Antiquities."

ABERNETHYANA.

The following is the last and best that we have heard of the above-named gentleman. We should premise, that the details of it are a little altered, with the view of adapting it to the "ears of the polite"; for, without some process of this kind, it would not have been presentable. A lady went to the Doctor in great distress of mind, and stated to him, that, by a strange accident, she had swallowed a large spider. At first, his only reply was, "whew! whew! whew!" a sort of internal whistling sound, intended to be indicative of supreme contempt. But his anxious patient was not so easily to be repulsed. She became every moment more and more urgent for some means of relief from the dreadful effect of the strange accident she had consulted him about; when, at last, looking round upon the wall, he put up his hand and caught a fly. "There, Ma'am," said he, "I've got a remedy for you. Open your mouth; and as soon as I've put this fly into it, shut it close again; and the moment the spider hears the fly buzzing about, up he'll come; and then you can spit them both out together."

When a Grand Vizier is favourably deposed, that is, without banishing or putting him to death, it is signified to him by a messenger from the Sultan; who goes to his table, and wipes the ink out of his golden pen; this he understands as the sign of dismissal.

THE LEGENDARY.

From Blackwood's Magazine, for February.

THE MURDER HOLE.

AN ANCIENT LEGEND.

Ah, frantic Fear!
I see, I see thee near;
I know thy hurried step, thy haggard eye!
Like thee I start, like thee disorder'd fly!

Collins.

In a remote distance of country belonging to Lord Cassillis, between Ayrshire and Galloway, about three hundred years ago, a moor of apparently boundless extent stretched several miles along the road, and wearied the eye of the traveller by the sameness and desolation of its appearance; not a tree varied the prospect—not a shrub enlivened the eye by its freshness—nor a native flower bloomed to adorn this ungenial soil. One "lonesome desert" reached the horizon on every side, with nothing to mark that any mortal had ever visited the scene before, except a few rude huts that were scattered near its centre; and a road, or rather pathway, for those whom business or necessity obliged to pass in that direction. At length, deserted as this wild region had always been, it became still more gloomy. Strange rumours arose, that the path of unwary travellers had been beset on this "blasted heath," and that treachery and murder had intercepted the solitary stranger as he traversed its dreary extent. When several persons, who were known to have passed that way, mysteriously disappeared, the inquiries of their relatives led to a strict and anxious investigation; but though the officers of justice were sent to scour the country, and examine the inhabitants, not a trace could be obtained of the persons in question, nor of any place of concealment which could be a refuge for the lawless or desperate to horde in. Yet, as inquiry became stricter, and the disappearance of individuals more frequent, the simple inhabitants of the neighbouring hamlets were agitated by the most fearful apprehensions. Some declared that the deathlike stillness of the night was often interrupted by sudden and preternatural cries of more than mortal anguish, which seemed to arise in the distance, and a shepherd one evening, who had lost his way on the moor, declared he had approached three mysterious figures, who seemed struggling against each other with supernatural energy, till at length one of them, with a frightful scream, suddenly sunk into the earth.

Gradually the inhabitants deserted their dwellings on the heath, and settled in distant quarters, till at length but one of the cottages continued to be inhabited by an old woman and her two sons, who loudly lamented that poverty chained them to this solitary and mysterious spot. Travellers who frequented this road now generally did so in groups to protect each other; and if night overtook them, they usually stopped at the humble cottage of the old woman and her sons, where cleanliness compensated for the want of luxury, and where, over a blazing fire of peat, the bolder spirits smiled at the imaginary terrors of the road, and the more timid trembled as they listened to the tales of terror and affright with which their hosts entertained them.

One gloomy and tempestuous night in November, a pedlar-boy hastily traversed the moor. Terrified to find himself involved in darkness amidst its boundless wastes, a thousand frightful traditions, connected with this dreary scene, darted across his mind—every blast, as it swept in hollow gusts over the heath, seemed to teem with the sighs of departed spirits—and the birds, as they winged their way above his head, appeared, with loud and shrill cries, to warn him of approaching danger. The whistle with which he usually beguiled his weary pilgrimage, died away into silence, and he groped along with trembling and uncertain steps, which sounded too loudly in his ears. The promise of Scripture occurred to his memory, and revived his courage. "I will be unto thee as a rock in the desert, and as a hiding-place in the storm." Surely, thought he, though alone, I am not forsaken; and a prayer for assistance hovered on his lips.

A light now glimmered in the distance which would lead him, he conjectured, to the cottage of the old woman; and towards that he eagerly bent his way, remembering as he hastened along, that when he had visited it the year before, it was in company with a large party of travellers, who had beguiled the evening with those tales of mystery which had so lately filled his brain with images of terror. He recollected, too, how anxiously the old woman and her sons had endeavoured to detain him when the other travellers were departing—and now, therefore, he confidently anticipated a cordial and cheering reception. His first call for admission obtained no visible marks of attention, but instantly the greatest noise and confusion prevailed within the cottage. They think it is one of the supernatural visitants of whom the old lady talks so much, thought the boy, approaching the window, where the light within shewed him all the inhabitants at their several occupations; the old woman was hastily scrubbing the stone floor, and strewing it thickly over with sand, while her two sons seemed with equal haste to be thrusting something large and heavy into an immense chest, which they carefully locked. The boy, in a frolicsome mood, thoughtlessly tapped at the window, when they all instantly startled up with consternation so strongly depicted on their countenances, that he shrunk back involuntarily with an undefined feeling of apprehension; but before he had time to reflect a moment longer, one of the men suddenly darted out at the door, and seizing the boy roughly by the shoulder, dragged him violently into the cottage. "I am not what you take me for," said the boy, attempting to laugh, "but only the poor pedlar who visited you last year." "Are you alone?" inquired the old woman, in a harsh deep tone, which made his heart thrill with apprehension. "Yes," said the boy, "I am alone here; and alas!" he added, with a burst of uncontrollable feeling, "I am alone in the wide world also! Not a person exists who would assist me in distress, or shed a single tear if I died this very night." "Then you are welcome!" said one of the men with a sneer, while he cast a glance of peculiar expression at the other inhabitants of the cottage.

It was with a shiver of apprehension, rather than of cold, that the boy drew near the fire, and the looks which the old woman and her sons exchanged, made him wish that he had preferred the shelter of any one of the roofless cottages which were scattered near, rather than trust himself among persons of such dubious aspect. Dreadful surmises flitted across his brain; and terrors which he could neither combat nor examine imperceptibly stole into his mind; but alone, and beyond the reach of assistance, he resolved to smother his suspicions, or at least not reveal the danger by revealing them. The room to which he retired for the night had a confused and desolate aspect; the curtains seemed to have been violently torn down from the bed, and still hung in tatters around it—the table seemed to have been broken by some violent concussion, and the fragments of various pieces of furniture lay scattered upon the floor. The boy begged that a light might burn in his apartment till he was asleep, and anxiously examined the fastenings of the door; but they seemed to have been wrenched asunder on some former occasion, and were still left rusty and broken.

It was long ere the pedlar attempted to compose his agitated nerves to rest; but at length his senses began to "steep themselves in forgetfulness," though his imagination remained painfully active, and presented new scenes of terror to his mind, with all the vividness of reality. He fancied himself again wandering on the heath, which appeared to be peopled with spectres, who all beckoned to him not to enter the cottage, and as he approached they all vanished with a hollow and despairing cry. The scene then changed, and he found himself again seated by the fire, where the countenances of the men scowled upon him with the most terrifying malignity, and he thought the old woman suddenly seized him by the arms, and pinioned them to his side. Suddenly the boy was startled from these agitated slumbers, by what sounded to him like a cry of distress; he was broad awake in a moment, and sat up in bed,—but the noise was not repeated, and he endeavoured to persuade himself it had only been a continuation of the fearful images which had disturbed his rest, when, on glancing at the door, he observed underneath it a broad red stream of blood silently stealing its course along the floor. Frantic with alarm, it was but the work of a moment to spring from his bed, and rush to the door, through a chink of which, his eye nearly dimmed with affright, he could watch unsuspected whatever might be done in the adjoining room.

His fear vanished instantly when he perceived that it was only a goat they had been slaughtering; and he was about to steal into his bed again, ashamed of his groundless apprehensions, when his ear was arrested by a conversation which transfixed him aghast with terror to the spot.

"This is an easier job than you had yesterday," said the man who held the goat. "I wish all the throats we've cut were as easily and quietly done. Did you ever hear such a noise as the old gentleman made last night! It was well we had no neighbour within a dozen of miles, or they must have heard his cries for help and mercy."

"Don't speak of it," replied the other; "I was never fond of bloodshed."

"Ha, ha!" said the other with a sneer "you say so, do you?"

"I do" answered the first, gloomily; "the Murder Hole is the thing for me—that tells no tales—a single scuffle—a single plunge—and the fellow's dead and buried to your hand in a moment. I would defy all the officers in Christendom to discover any mischief there."

"Ay, Nature did us a good turn when she contrived such a place as that. Who that saw a hole in the heath, filled with clear water, and so small that the long grass meets over the top of it, would suppose that the depth is unfathomable, and that it conceals more than forty people who have met their deaths there! it sucks them in like a leech!"

"How do you mean to dispatch the lad in the next room?" asked the old woman in an under tone. The elder son made her a sign to be silent, and pointed towards the door where their trembling auditor was concealed; while the other, with an expression of brutal ferocity, passed his bloody knife across his throat.

The pedlar boy possessed a bold and daring spirit, which was now roused to desperation; but in any open resistance the odds were so completely against him, that flight seemed his best resource. He gently stole to the window, and having by one desperate effort broken the rusty bolt by which the casement had been fastened, he let himself down without noise or difficulty. This betokens good, thought he, pausing an instant in dreadful hesitation what direction to take. This is momentary deliberation was fearfully interrupted by the hoarse voice of the men calling aloud, "The boy has fled—let loose the bloodhound!" These words sunk like a death-knell on his heart, for escape appeared now impossible, and his nerves seemed to melt away like wax in a furnace. Shall I perish without a struggle! thought he, rousing himself to exertion, and, helpless and terrified as a hare pursued by its ruthless hunters, he fled across the heath. Soon the baying of the bloodhound broke the stillness of the night, and the voice of its masters sounded through the moor, as they endeavoured to accelerate its speed,—panting and breathless the boy pursued his hopeless career, but every moment his pursuers seemed to gain upon his falling steps. The hound was unimpeded by the darkness which was to him so impenetrable, and its noise rung louder and deeper in his ear—while the lanterns which were carried by the men gleamed near and distinct upon his vision.

At his fullest speed, the terrified boy fell with violence over a heap of stones, and having nothing on but his shirt, he was severely cut in every limb. With one wild cry to Heaven for assistance, he continued prostrate on the earth, bleeding, and nearly insensible! The hoarse voices of the men, and the still louder baying of the dog, were now so near, that instant destruction seemed inevitable,—already he felt himself in their fangs, and the bloody knife of the assassin appeared to gleam before his eyes,—despair renewed his energy, and once more, in an agony of affright that seemed verging towards madness, he rushed forward so rapidly that terror seemed to have given wings to his feet. A loud cry near the spot he had left arose on his ears without suspending his flight. The hound had topped at the place where the pedlar's wounds bled so profusely, and deeming the chase now over, it lay down there, and could not be induced to proceed; in vain the men beat it with frantick violence, and tried again to put the hound on the scent,—the sight of the blood had satisfied the animal that its work was done, and with dogged resolution it resisted every inducement to pursue the same scent a second time. The pedlar boy in the meantime paused not in his flight till morning dawned—and still as he fled, the noise of steps seemed to pursue him, and the cry of his assassins still sounded in the distance. Ten miles off he reached a village, and spread instant alarm throughout the neighbourhood—the inhabitants were aroused with one accord into a tumult of indignation—several of them had lost sons, brothers, or friends on the heath, and all united in proceeding instantly to seize the old woman and her sons, who were nearly torn to pieces by their violence. Three gibbets were immediately raised on the moor, and the wretched culprits confessed before their execution to the destruction of nearly fifty victims in the Murder Hole which they pointed out, and near which they suffered the penalty of their crime. The bones of several murdered persons were with difficulty brought up from the abyss into which they had been thrust; but so narrow is the aperture, and so extraordinary the depth, that all who see it are inclined to coincide in the tradition of the country people that it is unfathomable. The scene of these events still continues nearly as it was 300 years ago. The remains of the old cottage, with its blackened walls (haunted of course by a thousand evil spirits,) and the extensive moor, on which a more modern inn (if it can be dignified with such an epithet) resembles its predecessor in every thing but the character of its inhabitants; the landlord is deformed, but possesses extraordinary genius; he has himself manufactured a violin, on which he plays with untaught skill,—and if any discord be heard in the house, or any murder committed in it, this is his only instrument. His daughter (who has never travelled beyond the heath) has inherited her father's talent, and learnt all his tales of terror and superstition, which she relates with infinite spirit; but when you are led by her across the heath to drop a stone into that deep and narrow gulf to which our story relates,—when you stand on its slippery edge, and (parting the long grass with which it is covered) gaze into its mysterious depths, when she describes, with all the animation of an eye witness, the struggles of the victims grasping the grass as a last hope of preservation, and trying to drag their assassin as an expiring effort of vengeance,—when you are told that for 300 years the clear waters in this diamond of the desert have remained untasted by mortal lips; and that the solitary traveller is still pursued at night by the howling of the bloodhound,—it is then only that it is possible fully to appreciate the terrors of THE MURDER HOLE.

MISCELLANY.

BUDHISM.

The following sketch of Buddhism is drawn from a folio volume upon the mythology of the east, just published by Ackerman, London. The English journal from which we extract this sketch represents the work as an extraordinary performance, abounding in illustrations of a most curious character, and of singularly beautiful workmanship. The title of it is The History and Doctrines of Buddhism, popularly illustrated; with notices of the Kappooism, or Demon Worship, and of the Boli, or Planetary Incantations of Ceylon. By Edward Upham, M.R.A.S.; with forty-three Lithographick Prints, from original Singalese Designs.

The grand original tenet of all the eastern religions is the existence of a God, supreme over all things; but so infinitely above all other natures, that he has no participation in their government. He is the "Abstracted,"—the "Essential,"—the "Unknown;" too high for worship, hope, love, or fear; remaining in profound repose for ages, and then suddenly putting forth his energy and creating worlds, when he propagates his own nature through every shape of matter.

Budhism, in its first state, seems to have been an attempt to account for the government of the world under this sublime emblem of Inaction; for which it substituted a long succession of Budhas, or active gods, distributed into three classes. The tradition of their reigns exhibits an evident knowledge of the original history of mankind. The first class of these Budhas, the Latouras, consists of but five, each governing the Universe for his time, and four Budhas have already come. The Maha-vansi, one of the most sacred of the Buddhist books, thus describes the early ages of the world—

"In the time called the first Antalgapa (age), there was a King—the son of the Sun, who came into the world by the operation called Apopatika: he was chosen King by the general voice of the people; he had the power of going through the air.

"This King reigned over a large portion of the earth, in prosperity, peace, and happiness, during an assaukaya (unit with sixty-three cyphers) of years. At that time all beings lived an assaukaya of years. There was no sin in the world. The immense duration of their life caused men to forget their birth, and to be unmindful of death, they knew not the infirmities of life, nor the miseries of the world. They derided the very gods, as these were not the fortunate partakers of such a length of days. So that, at that time, the life of mankind outlasted the existence of the gods. Irrational animals had also their kings. The narrative of these facts appears in the ancient histories."

Budhism abounds in all the conceptions capable of being raised by the imaginative mind of an Indian philosopher half maddened by seclusion and self-infliction. It has a crowd of deities of every rank, from the Supreme to the demon, or spirit of the dead; it has the metempsychosis, the purgatory, the successive heavens, and the successive hells. In the descriptions of the heavens, we recognize the glowing fancy of the Oriental.

The sun-palace of the god Sekraia is within of gold, and without of crystal. The moon-palace is within of silver, and without of carbuncle. Here reside the four gods, of the same rank, and having the same power.

The first god presides over the East. His attendants, his clothes, his chariot, and his horses, are all white, and his arms are crystal. He presides over musick. His residence is in a city of splendour on the summit of the mountain Jugandere. Its pillars, walls, and beams are of silver, suiting the bowers of light. In the whole of this heaven grows the padze-zebayn tree, on which, in place of fruit, hang brilliant garments, exquisite viands, and ornaments of inestimable value. Everywhere are running streams, lakes and delicious gardens.

The second is blue. He presides over the West, and over hosts of Angels. His body shines like a lamp, and he wears a diamond crown of prodigious height. His form is ever bathed with precious perfumes, and is clothed with divine garments, and decorated with ornaments emitting the brightest rays. He is the god of light.

The god Sekraia is still more splendidly lodged, if possible. His dwelling is in the great city, Maha-Soudassana, which is of a square form. Its gates are of gold and silver, adorned with precious stones. Seven moats surround the city, and beyond the last, is a range of marble pillars, studded with jewels, beyond which are seven rows of palm-trees bearing rubies, pearls, and gold.

After this profusion of ornament, the brilliancy of the scene could scarcely seem capable of being brightened. But Sekraia has, like all his earthly types of sovereignty, a favourite hall of the most immense size. The road to this hall is bordered with every kind of tree covered with fruits and flowers. Whenever Sakraia approaches, the winds instantly shake off the flowers blooming on these innumerable trees, as an offering from the deities of the air, and the shower of buds and blooms fill up the mighty avenue to the knees. In the centre of the hill stands the Throne of Empire, surmounted by the white chittra (umbrella), covered with gems and gold. It is surrounded by thirty-two shrines of angelick sages, and behind those, ranks of inferior deities, which touch instruments of musick.

A grand inquiry is here held into the conduct of mankind. The angels pass through the earth, write down in a golden book the actions of its inhabitants, and return it to the four presiding spirits, who send it on through ranks of deities, until it reaches the hand of Sekraia. He, opening his book, reads aloud, and his voice sounds over the whole Empyrean. If the inferior deities hear that men observe the Buddhist laws, they exclaim, "Oh, now the infernal regions will be empty, and our dwelling full." If they hear that the Buddhist laws are forgotten, "Oh, wretches," they say, smiling, "men and fools, who, feasting for a short life,—for a body four cubits in length, and a belly not larger than a span,—have heaped upon themselves sin, which will make them miserable in the time to come."

The Indian imagination that has here revelled in beauty and pomp, grows terrific when it has to picture the place of punishment. Among the crimes for which sentence is given, are wine-drinking, the corrupting of wells, the destroying of highways, the propagation of scandal, the chaining of our fellow-creatures, and the neglect of the sick. The third large hell is for "ministers or governors who oppress the people," a hazardous declaration of Eastern theology. The eight principal hells, and the hundred and twenty-six minor ones, are well secured, having walls of iron thirty-six miles thick, with a flooring and roof of the same material, and the same density.

From Memoirs of Josephine.

MARRIAGE OF MAMSELLE LECLERC.

Josephine related to us the way in which the marriage of Mademoiselle Leclerc and General Davoust was brought about. The details are curious, as shewing how the most rude and indomitable characters yielded to the will of Napoleon, even when he was only consul. At the time of the expedition to Saint Domingo, Bonaparte was desirous of intrusting the command of the troops to his brother-in-law General Leclerc (who had married Pauline Bonaparte.) He called him into his closet, and told him of his intentions. "I should be happy again to serve France; but, general, a sacred duty detains me here." "Your love for Paulette? She shall accompany you. The air of Paris is pernicious; it is that of coquetry; she has no need of it, and shall go with you; so that is settled." "Undoubtedly I should be inconsolable to be separated from her; but that would not be sufficient to induce me to refuse an honourable command. My wife would remain surrounded by a family which loves her; and I should have no uneasiness on her account. It is the state of my good sister which compels me to reject what, under such circumstances, would be the object of my envy. She is young and pretty; her education is not entirely completed; I cannot give her any portion; ought I to leave her without protection, during an absence which may be long, which may be eternal? My brothers are not here; I must therefore stay. I appeal to your heart, so devoted to your family; general, can I do otherwise?" "No, certainly; she must be married forthwith. To-morrow, for instance; and you can set off instantly." "But, I repeat, I have no fortune to give her; and—" "Well, do I not know that? Come, my dear friend, make your preparations; to-morrow your sister shall be married; I do not yet know to whom; but that is all one." "But—" "I fancy I have expressed myself distinctly; so no remarks." General Leclerc, accustomed, like all the other generals, to consider as a master the man who so short a time before had been his equal, left the room without adding a word. Some minutes afterwards, General Davoust called on the first consul, and told that he came to communicate to him his intended marriage. "With Mademoiselle Leclerc? I think it an exceedingly suitable match." "No, general, with Madame—" "With Mademoiselle Leclerc," interrupted Napoleon, laying an emphasis on the name; "not only is it a suitable match, but I am determined that it shall take place immediately. 'I have long loved Madame—; she is now free, and nothing shall induce me to renounce her.' 'Nothing but my will,' replied the first consul, fixing on Davoust his eagle eye: 'you shall go immediately to Saint Germain with Madame Campan; you shall demand your future wife; you shall be presented to her by her brother, General Leclerc, who is now with my wife; he shall accompany you; the bride shall come this evening to Paris; you shall order the nuptial present, which must be handsome, because I intend myself to give away this young lady; I take upon myself the payment of the portion, and the expense of the paraphernalia; and the marriage shall be celebrated as soon as the formalities required by the law can be fulfilled, and I will take care to abridge them; you have heard me! I must be obeyed.' On finishing this long sentence, which was pronounced rapidly, and in that absolute tone which belonged only to himself, Napoleon rang the bell, and gave orders to let General Leclerc know that he was wanted. As soon as he saw the general, 'Well! was I wrong?' he exclaimed, 'there is your sister's husband. Go together to Saint Germain, and let me not see either of you until all is arranged: I hate discussions about business.' The two generals, equally astonished, left Napoleon to obey him. Notwithstanding the bluntness of a character by no means amiable, General Davoust humbly submitted. On their arrival at Madame Campan's house, he was presented to Mademoiselle Leclerc: the interview, they say, was rather a serious one; but in a very few days the wedding took place.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, MAY 2, 1829.

☞ The Office of the Masonick Record is removed to No. 3 Beaver street.

ANOTHER RENUNCIATION! The following are a few of the reasons published by Mr. L. D. Mansfield, of Jefferson county, for leaving the ranks of the anti-masonick faction. Our readers will recollect that a week or two since seventy-two honest farmers of Genesee county, who had been deceived by the falsehoods and professions of the opponents of masonry, nobly came out from among them, and denounced their base and dangerous principles. Mr. Mansfield is another evidence of the rapid and salutary progress of the reformation which has commenced its progress in the west. The editor of the Watertown Freeman says,

"Mr. Mansfield is one of those who, from pure motives and an honest indignation at the outrages committed upon Morgan, entered the lists in opposition to masonry. He has seen, however, as every man who will take the trouble to examine and reflect upon the subject, must see, that the honest prejudices of the people against masonry, has been seized upon by political demagogues to effect, not the destruction of that institution, but their own views of political preferment. He has seen its effects upon churches, societies, and neighbourhoods, and the exertions of those who hope to advance their political fortunes by it, to keep alive and aggravate it; and seeing these things, he has felt it his duty to take the course which he has taken."

Mr. Mansfield refuses to act with the antimasonick party because they give too much evidence to the candid, that their pretention to oppose masonry merely on account of its immorality, is hypocritical.

Because it has made great and alarming divisions in our churches, which have in many instances destroyed their moral influence, which can never be restored by the anti-masonick cause, while it is under the influence of selfish and political men.

Because there is not interest enough manifest in the moral character of those chosen to forward the anti-masonick operations.

Because there are men appointed to exert the anti-masonick influence, who publicly say, to use their own language, were it not for the law, they would go to their knees in blood to destroy the property or lives of their neighbours who are masons.

☞ Some apostate masons in and about Le Roy have had a meeting, and among other things resolved "that they can not and will not be satisfied with the proceedings of the free-masons of Ontario and Monroe counties, in returning their charters," &c. Now, we believe it was not expected that the tender consciences of these gentlemen would be satisfied with any measure which might have a tendency to calm the minds of the people, nor do we believe any honest mason cares a straw whether they "can" or "will" be "satisfied," or not. They know themselves to be despised, and the people know them to be ambitious, and restless, and dishonest. The mark is upon them, and they cannot wipe it off.

SUNDAY MAILS. A few over-much religious people in New Jersey took it into their heads to stop the U. S. mail on Sunday the 19th ult., for the purpose of testing the constitutional power of the United States to send the mail on the sabbath through the territory of a state which, in its constitution, has recognised "the sanctity of a seventh part of time." Prosecutions have been instituted under the post office law of the United States, and we hope those who have been guilty of this unique outrage may be punished, as we do not believe that an appeal to the club law can in any event be beneficial to the cause of religion.

SPOTS ON THE SUN. The Boston Palladium, of Tuesday, thinks that with a powerful telescope at least two hundred spots on the sun might be seen in that city at that time. They stretch "in an almost continuous line from one side of the disk to the other, and make a handsome appearance."

SUICIDES. The suicides in the dominions of his "celestial" majesty, the emperor of China, it is said amount to nine-tenths of the untimely deaths reported to the government; and Judge Yaou has put forth a proclamation prohibiting the "wicked custom of despising life, and terminating one's own existence." The ladies are the guilty, seven times in ten.

☞ Mr. Jacob Allen, the anti-masonick show-man whom we noticed a few weeks since, having been "found out" by most of the men, is now making arrangements to wheedle the ladies out of twenty-five cents each; and as the love of novelty is not confined to the "lords of creation," we have no doubt he will meet with some success. But we very much doubt whether he will be encouraged by any man who has respect for society, for religion, or for female virtue, or by any woman who has respect, or even the shadow of it, for herself. Mr. Allen, as we are informed, is not at all chaste in his language, or scrupulous as to the spectacles he may present to his auditors.

A Boston anti-masonick paper contains the following detectable morceau, which, when in Boston, is probably as near Smyrna as it ever was. The fellow who wrote it forgot (if he ever knew) the location of Montreal, which happens to be in Lower Canada, unless it has emigrated since we last heard from it.

"This may certify that I am not the man that was drowned in Lake Erie. I was born at Montreal, in Upper Canada, was a bad Christian, and became a Turk. I am

JAMES PILCHER,
Smyrna, Dec. 10, 1828." Nick-named Morgan.

LITERARY ITEMS: Translations of Irving's Life of Columbus and of Cooper's Works, have been published in Germany.

The Boston Courier says Samuel L. Knapp, esq., author of the "Genius of Masonry," &c. is preparing for the press A Historical and Picturesque View of Washington and the Vicinity, "in which, in addition to a minute history of the rise and progress of the capital of the United States, will be found a variety of interesting facts respecting the neighbourhood of the city, and a particular description of Mount Vernon. The same gentleman intends in the course of the summer, to publish his lectures on American Literature, should the subscription justify the undertaking."

A late London Literary Gazette contains what may be called a review of the Cherokee Phoenix, edited by Elias Boudinott, an educated Indian of superiour abilities, and published for the Creek nation at New Echota, in Georgia. The reviewer considers the Phoenix "one of those curiosities of literature, which, though slight in themselves, establish memorable epochs in the history of mankind."

"It was but the other day, to speak in familiar terms, that the whole race of red men on the great American continent were illiterate barbarians, in a savage state; and now, within the compass of our own memory, we see a prominent portion of them not only lifted into civilization, but affording that marked instance of its progress, a love of intelligence and literature—the publication of a newspaper."

A new novel by Mr. Galt, entitled My Landlady and her Lodgers, is in the English press.

Captain Basil Hall's Travels (or, Walk, as it is called,) in the United States were expected to be published about the first of the present month.

The forthcoming history of this country by Mr. Kendall is, it is said, to be full and general—commencing with the discovery of the continent and extending down to the present time. It embraces a particular history of all the settlements and states in North and South America, and the West Indies; and is preceded by a discourse upon the name, discovery, geography, natural history, aborigines and antiquities of both the continent and islands.

ITEMS. The London Morning Chronicle of the 16th of March announces the death of SIR HUMPHREY DAVY, the celebrated chymist.

A negro man belonging to Mrs. Bacon, died in Edgefield (S. C.) on Tuesday, 17th ult. at the great age of one hundred and thirty years. He himself rated his age a few years higher, and from the reach of his memory, there is little doubt but that he was at least as old as has been stated. He came to that neighbourhood from Virginia, about twenty five years ago. He died from the gradual waste of nature, without any disease, and apparently without pain.

It has been judicially decided at Charleston, S. C. that money lost at a gaming table, not being the property of the loser, is recoverable at law from the winner.

Iron Wire is now manufactured extensively by Townsend, Bard, & Co. at the Beaver Falls, Beaver County, Pa. It is made of Juniata iron, and is round, smooth, strong and flexible, and adapted to all the purposes to which iron wire is usually applied. They manufacture a ton per week, from No. 1 to No. 36. The quality of the article is such that it finds a ready sale.

We give it as a curious fact, that on the intelligence of General Jackson's election to the Presidency, the City of Mexico was brilliantly illuminated, and public rejoicing took place throughout the Republic.

A letter from a young officer in Bengal, gives an account of a Sutte in March, 1823, at which eight wives of a deceased Rahab Prince, sacrificed themselves on his funeral pile!

Small Affair. A pamphlet has been published in New-York, developing the project of establishing a rail road of 1000 miles in length and to be constructed at an expense of $8,000,000 to 15,000,000 from the Hudson to the junction of the Mississippi at Rock river.

An extraordinary Chippewa Scull, having had three sets of teeth, two of which are visible, is exhibiting at the Masonick Hall, Broadway N. Y.

M. Aldini, of Milan, is said to have invented a fire proof dress to enable the wearer to traverse with impunity the flames of a large fire.

VARIETIES.

From English Journals received at this office.

The Latos of Honour.—A duel was lately fought at Strasbourg between two ladies, one French, and the other German, on a quarrel about a young miniature painter. The combatants met, pistol in hand, and each attended by a female second. The German was furious, and insisted on fighting muzzle to muzzle: but the Frenchwoman, regulating her conduct by the advice of her second, stood out for twenty-five paces. They fired together, and missed. The German then insisted on their approaching, and firing until either fell. The seconds, however, now interposed, and declaring that the laws of honour were now satisfied, took away the pistols, and the affair ended; but without any apology. The fair Frenchwoman, before leaving the ground, handsomely professed herself not actuated by any personal hostility: "she had thought it due to her honour to take a shot with the German, but now that the affair was at an end, the lady was welcome to the miniature painter, whom she had forbidden her presence that very morning." The German was a Baroness, and the Frenchwoman the wife of a General of Division.

Noble Robbery.—One of the German journals boasts, that between the Rhine and Vienna, there are no less than sixteen thousand robbers; not including the innkeepers, boatmen, douaniers, and passport clerks. The most vulgar of those free-booters are in the neighbourhood of Vienna, and are supposed to consist chiefly of the better order of shopkeepers. The most accomplished are on the Bohemian frontier, many of whom are of high birth. One of those bands names itself the Imperial Lancers, receives no man without proof of nobility, and its members are pledged not to rob any one under the rank of a Baron. A code of honour has been lately published for the use of the profession; in which picking pockets is ordered to be left to the imbecile and infirm; burglary is suffered only to those who have not had the benefit of an University education; knocking down and pillaging on the highway between the hours of sunrise and sunset are declared to be the legitimate and exclusive privilege of Chevaliers of three orders at the very least; but the more lucrative kinds of capital felony,—the stopping of diligences, seizure of couriers with the post-bags, and the plunders of banker's parcels,—is reserved for those who have been presented at court!

Ancient Islandick Poem. A curious specimen of old northern poetry has lately been published at Copenhagen. It is entitled the Song of King Regnar Lodbrock, and has been copied from ancient Islandick manuscripts, by Professor Rafn, of Copenhagen, by whom it has been published in the original language, together with translations in Danish Latin and French. Of the origin of this curious composition, an old tradition gives the following account:—In the year 817, King Regnar Lodbrock was made prisoner by a King of England, and confined in a tower filled with serpents and other poisonous animals. By these reptiles he was bitten to death, and, in the midst of his torture, he sang, or recited the song which bears his name.

Russian Monument of Howard. At the town of Cherson, in Russia, a monument has recently been erected to the memory of Howard the Philanthropist, who died at that place, of an epidemick disease, in the year 1796. The monument consists of a quadrangular stone pillar, on two sides of which are inscribed, in the Russian language, the words: "Howard died January 20th, 1796, aged 65." On the other two sides appear the following lines:—"Alios salvos fecit.—Vixit propter alios." In the centre of the monument, there is a sun-dial. Thus, even in death, the philanthropist is useful to his fellow-creatures.

The Largest Village in Europe. In an extensive valley, about eighty miles from Pesth, lies Czaba, which, though indisputably the largest village in Europe, has not met with the attention it deserves at the hands of modern geographers. It dates its origin from the year 1715; and, as John von Agoston, a Hungarian writer, informs us, contained, in the year 1826, the number of 20,187 inhabitants, all of them Slavonians, and, with few exceptions, of the Protestant faith; 1,923 houses, and 620 farms. It comprises a district of more than thirty square miles; its ecclesiastical edifices consist of one Catholic and two Protestant churches; and the majority of its population derive their livelihood from husbandry and breeding cattle.

Population of Russia. January 1, 1829. The Synod has just published the bills of mortality of the Russian empire for the year 1828. (It is to be observed, that these tables include those who profess the Greek religion, as established in Russia.)

	Males.	Females.	Total.
Births.....	959,673	892,106	1,841,779
Deaths.....	600,162	577,889	1,178,051
Excess of births.	359,511	314,217	666,728
Number of marriages.....			388,377

Among the deaths of men there are the following:—

From 95 to 100	1,644	From 120 to 125	31
— 100 to 105	604	— 125 to 130	16
— 105 to 110	141	— 130 to 135	4
— 110 to 115	104	— 135 to 140	1
— 115 to 120	46

Fossil Bones. Another cavern, containing the bones of antediluvian mammalia, has been discovered near the town of Vigau, in the south of France, by M. Renaud de Vilbac, director of the coal mines at Cavillac. It is situated at the western extremity of the department Du Gard, and toward the upper part of the mountain of Fessonne, about one thousand feet above the level of the sea. It bears considerable analogy to the famous caverns of Gailuruth, in Germany. Among the bones which have been already obtained, M. Cuvier has recognized several belonging to a species of bear at present extinct.

Leo XII. The late Pope is said to have had a strong presentiment of his death just before it happened, and to have left behind him the following epitaph:—

LEONI MAGNO,
Patroni celestis,
Me supplex commendans,
Hic apud sacros cineres
Locum sepulture elegi,
Leo XII., humilis cliens
Heredum tanti nominis
Minimus.

Sculpture. Mr. Allan Cunningham, it is stated, has remarked, that if the instrument by which marble busts, &c. are modelled after the clay, be placed in inverse or other positions, it may still be used, and with this advantage,—that it will alter the attitude of the bust or statue, and make it look any way, instead of being always the same in a hundred copies.

Longevity. The French papers contain an account of the death, in the hospital at Lausanne, of a widow named Besancon, aged 115 years. She is stated to have had good health until within a few days of her death, and to have walked about the streets of Lausanne without difficulty. The old lady was married to her late husband in 1814, being then 100 years of age.

Immense Fire-tree. In the Museum of Natural History at Strasburg, is shown the trunk of a silver fire-tree, from the forest of Hochwald, at Barr, in Alsatia. The tree was 150 feet high, with a trunk perfectly straight and free from branches to the height of 50 feet, after which it was forked with the one shoot 100 feet long, and the other somewhat shorter. The diameter of the trunk at the surface of the ground was eight feet; estimated age 350 years.

Singing Birds. Those who have paid attention to the singing of birds, know well that their voice, energy, and expressions differ as widely as in man; and agreeable to this remark, Mr. Wilson (the celebrated ornithologist) says he was so familiar with the notes of an individual wood thrush, that he could recognise him from all his fellows the moment he entered the woods.

ANTI-MASONRY.

It appears by Mr. Skinner's Republican, that another murderer of Morgan has been discovered. An affidavit is published in blank, without the name of the deponent. The whole story is probably founded on circumstances similar to those that occurred in this town two or three days before town meeting. It was given out that the actual murderer of Morgan had been discovered in a citizen of this county, and the fact was supported by affidavit, that the murderer had, under supposed masonic secrecy, made a full confession, in which he also implicated two respectable citizens of this village. The man probably made such confession in a state of inebriation, but the deponent acknowledged afterwards that he did not believe him guilty. A great excitement was raised however, and many insinuations made, injurious to private character, till it was ascertained that the supposed murderer had not in five years been without the limits of this county. In like manner we understand the pretended facts in the case under consideration will be soon fully contradicted. There have been so many deceptions of this kind that the people should be wary in believing any of the marvellous stories propagated in the anti-masonic papers.

[Cayuga Patriot.]

The news from the west, and from all parts of the state, shews the complete prostration of political anti-masonry. The broken down leaders who have attempted to ride into power on the Morgan hobby, will seek another name, within a twelvemonth, in order to cover their ambitious projects and lust of office.

[Ibid.]

ANTIMASONICK VIOLENCE. The assertions of the anti-masonic Enquirer respecting the affairs at the late town meeting here, are false, vilely false, and the writer well knew that they were so when he penned them. The first threat of violence (offering to "slap the face" of a gentleman on the other side of the Board) was made by a member of the anti-masonic state central committee; and the first overt act of brutality was committed by an anti-mason of lower grade, who, unprovokedly attacked one his political opponents, and was soundly chastised before night. So much for the cock-and-bull stories by which Whiskerado attempts to excite sympathy in behalf of his anti-masonic brethren. His threadbare slang about "masonic violence" is a flimsy cover for the drubbing and defeat which political anti-masonry received through the ballot boxes.

[Rochester Republican.]

Why is it that renouncing masons are the most vindictive and intolerant towards their former brethren? Many have themselves been instrumental in making men masons, whom they would now, if they had the power, deprive, not only of their character and franchise as citizens, but of the very means of subsistence. We could name a renouncing mason who, while he acted as the master of a lodge, in a neighbouring county, advised a clergyman to become a member of his lodge, wrote his petition and presented it to the lodge, conferred the degrees upon him himself, and who has since strenuously urged the dismissal of the same clergyman, by his congregation, because he was a mason.

[Craftsman.]

The information from all the counties where the anti-masonic excitement has been introduced, continues to show the decrease every where of that cause, and no where does it appear to be gaining ground.

[Fredonia Censor.]

An account of the number of Indians, estimated by the War Department, as within the territory of the United States, says that there are 2,573 within the states of Maine, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut and Virginia; 4,820 within the states of New-York; 3,000 within the state of Pennsylvania; 3,100 within the state of North Carolina; 300 within the state of South Carolina; 5,000 within the state of Georgia;

1,000 within the state of Tennessee; 1,877 within the state of Ohio; 23,400 within the state of Mississippi; 19,200 within the state of Alabama; 939 within the state of Louisiana; 4,050 within the state of Indiana; 5,000 within the state of Illinois; 5,631 within the state of Missouri; 9,403 within the peninsula of Michigan; 7,209 within the territory of Arkansas; 4,000 within the territory of Florida; 20,200 within the country east of the Mississippi, north of the state of Illinois, and west of the three upper lakes; 94,300 within the country west of the Mississippi, east of the Rocky Mountains, and not included in the states of Louisiana, Missouri or the territory of Arkansas; 20,000 within the Rocky Mountains; 80,000 west of the Rocky Mountains, between latitude 44 and 49; making a total of 513,130 within the United States.

IRISH SHIELD FOR APRIL.

Contents.—History of Ireland, Chapter V.; Ossianic Fragments, No. II. (The Castle of Dunluce); Literary and Biographical Notices of Irish Authors and Artists, No. VII. (Leonard M'Nally, esq.) Essay on the Present state of Ireland, No. II.; Irish Topography, No. IV. (The Phoenix Park Dublin); O'Rourke and Morna O'Donnell, (A true and tragical story); Descriptive Sketches of Egyptian Women; Publick Edifices of Dublin, (The Castle); The Royal Exchange; May-Day in Great Britain and Ireland; Questions arising from the Drama; Irish Affairs, Heads of the proposed Bill for the relief of the Catholics, Irish Affairs—Letter from Daniel O'Connell, M. P. to the people of Ireland, dated London; Original Patch Work—Self Love, How to cut down the merit of an actor, A clear point, The merit of a Book, Irish Bulls: Poetry—Irish Volunteers, An Oath, by Lady Morgan, never before published, Idyl on Spring, Sonnet, written on the pier of Kingston, Dunleary near Dublin, Extempore Lines to a young Lady in William-street.

ALBANY BRUSH TRUNK AND BANDBOX MANUFACTORY.—NORRIS TARBELL, No. 453 South Market-street, (opposite the Connecticut Coffee-House.) Keeps constantly on hand, and for sale, the above named articles, at low prices. Those who wish to purchase, will please to call and examine for themselves. Cash paid for clean combed Hogs' Bristles. Albany, March 4, 1829.

FINE CUTLERY, &c.—JAMES DICKSON, Cutler and Surgical Instrument Maker, No. 3, Beaver street, (formerly at No. 98 North Market street) Albany, manufactures and repairs all kinds of instruments in the above branches, with neatness, accuracy and despatch, and warranted equal to any article imported, or manufactured in the United States.

Shears, Scissors, Razors and Penknives, ground and finished on an improved plan, and warranted to excel any other in use in this city or elsewhere.

Currier's Steels constantly on hand, and warranted a superiour article.

Blades inserted in knife-handles in the most approved style, and most reasonable terms. Locks repaired.

N. B. Country orders punctually attended to.

Albany, Feb. 14, 1829.

31f

ALBANY TYPE FOUNDRY.—The subscribers, successors to R. STARR & Co. in the above foundry, continue the business in its various branches, and are prepared to execute orders for the following type, at the regular prices, on a credit of six months, or at a discount of 7 1/2 per cent, for cash, viz:

Roman and Italic.—Twenty, Fourteen, Ten, Eight, Seven, Five and Four lines Pica, Canon, Double Paragon, Double Great Primer, Double English, Double Small Pica, Great Primer, English, Pica, Small Pica, Long Primer, Bourgeois, Brevier, Minion, Nonpareil, Pearl.

Two line letters.—Pica, Small Pica, Long Primer, Bourgeois, Brevier, Minion, Nonpareil, Pearl.

Full face capitals.—Small Pica, Long Primer, Bourgeois, Brevier, Minion.

Antiques.—Ten and Eight lines Pica roman, Five line Pica italic, Four line Pica, Double Great Primer, Double Small Pica, Great Primer, and Pica, with lower case; and Long Primer, Brevier and Nonpareil.

Italians.—Five line Pica, Double Small Pica, Two line Brevier, and Two line Nonpareil.

Tuscan.—Double Small Pica.

Black.—Five line Pica, Double Small Pica, Great Primer Pica Long Primer.

Open Blacks.—Five line Pica, Double Small Pica, Great Primer.

Shaded letters.—Six line Pica ornamented, Two line Brevier and Two line Nonpareil double shade; Two line Nonpareil meridian shade

Double Great Primer, Two line Brevier, Two line Nonpareil, and One line Brevier, single shade; Two line Minion and Two line Pearl italic single shade; Double Small Pica roman, and One line Brevier italic

Antique shaded.

Script.—English, on inclined body, (cast on a new plan.)

Greek.—Pica.

Borders and Flowers.—From Six line Pica to Pearl, all cast in copper matrices.

Checks.—Canon and Double English, plain and opened.

Fractions and Leaders of all sizes, from English to Pearl, English, Pica and Long Primer Picos Fractions; Spanish and French Accents, and Accented Vowels, Figure Vowels, Superiour Figures, Daashes, and Astronomical and other Signs, of various sizes; Long Primer Brass Rules. Also, Leads ten to Pica, and thicker; Quotations; Brass Rules, &c. and Ornaments and Cuts, in great variety.

Printing materials of every description, and of the first quality, at the lowest prices.—Cases, Stands, (an improved pattern,) Gallies, Composing sticks, Chases of all sizes, improved newspaper Chases, in two parts Ball, stocks and skins, Bodkins, Furniture, &c. and, Prout's and Johnson's Printing Ink, constantly on hand. Presses of all kinds furnished at the manufacturers' prices. Wells' Improved presses will be kept constantly on hand, and may be examined at the foundry.

Large additions in the variety of type have been made since the specimen of this foundry was published of which specimens are now nearly completed, and will soon be sent to printers; the punches of which are cut by the senior partner of this firm, whose reputation as a superiour letter-cutter is well established; and the whole business being under our immediate superintendence, no pains is spared to make our types in every way worthy the attention of printers. An important improvement in the composition of the type-metal has also been made—copper and some other ingredients being added, which render it both harder and tougher, and of a finer grain. Type cast at this foundry are warranted to be as solid as any cast in the country, and that they will not settle in height from the pressure in using. Particular care is also taken to have the type well dressed, and the fonts regularly put up.

Old type is received in exchange for new, at 10 cents per lb. Orders, by mail, or left at the foundry, No. 8 Liberty-st, will receive prompt attention.

STARR & LITTLE.

The type upon which this paper is printed was cast at the above foundry.

POETRY.

From Willis' American Monthly Magazine.

THE ABSENT HUSBAND.

WIFE, who in thy deep devotion,
 Puttest up a prayer for one
 Sailing on the stormy ocean—
 Hope no more—his course is done!
 Dream not, when upon thy pillow
 That he slumbers by thy side,
 For his corse beneath the billow
 Heaveth with the restless tide.

Children, who, as sweet flowers growing,
 Laugh amid the sorrowing rains—
 Know ye many clouds are throwing
 Shadows on your sire's remains?
 Where the hoarse, gray surge is rolling,
 With a mountain's motion on,
 Dream ye that its voice is tolling
 For your father—lost and gone?

When the sun looked on the water,
 As a hero on his grave,
 Tinging with the hue of slaughter
 Every blue and leaping wave;
 Under the majestick ocean,
 Where the giant currents rolled,
 Slept thy sire without emotion—
 Sweetly by a beam of gold.

And the violent sunbeams slanted,
 Wavering through the crystal deep,
 Till their wonted splendours haunted
 Those shut eyelids in their sleep.
 Sands, like crumbled silver gleaming,
 Sparkled through his raven hair,
 But the sleep that knows no dreaming
 Bound him in its silence there.

So we left him; and to tell thee
 Of our sorrow, and thine own,
 Of the wo that then befel thee,
 Came we weary and alone—
 That thine eye is quickly shaded,
 That thy heart's blood wildly flows,
 That thy cheek's clear blood is faded—
 Are the fruits of these new woes.

Children, whose meek eyes inquiring,
 Linger on your mother's face,
 Know ye that she is expiring?—
 That ye are an orphan race?
 God be with you on the morrow!
 Father—mother—both no more!
 One within the grave of sorrow,
 One upon the ocean's floor!

J. O. R.

DESTINY.

BY MRS. M. E. BROOKS.

Sybil! look upon my brow,
 Read to me my destiny;
 Mark the thoughts that even now
 Burn to burst their secrecy.
 Many a bright and laughing morrow;
 Cradling in the sigh of sorrow;
 Or in lines of light revealing
 Withered hope and blasted feeling;
 Sybil, speak! whate'er the spell,
 Name, for I can hear it well.

Tell of blisses rich and rare,
 Wooing hearts to meet them, never;
 Tell of all that's bright and fair,
 Grappled, dashed aside, for ever:
 Tell of roses plucked, and withering;
 Storm clouds in the blue sky gathering;
 Serpents coiling round the bower,
 Blasted bud, and falling flower;
 Sybil, speak! whate'er it be,
 Read to me futurity!

I have trod the mountain track,
 Where ambition rears her brood;
 I have flung the vesture back,
 Dared to look on ill and good:
 Day-beams on the spirit flashing,
 Idle dreams of beauty dashing;
 With a shudder and a feeling,
 Earth's cold nakedness revealing;
 Sybil, speak! no spell ye bind
 That my thoughts will shrink to find.

Shall I win the golden flow
 Of young promise satisfied,
 But to wake in depths below,
 Colder, deeper, darker tide?
 There by fancy lit and shaded,
 Low recline the frail and faded;

Phantoms like the bubble buried
 In the wave that o'er them hurried;
 Sybil, speak! the gathering gloom,
 Wraps it beauty or a tomb?

I can nerve to meet the scorn,
 I can bear the scorching flame;
 'Tis but once to cloud the morn,
 But the blighting of one name:
 Bloom or burning, joy or anguish,
 'Tis but once to writhe or languish;
 Speak the muttered malin louder,
 Never can ye crush a prouder;
 Speak! and be futurity,
 Dark or bright, unveiled to me!

From the Ladies' Magazine.

"ELEGANT LEISURE."

Ho! hoy—bring here my rocking chair—
 Light up the fire with pine;—
 'T is done—and now to banish care,
 Let fancy's spell be mine.

The world's shut out—and I alone—
 'T is pleasant thus to be;
 The world without's a slavish one—
 The world within is free!

Up—up, my soul! the night is yours—
 Be griefs and wrongs forgot:
 The day was made for slaves and bores—
 The night—the night, for thought!

Go! walk the isles of classic Greece,
 And join the ranks of war;
 Fling off the sober robes of peace—
 And grasp the scimitar!

On! with the rushing host—see, how
 The crescent flames on high;
 On! with the rushing host—now—now
 We conquer or we die!

Away—away—through all the earth—
 Now climb from from star
 Into the region of thy birth,
 Where kindred spirits are!

Now with the storm worn mariner
 Upon the moonlit deep—
 Now hie thee to the couch of her
 I love, and watch her sleep!

There! rest thee there. 'T is beautiful!—
 In heaven—on earth and sea,
 Thou hast not found a scene so full
 Of calm sublimity!

ROSCREA.

THE FOUNTAIN OF OBLIVION.

BY MRS. HEMANS.

"Implora pace."

One draught, kind Fairy! from that fountain deep,
 To lay the phantoms of a haunted breast,
 And lone affections which are griefs, to steep
 In the cool honey-dews of dreamless rest;
 And from the soul the lightning-marks to lave—
 One draught of that sweet wave!

Yet, mortal, pause!—within thy mind is laid
 Wealth, gather'd long and slowly; thoughts divine
 Heap that full treasure-house; and thou hast made
 The gems of many a spirit's ocean thine
 —Shall the dark waters to oblivion bear
 A pyramid so fair.

Pour from the fount! and let the draught efface
 All the vain lore memory's pride amassed,
 So it but sweep along the torrent's trace,
 And fill the hollow channels of the past!
 And from the bosom's inmost-folded leaf
 Raze the one master-grief!

Yet pause once more!—All, all thy soul hath known,
 Loved, felt, rejoiced in, from its grasp must fade!
 —Is there no voice whose kind, and awakening tone
 A sense of spring time in thy heart hath made?
 No eye whose glance thy day-dreams would recall?
 —Think—would'st thou part with all?

Fill with forgetfulness!—there are, there are,
 Voices whose music I have loved too well;
 Eyes of deep gentleness—but they are far,
 Never, but never in my home to dwell!
 Take their soft looks from off my yearning soul—
 Fill high the oblivious bowl!

Yet pause again!—with memory wilt thou cast
 The undying Hope away, of memory born?
 Hope of re-union, heart, to heart at last,
 No restless doubt between, no ranking thorn?
 Would'st thou erase all records of delight,
 That make such visions bright?

Fill with forgetfulness, fill high—yet stay—
 —'Tis from the past we shadow forth the land,
 Where smiles long lost, again shall light our way,
 And the soul's friends be wreathed in one bright band.
 —Pour the sweet waters back on their own rill,
 I must remember still!

For their sake, for the dead—whose image nought
 May dim within the temple of my breast,
 For their love's sake, which now no earthly thought
 May shake or trouble with its own unrest,
 Though the past haunt me as a spirit—yet
 I ask not to forget!

From the Connecticut Mirror.

TO MY LITTLE SISTER.

Come, Sister, come, the Sun is up and smiling o'er the earth,
 The morning Lark is carolling her melody of mirth,
 And all the songsters of the sky, awakened by her strain,
 Respond in thrilling harmony from every hill and plain.

The dew is sparkling on each flower, fairer than India's gems,
 A brighter, richer coronet than royal diadems—
 Come let us forth to meet the sun, to hear the joyous lay
 Of Nature's minstrels, and to bathe our feet in glittering spray.

'Twill make the purple tide of life in brisker currents flow.
 'Twill bring upon thy tender cheek health's purest, ruddiest glow,
 'Twill fill thy heart with calm delight, with peace, with joy, with love,
 And while thou view'st His goodness here, 'twill lift thy soul above

To that fair land upon whose flowers a heavenly dew distils.
 That universe whose farthest realms an angel anthem fills—
 That place where shines no sun by day, where smiles by night no moon,
 But God himself, in glory, pours one bright, eternal noon
 D.

BOOK BINDING. Sign of the Golden Ledger, corner of State and North Market-streets, Albany. WILLIAM SEYMOUR, carries on the above business in all its branches; viz: plain, extra, and super-extra—has a first rate ruling machine, and other necessary implements for manufacturing Blank Books of every description, on the most reasonable terms, or the best workmanship.

—An assortment on hand. Subscribers to the American Masonick Record can have their volumes handsomely bound in boards, with leather backs and corners, at 62 1-2 cents a volume. Feb 14 3m3

PAINTING AND GLAZING.—The subscriber respectfully informs his friends and the publick that he continues the House and Sign Painting and Glazing, at the old stand, No. 299, corner of North Market and Steuben streets, where he will accommodate the publick with any article in his line. Paints in pots mixed ready for use, of the first quality, can be had at any time. Personal attention will be paid to all orders. March 9, 1823. JOHN F. PORTER.

FRANKLIN LETTER FOUNDRY. The proprietors of this Foundry, offer on liberal terms, the following articles, viz:—
Roman and Italic. Fourteen, Twelve, Ten, Eight, Seven, Six,
 Five, and Four Lines Pica, plain, Canon, Meridian, Double Great Primer, Double English, Double Small Pica, Great Primer, English,
 Pica, Small Pica, Long Primer, Bourgeois, Brevier, Minion, Nonpareil, Pearl.

Two Line Letter. Minion, and all larger, Nonpareil, Pearl.
Full Face. English and Pica, Small Pica, Long Primer, Bourgeois, Brevier, Minion.

Borders and Flowers of every kind.
Antiques. Ten and Six Lines, Four Lines Pica, Double Great Primer, English and Pica, Long Primer, Brevier, Minion, Nonpareil.

Blacks. Four Lines Pica, Double Great Primer, Double Small Pica, Great Primer, English and Pica, Small Pica, Long Primer.

Open Blacks. Great Primer, Double Great Primer, and Four Line
 Pica.

Italians. Seven Lines Pica, Five Lines Pica.

Tuscan. Eight Lines Pica, Four Lines Pica.

Shaded Letter. Eight Lines Pica, Four Lines Pica, Double Great
 Primer, Two Lines Brevier, Two Lines Nonpareil, Eight Lines Pica
 Ornamented, Six Lines Pica, Ornamented.

Leads. Six to pica and thicker, Seven to pica, Eight to pica.
 Quotations; Space Rules, from one to eight ems, Long Primer
 Astronomical, and other signs; Spanish and French Accents; Fractions; Composing Sticks from twenty to four inches in length; Cases Chases; Slice, Brass, and common Galleys; Iron and Mahogany Fer-ture; Proof's ink; Skins; parchment; points Presses also fornished.

Several new founts of letter have been cut; and it has been the wish of the proprietors to combine the beauty of the modern, with the clearness and durability of the ancient style of typography, and to produce types at once handsome, legible, and useful. Specimens of these will be sent to printers. The greatest care has been taken in the composition of the metal with which all their founts of letter are cast.

All orders, either by letter or otherwise, left at their Counting Room
 No 41, State-street, or at their Foundry, Eagle-street, south of State street, will receive prompt attention. A. W. KINSLEY & Co.
 Albany, Feb. 14, 1823.

THIS PAPER

Is published every Saturday, by E. B. CHILD,
 AT NO. 3, BEAVER STREET, ALBANY, N. Y.

TERMS.—To city subscribers, Three Dollars a year. To subscribers who receive their papers by mail, Two Dollars
 and Fifty Cents, IN ADVANCE—otherwise, Three Dollars
 JOB PRINTING neatly executed at this office.

AND ALBANY SATURDAY MAGAZINE.

NO. 15.

A decorative woodcut illustration of a triangular shield. Inside the shield is a face with long, flowing hair. Below the face are two symbols: a cross-like symbol on the left and a crescent moon on the right. The shield is set against a background of dark, billowing clouds. Above the shield, a series of radiating lines or rays emanate from a central point, creating a sunburst effect. The entire illustration is framed by a decorative border.

Jewish Year of the World, 5589-90.

February 27

March 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15 16 17 18 19 20 21 22 23 24 25

"MAGNA EST VERITAS."

There is one subject upon which we touch with regret; and that subject is anti-masonry. We had intended to remain a mere passive spectator of its rise, progress and efforts. but there are times when to be silent would be criminal—times when patriotism is led by the clarion call of justice, to gird on its armour, and to stand forth in the pride of its strength, the fearless vindicator of the rights of mankind. It is not our object to defend the institution of freemasonry, farther than to point out and expose the utter absurdity of those who, by means the most unjust and most to be deprecated, are endeavouring to raise an excitement against it. Our object is the peace and harmony of society—on this ground we shall predicate our course—on this ground we shall take a firm, decided stand. We shall act as becomes a man intent on subserving the best interests of his fellow beings—with a single eye to the publick good. Our course is plain—it is not a devious track—it is marked by no eccentricities.

That difference of opinion as to the nature and tendency of things should exist among different members of society, is a thing consonant with the very nature of humanity. Human wisdom does not always flow in the same channel; and the pathways of human frailty, are, if possible, still more broken and meandering in their course. Yet inconsistency and absurdity of opinion, to be guarded against, need only a fair and candid display of facts. Undisguised realities are more powerful than fictitious dreams and fanciful illusions.

3 That the present excitement against masonry was germinated in a want of facts, must be the opinion of every one who views the subject with an unprejudiced eye. Every one knows that masonry is a secret institution, and that the uninitiated can only judge of it by those things which casually come under observation. The men—the characters of the men who have upheld the institution for ages, afford sufficient proof of its utility; for it is just as impossible for good men to uphold a bad institution, as it is for bad men to support a good one. The nature of the institution is governed by, and necessarily connected with, the nature of the men. This principle will hold good in every relation of life—every social compact—every attribute of humanity. As well might we expect pure water from a corrupt fountain, as pure men from a corrupt society. Such a thing is impossible—it is out of character with those laws which govern the existence of mankind universally. As well might we deduce wholesome effects from unwholesome causes; as well might we say that light is evolved from darkness, or that heat is the most common in the frigid zone.

27 But let us examine a little further into the effects of the 28 institution of masonry. We have all doubtless to some meas-

its effects. We have seen the hand of charity extended by it to the hapless widow and orphan—those who, in this vale of sorrow, most need the dole of kindness and protection. And if the object of the institution is more particularly to assist those who are left desolate in the world when the ruthless hand of the destroyer visits a member of the craft and calls him from time to eternity, its influence is not the less salutary. "Help one another," is a principle authorized by the very fact that we are dependent beings—that we are dependent on each other for all that can make existence desirable. So far as this end is attained, without detriment to society at large, the institution is salutary—is consonant with the best feelings of human nature; and if based upon such principles, it cannot be overthrown.

But,—says the credulous, arrogant opposer of masonry,—it goes further than is salutary; its object is to "help one another," whether right or wrong—and of course every mason is a "sworn cut-throat and assassin." This postulate needs examining. The very fact that there are vagabonds in existence, who have been initiated into the mysteries of the order, and yet receive no assistance from the institution, gives the lie direct to an assertion so utterly foolish and groundless. An abhorrence of crime is among the vital principles of human nature. No combination of circumstances can dispel that abhorrence—no social compact can exist without it.

We have but to look around us. We behold on every side men and citizens whose integrity and honour no one could or would impeach. They bear testimony by their words and their acts, that the institution in question is consistent with laws human and divine, and that it militates against neither. Now which had we ought to believe, the man who by his own testimony perjures himself, or him who remains true to and vindicates his principles? Whose motives should be soonest suspected? It would be a libel on the good sense of community to answer the question. We must consider, then, the scandal which is thrown upon the fraternity of Freemasons as wretched sophistry—as mere cant, which takes with the unthinking and vulgar, but which the candid man despises.

The efforts continually making to raise an anti-masonick excitement in this section of the country, for audacity of purpose and recklessness of spirit, has no parallel in our annals. But as yet it has met with little success. It is gratifying to see the members of the masonick fraternity pursuing the even and noiseless tenor of their way, through good report and through bad report, unmindful of the calumny with which they are assailed. As stands the grown oak unscathed by the pelting of the storm, so virtue and integrity repose in the consciousness of their own strength. "Magna est veritas, et prevalebit."

POPULAR SCIENCE.

"How charming is divine philosophy!
Not harsh and crabbed as dull fools suppose,
But musical as is Apollo's lute" Comas.

I.—ANIMATED NATURE.

"And God said, let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing."—Genesis.

1.—ANIMAL MECHANICKS.

Balancing of Eggs on a Bare Rock. The following singular fact is stated by the celebrated Harvey, the discoverer of the circulation of the blood, in his ingenious work "De Generatione." A bird (Alca Pica, Linn.) lays only one egg, which, without making any nest or preparation for its reception, she deposits on the top of a sharp acute stone, and with such firmness that she can leave it and return to it with safety. If the egg should be removed by any means, it can never be replaced, and rolls thence into the sea. The spot, as I have said, is encrusted with a white cement, and the egg, as soon as it is laid, is slimed over with a soft and viscous humidity, which quickly causes its adhesion to the rock, as firmly as if they had been fastened together with bars of iron.

2.—ANIMAL ARCHITECTURE.

Spring and Summer Nests of Birds. The construction and selected situations of the nests of birds are as remarkable as the variety of the materials employed in them; the same forms, places, and articles being rarely, perhaps never, found united by the different species, which, we should suppose, similar necessities would direct to a uniform provision. Birds that build early in the spring seem to require warmth and shelter for their young, and the blackbird and the thrush line their nests with a plaster of loam perfectly excluding, by these cottage like walls, the keen icy gales of our opening year; yet, should accidents bereave the parents of their first hopes, they will construct another, even when summer is far advanced, upon the model of their first erection, and with the same precautions against severe weather, when all necessity for such provision had ceased, and the usual temperature of the season rather requiring coolness and a free circulation of air. The house sparrow will commonly build four or five times in the year, and in a variety of situations, under the warm eaves of our houses and our sheds, the branch of the clustered fir, or the thick tall hedge that bounds our garden, &c.; in all which places, and without the least consideration of site or season, it will collect a great mass of straws and hay, and gather a profusion of feathers from the poultry-yard to line its nest. The cradle for its young whether under our tiles in March or in July, when the parent bird is panting in the common heat of the atmosphere, has the same provision made to afford warmth to the brood; yet this is a bird that is little affected by any of the extremes of our climate.

3.—ANIMAL ETHICKS.

Instincts of the Missel Thrush. The missel thrush (turdus visivorus) is a wild and wary bird, keeping generally in open fields and commons, heaths, and unfrequented places, feeding upon worms and insects. In severe weather it approaches our plantations and shrubberies to feed on the berry of the mistletoe, the ivy, or the scarlet fruit of the holly, or the yew; and, should the redwing or the field-fare presume to partake of these with it, we are sure to hear its voice in clattering and contention with the intruders, until it drives them from the place, though it watches and attends, notwithstanding, to its own safety. In April, it begins to prepare its nest. This is large and so openly placed, as would, if built in the copse, infallibly expose it to the plunder of the magpie and the crow, which at this season prey upon the eggs of every nest they can find. To avoid this evil, it resorts to our gardens and our orchards, seeking protection from man, near whose haunts those rapacious plunderers are careful of approaching; yet they will at times attempt to seize upon its eggs even there, when the thrush attacks them and drives them away with a hawk-like fury; and the noisy warfare of the contending parties occasionally draws our attention to them. The call of the young birds to their parents for food is unusually disagreeable, and reminds us of the croak of a frog. The brood being reared, it becomes again a shy and wild creature, abandons our homesteads, and returns to its solitudes and heath.

4.—CONCHOLOGY.

A shower of snails, near Bristol. In the south of England, a little banded snail (helix virgata) is a very common species, on most of the arid maritime pastures, and the sheep-downs of many inland places. It happened from some unknown cause, that those inhabiting a dry field in a parish near Bristol, were, in one season, a few years ago, greatly increased, so as to become an object of notice to a few, then to more, till, at length this accumulation was noised about as a supernatural event. The field was visited by hundreds daily from neighbouring villages and distant towns. People who could not attend purchased the snails at a half-penny each; and there were persons who made five shillings a day by the sale of them. As this increase of the creature was certainly not to be accounted for, some had the impudence to assert that they had witnessed their fall from the clouds; and many declared their belief that some great public or private misfortune was indicated by it. The proprietor of the field being supposed not to maintain the same sentiments as the commonality, upon a political circumstance which at that moment greatly agitated the country, it was considered as a manifestation of heavenly displeasure, precursive of malady, misfortune, death. However, autumn came, these snails retired to their holes in the bapks, and the worthy man lived on—and long may he live, esteemed and respected by all, unscathed by snails or misfortunes.

5.—ENTOMOLOGY.

The Ghost Moth. The moth known to collectors by the name of the ghost, (hepalus humuli), has a singular habit when on the wing, which at once distinguishes it from any other moth. The larva which produces this creature is hidden in the ground during the season of winter: the fly being formed in the month of May, and soon rising from the soil, then commences its short career. At this time, one or more of them may frequently be observed under some hedge in a mead, or some low place in a damp pasture, only a few feet from the ground, persevering for a length of time together in a very irregular flight, raising and falling, and balancing about in a space not exceeding a few yards in circumference, in action not observable in any other—and fully indicating this moth. This procedure is not the meanless vagary of the hour, but a frolicsome dance, the wooing of its mate, which lies concealed in the herbage over which it sports. The two insects are something similar in their general form, but very differently marked. The male exhibitor is known by his four glossy, satiny, white wings, bordered with buff; the lady reposer has her upper wings of a tawny yellow, spotted and banded with deep brown. They are very inert creatures, easily captured; and their existence appears to be of very short duration, as we soon cease to observe them either in action or at rest. The male probably becomes the prey of every bird that feeds by night; his colour and his action rendering him particularly liable to dangers of this nature, and the frequency with which we find his wings scattered about, points out the cause of death to most of them. The bat pursues with great avidity all those creatures that fly in the evening; and, by its actions, it seems to meet with constant employment, and has greater probability of success than some insensituous birds that feed by day, as all the myriads which abound at this time are the sole prey of itself and a few nocturnal rambles. From this singular flight in the twilight hour, haunting, as it were, one particular spot, the fancy of some collector, considering it as a spectre like action, named it the "Ghost Moth." This Ghost Moth discharges her eggs in a very singular manner, and frequently immediately upon capture, not deliberately producing them, but dismissing them from the oviduct in rapid succession, until it is exhausted, by a slight elastic force that conveys them clear from the abdomen. They are perfectly dry and unadhesive.

6.—OPHIOLOGY.

Eggs of the common Snake. The common English snake (coluber natrix) usually deposits its eggs about midsummer, in dung or compost heaps. They are larger than the eggs of a sparrow, obtuse at each end, of a very pale yellow colour, feeling tough and soft like little bags of some gelatinous substance. The interior part consists of a glaucous matter like that of the hen, enveloping the young snake imperfect, yet the eyes and nose sufficiently defined. Snakes must protrude their eggs singly, but probably all at one time, as they preserve no regular disposition of them, but place them in a promiscuous heap. At the time of protrusion, they appear to be surrounded with a clammy substance, which, drying in the air, leaves the mass of eggs united, as if by pasted paper. As many as forty eggs have been found in these deposits; yet, notwithstanding such provisions for multitudes, the snake, generally speaking, is not a very common animal.

Conclusion next week.

THE NATURALIST.

AMERICAN SONG BIRDS.

The Mocking-bird seems to be the prince of all song birds, being altogether unrivalled in the extent and variety of his vocal powers; and, besides the fulness and melody of his original notes, he has the faculty of imitating the notes of all other birds, from the humming-bird to the eagle. Pennant tells us that he heard a caged one, in England, imitate the mewling of a cat and the creaking of a sign in high winds. The Hon. Daines Barrington says, his pipe comes nearest to the nightingale, of any bird he ever heard. The description, however, given by Wilson, in his own inimitable manner, as far excels Pennant and Barrington as the bird excels his fellow-songsters. Wilson tells that the ease, elegance and rapidity of his movements, the animation of his eye, and the intelligence he displays in listening and laying up lessons, mark the peculiarity of his genius. His voice is full, strong, and musical, and capable of almost every modulation, from the clear mellow tones of the wood thrush to the savage scream of the bald eagle. In measure and accents he faithfully follows his originals, while in force and sweetness of expression he greatly improves upon them. In his native woods, upon a dewy morning, his song rises above every competitor, for the others seem merely as inferior accompaniment. His own notes are bold and full, and varied seemingly beyond all limits. They consist of short expressions or two, three, or at most five or six, syllables, generally expressed with great emphasis and rapidity, and continued with undiminished ardour, for half an hour or an hour at a time. While singing, he expands his wings and his tail, glistening with white, keeping time to his own music, and the buoyant gaiety of his action is no less fascinating than his song. He sweeps round with enthusiastick ecstasy, he mounts and descends as his song swells or dies away; he bounds aloft, as Bartram says, with the celerity of an arrow, as if to recover or recall his very soul, expired in the last elevated strain. A bystander might suppose that the whole feathered tribes had assembled together on a trial of skill; each striving to produce his utmost effect, so perfect are his imitations. He often deceives the sportsman, and even birds themselves are sometimes imposed upon by this admirable mimic. In confinement he loses little of the power or energy of his song. He whistles for the dog; Cæsar starts up, wags his tail, and runs to meet his master. He cries like a hurt chicken, and the hen hurries about, with feathers on end, to protect her injured brood. He repeats the tune taught him, though it be of considerable length, with great accuracy. He runs over the notes of the canary, and of the red bird, with such superior execution and effect, that the mortified songsters confess his triumph by their silence. His fondness for variety, some suppose to injure his song. His imitations of the brown thrush is often interrupted by the crowing of cocks; and his exquisite warblings after the blue bird, are mingled with the screaming of swallows, or the cackling of hens. During moonlight, both in the wild and tame state, he sings the whole night long. The hunters, in their night excursions, know that the moon is rising the instant they begin to hear his delightful solo. After Shakespeare, Barrington attributes in part the exquisiteness of the nightingale's song to the silence of the night; but if so, what are we to think of the bird which in the open glare of day, overpowers and often silences all competition? His natural notes partake of a character similar to those of the brown thrush, but they are more sweet, more expressive, more varied, and uttered with greater rapidity.

The Yellow breasted Chat naturally follows his superior in the art of mimicry. When his haunt is approached, he scolds the passenger in a great variety of odd and uncouth monosyllables, difficult to describe, but easily imitated so as to deceive the bird himself, and draw him after you to a good distance. At first are heard short notes like the whistling of a duck's wings, beginning loud and rapid, and becoming lower and slower, till they end in detached notes. There succeeds something like the barking of young puppies, followed by a variety of guttural sounds, and ending like the mewing of a cat, but much hoarser.

The song of the Baltimore Oriole is little less remarkable than his fine appearance, and the ingenuity with which he builds his nest. His notes consist of a clear mellow whistle, repeated at short intervals as he gleams among the branches. There is in it a certain wild plaintiveness and naïveté extremely interesting. It is not uttered with rapidity, but with the pleasing tranquility of a careless ploughboy, whistling for amusement. Since the streets of some of the American town have been planted with Lombardy poplars, the orioles are constant visitors, chanting their native "wood notes wild," amid the din of coaches, wheelbarrows, and sometimes within a few yards of a bawling oysterwoman.

The Virginian Nightingale, Red Bird, or Cardinal Grosbeak, has great clearness, variety, and melody in his notes, many of which resemble the higher notes of a fife, and nearly as loud. He sings from March till September, and begins early in the dawn, and repeating a favourite stanza twenty or thirty times successively, and often for a whole morning together, till, like a good story too frequently repeated, it becomes quite tiresome. He is very sprightly, and full of vivacity; yet his notes are much inferior to those of the wood, or of even the brown thrush.

The whole song of the Black-throated Bunting consists of five, or rather two, notes; the first repeated twice and very slowly, the third thrice and rapidly, resembling chip, chip, che-che-che; of which ditty he is by no means parsimonious, but will continue it for hours successively. His manners are much like those of the European yellow-hammer, sitting, while he sings, on palings and low bushes.

The song of the Rice Bird is highly musical. Mounting and hovering on the wing, at a small height above the ground, he chants out a jingling melody of varied notes, as if half a dozen birds were singing together. Some idea may be formed of it, by striking the high keys of a piano-forte singly and quickly, making as many contrasts as possible, of high and low notes. Many of the tones are delightful, but the ear can with difficulty separate them. The general effect of the whole is good; and when ten or twelve are singing on the same tree, the concert is singularly pleasing.

The Red-eyed Flycatcher has a loud, lively, and energetic song, which is continued sometimes for an hour without intermission. The notes are, in short emphatic bars of two, three, or four syllables. On listening to this bird, in his full ardour of song, it requires but little imagination to fancy you hear the words "Tom Kelly! whip! Tom Kelly!" very distinctly; and hence Tom Kelly is the name given to the bird in the West Indies.

The Crested Titmouse possesses a remarkable variety in the tones of its voice, at one time not louder than the squeaking of a mouse, and in a moment after whistling aloud and clearly, as if calling a dog, and continuing the dog-call through the woods for half an hour at a time.

The Red-breasted Blue Bird has a soft, agreeable, and often repeated warble, uttered with opening and quivering wings. In his courtship he uses the tenderest expressions, and caresses his mate by sitting close by her, and singing his most endearing warblings. If a rival appears, he attacks him with fury, and having driven him away, returns to pour out a song of triumph. In autumn his song changes to a simple plaintive note, which is heard in open weather all winter, though in severe weather the bird is never to be seen.

THE GATHERER.

THE VINE.

From the German of Herder.

On the day of their creation, the trees boasted one to another, of their excellence. "Me, the Lord planted!" said the lofty cedar:—"strength, fragrance, and longevity, he bestowed on me."

"Jehovah fashioned me to be a blessing," said the shadowy palm; "utility and beauty he united in my form." The apple-tree, said, "Like a bridegroom among youths, I glow in my beauty amidst the trees of the grove!" The myrtle, said, "Like the rose among briars, so am I amidst the other shrubs." Thus all boasted;—the olive and the fig-tree—and even the fir.

The vine, alone, drooped silent to the ground! "To me," thought he, "every thing seems to have been refused;—I have neither stem—nor branches—nor flowers,—but such as I am, I will hope and wait." The vine bent down its shoots, and wept!

Not long had the vine to wait; for, behold, the divinity of earth, man, drew nigh; he saw the feeble, helpless, plant trailing its honours along the soil:—in pity, he lifted up the recumbent shoots, and twined the feeble plant around his own bower.

Now the winds played with its leaves and tendrils; and the warmth of the sun began to empurple its hard green grapes, and to prepare within them a sweet and delicious juice.

Decked with its rich clusters, the vine leaned towards its master, who tasted its refreshing fruit and juicy beverage; and he named the vine, his friend and favourite.

Despair not, ye forsaken; bear—be patient,—and strive.

From the insignificant reed flows the sweetest of juices;—from the bending vine springs the most delightful drink of the earth.

WITCHES.

The following extract from Professor Boehmer's "Manuel of the Literature of Criminal Law," may give some information to such as believe witches were never hanged but in Salem. The extract relates to the superstition and cruelty which prevailed in Hungary, with respect to witches, in the first half of the last century. In a report from the Segedin, of 26 of July, 1723, it is said, "As several persons of both sexes have been lately thrown into prison here, they have not only been very strictly examined, but also sentenced to be burned. But before this sentence was executed on them, they were first, according to the custom of this place; put to the proof; that is to say, they were let down into the water, with their hands bound, and a long rope fastened round their bodies; but, according to the manner of witches, they floated on the water like a piece of dry wood. After this, they were immediately put to the second proof, namely, laid in the scales, to see how heavy each was, upon which it was astonishing to behold that a tall and robust woman weighed no more than three drams, and her husband, who was not of the smallest, only five drams, and the rest on an average only half an ounce three drams, and even less. On the 20th of this month the sentence was executed on thirteen persons, namely, six sorcerers and seven witches, who were all burned alive. Among them the last year's justice of the town, a man otherwise highly esteemed by every body, 82 years old, adorned the funeral pile!!! It is not to be described how dreadful this spectacle was to behold; three wood piles were erected a league from the town, with a great stake fixed in the middle of each; to this stake four malefactors were bound with ropes upon each pile, and then a woman, who was not yet burned, was beheaded — — — thereupon all the piles were kindled, and set in full flames at once. — — — There are eight more still in prison: these have already been swam and weighed, sustain the ordeal for witches," &c.

LONG STORIES.

Capt. S—, of the — regiment, during the American war, was notorious for a propensity, not to story-telling, but to telling long stories, which he used to indulge in defiance of time and place, often to the great annoyance of his immediate companions; but he was so good-humoured withal, that they were loth to check him abruptly or harshly. An opportunity occurred of giving him a hint, which had the desired effect. He was a member of a courtmartial assembled for the trial of a private of the regiment. The man bore a very good character in general, the offence he had committed was slight, and the court was rather at a loss what punishment to award, for it was requisite to award some, as the man had been found guilty. While they were deliberating on this, Major —, now General Sir —, suddenly turning to the president, said, in his dry manner, "Suppose we sentence him to hear two of Captain S—'s long stories."

PARLIAMENTARY QUALIFICATIONS.

When the friends of the youngest Thelluson proposed making him a member of parliament, he said, "he did not understand exactly what it was to be in parliament, or what they meant by constituents in the country; but, if there was any necessity to go backwards and forwards for their orders, he could trot down as fast as any member of parliament in the kingdom."

GENIUS DEFINED.

A wit being asked what the word genius meant, replied, "If you had it in you, you would not ask the question; but as you have not, you will never know what it means."

THE LEGENDARY.

THE LANAUNTSHEE.*

Is it a ghost of olden time?—The Harp of Inisfail.

In that land of Paddies and potatoes—of fun and fighting—there are (where are they not!) many a poor scholar; boys who 'beg for their learning and likewise their bread;' and who are as great proficient in the mysteries of Pastorini as they are in the beauties of Virgil. Poetry and prophecy are equally familiar to them, and they can scan a line of Horace or tell you the precise year on which the Orangemen are to get a 'great big beating.' Talk, indeed, about the ignorance of the Irish! they respect learning, though clothed in rags; and the ancient fame of the kingdom is still sustained in sweet Munster; for the student is furnished not only with masters but with board and lodging—when he can get them—gratis. This hospitality—which once excited the eulogium of Bede—has produced its wonted effect; the land swarms with bare-footed poets and breechesless mathematicians; every hedge can boast its academy; and every stream has been celebrated in madrigals and sonnets. The superabundance of students, however, has recently produced great fastidiousness in patrons; and he must now excel as a tale-teller who will be honoured with potatoes for supper, and nothing less than a new song in praise of the farmer's eldest daughter (unmarried) can secure the additional luxury of butter.

It happened not many years since, that one of those friendless aspirants for fame took up his abode in a sequestered part of the county of Tipperary: he was, he said, in his humanities;† and whatever effect the study might have produced on his heart, his exterior bore evidence against the humanity of the times. The fragments of his coat, like the Hindoo lately exhibited, might be considered as self-sustained in air; and the extremities of his person was unconscious of any friendly covering. Absorbed, however, in his books, he appeared indifferent to the absence of essential garments; and, what was still more unfortunate, he could neither write poetry nor tell a story. At first he met with a tolerable reception, but his abstraction, and occasional fits of absence, soon filled his patrons with disappointment: when he called a second time, at a farmer's there was no straw in the barn, or a 'poor traveller' (Anglice, a beggarman) who had anticipated him. Driven thus from house to house he was forced sometimes to sleep in the fields and sometimes in the caves of mountains.

In winter this was impossible, and necessity soon sharpened his wits: he learned to relate wonderful legends of fairies and ghosts, and seldom wanted lodging. One night, however, he encountered, among the galties, successive disappointments. No door opened to receive him; no fire blazed to cheer him; echo among the hills threatened a speedy storm, and the winds whistled 'over the wildness of night.' He, too, had mistaken his way, but the apprehension of still greater ills urged him forward. After two hours' fatigue he espied a glimmering light at a distance, and hoping that it issued from some aperture in a mountain cabin he made for it. He was not mistaken; and cautiously approaching the one-paned lattice he saw a young girl busily employed in baking bread on a griddle. Her kitchen exhibited considerable tidiness: her dresser was white, and the pewter on it reflected the rush-light that twinkled on a little table placed before the fire, and covered with a rustic feast—bacon and eggs ready for the pan, and a little cruiskeen of 'mountain dew.' The mouth of the benighted scholar was instantly filled with that water which ever springs up at the sight of palatable viands, and, without further ceremony, he knocked at the door. At first there was the sound of a suppressed bustle within, and then all became as silent as the tomb. He knocked again, and, after a pause, a female voice inquired who claimed admittance. The poor student, at this interrogation, recounted the evils which beset him, and, after some time, the door was opened, evidently with reluctance; but no sooner was his miserable aspect revealed than the countenance of the mountain nymph underwent a considerable change. A look of seriousness first came, like a summer cloud athwart the mid-day sun, across her face, and pity soon melted in her eye; she threw another bush on the hearth, thrust, with silent kindness, a piece of bread into the stranger's hand, and while he was partaking of this she placed before him a glass-full of potheen. Goodness became her better than blushes, and even ungallant as the poor scholar was he could not withhold a few compliments on her beauty.

When he had concluded his repast he inquired whether he could not adjourn to the barn, but was answered in the negative: and, with some hesitation, she allowed him to lie down in a bed which stood at the upper end of the kitchen. He was too much fatigued for gentle sleep to weigh his eyelids down in a hurry, and, before all around him had become oblivious, he heard a shrill whistle. In a moment the colleen (young girl) started from her seat, rubbed down her apron, adjusted her hair, and cautiously opened the door. A quick step was instantly felt on the floor, and then that gently thrilling noise which indicated the contact of innocent but ardent lips, whilst the lovers, like fear, seemed to startle at the sound themselves had made.

'Pardon, Norah,' said the lover, 'I should have been here sooner.' 'Hush,' said she, 'a poor scholar is in my father's bed.'

This intelligence seemed to damp the young man's ardour, but the poor scholar, not wishing to disturb their moments of bliss, affected sleep so cleverly that they appeared quickly to forget his presence. The hot cake was placed on the table; the bacon and eggs screamed in the pan, and Andy had snatched another kiss when the sound of a horse and car, entering the bawn, (yard) assailed their terrified ears. 'My father!' exclaimed Norah. 'Where shall I go?' asked Andy. 'Under the bed,' she answered, as the master of the mansion knocked at the door. Before it was opened the supper was disposed of in opposite cupboards, and when the old man entered, he angrily inquired what she had been doing. 'I had fallen asleep, father,' replied Norah, 'but will I get something for you to eat?'

'Eat! what have you to eat, you extravagant huzzy!'

'Some eggs and bacon,' said the daughter. 'Eggs and bacon, hoh! you think the bit o' bacon won't be gone time enough, do n't you!'

'Well, then, the eggs.'

'No; three eggs are worth three ha'pence, an that's somethin when oats is only twelve hogs (shillings) a barrel. Eaten! eaten! the thackeen thinks o' nothin but eaten, hoh! she'll eat me out o' house an home; but no eaten to-night, any how, for I'll go to bed.'

'There's a poor scholar in it, father.'

This piece of information threw the miserly father into a rage, and, while the fit was on him, he threw Norah almost into the fire, and dragged the student from his place of repose.

'Och! blud-an-thunder!'

'Parce mihi!' exclaimed the affrighted scholar; and the words of an unknown tongue, no less than his wild appearance, produced a very fortunate effect upon the farmer, who was extremely superstitious. He drew back, somewhat affrighted, muttering to himself, 'a poor scholar, or rather a fairy man.'

'You judge correctly,' said the Munster student, assuming a mysterious air, 'I am familiar with the 'good people,' and seldom travel without my Lanauntshee: pray, do you stand in need of any thing?'

'Och, none a-vich!' (my son) replied the farmer; 'God bless you, man, I—I—did n't know you.'

'No harm done, sir, but don't you want your supper; I'll provide you with one instantly for nothing; I see you smile assent; you'd have no objection to bacon and eggs. Lay the cloth, colleen.'

Norah obeyed his commands, and the poor scholar, placing himself within a circle roughly drawn on the floor, said, in a solemn tone, 'Lanauntshee! Plus videas tuis oculis quam alienis.' 'Look,' he continued, addressing himself to the farmer, after a mysterious pause, 'and see what my good spirit has placed in yonder buffet.'

The miser, half incredulous—half alarmed, cautiously approached the depository of edibles, but hesitated to turn the wooden button that kept the door closed, until commanded in an authoritative tone, to do as desired; still, apparently unwilling, he hesitated for a moment, and then hurriedly pulled open the door. His amazement was somewhat of the pleasing kind when he saw revealed before him the bacon and eggs, hardly ceasing to hiss in the pan; and, as he laid them on the table, he cast a very expressive look on the poor scholar. 'What think you,' asked the shoeless student, 'of a piece of oaten cake with that fried bacon?'

'Beautiful!' cried the farmer, rubbing his hands, 'or, may-be you could order some white eyes' (potatoes).

'Vulgar food,' said the scholar, 'I prefer bread. In that corner buffet, forenent you, you'll find some.'

The bread being produced, the farmer invited the stranger to partake of the feast, and when they had discussed that, amongst other things, the scholar asked if there was any potheen in the house. He was answered, not a drop. 'Then,' said he, 'I must trouble my Lanauntshee; he's fond of a drop himself, and I fear has nearly finished his allowance; but, rei bonæ vel vestigia delectant, and now, sir, look into the spy-hole behind you, under that bonnet.' The bonnet was no sooner removed than the bottle became visible, and when its contents had done their worst upon the farmer he inquired if he, too, could not prevail on a Lanauntshee to obey his commands. 'Did you ever see one?' asked the poor scholar; 'if not, I'll show you one in the form and dress of a young man; perhaps not altogether unknown to you, for this good spirit assumes all shapes at will.' Then placing himself within the circle, he desired the door to be opened, and when the passage was clear, he said, in a solemn voice, 'Lanauntshee! come from under the farmer's bed, and quickly hence to your mote, there to wait my further orders.'

The lover understood the hint, and instantly obeyed this injunction. 'Tunder-un-turf!' exclaimed the farmer, as he rushed across the floor, 'why that's Andy Russell, the miller;—'

'Only his fetch,' interrupted the poor scholar, 'and, now, sir, the awful process which I've gone through has fatigued me, and with your permission, I'll take some rest.'

When he arose next morning, he saw in Norah's looks, a world of gratitude, and her father, ambitious of the acquaintance of so convenient a guest, gave him a general invitation to his house.

MISCELLANY.

HERCULANEUM AND POMPEII.

M. Raoul Rochette has communicated to the French Academy of inscription and the Academy of Fine Arts, intelligence of high interest, extracted from a letter from Pompeii, dated Jan. 15, concerning the recent excavations. It is as follows:—

'The most brilliant discoveries are daily making at Herculanum and Pompeii. A magnificent mansion is gradually appearing at Herculanum, the garden of which, surrounded by colonnades, is the grandest which has hitherto been found. Some of the paintings with which it is decorated are of grand interest. Among other mythological subjects there is a picture of Perseus, who, assisted by Minerva, is killing Medusa; Mercury laying Argus to sleep, that he may ravish away the beautiful Io, a subject very rare among the monuments of art; Jason, the Dragon, and the three Hesperides. But the most remarkable objects in this mansion are some bas-reliefs in silver, fixed on elliptical tablets of bronze, and representing Apollo and Diana. There are numberless other articles of curiosity in furniture and household utensils.

'But as to ancient pictures, it appears that none approach in merit those discovered at the house in

* Mr. Croker, in his 'Fairy Legends,' has taken no notice—an unpardonable offence—of the Lanauntshee; yet the name of this spirit is as familiar as that of the Banshee. It is, however, a thing of very doubtful generation, and, like the wolf-dog, implacable in resentment—unalterable in friendship. It frequently happens that Paddy performs wonders in a fair fight against considerable odds; and the thing would be an absolute miracle were it not for the aid afforded him by his Lanauntshee.

† Learning Latin and Greek.

Pompeii. It is now certain that the quarter in which the excavations are going on is the finest in the city. The Tuscan Atrium first presents itself in the mansion we are speaking of. This Atrium is surrounded with small rooms very prettily decorated, from which we pass into a garden, round which are also disposed apartments appropriated to visitors. To the left of the Atrium there is a passage leading to large porticos supported by red pillars, and embellished with a profusion of beautiful paintings.

"Among these pictures the following compositions are particularly remarkable:—

"1. Medea meditating the murder of her children, who are innocently playing at dice, whilst their tutor at a short distance, conscious of Medea's intention, is lamenting the fate which impends over them.

"2. The Sons and Daughters of Niobe assailed with the arrows of Apollo and Diana. This is a picture full of pathos.

"3. Meleager departing for the Chase of the Wild Boar of Calydyne.

"4. Perseus delivering Andromeda.

"5. A Bacchante.

"6. The Muses.

"There are also some grotesque designs; such as a pigmy teaching an ape to dance, as well as paintings of fruit and animals beautifully executed. These porticos were devoted to promonading. They enclose a little garden, in the centre of which there is a basin for fish, and at the bottom was found a large triclinium, or dining-table, and seats for reclining. The gynæceum, or apartment appropriated to females, consists of a peristyleum, surrounded with porticos leading into the apartments, where there is a luxurious display of pictures, executed in first-rate style. Castor and Pollux, the household gods, are on each side of the entrance; the other principal subjects are—Echo and Narcissus; Endymion; the Infant Achilles plunged into Styx by his mother Thetis; Mars and Venus; Saturn; Orpheus; Ceres; Mars Pacific; Jupiter Hospitalis; and a classical group of a Satyr and an Hermaphrodite.

"The exedrum, or study, is decorated with some admirable pictures, representing Bacchantes of incomparable beauty; also a picture of Achilles drawing his sword against Agamemnon, and restrained by Minerva. Pictures on this subject, but indifferently executed, have been before discovered among those in the Temple of Venus. There is here, likewise, Achilles, disguised as a woman, and detected by Ulysses; Ulysses, begging and receiving alms from the faithful Eumæus, &c. The style of these paintings is said to be superior to any thing that has yet been discovered of ancient art. From the exedrum we pass into a third garden, also surrounded with red columns, and adorned with pictures on the following subjects:—Phædra discovering her incestuous passion to Hippolytus; several tragick and comick scenes; the fable of Ætra and Ægeus; Apollo, with Daphne, changed into a laurel. There is a little niche, or sacrum, in the garden, from which we pass into a third peristyleum. Among the moveable articles found in this mansion, a casket is particularly mentioned, enriched with elegant ornaments in bronze, and deposited in a corner of the gynæceum. It contains 42 pieces of imperial gold money, and six of silver.

THE VISION OF VALDEMARE.

Translated from the Spanish.

It was night; and by degrees, that sweet forgetfulness which suspends our faculties insensibly began to steal over me, and I fell asleep. In an instant my soul was transported to an unknown region. I found myself in the centre of a spacious plain, surrounded by groves of mournful cypresses. The whole enclosure was full of superb mausoleums, some assuming the shape of pyramids, whose lofty summits almost touched the clouds; and others the forms of altars, whose magnificence presented the most imposing spectacle. On all were engraved the epitaphs and sculptured insignia of the heroes who had been interred there. In various places I discovered coffins lying on the ground covered with sable palls, and bodies extended on the bare earth, meanly enveloped in miserable garbs.

I wandered, filled with terror, through this dismal region. By the light of the moon, which shone in the midst of an unclouded sky, I attentively regarded these proud monuments, and curiosity impelled me to read the pompous epitaphs inscribed on them. "How remarkable a difference!" I observed to myself; "when ordinary men, incapable of eclipsing their fellow-mortals, lie forgotten in dust and corruption, those great men who have excited astonishment and admiration throughout the world, even after the lapse of many ages, still breathe in splendid marble! Happy are they who have had the glory of performing brilliant achievements! Even though inexorable fate refuse to spare them, their ashes afterwards revive, and under the very stroke of death, they rise triumphantly to a glorious immortality!"

I was indulging in these reflections, when, on a sudden, a hoarse and fearful blast of wind affrighted me. The earth rocked under my feet, the mausoleum waved to and fro with violence, the cypresses were torn up with tremendous fury, and, from time to time, I heard a sound as of fleshless bones clashing together. In a moment, the heavens were covered with black clouds, and the moon withdrew her splendour. The horror inspired by the darkness of the night, and the dead silence which reigned amidst the tombs, caused my hair to stand on end, and stiffened my limbs until I had scarcely power to move them.

In this dreadful situation, I saw an old man approaching me. His head was bald—his beard white—in his right hand he carried a crooked scythe, and in his left an hour-glass—whilst two immense flapping wings nearly concealed his body. "Thou," said he to me in a terrible voice, "who art still dazzled by the dignities and honours which mankind pursue with such reckless eagerness, see whether you perceive any difference between the dust of the monarch and that of the most wretched slave!" He spoke, and striking the ground a tremendous blow with his scythe, all these proud monuments fell headlong to the earth, and in an instant were reduced to dust. My terror was then redoubled, and my strength almost failed me. I could only perceive that there was no distinction. All was dust, corruption, and ashes. "Go," said he, "seek another road to the temple of immortality! Behold the termination of those titles of grandeur which men so ardently desire! They vainly imagine that, after death, they shall survive in history, or in marbles, which shall leap emulously from their quarries to form such monuments of pride as you have just beheld; but they are miserably deceived; their existence ends at the instant they expire, and their fame, however deeply engraven on brass and marble, cannot have a longer duration than that of a brief moment when compared with eternity! I myself, TIME, consume and utterly annihilate all those structures which have vanity for their base; the works which are founded on virtue are not subject to my jurisdiction. They pass to the boundless regions of another world, and receive the reward of immortality!" With these words he disappeared.

I awoke with a deadly chillness, and found that my sleep had been productive of instruction. Thenceforth I regarded, in a very different point of view, the pompous titles which before had dazzled me, and, by the aid of a little reflection, I soon became thoroughly sensible of their vanity.

From the New York Morning Courier.

HOW TO BATHE.

Reader, we are disposed to take some care of your body as well as your mind. Be duly thankful therefore for the advice we are about to give you. If you are an M. D. do not turn up your medical nose at our instructions, for they are founded on much experiment and long experience, backed by the uncommon wisdom we received from nature.

The spring bath come—"refreshing earth, reviving all but man"—your head aches, and you feel occasionally drowsy, languid and uncomfortable. Take a warm bath; it will relieve you in an hour. But take it in the proper way—

"When 'tis done, 't were well
It were not done quickly!"

for in this lies the mischief of warm bathing.—A man generally posts to a bath as if he were carrying an express or running away from a broomstick. He is out of breath and in a perspiration on his arrival. He undresses himself in a great hurry, soaks his body in the hot water, kicks about for five minutes, emerges with every pore open, puts on his garments, looks complacently in the mirror, and thinks he has taken a warm bath! No such thing—he has taken nothing but a cold! In one hour he begins to sneeze, and the next day he commences coughing, and curses the bath. Philosophy grieves over his folly, but will not relieve his nose and lungs. Why did the bath give him a cold? Because he was in a perspiration when he went into the water, which said perspiration was increased by the heat, and checked as soon as he raised, "placidum caput [it should be corpus] unda" into the colder medium of the air. The order of nature must be reversed to prevent a man from taking cold under such circumstances.

Now, reader, we will tell you how to take a bath. In the first place, pay your note, if it be due—or if you cannot do that let it be protested, and think no more about it. If you have any quarrel on hand, whip or get whipped at once—tranquility of mind is all important in rendering the warm bath beneficial. Walk leisurely to the house of ablution, and disrobe yourself with moderate haste. You may have the water hot enough to parboil you, if you choose—that is left to your own taste. In with you, and to beguile the time read a newspaper or smoke a cigar—taking care, however, to keep the cigar above water. If you don't it will go out. In about half an hour, the water will cool to nearly the temperature of the air, and you will have gone gradually and safely through half a dozen climates. You will have left the torrid for the temperate zone. Then let in the cold water, very slowly, almost drop by drop, and in the course of twenty minutes you will find yourself in a cold bath. Your pores will have closed gradually and moderately, your sensations will be exquisite during the process, and you will feel strength and elasticity in every limb. You emerge from the cold water into the warmer air—dry your body thoroughly with a coarse towel, and feel like a new man. It is an impossibility for you to take cold—if you do, you are at liberty to come and box our ears for giving you bad advice.

SUPERSTITION OF THE MOORS.

An opinion prevails, we believe, in all the four states, that it is ordained, that the Moors shall lose their country on a Friday, during the hour of prayer, by the invasion of a people clothed in red; yet, so inconsistent are they, that at this hour, all the gates of every city are carefully locked, as if bars and bolts could oppose the decrees of fate. They are not, however, mere theorists in predestination, but submit to every change of fortune with humble resignation, passing from a state of opulence to that of misery, without a murmur; and when death approaches, the expiring man desires nothing more, than that his face may be carefully turned towards Mecca, and, when assured of this position he bears his sufferings with patience, and leave the world in peace.

"When a person is thought to be dying, he is immediately surrounded by his friends, who begin to scream in the most hideous manner, to convince him there is no more hope, and that he is already reckoned among the dead! The noise and horror of this scene cannot surely but serve to hurry the patient worn down already by sickness, to his last state. If the person be in too much pain, (perhaps in a fit,) they put a spoonful of honey in his mouth, which in general, puts him out of his misery (that is to say, he is literally choked;) when, by being treated differently, or even left to himself, he might, perhaps, have recovered. Then, as, according to their religion, they cannot think the departed happy, till they are under ground, they are washed instantly, while yet warm; and the greatest consolation the sick man's friend can have, is to see him smile while this operation is performing, as they look on that as a sign of approbation in the deceased of what he is doing; not supposing such an appearance to be a convulsion, occasioned by washing and exposing to the cold air, the unfortunate person, before life has taken its final departure. This accounts for the frequent instances that happen here, of people being buried alive. Many of the Moors say a third of the population are lost in this manner."

The moment a death happens in a family, the alarm is given by the shrill screaming of the words, woulliah wou, repeated incessantly, by the relations and every body in the house. These cries, heard at a great distance, bring every female acquainted with, or dependent on, the family, to scream over the dead, and mourn with the nearest relations of the deceased: and it strikes one with the greatest horror, to see the afflicted widow or mother, half dead with grief for her loss, obliged (according to the custom of the country,) to receive the visits of not less than a hundred different women, who come to condole with her. They each take her in their arms, they lay her head on their shoulder, and scream without intermission for several minutes, till the afflicted object, stunned by the constant howling, and a repetition of her misfortune, sinks senseless from their arms, on the floor! They likewise hire a number of women, who make this horrid noise round the bier, placed in the middle of the court yard of the mansion, over which these women scratch their faces to such a degree, that they appear to have been bled with a lancet at the temples; after the ceremony is over, they lay on a sort of white chalk, to heal the wounds and stop the blood. These women are hired indifferently at burials, weddings, and feasts; at the two latter, they sing the song loo, loo, loo, and extempore verses. Their voices are heard at the distance of half a mile.

"It is the custom of those who can afford it, to give on the evening of the day the corpse is buried, a quantity of hot dressed victuals to the poor, who come to fetch each their portion, and form sometimes immense crowds, and confusion at the doors; this they call the 'supper of the grave.'"

The dead are always dressed for life; the ears, nostrils and eyelids are stuffed with a preparation of camphor and rich spices. An unmarried woman is ornamented as a bride, and bracelets are put on her arms and ankles. The body is wrapped in fine white linen, sanctified at Mecca, which is generally procured in their life-time, and carefully preserved for their last dress. At the head of the coffin, is placed a turban, if the deceased be a male, corresponding with his rank; if a female, a large bouquet of flowers—if a virgin, the loo, loo, loo, is sung by hired women, that she may not be laid in the ground, without having had the benefit of the wedding song. On Fridays, the eve of the Mahomedan Sabbath, the women visit the tombs of their deceased relations, under the idea that on that day, the dead hover round to meet their friends, and to hold commerce with those that may be deposited near them; and on this account, they conceive it to be more necessary to dress the dead, that they may not, in such an assembly of ghosts, complain of the neglect of their relations. The tombs are neatly white-washed, and kept in constant repair; flowers are planted round them, and no weeds suffered to grow. Small chapels are generally built over the tombs of persons of rank, and decorated with flowers, placed in large China vases.

A VIZIER'S CUNNING.

The possibility of a great change being introduced by very slight beginnings may be illustrated by the tale which Lockman tells of a vizier who, having offended his master, was condemned to perpetual captivity in a lofty tower. At night his wife came to weep below his window. "Cease your grief," said the sage; "go home for the present, and return hither when you have procured a life black-beetle, together with a little ghee, (or buffalo's butter,) three clews, one of the finest silk, another of stout packthread, and another of whipcord; finally, a stout coil of rope." When she again came to the foot of the tower, provided according to her husband's commands, he directed her to touch the head of the insect with a little of the ghee, to tie one end of the silk thread around him, and to place the reptile on the wall of the tower. Seduced by the smell of the butter, which he conceived to be in the store somewhere above him, the beetle continued to ascend till he reached the top, and thus put the vizier in possession of the end of the silk thread, who drew up the packthread by means of the silk, the small cord by means of the packthread, and, by means of the cord, a stout rope capable of sustaining his own weight,—and he at last escaped from the place of his duress.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, MAY 9, 1829.

☞ The Office of the Masonick Record is removed to No. 3 Beaver street.

The theological discussion between Mr. Owen and Mr. Campbell, commenced at Cincinnati on the 13th and continued until the 22d of April, when it ended, as the reader will naturally suppose, without producing any new evidence in favour of or against Christianity, and without either of the gentlemen having convinced the other of the errors of his opinions. The Cincinnati Chronicle contains a notice of the manner in which the debate was conducted, and a brief summary of Mr. Owen's arguments. The most courteous deportment prevailed throughout the discussion; and the audience, each day of debate, exceeded 1200 persons. The editor of the Chronicle thinks Mr. Campbell, the champion of religion, had the best of the argument; but says that the enthusiasm of Mr. Owen on the subject of reforming the world seems to be in no measure abated. The arguments of both have been taken down in short hand, and, it is said, will soon be published. For ourselves, we do not see what good can result from discussions of this nature. No true christian will forsake his belief for the philosophy, as it is termed, of Mr. Owen, whatever may be the arguments in its favour; nor is it at all probable, that at this late day, Mr. Owen will acknowledge that he has all his life supported a false theory, and been in truth all that the jesting of his enemies has endeavoured to make him appear—a mere visionary.

The election for town officers took place in this city on Tuesday last, when the anti-masons mustered one hundred and two votes for their most favoured candidates. The city contains about 20,00 inhabitants—the Observer has been hammering anti-masonry into them for nearly three years—we have had an anti-masonick state convention here—an anti-masonick nomination for governor—three or four score of anti-masonick orations and speeches—numberless embassies from the anti-masonick state central committee—&c. &c. &c. all in the "anti-masonick" line, and all this labour, added to the "immense influence" of Samuel M. Hopkins, esq. has discovered one hundred and two easy sort of fellows, who do not know which side they belong to, but will vote any way to please a friend! Really, anti-masonry gains ground wonderfully! One hundred and two voters after a three years campaign! Governor Southwick's capitals do not appear to be very fruitful. The people look on him in a proper light—the man is mad.

WESTERN CHARTER ELECTIONS. We notice these elections because they furnish a true picture of anti-masonry in the western part of this state, where its votaries have hitherto considered it, or pretended to consider it, so firmly fixed as to be superior to every change and every reverse. Like all things of "sound and fury," however, it is rapidly losing its ill-gotten power, and passing away, among the things that "were." The election for village officers took place in Rochester on Monday last, when the general toleration ticket succeeded by an average majority of sixty-votes, over the anti-masonick ticket. In Batavia the election took place on Tuesday, and the toleration ticket succeeded by a very handsome majority. It should be recollected that in Rochester and Batavia anti-masonry had its birth, and that from these two places has proceeded all the impetus of the excitement. Rochester is the head quarters of the state central committee, and Batavia is the residence of David C. Miller and some of the most zealous and violent members of the faction. The effectual check which anti-masonry has received in these places must be felt throughout the state, and, indeed, in every quarter where the excitement has shown itself. It is but reasonable to indulge the hope that the public mind will in a few months resume its wonted calmness; and profiting by recent experience, be prepared in future to resist the machinations of the ambitious and "dishonest."

☞ Eighty anti-masons resident in the fourth and fifth Wards of the village of Rochester have publicly renounced all connexion with the anti-masonick faction. The following are among the reasons they have published as the cause of the measure they have adopted.

"They have seen with regret the harmony of society disturbed—the peace of families broken, the son being literally arrayed against the father:

"They have seen a violent and persecuting spirit derange the ordinary business transactions between man and man—the political anti-masons generally refusing to trade with or employ those who do not unite with them in an indiscriminate proscription of the masons:

"They have seen the most sacred feelings of our nature prostituted by the anti-masonick leaders to the vile purposes of party—the temples of the Almighty polluted by the baleful spirit of persecution—the sacred desk perverted to the unholy purpose of proscription, and the harmony of religious societies destroyed by the prevalence of anti-masonick intolerance:

"They have not seen any benefits arising from anti-masonry to counterbalance even the least of these evils."

FOREIGN NEWS. The Packet ship Columbia, Capt. Delano, arrived at New-York on Monday evening from London. She left Portsmouth on the 1st of April, and brings London papers to the 31st of March.

The prominent items of news relate to the Catholic question, which may now be looked upon as entirely triumphant.

The Roman Catholic Relief Bill, passed the House of Commons on the 30th March, after a warm discussion of many hours. The vote was 330 to 142, giving a majority of 178. The bill was then sent to the house of Lords for concurrence, on putting the motion for which, the cheering was long and loud. Many members approached Mr. Peel and shook him by the hand, congratulating him on the success of his Bill: The Irish Forty Shilling Freeholders Disfranchisement Bill, passed on the same day.

The Courier of the 30th March, in noticing various arrivals from Germany, states that accounts from the frontiers of Servia say, that in consequence of the appointment of Redschid Pacha to the post of Grand Vizier, the whole system of war will be changed. It is justly remarked that the Turks have hitherto acted on no general plan, each separate commander following his own views, or rather those to which circumstances gave rise. Redschid who has acquired considerable experience in the Greek contest, is fully aware of the importance of combined operations, and has determined, it is asserted, to make every movement tend to one great object. In order to confirm the Governments of Fortresses in the faithful discharge of their duty, or rather in order to prevent the surrender of the remaining strong holds on the Danube till the very last extremity, commissioners have been sent to each of them, forming superior councils, by whom the conduct of the Governments is to be controlled.

The Courier makes sad lamentations over the passage of the Irish Relief Bill. It concludes a long article by remarking that "the public must be prepared to hear that it will pass the House of Lords and receive the Royal assent previous to the adjournment for the Easter Holidays."

It is stated by the Times that a knot of blackguards assembled daily in the vicinity of the two Houses of Parliament, for the purpose of insulting the Duke of Wellington and other members of the Administration, and that the man is one of the gang who threw a bottle at the Marquis of Wellesly in Dublin, some two or three years since.

The Algemeine Zeitung contains letters which announce that the Sultan would not accede to the proposals of M. Jaubert, nor indeed to any thing in the shape of proposals. The Allies it is said must act without him, and it is supposed that the Porte will be forced to submit to the independence of Greece, and the erection into a separate state of the Morea, the Cyclades, Attica, Livadia, and Negropont.

The Warsaw Government has prohibited the sale or circulation within the Territory of Russian Poland, of Bowring's translation of the popular Polish poets.

By intelligence from Smyrna, it appears that conferences were still taking place between M. Jaubert and the Reis Effendi, but without any arrangement being likely to take place, until the return of answers from London and Paris. The Porte was desirous that the French and English Ministers should return to Constantinople, to conclude the ultimate arrangements. It was supposed that the Russian government had consented that they should treat upon the affairs of Greece, and that it would accede to whatever arrangements might be made, which it is supposed would be the forerunners of a peace between Russia and Turkey. Meanwhile preparations proceed on both sides. The Sultan was concentrating his Asiatic troops upon the points along the Marmora. [Morning Herald.]

A very melancholy occurrence took place last night, on board the steam boat Franklin, on her passage from Providence to this city. George Washington Adams, eldest son of the late President of the U. States, was on board, on his way to Washington. During the day and evening he evinced no symptoms of indisposition, till near bed time, when he complained of violent pain in the head, and said he would be bled as soon as he got to New-York. He, however, retired with the other passengers, but rose about two o'clock, dressed himself in a hurried manner, and awoke one or two of the passengers, complaining that they were plotting against him, and particularly asked one of them what it was he had said about his (Mr. Adams) jumping overboard; and the thing passed off, Mr. A. going upon deck and the passengers resumed their slumbers. The only subsequent trace of the unfortunate young man was the finding, some hours afterwards, his hat upon the deck forward of the wheel guard, whence he is supposed, in a high state of fever, to have jumped overboard. Mr. G. W. Adams was a lawyer of promise—a young man of considerable acquirements—and has been several times one of the representatives in the Massachusetts legislature of the city of Boston. He was unmarried. [N. Y. American, May 4.]

PETITIONS AGAINST SABBATH MAILS. We learn from a gentleman who had access to the rooms of the Committees of both houses of Congress, to whom petitions and memorials against Sabbath mails were referred, that the total number of these petitions was four hundred and sixty-six. They came from nineteen different states, the District of Columbia and the Territory of Michigan. As it has been stated that these petitions were the result of an extensive combination, and originated with a few prime movers, it will be well to add that this gentleman found more than one hundred petitions, in the number, of an original composition, varying in expression and ideas from each other or from any given form. [New-England Palladium.]

An individual was lately tried in Raleigh, N. C. for having in company with another, disinterred the body of a stranger, for the purpose of obtaining his teeth! one of the miscreants run away, but the other was brought into Court, and fined $25 in spite of his teeth. Little enough in all conscience, for such an outrage—the temptation was almost as pitiful, as that of Burke and his associates in Edinburgh. [Camden Journal.]

Bull. A writer in a northern provincial paper charges the Catholic Association with having cruelly drained the pockets of their unfed and unclothed countrymen!

VARIETIES.

From English Journals received at this office.

Progress of Public Instruction in Denmark. The following numbers speak more forcibly than any declamation, in favour of popular education; for "the schoolmaster is abroad," even in despotick countries. In the year 1819, there existed but one school of mutual instruction in Denmark. The propriety of permitting even this single example of so great an innovation, was not discussed before the King in Council, until the month of August 1822; and a Royal Circular, issued in the course of the following month from the High Chancery, made public for the first time the King's sanction of that system of instruction. From that moment the number of schools founded for the propagation of knowledge on the Lancasterian principles, increased rapidly and in the following ratio.

On the 31st December 1823 there were 244 Schools.

1824	605
1825	1143
1826	1545
1827	2063
1828	2400

Mother of Sultan Mahmoud. After the war between Russia and the Porte in 1770, when the former lent assistance to the insurgent Greeks in the Morea, these people were exposed to the most revengeful persecutions by the Turks, who, in spite of the amnesty which was proclaimed, carried off, among the female slaves selected for the Seraglio, the daughter of a Greek secular priest. Her beauty fascinated the Sultan, Abdul Hamid, to such a degree, that he became violently enamoured, and exalted her to the rank of a wife; so that, his son, the present Sultan, is on the mother's side probably of Greek extraction. The unhappy father repaired to Constantinople for the purpose of obtaining the release of his daughter, and went to the banker of the Sultana Asma, the sister of Abdul Hamid, to solicit his interposition in this affair. "Reverend father," replied the banker, "if you set any value upon your head, take these two thousand piastres, and quit Constantinople immediately." The old man took his advice, and his daughter remained in the power of the Sultan.

The Bulgarian Alps. From a memoir lately published in Paris, by Lieutenant General Comte de T—, who writes from personal experience, it appears that there are three lines of roads by which an equal number of Corps d'Armee may march in parallel directions, from the Danube to the plains of Thracia over the Balcan, (Mount Hemus,) or Bulgarian Alps, with artillery, waggons, and carriages during seven months in the year. They may get over their distance in twelve days march, and three days of rest, and go in under the walls of Adrianople at the expiration of that time. The first road commences in the environs of Sistova and Routschouk, through Ternova, Kabrova, Rezanlik, &c.: distance 59 1-2 hours. The second road from Silistria, through Razgrav Eski-Djuma, or more directly by Schumla, Carnabat, Papasli, and Adrianople. Distance the same. The third road from Hadji Oglou-Razardjik, where all the roads of the lower Danube join between Silistria and the Coast of the Black Sea, through Pravadi, Aidas, Aumour-Fakih, &c. Distance 54 hours. Another road exists from Silistria to Constantinople, by Varna, along the Sea Coast; but this is not practicable for the wagon train and heavy artillery.

Ingenious Test in Manufactures. An experiment to ascertain the presence of cotton in woollen stuffs was lately described to the Academy of Sciences at Metz; and consists of boiling the cloth for two hours in a solution of one ounce of pure alkali in half a pound of water. The caustick entirely dissolves the animal substance, wool, but acts only partially on the vegetable substance, cotton; so that by the residuum the fact is readily ascertained.

New Gas. A company has been formed at Berlin of chemists and capitalists, to supply that city with gas procured from the excremental matters of every description, which are now taken to the environs and used as manure. This government have not yet given their permission for the commencement of the undertaking; but they have promised to do so, on the company being answerable that no offensive smell shall be allowed to escape from their gas-pipes.

Learning. Learning raises up against us many enemies amongst the low, and more among the powerful; yet does it invest us with grand and glorious privileges, and confers on us a largeness of beatitude. Nothing is past which we desire to be present; and we enjoy, by anticipation, somewhat like the power which I imagine we shall possess hereafter, of sailing on a wish from world to world. [Landor.]

From the (Batavia) People's Press.

POLITICAL ANTI-MASONRY. From every quarter of the state, we have the same current of information and expression. The people, ashamed of the leaders in this crusade, and surprised at their own credulity in believing that perjured traitors and worthless speculators, who could sell their consciences and friendships, and, like their proper prototype, betray their nearest and most valuable friend and benefactor with a kiss, for private gain, should be more patriotic and trustworthy than the great founder of our republic and his immortal compeers, have paused, and that pause has been fatal to political anti-masonry.

It is perfectly natural that men who should so far lose their reason, whether through just or unreasonable resentment, as to place Solomon Southwick, Henry F. Yates, David C. Miller, and the rest of the clan of Judas like speculators, before Washington, Jefferson, Franklin, Lafayette, Jackson, Clinton, and Tompkins, and believe, for any length of time that these great fathers and protectors of their country, and benefactors of their species, were either fools or knaves, and that the superiour discernment and patriotism of the modern worthies had discovered and exposed their follies or their villainies, should upon a short interval of reflection, discover the utter absurdity of such an opinion, and be ashamed that they had ever entertained it.

But there has been, for two years past, such a monstrous opinion currently prevailing among the most heated portion of the people; and we have often heard it said, that Southwick was a much greater man, and purer patriot, and benefactor, than Washington; and that Clinton and Jackson were murderers outright!

To put a stop to the rage of political anti-masonry, nothing has ever been necessary but for those who had been wrought up by their own feelings of resentment, aided by the unceasing outcry of the interested speculators in almanacks, or offices, to have time to examine their own opinions, and see how grossly ridiculous they are. They have never had time to do this till since the last fall election; that being naturally the point to which all political anti-masonry looked for rewards, and honours, and notoriety, and importance, to start upon. All the presses and all the bawlers concerned in the speculation were of course kept in full blast; and so loud and so violent was the din, that no man in this unhappy region, could hear himself speak or think. "Go the whole hog," was bawled and beat into the people with so much energy, that they scarcely knew whether they were going for "the whole hog," or with a "swinish multitude." When this din was over, because the blowers were out of breath, or had something else to attend to;— some ceasing because they had got into office, and some because they had failed—so much of a calm had happened per force, that men could not help thinking and looking about them. This was all that was necessary to cure the mania; and this is already nearly effected. We give several extracts from papers in different sections of the state to show this fact.

VERMONT. Agreeably to public notice, a large number of masons, and others opposed to the present anti-masonick excitement, met at the court house in this village, last week on Tuesday. Deacon SETH STORRS, of Middlebury was called to the chair, and PHILLIP C. TUCKER, esq. was appointed secretary. After prayer by Rev. J. C. Green, an address was read, expressive of the sense of the convention and bearing the signatures of a committee of thirty citizens of this county. This address declares, that the first degree of masonry enjoins the precepts of the Gospel, pledges the candidate to allegiance to his country, and to practice all the relative duties of parent, neighbour, and citizen. It denies that there is anything in the higher degrees, which require or sanction the taking the life of an offending member—which enforces the support of a brother, "right or wrong"—which authorizes or countenances the interference of the lodge in political questions; or that there is any thing in the ceremonies of the craft, of an impious character. The address examines and denies all the principal charges alleged against the fraternity, by anti-masons; and is to be given to the public in a pamphlet, with the names of the committee, who avouch for its entire truth.

An address, substantially confirming the above, was made by Dr. Allen; and speeches were heard from S. Haight and P. C. Tucker, esqrs., after which, the business of the convention was closed with a prayer. [Vt. American.]

ANTI-MASONICK OUTRAGES. As a fitting commentary on the whining paragraphs of the Anti-masonick Enquirer about "masonick violence" at the late town meetings, it may be mentioned that one of the anti-masonick bullies who then distinguished himself for his violence at the polls, a few days since committed a brutal and unprovoked assault on a respectable citizen, because the latter had expressed some opinion in opposition to the schemes of the political anti-masons. The anti-masonick ruffian was arrested, tried by a court of special sessions, and properly fined for his brutality. The anti-masons have been the aggressors in every breach of the peace committed for some time past in this quarter. They will, however, find themselves mistaken if they attempt to retrieve their political defeat by a resort to fists. [Rochester Republican.]

Southwickiana. The Whitehall Republican says that Solomon Southwick has lately been in that quarter and returned home with a FLEA in his ear. The flea must have had the worst of it. [N. Y. M. Courier.]

Contents of the Western Journal of the Medical and Physical Sciences, No. 12, for March. Essays and Cases—Observations on Fever and other Diseases of the South and West; Cases illustrating the efficacy of Paraceticism, in Abscesses of the Pleura, 1. A case of Empyema successfully treated by Paraceticism; 2. An account of a case of Empyema consequent upon Measles, cured by Paraceticism; 3. Notes of a case of Empyema from Chronic Pleurisy, in which the operation gave relief; Notes of a case of imitative Neuralgia affection, occasioned by Mercury; A sketch of the life and character of Dr. Thomas Hinde. Miscellaneous Intelligence.—I. Anæsthetic—Blisters in the early stages of Measles, Mr. Lizar's method of Amputation, Mercury, Treatment of Dropsies, Puerperal Insanity, Cases of Tetanus with Inflammation of the Spinal chord, Difference of the Blood in the Veins and Capillary Vessels, Cure of White Swelling by Frictions of Iodine, Extirpation of the Uterus, On the Congestion of the Blood, On the Diseases of the Kidneys and Ureters. On the use of Circular Ligatures in Intermittents, On Certain methods of treating Chronic Inflammations of the Eye, Remedy for Opacity of the Cornea, Signs of Drowning. II. Analytical—Removal of Loose substances from the Knee Joint, Acetate of Ammonia in Uterine Diseases, Hydrocyanate of Iron in Epilepsy and Chorea, Amputation—Circular and Flap Operation—Spina Bifida, Graduates of Transylvania University, Graduates of the Medical College of Ohio.

MARRIED,

On the 6th inst. by the Rev. Mr. Weed, colonel JOEL RATHBONE, of the house of Heermans, Rathbone & Co. to Miss EMELINE MUNN, all of this city.

On Tuesday evening last, by the Rev. Mr. Ludlow, Mr. JOHN PEMBERTON to Miss CLARISSA L. HENRY, all of this city.

On the 7th inst. by the Rev. Mr. Ferris, captain WILLIAM G. FRY to Miss SARAH S. SOUTHWICK, all of this city.

On the 22nd ult. by the Rev. Mr. Welch, Mr. SAMUEL T. PARENT to Miss MARY ANN CASSIDY, all of this city.

At Norwich, Chenango county, Mr. RALPH JOHNSON, junior editor of the Norwich Journal, to Miss MARY RANDALL.

JOB PRINTING,

Of every description, neatly and expeditiously executed on moderate terms, at the office of the American Masonick Record and Albany Saturday Magazine, No. 3, Beaver-street, one door west of South Market-street, Albany.

POETRY.

From the London New Monthly Magazine.

THE VICAR.

A SECOND EVERY-DAY CHARACTER.

Some years ago, ere Time and Taste
Had turned our parish topsy-turvy,
When Darnel Park was Darnel Waste,
And roads as little known as scurvy,
The man who lost his way between
St. Mary's Hill and Sandy Thicket,
Was always shown across the Green,
And guided to the Parson's wicket.

Back flew the bolt of lissom lath;
Fair Margaret, in her tidy kirtle,
Led the lorn traveller up the path,
Through clean-clipt rows of box and myrtle:
And Don and Sancho, Tramp and Tray,
Upon the parlour steps collected,
Wagged all their tails, and seemed to say,
"Our master knows you; you're expected."

Uprose the Reverend Dr. Brown,
Uprose the Doctor's "winsome marrow;"
The lady lay her knitting down,
Her husband clasped his ponderous Barrow;
Whate'er the stranger's caste or creed,
Pundit or Papist, saint or sinner,
He found a stable for his steed,
And welcome for himself, and dinner.

If, when he reached his journey's end,
And warmed himself in court or college,
He had not gained an honest friend,
And twenty curious scraps of knowledge;
If he departed as he came,
With no new light on love or liquor,—
Good sooth, the traveller was to blame,
And not the Vicarage, nor the Vicar.

His talk was like a stream which runs
With rapid change from rocks to roses:
It slipped from politics to puns;
It passed from Mahomet to Moses:
Beginning with the laws which keep
The planets in their radiant courses,
And ending with some precept deep
For dressing eels, or shoeing horses.

He was a shrewd and sound divine,
Of loud Dissent the mortal terror;
And when, by dint of page and line,
He 'established Truth, or startled Error,
The Baptist found him far too deep;
The Deist sighed with saving sorrow;
And the lean Levite went to sleep,
And dreamed of tasting pork to-morrow.

His sermon never said or showed
That Earth is foul, that Heaven is gracious,
Without refreshment on the road
From Jerome, or from Athanasius:
And sure a righteous zeal inspired
The hand and head that penned and planned them;
For all who understood admired,
And some who did not understand them.

He wrote too, in a quiet way,
Small treatises, and smaller verses;
And sage remarks on chalk and clay,
And hints to noble Lords and nurses,
True histories of last year's ghost,
Lines to a ringlet, or a turban;
And trifles for the Morning Post,
And nothings for Sylvanus Urban.

He did not think all mischief fair,
Although he had a knack of joking;
He did not make himself a bear,
Although he had a taste for smoking:
And when religious sects ran mad,
He held, in spite of all his learning,
That if a man's belief is bad,
It will not be improved by burning.

And he was kind, and loved to sit
In the low hut or garnished cottage,
And praise the farmer's homely wit,
And share the widow's homelier pottage:
At his approach complaint grew mild;
And when his hand unbarred the shutter,
The clammy lips of Fever smiled
The welcome, which they could not utter.

He always had a tale for me
Of Julius Cæsar, or of Venus;
From him I learned the rule of three,
Cat's cradle, leap-frog, and Quæ genus:
I used to singe his powdered wig,
To steal the staff he put such trust in;

And make the puppy dance a jig,
When he began to quote Augustin.

Alack the change! in vain I look
For haunts in which my boyhood trifled;
The level lawn, the trickling brook,
The trees I climbed, the beds I rifled:
The church is larger than before;
You reach it by a carriage entry;
It holds three hundred people more;
And pews are fitted up for gentry.

Sit in the Vicar's seat: you'll hear
The doctrine of a gentle Johnian,
Whose hand is white, whose tone is clear,
Whose phrase is very Ciceronian.
Where is the old man laid?—look down,
And construe on the slab before you,
Hic jacet
GULIELMUS BROWN,
Vir nulla non donandus laura.

From "Weeds and Wild Flowers," by the author of "Polham"

KNOWLEDGE.

'Tis midnight—round the lamp which o'er
The chamber sheds its lonely beam,
Is widely spread the varied lore
Which feeds in youth our feverish dream—
The dream, the thirst, the wild desire,
Delirious, yet divine—to know!
Around to roam, above to aspire,
And drink the breath of Heaven below!

From ocean, earth, the stars, the sky,
To lift mysterious Nature's pall,
And bare before the kindling eye
In man the darkest mist of all—
Alas! what boots the midnight oil?
The madness of the struggling mind?
Oh! vague the hope and vain the toil
Which only leave us doubly blind!

What learn we from the Past?—the same
Dull course of glory, guilt, and gloom!
I asked the Future—and there came
No voice from its unfathomed womb,
The sun was silent, and the wave;
The earth replied but with a breath;
But earth was kind, and from the grave
Arose the eternal answer—Death!

And this was all; we need no sage
To teach us Nature's only truth;
O fools! o'er wisdom's idle page
To waste the hours of golden youth!
In silence wildly do we seek
What only withering years should bring—
The languid pulse, the feverish cheek,
The spirits drooping on their wing.

Even now my wandering eyes survey
The glass to youthful glance so dear!
What deepening tracks of slow decay
Exhausting thought has graven here!
To think, is but to learn to groan,
To scorn what all beside adores,
To feel amid the world alone,
An alien on a desert shore,
To loose the only ties which seem
To idler gaze in mercy given!
To find love, faith, and hope a dream,
And turn to dark despair from Heaven!

THE STORM PAINTER IN HIS DUNGEON.

BY MRS. HEMANS.

Pietro Mulier was called Il Tempesta, from his surprising pictures of storms. "His compositions," says Lanzi, "inspire a real horror, presenting to our eyes death-devoted ships overtaken by tempest and darkness, fired by lightning on the mountain waves and again submerged in the abyss of ocean." During an imprisonment of five years in Genoa, the pictures which he painted in his dungeon were marked by additional power and gloom.

See Lanzi's History of Painting, translated by Roscoe.

Midnight! and silence deep!
The air is filled with sleep,
With the stream's whisper, and the citron's breath;
The fixed and solemn stars
Gleam through my dungeon-bars—
Wake, rushing winds! this breezeless calm is death!

Ye watch-fires of the skies!
The stillness of your eyes
Looks too intensely through my troubled soul;
I feel this weight of rest
An earth-load on my breast—
Wake, rushing winds, awake! and dark clouds roll!

I am your own, your child,
O ye, the fierce and wild
And kingly tempests! Will ye not arise?
Hear the bold Spirit's voice,

That knows not to rejoice,
But in the peal of your strong harmonies!

By sounding Ocean-waves,
And dim Calabrian caves,
And flashing torrents, I have been your mate;
And with the rocking pines
Of the olden Apennines,
In your dark path stood fearless and elate!

Your lightnings were as rods
That smote the deep abodes
Of thought within me, and the stream gushed free;
Come, that my soul again
May swell to burst its chain—
Bring me the musick of the sweeping sea!

Within me dwells a flame,
An eagle caged and tame,
Till called forth by the harping of the blast;
Then is its triumph's hour,
It springs to sudden power,
As mounts the billow o'er the quivering mast.

Then, then, the canvass o'er,
With hurried hand I pour
The lava floods and gusts of my own soul;
Kindling to fiery life
Dreams, worlds, of pictured strife;—
Wake, rushing winds, awake! and dark clouds roll!

Wake, rise! the reed may bend,
The trembling leaf descend,
The forest branch give way before your might;
But I, your strong compeer,
Call, summon, wait you here—
Answer, my spirit answer! Storm and Night!

ALBANY TYPE FOUNDRY—The subscribers, successors to B. STARR & Co. in the above foundry, continue the business in its various branches, and are prepared to execute orders for the following type, at the regular prices, on a credit of six months, or at a discount of 7 1/2 per cent. for cash, viz:

Roman and Italics—Twenty, Fourteen, Ten, Eight, Seven, Five and Four lines Pica, Canon, Double Paragon, Double Great Primer, Double English, Double Small Pica, Great Primer, English, Pica, Small Pica, Long Primer, Bourgeois, Brevier, Minion, Nonpareil, Pearl.

Two line letters—Pica, Small Pica, Long Primer, Bourgeois, Brevier, Minion, Nonpareil, Pearl.

Full face capitals—Small Pica, Long Primer, Bourgeois, Brevier, Minion.

Antiques—Ten and Eight lines Pica roman, Five line Pica italic, Four line Pica, Double Great Primer, Double Small Pica, Great Primer, and Pica, with lower case; and Long Primer, Brevier and Nonpareil.

Italics—Five line Pica, Double Small Pica, Two line Brevier, and Two line Nonpareil.

Texts—Double Small Pica.

Black—Five line Pica, Double Small Pica, Great Primer, Pica Long Primer.

Open Blacks—Five line Pica, Double Small Pica, Great Primer.

Shaded letters—Six line Pica ornamented, Two line Brevier and Two line Nonpareil double shade; Two line Nonpareil meridian shade Double Great Primer, Two line Brevier, Two line Nonpareil, and One line Brevier, single shade; Two line Minion and Two line Pearl italic single shade; Double Small Pica roman, and One line Brevier italic Antique shaded.

Script—English, on inclined body, (cast on a new plan.); Greek—Pica.

Borders and Flowers—From Six line Pica to Pearl, all cast in copper matrices.

Checks—Canon and Double English, plain and opened.

Fractions and Leaders of all sizes, from English to Pearl, English, Pica and Long Primer Piece Fractions; Spanish and French Accents, and Accented Vowels, Figure Vowels, Superior Figures, Dashes, and Rules. Also, Leads ten to Pica, and thicker; Quotations; Braces, and other Ornaments and Cuts, in great variety.

Printing materials of every description, and of the first quality, at the lowest prices—Cases, Stands, (an improved pattern,) Gallies, Composing sticks, Chases of all sizes, improved newspaper Chases, in two parts Ball, Rocks and skins, Bodkins, Furniture, &c. and, Prout's and Johnson's Printing Ink, constantly on hand. Presses of all kinds furnished at the manufacturers' prices. Wells' Improved presses will be kept constantly on hand, and may be examined at the foundry.

Large additions in the variety of type have been made since the specimen of this foundry was published of which specimens are now nearly completed, and will soon be sent to printers, the punches of which are cut by the senior partner of this firm, whose reputation as a superior letter-cutter is well established; and the whole business being under our immediate superintendence, no pains is spared to make our types in every way worthy the attention of printers. An important improvement in the composition of the type-metal has also been made—copper and some other ingredients being added, which render it both harder and tougher, and of a finer grain. Type cast at the foundry are warranted to be as solid as any cast in the country, and that they will not settle in height from the pressure in using. Particular care is also taken to have the type well dressed, and the fonts regularly put up.

Old type is received in exchange for new, at 10 cents per lb. Orders, by mail, or left at the foundry, No. 8 Liberty-st., will receive prompt attention.

STARR & LITTLE.

The type upon which this paper is printed was cast at the above foundry.

THIS PAPER

Is published every Saturday, by E. B. CHILD

AT NO. 3, BEAVER STREET, ALBANY, N. Y.

TERMS—To city subscribers, Three Dollars a year. To subscribers who receive their papers by mail, Two Dollars and Fifty Cents, IN ADVANCE—otherwise, Three Dollars. JOB PRINTING neatly executed at this office.

AND ALBANY SATURDAY MAGAZINE.

VOL. III.

ALBANY, N. Y. SATURDAY, MAY 16, 1829.

NO. 16.

MASONICK RECORD.

PROTEST OF UTICA LODGE.

The committee of Utica Lodge, No. 270, to whom was referred a circular from Ontario county, recommending the return of charters, &c., presented the following report and resolution, which were unanimously adopted and ordered to be published:—

The committee report that they have given the subject referred to them their most deliberate consideration; and that while they appreciate the spirit of conciliation that has prompted the course adopted by some of their brethren at the west, and are ready to acknowledge the importance and obligation to make every proper and reasonable sacrifice to satisfy honest prejudice and restore harmony to a disturbed community, they are constrained nevertheless to believe that no policy can be salutary in its consequences that requires the surrender of any portion of constitutional liberty. In a country like ours of equal rights, opinion should be left free as air, and every attempt, by coercive means to force one part of community to conform their sentiments to that of another, your committee confidently believe must be viewed as an invasion of personal rights against which they feel bound to remonstrate in the most solemn manner; for all experience confirms the truth, that concessions to unjust demands but stimulates to the making of further and more arbitrary exactions. The spirit of intolerance and oppression cannot be propitiated to moderation and forbearance by the most abject submission. It can only be disarmed and rendered harmless by a fearless and manly resistance.

"The excitement" which at the west originated in the unlawful abduction of an individual, and which has been continued, not for the purpose of vindicating the violated laws of the land, but to minister to unchastened ambition of political demagogues, has excited our deepest solicitude; and we would cheerfully adopt any measures, compatible with self respect and our obligations to the cause of truth, that furnished a reasonable prospect of allaying it. But can such a desirable result be accomplished by surrendering the charters of masonic lodges? We honestly believe it can not. How has the experiment been received? Instead of satisfying the leaders of the anti-masonic party, instead of being met by them in a spirit of amity and conciliation, it has been seized on as an occasion to exhibit increased malignity and abuse: the vials of wrath have been opened anew, and anti-masonic vituperation has astounded our ears with its violence. The motives of those who had made the "peace offering," have been misrepresented and their conduct vilified, rendering it perfectly evident that the persecutors of masons, will not be satisfied with any measure that, in spirit of regard for the public peace, they may think it expedient to adopt. To the great body of the people engaged in the excitement, we do not ascribe any selfish or improper motive; but it is evident that they are misdirected by more cunning and unprincipled men, who feeling indifferent to the destruction or continuance of masonry, are striving to gain political power, by exciting the prejudices of the public against an institution, whose principles are worthy to be engraven on the hearts of all mankind, and which the virtuous and the good of every age have avowed and cherished. The clamorous leaders of anti-masonry care not whether we meet in lodges or chapters. It is not the institution of masonry that they are contending against. That is merely the pretence—political power the object. The abominable scenes exhibited in France during the revolution were acted in the sacred name of liberty. There too concessions were demanded of christians; and when the clergy, oppressed by intolerance, were willing to shut up their churches and abstain from performing the sacred ceremonies of religion, it did not appease the vengeance of their persecutors. Nothing would satisfy, but their renouncing the principles of their religion and becoming thorough going Jacobites. It is just so with the leaders of anti-masonry; giving up of charters and abstaining from attending lodges, will not satisfy them; they require masons to renounce their principles, and to become thorough-going political anti-masons. When members of the fraternity can consent to such a course then indeed will they deserve the opprobrium that is now cast upon them; then will corruption stalk abroad in our land, and the temple of our liberty rock to its foundation.

The opponents of our institution constitute a discordant and heterogeneous association—there, among the most active may be seen an individual scoffing at all religion, and openly avowing his disbelief in the existence of a Supreme Being—here, another, whose profligate life has made him the object of public notoriety and condemnation—and then again, in close communion with these, another appears, who, with frontless and blasphemous impudence, declares that "anti-masonry emanated from the throne of God." From such a combination the publick must turn with aversion. Submission to its requirements can never meet the sanction of publick approbation.

It is not the voice of the people, but the voice of a faction that asks the destruction of masonry. The people seek only the punishment of the guilty, they do not require us to abandon what we honestly believe to be right, and embrace what we know to be wrong. It is a political faction that seeks to confound the innocent with the guilty, and would keep alive a war of indiscriminate proscription. Let offended justice call over the catalogue of human institutions, religious as well as moral, and should any be found whose members have not offended against the majesty of the laws, then will the officers and members of this lodge most cordially join in the opinion that the publick voice does most emphatically call upon us for the surrender of our charter and our funds.

But it is against the principles of the institution that anti-masons profess to be contending. Is there a mason who can honestly say he believes them dangerous or corrupt? We fearlessly answer No. Masonry inculcates only "peace on earth and good will towards men." She knows nothing of the immoral principles which anti-masonry has charged upon her; and we solemnly declare that its principles and precepts are all strictly in accordance with that unerring word, which we all profess to believe should be the standard of human actions. The most eminent christians, the most distinguished philanthropists, and the most enlightened statesmen have been members of the masonic fraternity. They have borne their testimony to the purity of its principles; and we appeal to the sober judgment of the people to say whether their evidence and their examples ought to be disregarded. That members of the masonic fraternity should violate the principles of the order and commit crime is deeply to be regretted, but it cannot excite the surprise of any one who understands the discrepancy that frequently is exhibited between the professed principles and practice of members of all other societies. While therefore, your committee do not hesitate to express a just abhorrence for the crimes committed by members of the fraternity, they feel bound by their love of truth to declare that they are no more chargeable upon the principles of the institution, than are those which have been committed by christians, upon the principles of their sacred religion. Masonry inculcates love to God, and justice to all mankind; and believing as your committee do, that its support is calculated to promote the best interests of society, they cannot refrain from expressing their regret, that any portion of their brethren should have deemed it expedient to withdraw their connexion from the institution, and from manifesting their determination peacefully to adhere to it through good and through evil report.

Therefore, Resolved, that we deem it inexpedient for masonic lodges to return their charters.

E. S. COZIER,
WILLIAM B. GRAY,
JOHN BAXTER,
IRA CHASE, } Committee.

Utica, May, 1829.

DANGER OF POPULAR EXCITEMENTS.

From the (Middlebury, Vt.) National Standard

Anti-masons affect so firmly to believe that Morgan was murdered, that the man who dares to express any doubt on the subject, is at once looked upon by them as dishonest. His integrity, how well soever it may have been established, is now questioned. This, however is not strange. It is always so with fanatics; they never wait for proof of what they are predisposed to believe. It is enough, if some of their leaders will merely assert, that they have no doubt of the fact, and when they go so far as to produce the affidavit of some nameless person—a mere blank deposition, stating that some renegade said so, the question is, in their view settled, although the man who is pretended to have said so, is admitted to be an infamous scoundrel, who would not be credited in any court of justice.

We recollect at the time Stephen and Jesse Boorn were charged with the murder of Russel Colvin, in Manchester, in this state, some years ago, the feelings of the people in that section were so excited against the Boorns, that a man who expressed a belief in their innocence of the crime charged upon them, or a desire for their acquittal, was considered unworthy of confidence or respect and was even threatened with violence. The development of some particular circumstances went so far to justify the previous suspicions of their guilt, and raised such an excitement against them, that they were convicted in the minds of their neighbours even before a trial could be had. The people in that vicinity were so well convinced that Colvin had been murdered and that the Boorns were the perpetrators of the crime, their only anxiety seemed to be, to bring upon them the sentence of the law by the decision of a judicial tribunal. To effect this, and to secure the testimony of one Merrill, a notorious scoundrel, who was at the time confined in jail with the Boorns, under bonds to await his trial on a charge of crime, and who pretended that the Boorns had confessed to him their guilt, a number of that place had become so excited as voluntarily to become his bail, for that purpose. He did testify against them and then fled into the state of New-York, where he was shortly after convicted of other crimes and was sentenced to the states prison for life, six months of which, to be in solitary confinement. And yet upon the testimony of this wretch, the conviction of the Boorns no doubt depended, more than upon any other. We mention this fact merely to show what effect an excitement in the publick mind can produce, and how far people may be led astray under the influence of a heated imagination. The Boorns, it will be recollected, were both sentenced to be hung. The punishment of death, as to one of them, was however subsequently commuted by the Legislature of this State, for that of states prison for life, and he was actually put into the prison at Windsor and remained there nearly a year. But before the day appointed for the execution of the other, Colvin was found alive, and by the vigilance and humanity of the city council of New-York, was brought to Manchester, having been absent and supposed by his neighbours to have been dead, about seven years. These are facts which ought to teach men to be cautious how they act in times in popular excitement. The circumstances which gave rise to and supported the suspicions that the Boorns had killed Colvin, were much stronger than any that have appeared to show that Morgan has been murdered. And should he yet be found alive, (and we are not without our belief that he may) it would be far less wonderful than the finding of Colvin. For Colvin could have had no possible motive of self-interest in absconding himself; whereas it is evident, that Morgan could have devised no way by which to effect the sale of his book, so well as by his absence under such circumstances as to render it probable that he had fallen a sacrifice to the publication he had made. Again we say his murder is not so probable as was that of Colvin, because, even under all the excitement which has prevailed in New-York, and with the most vigilance exertions of the officers of the government aided by one who has been appointed for that special purpose, no circumstances have been yet found sufficient to induce even an anti-masonic jury to convict any person of the crime; whereas the circumstances relating to the disappearance of Russel Colvin, were such as to induce a jury of twelve men on oath, and honestly no doubt, to pronounce two of their fellow citizens guilty of murdering him, and yet he was afterwards found alive.

Let anti-masons who are disposed to charge those with incredulity and dishonesty, who refuse to admit or believe that Morgan has been murdered by masons, until evidence of the fact is produced, pause a little and reflect on these things. That an outrage was committed upon his person in his abduction, an outrage no less against the principles of masonry than against the laws of the land, we are free to admit, as well as to censure, and hope and trust those who were engaged in it, will be made to suffer the punishment due to their crimes. But we have no wish to see the innocent suffer for the misdeeds of the guilty.

CELEBRATIONS.

The anniversary of St John the Baptist will be celebrated on the 24th of June next, at the Masonick Hall in the village of Greenville, Greene county. Neighbouring lodges, and brethren generally, are invited to attend.

AARON BUTLER,	} Committee of Arrangements.
SYLVESTER GUILD,
ANDREW LAKE,
EZRA HEALY,
JOHN FOOT,
JOHN SMITH.

Greenville, April 14, 1829.

The Festival of St John the Baptist will be celebrated in Dayton, Ohio, on the 24th June next. At the same time Unity Chapter will be installed. Members of the masonic fraternity are respectfully invited to attend.

INSTALLATION.

The consecration of Minerva Lodge, No. 96, and the installation of its officers took place in Miamiesburgh, Ohio, on Saturday the 9th of May.

ELECTION OF OFFICERS.

NEW-YORK.

Officers of Plattsburgh Encampment of Knights Templars, in Plattsburgh, Clinton county, elected April 17, 1829:—

William F. Haile, Grand Commander; John Bleecker, Generalissimo; Samuel Emery, Captain General; St. J. B. L. Skinner, Prelate; Winslow C. Watson, Senior Warden; R. Fitzgerald, Junior Warden; Roswell Wait, Treasurer; George W. Hicks, Recorder; Hiram Wood, Standard Bearer; William H. Morgan, Sword Bearer; Chester Bliss, Warder; H. Carter, A. Wooster, and E. B. Jones, Captains of Guards; M. M'Dermott, Sentinel.

Officers of Kingston Lodge, No. 20, in Kingston, Ulster county, for 1829:—

John Van Buren, Master; Hiram Green, Senior Warden, Lewis Mason, Junior Warden; Pierce Catlin, Treasure; Martin Miner, Secretary; Hiram Dubois, Senior Deacon; Joseph Cassel, Junior Deacon.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

The following brethren are the installed officers of the Grand Lodge of South Carolina, for the present year:—

Benjamin F. Hunt, Grand Master; Richard W. Cogdell, Deputy Grand Master; James Eyland, Senior Grand Warden; Henry A. Desaussure, Junior Grand Warden, Moses Holbrook, Grand Treasurer; Alexander M'Donald, Corresponding Grand Secretary; Edward Hughes, Recording Grand Secretary; Horatio G. Street, and John R. Rodgers, Senior Grand Deacons; Thomas E. Casey and James S. Burges, Junior Grand Deacons; Amity Bailly, J. C. Buxbaum, J. C. Pillars, and Joseph Moss, Grand Stewards; Samuel Rowan, Grand Marshal; A. M'Feeters, Grand Pursuivant; John Roche, Grand Tyler.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Officers of the Grand Lodge of the State of North Carolina, for the present year:—

Louis D. Wilson Grand Master; John Owen, Deputy Grand Master; James Grant, Senior Grand Warden; Samuel F. Patterson, Junior Grand Warden; Benjamin A. Barham, Grand Treasurer; John C. Stedman, Grand Secretary; Revs. Joseph Caldwell, Patrick W. Dowd, John Armstrong, Josiah R. Horn and Thomas P. Hunt, Grand Chaplains; Richard D. Spaight, Esak Arnold, Joseph R. Lloyd, David W. Stone, Francis Ward, John Mushat, William Davidson, Nathaniel W. Alexander, James Bozman, Edmund B. Freeman, Marshal Dickinson, Jesse H. Drake, Isaac N. Lamb, John A. Shaw, Mason L. Wiggins, George Sheldon and Edmund Jones, Grand Lecturers; William H. Hunter, Grand Senior Deacon; John G. Marshal, Grand Junior Deacon; Henry Bryan, Grand Marshal; Lawson H. Alexander, Grand Sword Bearer; John Walker, Grand Pursuivant; John T. C. Wiatt and Dirk Lindeman, Grand Stewards; Richard W. Ashton, Grand Tyler.

POPULAR SCIENCE.

"How charming is divine philosophy!
Not harsh and crabbed as dull fools suppose,
But musical as is Apollo's lute" Comus.

I.—ANIMATED NATURE.

"And God said, let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing."—Genesis.

7.—SAURIOLOGY.

The Water Newt. Water, in a state of rest, over decayed and putrescent vegetable matter, is peculiarly favourable for the residence of many of the insect world. The eggs that are lodged there remain undisturbed by the agitation of the element, and the young produced from them, or deposited there by viviparous creatures, remain in quiet, tolerably secure from accidental injuries; but there are natural causes which render these apparent asylums the field of reversionousness and of death. To these places resort many of those voracious insects, and other creatures which prey upon the smaller and helpless; for all created things seem subordinate to some more powerful or irresistible agents, from the hardly visible atom that floats in the pool, to man, who claims and commands the earth as his own. But we have no animal that seems to commit greater destruction in these places than the common newt (lacertus aquaticus). In some of these well-stored magazines, this reptile will grow to a large size, and become unusually warty, and bloated with repletion; feeding and fattening upon the unresisting beings that abound in those dark waters wherein it loves to reside. It will take a worm from the hook of those that angle in ponds; and in some places the boys in the spring of the year may be seen drawing them up by fishing lines, a very extraordinary figure, having a small shell-fish (tellina cornea) attached to one or all of its feet; the toes of the newt having been accidentally introduced into the gaping shell, in its progress on the mud at the bottom of the pool, or designedly put in for the purpose of seizure, when the animal inhabitant closed the valves and entrapped the toes. But, from whatever cause these shells became fixed, when the animal is drawn up hanging and wriggling with its toes fettered all round, it affords a very unusual and strange appearance.

8.—ICHTHYOLOGY.

Migrations of Salmon. The common salmon (salmo salar) leaves the sea, and ascends the river throughout the summer season. Having reached the suitable station, it pairs, and, in company, proceeds to excavate a furrow in a gravelly bed of the shallow or running water, at the top or bottom of the deeper pools. Into this furrow the milt and roe are simultaneously deposited and covered. This occupation occupies nearly a fortnight. The eggs sometimes amount to 20,000. When the fish have spawned, or become kelt, they betake themselves to the deep pools, and then proceed to the sea, the males commencing the journey earlier than the females. Their favourite food in the sea is the sand eel. The fry leave the spawning groove about March, retire to pools, and proceed, according to circumstances, in myriads along the easy water, at the margin of the river, with their heads against the stream, until they reach the tide in the estuary, where, like the kelt, which frequently go down at the same time, they retire to the deepest part of the channel, and disappear in the sea. These samlets, smolts, or smouts, are regarded by many as re-appearing in the estuaries a few months afterwards in the character of grises, or from three to nine pounds weight, according to the lateness of the season.

9.—MAZOLOGY.

The Hedge Hog. Notwithstanding all the persecutions from prejudice and wantonness to which the hedge hog (Erinaceus Europæus) is exposed, it is yet common with us; sleeping by day in a bed of leaves and moss, under the cover of a very thick bramble or furze bush, and at times in some hollow stump of a tree. It creeps out in the summer evenings; and, running about with more agility than its dull appearance promises, feeds on dew-worms and beetles, which it finds among the herbage, but retires with trepidation at the approach of man. In the autumn, crabs, haws, and the common fruits of the hedge constitute its diet. In the winter, covering itself deeply in moss and leaves, it sleeps during the severe weather; and, when drawn out of its bed, scarcely any thing of the creature is to be observed, it exhibiting only a ball of leaves, which it seems to attach to its spines by repeatedly rolling itself round its nest. Thus comfortably invested, it suffers little from the season. Some strong smell must proceed from this animal, as we find it frequently with our sporting dogs, even in this state; and every village boy with his cur detects the haunt of the poor hedge-hog, and as assuredly worries and kills him. Killing every thing, and cruelty, are the common vices of the ignorant, and unresisting innocence becomes the ready victim to prejudice or power. The snake, the blind-worm, and the toad, are all indiscriminately destroyed as venomous animals whenever found; and it is well for the last mentioned poor animal, which Boyle says "lives on poison, and is all venom," if prolonged sufferings do not finish its being; but even we, who should know better, yet give rewards for the wretched urchin's head! that very ancient prejudice of its drawing milk from the udders of resting cows being still entertained, without any consideration of its impracticability from the smallness of the hedge hog's mouth; and so deeply is this character associated with the name, that we believe no argument would persuade to the contrary, or remonstrance avail with our idle boys, to spare the life of this most harmless and least obtrusive creature in existence. Hedge hogs were formerly an article of food; but this diet was pronounced to be dry, and not nutritive, "because he putteth forth so many prickles." All plants producing thorns, or tending to any roughness, were considered to be of a drying nature; and upon this foundation, the ashes of the hedge hog were administered as a "great desiccative of fistulas."

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

ANCIENT INK.

Lamp-black, or the black taken from burnt ivory, and soot from the furnaces and baths, according to Pliny and others, formed the basis of the ink used by old writers. It has also been conjectured, that the black liquor of the cuttle-fish was frequently employed. Of whatever ingredients made, it is certain from chemical analysis, from the blackness and solidity in the most ancient manuscripts, and from an inkstand found at Herculaneum, in which the ink appears like a thick oil, that the ink then was made much more opaque, as well as encaustick, than what is used at present. Inks, red, purple, and blue, and also gold and silver inks, were much used—the red was made from vermilion, cinnabar, and carmine; the purple from the murex; one sort of which, named the purple encaustick, was set apart for the emperours. Golden ink was used by the Greeks much more than by the Romans. The manufacture, both of it and of silver ink, was a distinct and extensive, as well as lucrative business in the middle ages; and another distinct business was that of inscribing the titles, capitals, as well as emphatick words, in coloured and gold or silver inks.

A NEW POISON.

A combination of the basis of Prussick acid (Cyanogene) with Chlorine, has lately been discovered by Mons. Serullas, who has given it the name of Perchloride of Cyanogene. It is a white crystallized salt, the solubility of which is greater in warm than in cold water; when thus dissolved there is a mutual decomposition of the salt and the water. Its solubility in alcohol and ether is considerable. It evaporates at a temperature greater than that of boiling water—its vapours irritate the fauces and the eyes, and its odour is perfectly similar to that of mice. One grain dissolved in alcohol put down the throat of a rabbit killed the animal instantaneously.

BIOGRAPHY.

LA TOUR D'AUVERGNE.

THE FIRST GRENADIER OF FRANCE.

From Biographie Nouvelle des Contemporains.

Theophile-Malo-Corret de la Tour d'Auvergne was a hero of a peculiar order: perhaps the annals of war in all times and in all countries do not afford another example of the kind. He was simple, generous, and disinterested; the sensibility of his feelings was equal to the daringness of his courage; his temperament was as proud as it was gentle; in short his noble character was full of sterling greatness. Descended from a bastard branch of the house of Bouillon, he bore the same name as Turenne, and in many points resembled him. The same countenance, the same prudence, the same bravery: But Turenne was beaten, changed sides, and served Spain. La Tour d'Auvergne was always considered a conqueror, faithful to his country, lived and died under the national banners. Born at Cashiax, in the department of the Finisterre, the 23d of November 1743, he entered the service in 1767; was made captain in 1779, in the regiment of Angoumois; and served, in 1782, as a volunteer in the war of America. He was, at the siege of Mahon, aide-de-camp to the Duke of Crillon, who commanded the Spanish army. He was offered the command of corps: but he refused it. Always the first in the onset, the last in retreat, he was seen one day to take up a wounded soldier on his shoulders and carry him into the rear, and return and take his place in the broken ranks, where he fought till the affair in which he was engaged was successfully carried. The King of Spain offered him a sum of money by way of recompense for this action. A crown or a statue, the sole reward of deeds of this kind, would have been decreed to him by the republics of antiquity. When the French Revolution broke out, La Tour d'Auvergne was 50 years of age, and lived retired on a moderate pension. The ardent generosity of his character led him to hail with rapture the promises of liberty which it held out, and he was one of the first to range himself under the tri-coloured flag. He served as captain of Grenadiers; and in 1792 commanded eight thousand grenadiers of the army of Spain, though he would not accept of the title of General. La Tour taught the infantry to avail themselves of the bayonet, at that time neglected, but which since has decided many battles in favour of the French. He exposed his life every day: the cannon respected it—his hat and clothes were riddled with balls, and yet he received no wound. He distinguished himself especially in the retreat of Ustaritz, at the taking of St. Sebastian, and of a battery, on the opposite bank of Bidassoa. He led the advance-guard, and always filled the troops he led on with such enthusiasm, that this column, called the Inferral, frequently decided the fortune of the day before the main body of the army was set in motion. It is impossible to record here all the traits of bravery which are told of him. In the affair of Andaye, he was seen to go up, singlehanded, to a church, standing alone in the country, where the enemy had taken refuge, and break open the door with an axe. After the peace of Bale, he was going by sea to Brittany, where he was taken by the English, fighting with the national cockade tied on the hilt of his sword. He remained a year in prison; after which he returned to France to reside at Passy, near Paris; where he employed his leisure in antiquarian studies until the time when the war was rekindled.

He then set out for the army of Helvetia, commanded by Massena, as a substitute for the son of his friend Lebrillant, who had been drawn a conscript, and displayed his usual valour. It was at this time that he received the honourable title of "First Grenadier of France," and the solemn present of a sabre; he still, however, refused the pension attached to this military distinction. This noble and persevering disinterestedness had something of the antique about it, which raised him in his own estimation. He refused to wear his sabre of honour, until he had, as he said to some of his comrades, "given the enemy a near view of it."

La Tour d'Auvergne took service again in the 46th demi-brigade, in the army of the Rhine; and was slain 27th June 1800, at the battle of Neubourg. He was advancing in the front rank, sword in hand, when a hulan ran a lance right through his heart. His funeral and his tomb were worthy of him; his body was buried on the field of honour, and branches of oak and laurel marked the place. As they were committing him to the grave, a grenadier turned his body over and said—"he never turned his back in his life, and he shall not do it in his grave." The orator and the oration were worthy of the occasion. On the spot where he fell, a cenotaph was erected with this inscription—"To the memory of Latour d'Auvergne, First Grenadier of France, slain on the 27th June, 1800." General Dessoles rendered a still more glorious homage to his memory; he ordered that his place in the regiment should remain vacant, and that his name should always remain on the muster-roll of his company; and that when it was called some one should answer, "Dead on the field of battle." His heart was embalmed, and carried at the head of the regiment by the first sergeant; a new kind of honour, of which even antiquity affords no example. Lebrillant, the friend of Latour d'Auvergne, had inspired him with a taste for Celtic antiquities. During his abode at Passy, the First Grenadier of the Republic composed a Glossary of forty-five languages, a "French and Celtic Dictionary," and a treatise on the Origin of the Gauls. This last work, the only one he published, is distinguished by a profound erudition, an indefatigable perseverance, but perhaps a too great boldness of hypothesis. Traits of courage and noble actions abound in the life of this extraordinary man. Disinterested and modest, like one of his celebrated contemporaries, the learned Anquetil du Perron, he supported poverty with rare courage, and preferred it to an opulence which might have corrupted the simplicity of his life. The Minister of War offered him four hundred crowns on his return from England. he took one hundred and twenty francs, and said, "If I have further occasion I will come again." He carried into a camp Spartan sobriety. He refused the presents of the Prince du Bouillon, as he refused those of the King of Spain and the first Consul Napoleon. He always preserved his republican frankness and dignity. "I offer you my credit," said one of the representatives of the people. "I accept it." "Well then, do you want a regiment?" "No, I want a pair of shoes."

THE GATHERER.

ANCIENT MANNERS,

REGAL AND COURTLY.

Henry the Second, King of England, and his Chancellor, Thomas a Becket, riding together through the streets of London, observed a beggar shivering with cold. The King said to Becket, "Would it not be good to give that poor creature a warm garment?" "Assuredly," replied Becket; "and your benevolence in proposing to clothe him more comfortably is most laudable." "Then he shall have one," said Henry, seizing the skirts of the Chancellor's coat, which was of fine scarlet cloth, lined with ermine. The royal hand pulled violently—the Chancellor held fast his garment with equal vigour, till both had almost tumbled from their steeds. The Chancellor at length yielded, and the beggar, ignorant of the quality of the donor, received the fine coat in astonishment at the gift.

MINISTERIAL INGENUITY.

When the important fortress of Oczakow was taken by storm, by the Russians, under Suwaroff, in 1788, the Turkish ministers, whose intrigues had two years before occasioned the declaration of war against Russia, and who therefore sought in their reports to extenuate the losses of the Turkish armies, assured Abdul Hamid, that it was not Great, but merely Little Oczakow, of which the enemy had made themselves masters. Abdul Hamid gave implicit credit to the egregious falsehood. One day, riding incognito through the streets of Constantinople, he met with a mutilated soldier who had belonged to the garrison of Oczakow, crawling along the streets, and begging from house to house. The soldier recognized the Sultan. "Most magnanimous Sultan!" cried he, "I was wounded at the taking of Oczakow, while fighting for religion and for thee; and now no one cares about me, so that I am almost perishing with hunger." "It was at Little Oczakow, I suppose, that thou wast wounded?" "What sayest thou, Commander of the Faithful? there is neither a Little nor a Great Oczakow—there is but one—and that one is in the hands of the infidel Moscovites." The Sultan, enraged at having been thus duped by his ministers, sent some of them into exile, and ordered others to be beheaded.

THE LINES OF A GOOD JUDGE.

Extract from lord Bacon's speech in the common pleas, to Sir Richard Hutton, when he was called to be one of the judges of that court, March 3, 1617—14 Jac. I.

1. A judge, in maintaining the laws of the realm, should be rather heart strong than head strong.
2. He should draw his learning out of his books and not out of his brains.
3. He should mix well the freedom of his own opinion, with the reverence of opinions of his fellows.
4. He should continue the studying of his books, and not spend upon the old stock.
5. He should fear no man's face, and yet not turn stoutness into bravery.
6. He should be truly impartial, and not so, as men may see affection through fine carriage.
7. He should be a light to jurors, to open their eyes, but not a guide to lead them by the nose.
8. He should not affect the opinion of pregnancy and expedition, by an impatient and catching hearing of counsellors at the bar.
9. He should speak with gravity, as one of the sages of the law, and not be talkative, nor with impertinent flying out to show learning.
10. He should contain the jurisdiction of the court within the ancient meet-stones, without removing the mark.
11. Lastly, He should carry such an hand over his ministers and clerks, as that they may rather be in awe of him, than presume upon him.

COTTON.

The following extract from "A Collection for the Improvement of Husbandry and Trade," by John Houghton, F.R.S.—A. D. 1701, London, shows the small beginning from which one of the most extensive, lucrative, and still increasing manufactures, that of Cotton, took its rise:

The chief use of raw-cotton in those kingdoms is to put into inkhorns to imbibe the ink, and there keep it from spilling. This being universal, I presume spends a great deal, although at first sight one would no more think it, than they would that pins should be the chief consumption of copper, which is affirmed.

Another use is quilting of clothes, this lying between the outside and lining.

Another use is to put into rectified spirits, to try if they be proof; for if they burn till the cotton takes fire, it is approved on, as well as if it had been gunpowder.

But of late, since we put over wine in flasks with oil on them, there is a great consumption of cotton to take the oil off.

Cotton is spun into yarn of all sizes—and there are also made from it all sorts of calicoes, with muslins, and sail-cloth, and bale-cloth, with threads, tapes, cords and ropes of all sizes; as to which manufactures, most of them come from abroad; but we manufacture a great deal here, particularly we spin wick for candles and lamps, that burn with oil or spirits; and this I presume consumes a great deal of cotton, for 'tis almost universal, although some few make wicks with coarse hemp, and some use silver wire.

GIVING THE LIE.

The great affront of giving the lie arose from the phrase 'thou liest,' in the oath taken by the defendant in judicial combats, before engaging, when charged with any crime by the plaintiff; and Francis the First of France, to make current his giving the lie to the emperor, Charles the Fifth, first stamped it with infamy, by saying, in a solemn assembly, that he was no honest man that would bear the lie.

THE SKETCH-BOOK.

From Literary Remains of Henry Neale.

A YOUNG FAMILY.

You must know, most dear and courteous reader, that I am a bachelor; not an old one, Heaven forbid! but one of whom the ladies say. "What a pity it is that Mr. Wiggins does not marry!" The fact is, I am sole lord of my hours, and of my limbs. If I stay out late, I need neither lie nor look sulky when I get home. I need not say, "My dear Peggy, I really was the first to come away;" nor run the fearful alternative of either losing good company, or enduring a curtain lecture. Besides all this, I am not surrounded by a sweet young family; but of that "anon, anon, Sir."

Having thus introduced myself to your notice, allow me to perform the same kind office for one of my friends. George Cheviot and I were school-fellows. He was neither very wise nor very rich; but he was merry, and good tempered; qualities which I could then better appreciate than the others, and which I am still heretical enough to think the most valuable of the quartette. He was moreover, "a tall fellow of his hands," and as brave as a lion; and I, I don't blush to own it, was a weak, puny chitling, and as it is called in school phraseology, wanted somebody to take my part. George, accordingly, fought my battles, while I wrote his exercises; and thus we became sworn associates. We played, and romped, and rioted together; and, like the Vicar of Wakefield's parties, what we wanted in wit we made up in laughter; which, after all, I still consider the better thing of the two.

After leaving school, we both settled in the great city, until George, who had a touch of the sentimental in his character, fell in love with, and married, a journey-woman milliner; the consequence of which was that all his friends cut him, and none of his family would go within a mile of his residence. For my own part I make it a rule to cut all my friends as soon as they get married: I do not like the transformation of a merry, frank, sociable companion, into an important family man. Neither do I like their invariable practice of laying every fault upon the shoulders of their bachelor acquaintances; for I have known more than one man, who, when rated by his amiable help-mate for his late hours, has excused himself by saying, "My dear, Mr. Wiggins would not let me come away." Notwithstanding the tenacity with which I usually adhere to this rule, I determined to make an exception in favour of poor George. His grandfather had been a butcher, and his father a master-carpenter, and it is therefore not surprising that his mother should be shocked at his demeaning himself so vastly. I, however, who have always been of opinion that, in a free country like ours, a man has a right to make a fool of himself, if he chooses, looked at the affair with different eyes, and we continued as warm and friendly as ever. Although I did not call at his house, we met at our usual place of resort; and I found less difference in George than in most of my married acquaintances. He was, nevertheless, constantly expatiating on the joys of a married life, and especially of seeing a young family growing up about you; of "teaching the young idea how to shoot;" and of watching the archness, the vivacity, and the simplicity of the pretty, prattlers. One day when he was particularly eloquent on these topics, and I was as acquiescent and insincere as a man ought to be on such occasions, he extorted from me a promise to dine with him, that I might have the satisfaction of seeing him surrounded with his young family.

The appointed day arrived, and I was ushered into the presence of my friend, and his lady. She was dressed very finely, had a mincing air of gentility, and I should have thought her rather pretty, if no one had said any thing about her. In one corner of the room stood a cradle, and close by it—no matter what; socks, and caps, and ribands, were thrown about the room in "most admired disorder!" the chimney smoked; several panes of the window were broken; and three or four squalid, dirty-faced children were sprawling on the ground, and roaring very lustily. "That is a sweet little fellow, Madame," said I;—Heaven forgive me for the lie!—pointing to a blear-eyed bloated-cheeked cupid in her arms.

It's a girl, Sir," said she, bursting into a horse laugh; "yes!" she added, patting the bloated cheek aforesaid, "and it is a girl, though he thought it was a boy, my pretty!"

"This was the commencement of my baccalaurean blunders, and the lady for some time regarded me with a contempt, which, had I mistaken her own sex could hardly have been surpassed.

To recover myself from my confusion I took a pinch of snuff; my friend and his wife begged to participate in the contents of my box, which they had no sooner done, than every obstreperous urchin in the room roared out to be allowed to do the same. This petition was followed by a half angry altercation between husband and wife, the former saying, "Oh let them, pretty dears!" and the latter, "Indeed they shall not." The cause of indulgence, however, triumphed; and every dirty pig-nose in the room, was speedily made dirtier at the expense of my black rappee. The consequences may easily be guessed; a round of sneezing, snivelling, coughing, crying, and scolding, commenced until the adventure was closed by a general wiping of eyes, and blowing of noses, throughout the apartment. For myself I did nothing but commit blunders all the while I was in the house. Now my foot was on the nose of one, and now my elbow was in the eye of another; and I could not stir an inch without being in danger of dislocating a boy's neck, or fracturing a girl's cranium. I am afraid that I shall be thought a sad barbarian, for not being rapturously fond of children; but give me a cat, say I; I can play with that as long as I please, and kick it out of the room when I am tired of it.

The announcement that dinner was ready relieved me, at least for a time, from my many miseries. While descending the stairs, George whispered in my ear, asking me if I did not think him the happiest fellow in the world, to which I replied, "My dear boy, I quite envy you." We sat down to table, and after many apologies from the lady, who hoped that I should find something to my liking, but who feared that her fare would be found but homely, as her time was so much occupied by her young family, the dishes were uncovered. Whatever the dinner might be in fact, I found that it was intended to be considered a very good, and even a handsome one. The lady, who before her marriage had lived at the west end of the town, where she made shifts,—in more senses than one,—petticoats, and mantuas, in a garret, wished to pass for a person of some taste and fashion. Accordingly, the table, instead of the ordinary viands which the Englishman delighteth to masticate, exhibited a profusion of would-be French and Italian dishes. Of these I merely counterfeited to eat, excepting one or two; among which was a fricassee, for so my hostess styled a blue looking leg of a fowl, floating in a sea of dirty lard and salt butter, and a plate of macaroni, so called, which tasted exceedingly like melted tallow. The best thing which I could get hold of, was a bottle of their Champagne, which was really very tolerable Perry. Our dinner, however, did not pass over without the usual accompaniment of much uproariousness from the room above, which the sweet young family continued to occupy, and Betty was every five minutes despatched from the dining-room to still 'the dreadful pother o'er our heads.'

Lord Byron says,—

"—a fine family's a fine thing, Provided they don't come in after dinner."

and I agree with him; especially in the proviso. At my friend George's however, the young family was introduced with the dessert. The eldest, a wide mouthed round shouldered girl, took possession of the better half of my chair; where she amused herself the greater part of the evening by picking cherries out of my plate, and spitting the stone into it. The sweet innocent whose sex I had aspersed, filled, and well filled, the arms of mamma; and two greedy greasy boys stood one on each side of my worthy host. These contrived to entertain themselves in a variety of ways; putting their fingers into the preserves, drinking out of their father's wine-glass; eating till their stomachs were crammed to satiety, and bellowing out bravely for more. As a variety we were occasionally treated with crying, scolding, and threats of a whipping, which operation I at one time positively expected to see performed in my presence. At length the lady and the "family" retired, and amidst boasting of his happiness on George's part, and felicitations on mine, we continued to ply the bottle. Rather to my surprise, I found that the port wine was admirable, but poor George, as I afterwards learned, had sent for two or three bottles from a neighbouring tavern for which he had paid an admirable price. After emptying the decanters on the table, I found that I had had enough, and proposed joining the interesting group up stairs. In consequence, however, of my friend being very pressing, and of my being "nothing loath," I consented that another bottle should be broached. The order to that effect being speedily communicated to Betty, she met it with the astounding reply, "There is no more, Sir." Although I told my friend that I was glad of it, and that I had drank quite sufficient, his chagrin was manifest. He assured me that although his wine cellar was exhausted, he had plenty of spirits and cigars, of which he proposed that we should immediately avail ourselves. To this, however, I positively objected, especially as I knew that the ci-devant journey-woman milliner, considered smoking ungenteel.

I have but little more to tell you; we adjourned to the tea-table, where nothing passed worthy recording. The family was again introduced, for the purpose of kissing all round, previous to their retirement to bed. "Kiss the gentleman, Amy," said the lady; "and Betty, wipe her face first; how can you take her to the gentleman in such a state!" Betty having performed this very requisite operation, I underwent the required penance from one and all, with the heroism of a martyr. Shortly afterwards I took leave of my worthy host and hostess, and experienced a heart-felt delight when I heard the door close behind me. I am not in the habit, like Sterne, of falling down on my knees in the streets, or clapping my hands with delight in a crowded highway. Still I could not help feeling, that few as were my positive causes of rejoicing, I was not devoid of some negative ones; and above all, I felicitated myself, that I was not the happiest fellow in the world; and that I had not married a journey-woman milliner; and that I was not blessed with a sweet young family; as my recent experience of the latter comfort had induced me to think that king Herod was really not quite so cruel as I had hitherto considered him."

From the Baltimore American Farmer.

THE WEDDING.

It was a fresh and balmy morning in the delightful month of May, and nature seemed to have forgotten the ravages of winter, and smiled like a young bride, decorated in the blooms of youth and beauty, and waiting to welcome the embrace of summer. The meadows were gay with luxuriant verdure; the flowers hailed the genial influence of the reviving season, and loaded the air with sweets; and the young birds, participating in the general joy, mingled their songs with the voice of the gentle zephyrs. But the beauty of nature was forgotten, the songs of the birds unheard, for Lucy Brooks was to be married that day, and every head in Alesbury was full of the important subject. The girls, in merry groupes, might be seen at every porch; discussing the various items of arrangement and making their combined preparations for the scene, forgetful of the hour of dinner; and here and there a straggling gallant reconnoitred, to see how things were going forward, or culled for a favourite fair one, a bunch of pretty flowers to decorate her hair. It seemed as though all the world fancies of happiness were that morning summed up in the glorious thought of outrivalling in gayety the gayest.

The bride, a pretty girl of seventeen, proud of the noise and bustle she was making in the village, her fine wedding dress all ready, and a bride's maid at her nod, perfectly satisfied with herself and every body else, waited with little apparent anxiety for time to bring the appointed hour. The bright dreams of a holiday life were all before her.

Lucy had always been, on more than one account, the admiration of the gay ones of the village. She was of a light, airy form, and the fine proportions of her person, and the attractive beauty of her face were always displayed to the best possible advantage. There was a peculiar neatness ever remarked in her dress; every thing about her was becoming, (a word which signifies much,) and it was often said that Lucy would make a delightful wife; she was so smart, so genteel, and withal so perfectly economical—a consideration of vast weight among the old-fashioned people particularly, though the young, even in those days, seemed disposed to attach rather less consequence to it.

The morning preparations were succeeded by the evening's gathering; and before the sun had gone behind the high mountains that girdled the western horizon, the rural home of Farmer Brooks presented a spectacle that would have made a cold heart warm, and even age feel young again. The formal ceremonies of fashionable cities had not yet broken in upon the simplicity of early customs; and more than a score of pretty girls, in white, crowned with flowers and decorated with green, sported on the grass before the door. The bride, herself, was in the midst of them, and each with a gallant at her side. The more aged amused themselves by crowding the door and windows and looking on the sport: while all within was preparation for the wedding supper.

Many an eye then turned and turned again to the young couple, whose hearts and hands were now to be joined indissolubly. She was a beautiful bride, and her young intended husband viewed her with a look of triumph pride. He loved her because she was beautiful; because he thought her the prettiest in the village; because she was young and lively, and admired. And though still she made many an effort to be coy, and tried to put on a care-for-no-body kind of a look, a truant glance often strayed towards him, which plainly told that even if she did not admire especially his manly form, and frank and open manner, she at least loved him because he loved her.

When the all-important hour had at length arrived, the young people were called in, and the worthy squire, putting on his spectacles, performed the ceremony with all the gravity imaginable, and with a dexterity and promptness, withal, that was doubtless sharpened by the savoury smell of sundry roasted ducks and turkeys, which came cheerily from the adjoining apartment. The pretty bride and her chosen consort were pronounced man and wife; their hands were joined, and the mutual promises given without any unnecessary circumlocution. No fainting, no tears, no whimpering, a glorious kiss followed; and then, forthwith, the supper; as important a matter, in the estimation of the cool and calculating among the company, as any other.

I shall leave them there for the present, I never dare follow much further the course of things on such occasions; and at a single period pass to the counter part of the story.

I rode, a year afterwards, by a prettily situated farm-house, half secluded from view by a cluster of venerable oaks. It was the residence of Lucy and her husband; and the strong propensity I felt to see my old friend induced me to call a moment. I found her in the midst of business, though not busy. She was a wife now; and she had fallen into that most fatal error, carelessness of appearance. The floor was strewn with rubbish; every thing was out of place; she appeared perfectly slovenly in her person; and when I gazed on her, I could not but recal to mind the pretty, neat, sprightly girl that won Joe Miller's affections, and contrast her appearance with the same pretty girl, now Joe Miller's wife. She was but a year older; yet ten years less attractive. I would have given my eyes to have kissed her once, but the enchantment was gone, I wondered if her husband thought so.

I said Lucy had fallen into a sad error! and she is not the only one who has fallen into the same. Her days of courtship are over; the first young dream of love ended; unmarried and settled down in life, she had forgotten that the charms that attract love in the first instance are necessary to retain it; she thought as she had won a husband, it was not necessary to practice any of the means by which she won him, to secure his affections.

I had been sitting but a few minutes when Joe came in and welcomed me, in his frank and cordial manner; but I saw there was a cloud upon his brow; that he felt hurt. He looked round at the wild confusion that reigned in the room, and then at her. "Lucy," said he, mildly, "I wish you would put things in a little order; I do dislike such confusion." She coloured, and leaving her seat, flitted off in a pet: Joe looked after her as she slammed the door, and gave a deep sigh, that seemed to say, "Alas! poor Joe Miller!" and from my heart I could have responded it.

The young couple had set out in life with fine prospects. Joe was an industrious, sensible, good hearted fellow as one in a hundred; and Lucy was a sweet girl. She is still pretty; but that very habit of carelessness of dress, and mismanagement in her house, has lost her a world of pleasure and satisfaction.

MISCELLANY.

For the Masonick Record and Saturday Magazine.

WAITING FOR THE STAGE.

Is the stage coming? 'Tis already past the hour—what, in the name of patience, means such delay!—Here have I been waiting, and waiting, and waiting; out of business and out of amusement, when I ought to be pressing on at the rate of ten knots an hour. My enjoyment is about the same as that of a sheep-killing dog, that has been tied up to be kept from mischief, and, pinched with hunger, pulls at his chain, and leaps as far as its length admits, in the vain hope of escape and freedom. Nay, my case is even worse: with the dog, there is a possibility of breaking from his confinement, or at all events, he finds something to do, in striving to regain his liberty; while, here am I, in a predicament where no effort of mine will hasten my object or mend the matter in the least. Was ever mortal so afflicted! Men can bear delays and disappointment with some composure when the mind is busily employed. Set it, for instance, about some effort for removing a difficulty, and the difficulty itself will cease in a great measure to disturb. But put an obstacle in one's way, and at the same time bind him hand and foot, so as to render him incapable of stirring to get over it, and you might as well clap a red pepper in his mouth, for the matter of ease he will enjoy. That is just my case at present. I have nothing in the world to do, but wait the pleasure of that villainous stage-driver. Confound him! I'll warrant me, he is at this instant not more than a mile or two from this, loitering along with perfect sang froid, without even raising a whip to relieve a fellow creature from the fidgets. There he sits, I dare say, nodding over his lines, and suffering his horses to trudge on at a slow walk, while he considers his chance of being treated at the next stage-house. Horrors seize the dog—I would treat him in a manner he little dreams of, were I to catch him in such a predicament. Still I would not be irritable about the matter—I will keep cool—I am as patient as a toad—But hark! There it comes, rolling and rumbling merrily over the pavements. Crick, crack, smack. That driver, judging from the sound, uses his whip smartly, after all. Perhaps he is impatient for his dram—but let me see—Psha!—It's nothing but a wasp-waisted dandy, rattling by in his sulky. He ought to be apprehended for a nuisance, for driving so much like the stage.

So here am I yet, and here I am likely to remain, for aught I know, till doomsday—no remedy.—Well, what shall I do next? I might go perambulating about the streets, seeking objects of curiosity, but there is nothing in this dull place that will reward the exertion. I have already pushed myself out three times, propelling my corpus by the mere mechanical action of the muscles, without object, and without the impulse of the mind, like a very automaton; and after all, could see nothing but houses on either side, and people, walking and riding about the streets. Such tedious sights one can find any where.

I have lounged about this sitting room at least six hours—(to be sure, my watch tells me it is but two and a half—but it lies,) first taking one seat and then another, now springing to the window to look for that confounded coach, and now retiring from it, soured with disappointment, and ejaculating "fudge," in the low growling tones of an irritated man, who has nothing at which he can vent his spleen.

I have endeavoured to amuse myself by studying the characters of those who enter, and in applying those rules of the sage Lavater, by which you are enabled to determine a man's intellect and propensities by the arrangement of the bones and muscles of his face.

But all is common place, in this tedious town—not a single phiz has appeared, that has interested me.

There has one just entered with the dress of an exquisite. Let me study his features. Longitude about six inches, latitude eight—mouth, horizontal, three inches,—lips, one inch in thickness, forehead, the same in height—nose like a blue potatoe, and places seem to have been left by dame Nature, for eyes—but there she has been deficient—or at most has only clapped those of a mole in his head.—Fudge—who can make any thing from such data as these.

But here we have another entry, as merchants say. It wears — Upon my soul, its a beautiful girl!—That, now, is a countenance worth studying—what a noble expression it has—intelligence beams from it so plainly, that the veriest block-head would read, admire, and be awed by it—Her skin is fair as alabaster—cheeks round, and reddened with the rouge of health and exercise,—and then such an eye—I am confident it is self-luminous, and shines night and day—How pleasant 't would be to see it shedding light in darkness!

But ha! what's here! As sure as I am a patient man, the stage has arrived while I have been reading that beautiful countenance. This is quite a romantick place. These streets have a most spirit stirring appearance of animation and activity. I have forgotten to tell you the cause of my hurry—Hark! The driver is shouting "passengers aboard"—I must hasten—I will let you know some other time if I don't forget it. Q.

PORTUGUESE LITERATURE.

Of Portuguese politicks the publick, we should think, have, by this time, heard enough; and it is sometimes pleasant to turn from the violence of party animosities, which distract a country, to what many may consider more attractive—its literature and its literary men. Portuguese literature has not obtained, in this country, all the attention it would seem to merit: that it has produced no eminent prose writer is true; but it boasts a Camoens and Ferreira; men whose devotion to the muses did not detract from the love which they bore their country.

The history of Portuguese poetry is not less curious than instructive. That songs in the Portuguese language were sung on the banks of the Tagus, before any kingdom of Portugal existed, can not be doubted. Indeed, even Spanish writers, who have considered the question with impartiality, do not deny that Portuguese poetry flourished at an earlier period than the Castilian; and all accounts of the first dawns of modern civilization in Portugal denote an original poetick tendency in the national genius. That destiny, however, by which Portugal has been, from an early period, politically severed from the other parts of the Peninsula, could alone have prevented the Portuguese poetry from being like the Galician, completely absorbed and lost in the Castilian; for the Galician and Portuguese languages and poetry were originally, and even after the separation of Portugal from the Castiles, scarcely distinguishable from each other.

The foreigner, who is not repossessed by any national partiality, in favour of either the Castilian or the Portuguese modifications of the Hispanick romance, might, perhaps, be induced to conclude that poetry would, on the whole, have sustained no essential loss had the language of Portugal been rejected by literature, and reduced, like the Galician dialect, to the rank of a common popular idiom; for the Castilian poetry was, from its origin, so closely allied to the Portuguese, that it is certain the former might easily have incorporated into itself the latter, without producing the slightest inconsistency in any of its characteristic features. Still, however, to him who is capable of feeling the more delicate relations of the beautiful in nature and in art, it must be an increased pleasure to hear the same melody performed on two similar, yet differently constructed instruments. The historian of Portuguese literature ought, therefore, to direct his particular attention to those apparently unimportant, and yet in themselves very remarkable, properties, whereby Portuguese poetry has, in the varied progress of its cultivation, more or less deviated from the Castilian; or, as it is now usually styled, the Spanish; and also to the manner in which the differences not only of the two sister languages, but of the two nations, whose respective characters are impressed on those languages, have constantly preserved the boundary which divides the polite literature of Portugal and Spain, and which must otherwise have soon been obliterated.

The harmonious softness of the Portuguese language probably contributed no less to its early cultivation in general than its applicability to poetry in particular. Even the characteristic nasal sound, which the pronunciation of this language has in common with the French, is in no way detrimental to the rhythm, of the Portuguese syllables; for that rhythm, as in the Spanish and Italian languages, depends on a certain accentuation, which is a valuable remnant of the Latin syllabic forms, and which is not, as in the French, annihilated by a new rule of orthoepy. That this ancient accentuation, and with it the groundwork of metrical perfectibility, should be preserved in the Portuguese language, is a circumstance rendered the more remarkable by that of a French prince having been the founder of the first dynasty of the kings of Portugal; for, from this incidental occurrence, some critics and philologists have endeavoured to explain the similarity between the Portuguese and French pronunciation. The prince to whose influence this effect has been attributed is Henry of Burgundy, who was, in the year 1094, appointed by his father-in-law, Alphonso VI. of Castile, governor of the country situated at the mouth of the Tagus, and who afterwards held that territory in sovereignty with the title of count; but, however numerous might be the noble families, brought by this prince from France to Portugal, neither he nor they could be able to produce an essential change in the national language among all classes of the people. Moreover, the same dialect was and still is vernacular in Galicia, where no French prince ever ruled. It is, however, not a title extraordinary, that, under the dominion and influence of French princes and nobles, Portuguese poetry should, from its origin, have preserved unimpaired those romantic national forms in which it soon appeared perfectly to coincide with the Castilian poetry; for, notwithstanding that most of the French nobles, who settled in Portugal, came from the south of France, whence they brought with them the genuine poetry of the troubadours, still the introduction of that poetry did not impede the development of those poetical forms which constituted a common source of pleasure for the Portuguese, the Galicians, and the Castilian.

The favourable situation of Portugal could not fail to contribute, in a considerable degree, to the early development of the Portuguese tongue. While the Castilians, descending from their mountains, obtained no increase of wealth until they wrested it, sword in hand, from the Arabs, the Portuguese, particularly after they recovered possession of Lisbon, enriched themselves by the peaceful pursuits of trade and navigation. Lisbon soon became a flourishing commercial city; and the nation learned to unite civil industry with valiant achievements. The Portuguese, generally speaking, acquired a degree of practical dexterity which, even to this day, seems to distinguish them from the Spaniards, and which, indeed, is not sufficiently valued by the enemies of the Portuguese name, amongst whom must be more particularly included their Castilian neighbours. The benefits of civil industry which were widely diffused from Lisbon, fortified in the Portuguese that feeling of self-esteem which was necessary for the maintenance of their independence on so small a territory. In the reign of Alphonso I. the son of Henry of Burgundy, the Portuguese dominions acquired nearly their present extent by conquests made from the Moors, as far as the Algarves. The romance-dialect of Portugal now advanced southward into the conquered districts, and thus acquired the dignity of a prevailing national language, the formation of which proceeded from a great capital.

A PORTABLE ICE HOUSE.

Take an iron bound butt or puncheon, and knock out the head, cutting a very small hole in the bottom, about the size of a wine cork. Place inside of it a wooden tub, shaped like a churn, resting it upon two pieces of wood, which are to raise it from touching the bottom. Fill the space around the inner tub with charcoal, and fit to the tub a cover, with a convenient handle, having inside one or two small hooks, on which are to be hung the bottles during the operation. Place on the lid a bag of charcoal, about two feet square; if the charcoal in this bag is pounded it will answer better; and over all, place another cover, which must cover the head of the outer casks. When the apparatus is thus prepared, let it be placed in a cold cellar, and buried in the earth above four-fifths of its height; but, though cold, the cellar must be dry, wet ground will not answer, and a sandy soil is the best. Fill the inner tub or nearly so, with pounded ice; or, if prepared in the winter, with snow well pressed down, and the apparatus will be complete. Whenever it is wished to make ice, take off the upper cover, then the bag of pounded charcoal, and suspend the vessel containing the liquid to be frozen to the hooks inside of the inner cover; then close up the whole, as before, for half an hour, when the operation will be complete, provided proper care be taken to exclude external air.

HEART AND MIND.

The heart and mind can as little lie barren as the earth whereon we move and have our being, and which, if it produce not herbs and fruit meet for the use of man, will be overrun with weeds and thorns. Mulcy Ismael, a personage of tyrannical celebrity in his day, always employed his troops in some active and useful work, when they were not engaged in war, "to keep them," he said, "from being devoured by the worm of indolence." In the same spirit one of Elizabeth's poets delivered this wholesome advice:—

"Eachewd the idle vein
Flee, flee from doing nought!
For never was there idle brain
But bred an idle thought."

A WIFE.

When a man of sense comes to marry, it is a companion whom he wants, not an artist. It is not merely a creature who can paint and play, sing and dance; it is a being who can comfort and counsel him, one who can reason and reflect, and feel and judge, and discourse and discriminate, one who can assist him in his affairs, lighten his sorrows, purify his joy, strengthen his principles, and educate his children. Such is a woman who is fit for a mother and mistress of a family. A woman of the former description may occasionally figure in a drawing room, and attract the admiration of the company; but she is entirely unfit for a helpmate to a man, and to "train up a child in the way he should go."

MARSHAL VILLARS.

It was customary, as the French general in command of the Italian army passed through Lyons to join his army, for that town to offer him a purse full of gold. Marshal Villars on being thus complimented by the head magistrate, the latter concluded his speech by observing, that Turenne, who was the last commander of the Italian army who had honoured the town with his presence, had taken the purse, but returned the money. "Ah!" replied Villars, pocketing both the purse and the gold, "I have always looked upon Turenne to be imitable."

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, MAY 16, 1829.

The Office of the Masonick Record is removed to No. 3 Beaver street.

We invite the attention of our readers to an article on our first page, from the National Standard, on popular excitements. The case alluded to, of Russel Colvin, must be fresh in the memory of every one, and especially of the inhabitants of this city. It will be recollected that Colvin passed through this place, on his way to Vermont, about the time of the holy-days, 1819-20; and that a snug harvest was reaped by exhibiting him in the museum, at twenty-five cents a sight. His absence and supposed death occasioned as much excitement in Vermont as that of Morgan has in this state; and one innocent man would undoubtedly have been hanged, and another incarcerated in the state prison for life, on the supposition that they had murdered him, had he not been providently discovered, barely in time to prevent the execution of the sentence of the law. The plain questions will naturally be raised in every mind, Is there more or better evidence of the murder of Morgan, than there was of the murder of Colvin? Is the testimony of Giddins, or of any other backslider from masonry, whose interest it is, not to tell the truth, but to gratify the popular prejudice, worthy of more credit than the testimony of Merrill? We unhesitatingly answer both these questions in the negative. If the absence of Morgan argues his murder, so did the absence of Colvin argue his murder. There was as much mystery in the case of Colvin as there is in that of Morgan. Colvin was absent a number of years, and no traces of him,—not even the shadow of proof that he was in existence—could be discovered. Under these circumstances the public mind was excited, the popular prejudices were directed against two innocent men—Merrill swore very much as Giddins would be willing to swear at this time, and Stephen and Jesse Boorn were convicted by a jury of murder, and sentenced to be hanged: and it was alone through the instrumentality of men who were superior to the disgraceful feelings of the times, that one was saved from the gallows, and the other (whose sentence had been commuted) from the state prison for life. To say the least of the case of Colvin, it affords an instructive illustration of the evils which are to be apprehended from popular feeling when it is permitted to control the laws.

FOREIGN NEWS. By arrivals at New-York and Boston within the past week, regular files of London papers to the 20th and of Liverpool to the 21st of April, have been received. They contain the welcome intelligence that the Catholic Relief Bill has at length become a law; having received the Royal Assent on the 13th of April; it passed the House of Lords on the 10th, by a majority of one hundred and four. The bill disfranchising the Irish forty shilling freeholders received the Royal Assent on the same day. The Relief Bill passed the House of Commons on the 18th of March, just half a century after the question of emancipation was first agitated in that body; the measure was first brought forward by Mr. Fox, on the 18th of March, 1779. It is said that Ireland already begins to feel the benefits of the Relief Bill. The Papists evince no indecent exultation on the occasion; the protestants no abject despondency, but both parties seem inclined to co-operate with each other in the promotion of a general good will and toleration.

At a numerous meeting of Catholics in Dublin it was unanimously resolved that they should be requested not to illuminate in consequence of the emancipation bill being passed. The proceedings were published in a handbill, which advised the Catholics not to profane the great event by a celebration which could not add to the real triumph of Ireland, and might give unnecessary pain to those to whom it was their duty to render immediate and lasting reconciliation. All distinctions of sect and party are at an end; we are now one people.

A great meeting was held in St. James' to consider the best means of testifying the gratitude of the friends of civil and religious liberty to the Duke of Wellington, for the great measure of peace and justice, in the consummation of which he was principally instrumental. The Duke of Leinster was called to the chair. A resolution was passed proposing a meeting on the second of May, at the London tavern, to consider the means of raising a sum of money to erect a statue in or near Dublin, of the Duke of Wellington, as a commemorative of this, the most glorious of his public services.

The Jews are to be preparing a petition to be relieved from the disabilities under which they labour.

Great distress prevails in the manufacturing districts. The Sheffield Courant says—

"The state of trade in almost all the manufacturing districts is such as to excite the most fearful apprehensions. In our own town, the demand for its manufactures was scarcely ever so dull, and though our streets are not yet filled with half-famished workmen, there is too much reason to believe such an appalling sight will, ere long, present itself. The prices at which manufactured goods are sold do not, in some instances, exceed the value of the raw material, and the wages paid for labour are necessarily so very low as to reduce the workmen almost to the condition of paupers. Still under these circumstances, it is with difficulty any sales are effected, and large stocks are consequently accumulated. This order of things, however, cannot exist long, and unless a revival of trade takes place very shortly, we almost tremble for the consequences."

The distress in Spitalfields exceeds all description. Thousands are actually starving, and unless speedy relief be afforded, famine will soon accomplish its works in pestilence and death.

Hostilities between the Russians and the Turks are recommenced. The Turks are making repeated attacks upon the Russian posts between Varna and the Danube; and some bloody engagements have taken place. The Russians are hastening towards the Danube by forced marches, and he sultan is sending large numbers of troops and vast cannon and ammunition to Adrianople, and Rodosto, on the sea of Marmora. It is said there will be 300,000 Turks in the field.

Cardinal FRANCIS XAVIER CASTIGLIONE (aged 68, born at Cingoli) was declared Pope on the 31st March, and assumed the name of Pius 8th. The Gazette de France says that the French Ambassador had vainly attempted to procure the election of Cardinal LURIA.

EARTHQUAKE IN SPAIN. A dreadful earthquake was felt in Spain, on the 21st March. In the province of Murcia, it was attended with the most melancholy consequences. In Murcia itself, not one of the churches nor a single edifice but was considerably damaged; and many houses were also damaged. The number killed and wounded by this awful convulsion of nature is described as immense. In one village alone 400 bodies had been taken out of the ruins. The earthquake was accompanied with a fearful noise. Travellers observed a column of fire which, at the moment of the shock, made its appearance towards the eastward of Murcia. Since the 21st repeated shocks had been felt in the province, and great disasters were anticipated. The Paris papers state, that the "letters from Spain, as well as the journals, are full of dreadful details of the effects of the earthquake. Four towns have been entirely ruined, namely, Guadamar, Torreveja, Almoradi, and Los Dolores. The number of the dead is incalculable. After four hundred bodies had been dug out of the ruins of Almoradi, seventy more were found. Mineral springs have been removed to the distance of six miles from the place where their sources originally were. The river Segura, which flowed through the city of Murcia, has changed its course and its mouth. Four great craters are opened at Benejuzar, and emit lava and infectious exhalations. Two other craters, opened at the place where Torreveja was built, pour forth torrents of fetid water."

If the accounts from Madrid, given in the French papers, be true, the effects of the late earthquake in Murcia have extended far beyond that province, and been attended with still more fatal disasters than on the spot itself. All Cadix, it was reported, had been submerged, though pains were taken to conceal that dreadful calamity, by which every family in the kingdom, and many in other lands, would be thrown into desolation; for that rich commercial city comprised within its merchants individuals from almost every country on earth.

The number of dead bodies dug out of the ruins of the towns already amounts to more than three thousand, and the number of wounded and mutilated persons is more than six thousand. The houses destroyed are nearly seven thousand.

At Benejuzar four craters opened, two of which threw out lava and the other two, putrid exhalations. The river Segura changed its bed, and now reaches the sea by a new channel. Craters are opened on the spot where Torre Veja formerly stood, which throw out torrents of putrid water. The first shock was on the 21st of March, and before 5 o'clock the next morning, 48 shocks were counted. Great numbers of the inhabitants remained encamped in the fields. The king, in consequence of this catastrophe, had ordered the produce of the revenues of Murcia to be appropriated for the succour of the families who had been ruined by it.

A letter from Madrid of the 2d April, states fresh shocks of an earthquake were felt on the 25th, 30th, and 31st of March. The latter, which took place in the night, spread terror and consternation through the city. It was affirmed, that all Cadix was submerged by the reaction of the shock at Murcia.

According to a recent calculation of the annual increase of the population in Europe, it is supposed that in Prussia it would double itself in 26 years; in Great Britain, in 42 years; in the Netherlands, in 565 years; in the kingdom of Sicily, in 63 years; in Russia, in 66 years; in Austria, in 69 years; and in France, in 105 years.

The State Palladium, the prospectus of which we noticed some weeks since, is now commenced at New-London, Connecticut. It is a large and handsome sheet, well arranged and well printed. The editors take a fearless and independent stand, with respect to masonry and the Morgan excitement.

KEITH MEDAL. The Royal Society of Edinburgh, have communicated to the American Philosophical Society (with a request to have it made extensively known in America) that, "in December, 1820, the trustees of the estate of Alexander Keith placed in the hands of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, the sum 600l. sterling, the interest on which shall from November, 1820, form a Biennial Prize for the most important discoveries in science made in any part of the world, but communicated by their author to the Royal Society, and published for the first time in their Transactions."

The prize to be given is a gold medal, not exceeding fifteen guineas in value, together with a sum of money, or a piece of plate bearing the devices and inscriptions upon the medal.

The Batavia Times of May 8, after summing up the result of the late election in that village, for charter officers, where the friends of toleration and equal rights prevailed, says:—

"The reader is requested to bear in mind that this result was produced in Batavia!—the centre of gravity of Anti-masonry—and he is also requested to bear in mind, for it is worthy of remark, considering the place and the age in which we live, that two out of the five trustees elected, are masons—Messrs Thompson and Cummings."

From the (New-Haven) Connecticut Journal, May 8.

MASONICK RELICK. We have been favoured with the sight of a masonick emblem, found by Mr. William Gorman while digging his garden in the north part of Broadway in this city. It proves, upon inquiry, to be a "Past Grand Master's Jewel." It had evidently been long buried, and when first taken up was very much tarnished, though but little injured. Some of the letters were worn down and partly defaced—but there were no bruises nor marks of corrosion.

What is singular about it is, that that the date [1763] is anterior to the attainment, by any mason in Connecticut, to the dignity of Grand or Past Grand Master; the lamented general Wooster, who was slain at Cumpo Point, having been the first master of the first lodge in this state. It has been suggested to us, and from the length of time it has evidently been buried, we have little doubt of the truth of the fact, that it belonged to an officer in the British service, and was lost when this place was visited by the British army, July 5th, 1777. The supposition is corroborated by the fact that the army approached the city over the ground where the medal was found. It is now at the bookstore of Messrs. Durrie and Peck, where it can be examined by any one who has a curiosity to see it.

CAPTAIN WILLIAM MORGAN. A transient person, shabbily dressed, made his appearance in, and left this village on the 4th inst. who called himself William Morgan, and insisted that he was the identical William Morgan who was kidnapped in the western part of New-York, and who has been and still is, by many supposed to have been murdered. He was a little short of six feet high—supposed to weigh about 175 pounds; sandy hair and bald head, apparently about fifty years of age, wore a drab coloured coat and a kind of fox coloured fur cap. We understand he expressed a willingness to go before a magistrate and make oath to his identity, and that he also appeared to have a familiar acquaintance with the book entitled "Illustrations of Masonry." [Middlebury (Vt.) Standard, May 12.

The Hotspurs of the new cabal are as quiet as lambs since the result of the town elections, on seeing their mighty tide fall to low water mark—that tide which was to sweep into non-existence the republican ranks. In the rise and progress of the new party, a more despicable coalition was never before attempted to be formed to shackle the liberties of a free people. Surely it was time for all honest and honourable men to take a stand when, a reckless faction under false pretences would attempt to proscribe worth, talents and integrity to suit their ambitious views,—when leaders of a cabal would assassinate virtue, blast character, and impeach the proudest worthies in our land, and all from such pure, disinterested motives!—to renouncing and expelled masons, it was bad game for them to join in—men whose only credentials of credibility, the self-condemning acknowledgment of violating vows of the most imposing character, to condemn citizens of unimpeachable integrity, at whose probity they themselves could not raise the finger of suspicion. But the object is exposed and the cloven foot is now seen. [Northern Phœnix.

ANTI-MASONICK PHRENZY. In the present excitement against masons an intolerant and persecuting spirit is displayed, which is calculated in its nature and tendency to destroy the peace of community, and instead of remedying the evils complained of, must inevitably produce the real existence of that which now only exists in the imagination. The enemies of masonry complain that the streams of public justice are polluted, and yet they do not point out any particular instances of that pollution. If such instances were to be found, would they not be laid before the public? But suppose masons should be wholly excluded from office; can it be supposed that those who are so enraged against the members of that society, would be in a suitable frame of mind for jury-men, to try a cause between a man who is and one who is not a mason? Would there be no chance for an undue bias to warp their judgement? We suppose that even anti-masons are but men, and subject to like passions with other men. The truth is, no man, or set of men, while under the influence of phrenzy, can safely be trusted with the administration of justice. However honest they may be in their intentions, they would doubtless be ill qualified to exercise that impartiality which would be required at their hands. [National Standard.

ANTI-MASONICK TOLERATION. We know not but the days of imprisoning, branding, and burning of heretics are to be revived. For the sake of all that is dear to us as freemen, we hope the same spirit of turanny and superstition will not extend to the other christian denominations—but as a sample of its effects thus far, we are pained to record the fact—that at the late quarterly meeting of the Open Communion Baptist church in Russia, the Rev. Nathan Wilcox, a worthy minister of that society, was denied the privilege of receiving the sacrament, for his refusal to renounce freemasonry. O Tempora, O Mores [Little Falls People's Friend.

Some person in New-York signing himself Avery Allen, has written a letter to D. Brinsmade, esq. and says in it, that some person told him about two years ago, that a Mr. Richard C. Howard, alias Clipperfield, told him, that he was concerned in the murder of Morgan. This Mr. Avery after honestly keeping the secret of murder two years, honestly, we suppose, thinks honest people will believe his hearsay story. The people want facts, and not hearsay stories. Such as aunt Dorothy told Mag Tattle that Sal Gable had been concerned in a certain transaction about which the publick were dying to find out the truth, for two years and over. [Northern Phœnix.

TOLERATION AND CHARITY. The following extracts deserve to be remembered both for their wickedness and weakness. They are from a late Buffalo Patriot.

"Every man who clings to the institution of freemasonry, and supports its crimsoned name, with the full blaze of light which is now bursting upon it from every quarter, is, if not directly, at least by implication, accessory to the crimes of arson, kidnapping, murder, and we may add, perjury, to hide it."

The following is of a different order, and displays more of the fanatic than the knave:

"Indeed, there is to us a striking resemblance between the blind infatuation which has seized the masonick fraternity, and led them on to imbue their hands in a brother's blood, persisting in a reckless opposition to the laws of the land and to public opinion, and the grievous blindness which overshadowed the minds of the Jews at the crucifixion of our Saviour. And most assuredly, there is no difference in the spirit which characterized the blind zealots of Judaism then, and of masonry now."!!!

BOARDING.—Six or eight gentlemen can be accommodated with board and lodging, on reasonable terms, in a central part of the city. Apply at Mrs. Goodwin's, centre west building, Wm. James' Row, Howard street. May 16

FINE CUTLERY, &c.—JAMES DICKSON, Cutler and Surgical Instrument Maker, No. 3, Beaver street, (formerly at No. 98 North Market street) Albany, manufactures and repairs all kinds of instruments in the above branches, with neatness, accuracy and despatch, and warranted equal to any article imported, or manufactured in the United States.

Shoers, Scissors, Razors and Pocketknives, ground and finished on an improved plan, and warranted to excel any other in use in this city or elsewhere.

Currier's Steels constantly on hand, and warranted a superior article.

Blades inserted in knife-handles in the most approved style, and most reasonable terms. Knives repaired.

N. B. Country orders punctually attended to.

Albany, Feb. 14, 1829.

ALBANY BRUSH TRUNK AND BANDOBOX MANUFACTORY.—NORRIS TARBELL, No. 455 South Market street, (opposite the Connecticut Coffee House,) keeps constantly on hand, and for sale, the above named articles, at low prices. Those who wish to purchase, will please to call and examine for themselves. Cash paid for clean combed Hags' Bristles. Albany, March 4, 1829.

BOOK BINDING. Sign of the Golden Ledger, corner of State and North Market streets, Albany. WILLIAM SEYMOUR, carries on the above business in all its branches: viz. plain, extra, and super-extra—has a first rate ruling machine, and other necessary implements for manufacturing Blank Books of every description, on the most reasonable terms, of the best workmanship. An assortment on hand. Subscribers to the American Masonick Record can have their volumes handsomely bound in boards, with leather backs and corners, at 23 1/2 cents a volume. Feb 14 3m3

POETRY.

[From the Posthumous Poems of Percy Bysshe Shelley.]

SONG.

Rarely, rarely, comest thou,
Spirit of delight!
Wherefore hast thou left me now
Many a day and night?
Many a weary night the day
'Tis since thou art fled away.

How shall ever one like me
Win thee back again?
With the joyous and the free
Thou wilt scoff at pain.
Spirit false! thou hast forgot
All but those who need thee not.

I love all that thou lovest,
Spirit of delight!
The fresh earth in new leaves drest,
And the starry night;
Autumn evening, and the morn
When the golden mists are born.

I love snow and all the forms
Of the radiant frost;
I love waves, and winds, and storms,
Every thing almost
Which is Nature's and may be
Untainted by man's misery.

I love tranquil solitude,
And such society
As is quiet, wise and good;
Between thee and me
What difference? But thou dost possess
The things I seek, not love them less.

I love Love—though he has wings,
And like light can flee;
But above all other things,
Spirit, I love thee—
Thou art love and life! O come—
Make once more my heart thy home!

THE SHADOW.

BY J. MALCOLM.

Upon yon dial stone
Behold the shade of Time,
For ever circling on and on,
In silence more sublime
Than if the thunders of the spheres
Pealed forth to mortal ears.

It metes us hour by hour,
Doles out our little span,
Reveals a presence and a power,
Felt and confessed by Man;—
The drop of moments day by day,
That rocks of ages wear away.

Woven by a hand unseen,
Upon that stone survey
A robe of dark sepulchral green,
The mantle of decay,—
The fold of chill Oblivion's pall,
That falleth with yon shadow's fall.

Day is the time for toil;
Night balm the weary breast:
Stars have their vigils; seas a while,
Will sink to peaceful rest;
But round and round the shadow creeps
Of that which slumbers not, nor sleeps:—

Eclipsing all that's fair,—
Hushing the voice of mirth
Into the silence of despair
Around the lonesome hearth—
And training ivy-garlands green
O'er the once gay and social scene.

In beauty fading fast
Its silent trace appears,—
And, where a phantom of the past,
Dim in the mists of years,—
Gleams Tadmor: o'er Oblivion's waves,
Like wrecks above their ocean graves.

Before the ceaseless shade
That round the world doth sail,—
Its towers and temples bow the head,—
The pyramids look pale:
The festal halls grow hushed and cold,
The everlasting hills wax old.

Cæval with the sun
Its silent course began,—
And still its phantom-race shall run
Till worlds with age grow wan;—
Till darkness spread her funeral-pall,
And one vast shadow circle all."

THE RETURN OF SPRING.

BY J. MALCOLM.

Dear as the dove, whose wafting wing
The green leaf ransomed from the main;
The genial glow returning Spring!
Comes to our shores again.
For thou hast been a wanderer long,
On many a far and foreign strand;
In balm and beauty, sun and song,
Passing from land to land.

O'er vine clad hills and classic plains,
Of glowing climes beyond the deep;
And by the dim and mouldering fane
Where the dead Cæsars sleep;
And o'er Sierra's brightly blue,
Where rest our country's fallen brave,
Smiling through thy sweet tears, to strew
Flower offerings o'er each grave.

Thou bring'st the blossoms to the bee,
To earth a robe of emerald dye;
The leaflet to the naked tree;
And rainbows in the sky;
I feel thy blest, benign control
Thy pulses of my youth restore;
Opening the springs of sense and soul;
To love and joy once more.

I will not people thy green bowers,
With Sorrow's pale and spectre hand;
Nor blend with thine the faded flowers
Of Memory's distant land:
For thou wert surely never given
To wake regrets for pleasures gone;
But, like an angel sent from heaven,
To soothe Creation's groan.

Then, while the groves thy garlands twine,
Thy spirit breathes in flower and tree,
My heart shall kindle at thy shrine,
And worship God in thee:
And in some calm, sequestered spot,
While listening to thy choral strain,
Past griefs shall be a while forgot,
And pleasure bloom again.

LONG AGO!

Long ago! oh, long ago!—
Do not those words recall past years,
And, scarcely knowing why they flow,
Force to the eyes unbidden tears?
Do ye not feel, as by they come,
Those dim sweet dreams of olden days,
A yearning to your childhood's home,
Peopled with tones of love and praise—
Long, long ago!

Long ago! when many a sound
Awoke to mirth which saddens now,
And many an eye was sparkling round
That weeps beneath a darkened brow:
When with our whole young happy hearts
We loved and laughed away the time,
Nor thought how quickly all departs,
So cherished in life's early prime—
Long, long ago!

Long ago! the hopes we nursed
Of happiness, of earthly fame.
Were bright as bubbles at that burst—
A glittering drop, an empty name!
Oh, but to be one hour again
(Whatever that sweet hour might cost)
Free from dim memory's torturing pain,
With those we loved—with those we lost—
Long, long ago!

Long ago! who breathes there here
O'er whom the past hath no such power?
Young heart! if now thy sky is clear,
Beware, beware the future hour!
Perchance the chords that echo now
In after years thou'lt hear again,
And gazing on each faded brow,
Wilt sighing say, "I heard that strain
Long, long ago!"

[From the New-England Palladium.]

MEMORIES.

The day-light of my memory—
The morning gush of joy!
The hope of pleasure ne'er to be,
That charmed me when a boy;

The stir of unknown feelings
That struggled to be free—
The music, the appealings
Of inward melody.

Oh! these have long since faded,
And memory now appears
With shadowy shapes invaded—
The burial place of years!

And oft her wild eye wanders
O'er many a grave of green,
And fondly lingering, ponders
O'er friendship that hath been.

The day-light of my memory—
The morning gush of joy!
The hope of pleasures ne'er to be,
Have left me, since a boy.

Thus when the sun advances
And leads in the young day,
How beautiful his glances
Are mirror'd in yon bay!

Alas, how false the mirror!
Brightly the waters glide;
But oh! what shapes of terror
Those silvery sparkles hide!

Soon—soon the eve shades cleaving,
Day wanders from our eye,
And then the pale moon, grieving,
Sits lonely in the sky!

The moonlight of my memory!
The sun hath long since set—
The moonlight of my memory!
Shine on! I love thee yet.

ROSCREA.

ALBANY TYPE FOUNDRY—The subscribers, successors to R STARR & Co. in the above foundry, continue the business in its various branches, and are prepared to execute orders for the following type, at the regular prices, on a credit of six months, or at a discount of 7 1/2 per cent, for cash, viz:

Roman and Italics—Twenty, Fourteen, Ten, Eight, Seven, Five and Four lines pica, Canon, Double Paragon, Double Great Primer, Double English, Double Small Pica, Great Primer, English, Pica, Small Pica, Long Primer, Bourgeois, Brevier, Minion, Nonpareil, Pearl.
Two line letters—Pica, Small Pica, Long Primer, Bourgeois, Brevier, Minion, Nonpareil, Pearl.
Full face capitals—Small Pica, Long Primer, Bourgeois, Brevier, Minion.

Antiques—Ten and Eight lines Pica roman, Five line Pica italic, Four line Pica, Double Great Primer, Double Small Pica, Great Primer, and Pica, with lower case; and Long Primer, Brevier and Nonpareil.
Italians—Five line Pica, Double Small Pica, Two line Brevier, and Two line Nonpareil.

Tuscan—Double Small Pica.
Black—Five line Pica, Double Small Pica, Great Primer, Pica, Long Primer.

Open Blacks—Five line Pica, Double Small Pica, Great Primer.
Shaded letters—Six line Pica ornamented, Two line Brevier and Two line Nonpareil double shade; Two line Nonpareil meridian shade Double Great Primer, Two line Brevier, Two line Nonpareil, and One line Brevier, single shade; Two line Minion and Two line Pearl italic single shade; Double Small Pica roman, and One line Brevier italic Antique shaded.

Script—English, on inclined body, (cast on a new plan.)
Greek—Pica.

Borders and Flowers—From Six line Pica to Pearl, all cast in copper matrices.

Checks—Canon and Double English, plain and opened.
Fractions and Leaders of all sizes, from English to Pearl, English, Pica and Long Primer piece Fractions; Spanish and French Accents, and Accented Vowels, Figure Vowels, Superiour Figures, Dashes, and Astronomical and other Signs, of various sizes; Long Primer Space Rules. Also, Leads ten to pica, and thicker; Quotations; Brass Rules, &c. and Ornaments and Cuts, in great variety.

Printing materials of every description, and of the first quality, at the lowest prices—Cases, Stands, (an improved pattern,) Galleys, Composing sticks, Chases of all sizes, improved newspaper Chases, in two parts Ball, stocks and skins, Bodkins, Furniture, &c. and, Prout's and Johnson's printing Ink, constantly on hand. Presses of all kinds for use at the manufacturers' prices. Wells' Improved presses will be kept constantly on hand, and may be examined at the foundry.

Large additions in the variety of type have been made since the specimen of this foundry was published of which specimens are now nearly completed, and will soon be sent to printers, the punches of which are cut by the senior partner of this firm, whose reputation as a superiour letter-cutter is well established; and the whole business being under our immediate superintendence, no pains is spared to make our types in every way worthy the attention of printers. An important improvement in the composition of the type-metal has also been made—copper and some other ingredients being added, which render it both harder and tougher, and of a finer grain. Type cast at this foundry are warranted to be as solid as any cast in the country, and that they will not settle in height from the pressure in using. Particular care is also taken to have the type well dressed, and the fonts regularly put up.

Old type is received in exchange for new, at 10 cents per lb. Orders, by mail, or left at the foundry, No. 8 Liberty-st., will receive prompt attention.

STARR & LITTLE.
The type upon which this paper is printed was cast at the above foundry.

THIS PAPER

Is published every Saturday, by E. B. CHILD

AT NO. 3, BEAVER STREET, ALBANY, N. Y.

TERMS—To city subscribers, Three Dollars a year. To subscribers who receive their papers by mail, Two Dollars and Fifty Cents, IN ADVANCE—otherwise, Three Dollars.
JOB PRINTING neatly executed at this office.

AMERICAN MASONICK RECORD

AND ALBANY SATURDAY MAGAZINE.

VOL. III.

ALBANY, N. Y. SATURDAY, MAY 23, 1829.

NO. 17.

MASONICK RECORD.

PUBLIC OPINION, AND SPIRIT OF THE PUBLIC JOURNALS.

From the (Batavia) People's Press.

It is exhilarating and comfortable to look about this fertile and beautiful region, which has been transformed from a savage wilderness to a populous and flourishing country, with a facility and rapidity that seems more like magic than the result of human labour, and see its moral and political health and vision recovering from the loathsome, morbid, and blind disorder which has of late distressed and disgraced it.

Political anti-masonry, like "the pestilence that walks in darkness and wastes at noon day," had but lately spread its desolating influence over the fairest portion of our favourite west. Like the hydrophobia, its contagion was certain, whether the bite was through wantonness or malignity. It was equally sure to spread, whether a truly infected fanatic honestly declaimed against masons and masonry, and expressed sincere, but feverish and unfounded fears and apprehensions; or whether the cool, designing, unmoved and unalarmed knave, balled, frothed and vociferated the cry of murder, and talked of religion, which he despised—patriotism, which he never felt—the good of society, which meant only his own—good order, which he was designedly disturbing—our laws and institutions, which he cared no more for, than did Cataline for the laws of Rome—or of our country, which he would sell for a less price than tempted Benedict Arnold. The nature of the provocation, and the character of the theme, were peculiarly calculated to produce excitement; and excitement of whatever kind, is the most certainly communicable, of any moral disease in the catalogue of human infirmities. It spread; and demagogues, who felt no more of it than they did the warmth of virtue, or the glow of patriotism, seeing that something could be made out of it, affected to be extremely agitated by the fears and resentment which gave it birth; but in a much higher degree than others. Their zeal, like that of hypocrites in religion, was manifested on all occasions. They harranged upon the house top and at the corners of the streets. They dare not sleep alone for fear of the dreadful masons! But Religion and the cause and honour of God was the greatest concern with many of the leading hypocrites. With all it was God or their dear country, that prompted their exertions to blast the characters, standing and prospects of their neighbours, whom they knew to be blameless in the matter for which they were labouring to ruin them.

By keeping up an incessant din—leaving no time for reflection—stunning the public ear with a continual series of alarming and astonishing charges against the masons, no matter whether true or false, they were enabled, by leading the honestly excited portion of the people into their meetings and conventions, to effect an organization, ostensibly to put down masonry, but in fact, to advance themselves to the head of political affairs and the control of all the offices.

It was boldly avowed that anti-masonry was to be carried into all elections, "from a Path-master to a President;" and upon deliberate advice, and under the direction and management of the Lewiston Committee, originally appointed by an indignant people, for the laudable purpose of investigating the Morgan outrages, "the whole hog" party was regularly constituted and officered; and the election of the leaders of the political anti-masonic party, to the minor offices, was a matter of course, provided they could prevail on the people to forego all political principle, for the sake of the great anti-masonic cause.

To produce this abandonment, the welkin rung with murder, masonry, midnight assassins,—and Religion, Law, Liberty and Order, were bawled in the streets and bar-rooms, and through the anti-masonic presses, from His Excellency Governor Solomon Southwick's down to Deacon Timothy Judas Strong's, from one end of the state to the other.

The people were very truly and cunningly told, that if they went in for the cause of anti-masonry, they must not scrutinize the characters or qualifications of their candidates. They knew that if this should form any part of the consideration upon which the people should make up their choice, none of them could be elected. The cause! the cause! was the constant theme, embellished with a few abductions, murders and arsons.

The political principles and reason and common sense of a great majority of the voters in this quarter, were as effectually drowned in this outcry, as the most heartless demagogue could wish, and the "whole hog" tickets were carried in most of the western counties, as by a whirlwind!

The success of such men as prevailed on those tickets, stimulated kindred spirits to hopes and exertions throughout the state. The Inquisition was organized in this county, and the convention called at Albany to plan the next political campaign, which was to embrace the whole United States. Southwick, and Granger, and Weed, and Hascall found themselves, in their own fancies, the arbiters of a nation's fate. "The little Spartan band" was organized, and regular nominations were made in caucus by the renowned twenty, for all state appointments. The anti-masonic frog attempted to swell itself to the size of the republican ox. In its mighty efforts to inflate itself, the poor reptile burst! And the honest yeomanry, upon surveying its ruptured and disgusting carcass, were filled with astonishment and shame, that they could ever have been so deprived of reason as to worship so foul and despicable a thing.

In viewing the creatures they had exalted, or attempted to exalt to power, they were not much less surprised and mortified. They beheld among them reptiles not less despicable and disgusting. And the question, "what have we got by our crusade against masons, and our anti-masonry?" is so natural and pertinent, that scarcely a man in the infected region has failed, by this time, to put it to himself.

The dullest capacity can answer this question. Those who sought no office, and had nothing to gratify but an honest desire to punish violence and correct evils which they verily believed to exist, have got nothing, but the disgrace and shame of having been gulled, and led by the nose, by a parcel of the most unfeeling, unprincipled, hypocritical villains that ever succeeded in deceiving any people. As for this set of knaves, they had many of them—got into office!—the grand desideratum that had made them so much greater saints and patriots than they ever were before Morgan was murdered.

While the answer to this question was before every one's eyes, it was also to be seen, that the people out of this section of the state of New-York, were not deprived of their reason by the outcry that issued from it. They had sustained the old fashioned republicanism which the immortal Jefferson had made the foundation of his memorable administration.

At the spring town meetings, the people in this quarter were nearly ready to abandon so desperate and wicked a cause, which they had for a time, through delusion, supported. In most places where opposition was attempted, political anti-masonry was defeated. In all subsequent tests, as charter elections, the triumph has been complete; and the current of expression in public conversations, and in the newspapers, indicates clearly that the Hydra is not only "Scotched," but killed.

We breathe a pure air again. The gloom of a dark fanaticism, and a reckless and wicked proscription and persecution has passed away; and this fair portion of our state, formerly the stay and strong hold of republicanism, for two years past, the bye-word of other parts of our country, is "redeemed, disenthralled, and emancipated" from the incubus pressure of that foul fiend, POLITICAL ANTI-MASONRY.

From the Rochester Craftsman.

STATEMENT, SHEWING THE NATURE OF ANTI-MASONICK RELIGION, PRINCIPLE, AND IDEAS OF RIGHT AND WRONG. In the month of June, 1827, the Baptist church in the towns of Lewiston and Porter, of which Elder Olney is the head, proposed to capt. John Taylor, an old and most respectable inhabitant in Lewiston, and a christian of unimpeachable character, he being also a Royal Arch Mason, to renounce masonry; threatening him with expulsion from the church in case of his refusal. Being a man of firmness and strict integrity, he replied, that though he should regret such an occurrence, he had never seen nor known ought amiss in the institution, and he should, by no such threats be induced to abandon it. Accordingly elder Olney and a majority of his congregation proceeded to put their threats in execution, and Capt. Taylor was accordingly expelled. In about six months afterwards they presented a new subscription to Capt. Taylor, for the purpose of paying this same preacher, elder Olney—Mr. Taylor declined subscribing any thing for such an object.

Since then every exertion has been made by elder Olney and his worthy congregation, to induce capt. Taylor to return to their fellowship and communion, offering to receive him again without insisting on his renunciation. Repeatedly he has been solicited by the very individuals who voted for his expulsion to join the congregation again; but capt. Taylor, acting with principle and firmness, (in both of which qualities elder Olney and his flock seem lamentably deficient) has uniformly refused their invitation unless they will unanimously acknowledge the wrong done him, and express their penitence for the course they have pursued towards him. After this statement it is hardly necessary to say that they have neither candour or magnanimity enough to allow them to pursue what would be a truly christian course, although very many of them (among whom is the elder himself) have privately acknowledged to Mr. Taylor, that they have done wrong, and expressed their sorrow therefor.

The above recited case is but one among many that have occurred since the commencement of the Morgan excitement. The facts speak for themselves, and require no comment from us. We cannot avoid a thought, however, of the joy which must be experienced by the infidel Giddins, at seeing those who pretend to worship that God whom he denies, and who profess that religion which he despises, so conducting themselves as to injure the cause of christianity, and revelation, and strengthen that of infidelity and atheism. Giddins may extend the hand of fellowship to the Rev. Mr. Olney, and his anti-masonic brethren, as he has long since to Joel Parker & Co. who by their entire lack of christian charity, toleration, forbearance, and decency, are doing more to injure the cause of Christ than all the open avowed infidels from Tom Paine to the worthy pedlar of anti-masonic almanacks and soi-disant participator in the murder of Morgan—himself.

From the Buffalo Journal.

THE QUESTION. What is the nature of the question now at issue? Our enemies say their object is to destroy the masonic institution. But this is shown to be false by every step they take. Their object is POLITICAL, and only POLITICAL, by their own confession, and still they object to being called political anti-masons. They are so however.

The New-York "Anti-Masonic Beacon," in a late number declares—"Anti-Masonry and Politics are joined together by legitimate bands: no hand can part them." This is true. They are joined together. They are wedded to the same fate that befel the ancient enemy of Democracy, and "all the People will say, amen!"

In order fairly to understand the question, let the careful observer look around him, and see who are the abettors of Political Anti-Masonry. They will be found literally to be the plotting and ambitious, the malecontent and designing of all modern parties. Those men who now seek to controul the destinies of Anti-Masons, properly so understood, and to lead them off in pursuit of political power, and the eleventh hour men, speculators, who seek to convert the honest prejudices of the yeomanry to their especial advantage. They are men who joined in the cry against masonry only when they saw a chance by its aid, of once more gaining admission into the public councils, from whence they had been driven for their political crimes. Under their guidance anti-masonry is made to assume a malapert front, and boast of political connexions! The spirit that first moved the people was a love of public justice—now party violence and political power are the only elements in which its new guardians think it will flourish. The connexion will prove fatal to it. It loses its distinctive character—its moral force is gone at once—swallowed up, in the gross and corrupting influence of exclusive purpose Force may make the body willing, but it never convinced the mind.

There is nothing more necessary in examining a question, than a frequent recurrence to first principles; otherwise, the subject is lost sight of, and the parties find themselves contending for the non-essentials, or, what is more likely, for a very different object than that for which they first set out. We would, therefore, with earnest sincerity, ask honest anti-masons, (not Political Anti-Masons!) if, on reviewing the ground of controversy, they now find themselves contending for the object they first had in view? Have they not suffered themselves to be misled by artful tales, trumped up by ignorant and hired libellers, and, instead of manfully pressing forward in defence of the laws and civil rights, are they not now lending themselves to advance the selfish political views of a corrupt and dangerous combination? The answer must be in the affirmative, or truth has lost its power.

To the sincere enemy of masonry, we have not a word to say. From us he will meet with no opposition—"not that we love Caesar less, but that we love Rome more." Honest opinion, openly and honestly expressed, we will cherish as the apple of our eye. Where we cannot convince, we will not upbraid. But the sly, insinuating Jesuit, who uses political honesty as a convertible commodity, and who makes two professions for every virtuous intention, and deceives you at last, shall be the object of our unwearied and peculiar care.

We are struggling in defence of political rights, and not for the acquisition of power—this is the difference between the parties. In such a conflict, where the success of our enemies distinctly implies a relinquishment of privileges on our part, and when the social virtues, domestic peace, and private character, form a part of the sacrifice, there is no room to doubt in forming a decision how to act. This is the nature of the question now at issue, on which the people are called upon to decide.

From the Northern Phoenix.

It was amusing to see with what avidity the anti-masonick prints some months since, announced the renunciation of now and then a solitary individual from masonry,—hailing them as Shadrack's, Meshack's and Abed-nego's from a fiery furnace; and pronouncing them as the purest of the pure. Anti-masonry was then, all the go, and the renunciation of a few individuals at that time, was wafted from one end of the state to the other, by the cabal prints, and magnified into as many hundreds, as incontestible evidence that their new party was increasing, and would soon sweep like a mighty torrent all before it. No sooner, however, has the mask been torn from the leaders, than the republicans, who for a moment were blinded by the dust kicked up, and astounded at the bluster of words "murder, treason," "and all that sort of thing," which in column after column, crowded upon their bewildered senses, than they have begun to leave the anti-masonick political aspirants, who had duped them, and to return to the republican ranks—not in single file, but by fifties and hundreds. In two wards in Rochester, upwards of seventy have come out in imitation of the republicans of the town of Greece, whose renunciation from political anti-masonry, we published a week or two since. The torrent is indeed, rapidly subsiding, and the troubled waters of anti-masonry emptying itself fast into the ocean, which has heretofore swallowed up the hopes of those restless demagogues, who always have, and always will, attempt to ride any hobby, that through their intrigue and deceit can be made popular, to gull the people, and convey them to power.

From the same.

No better evidence is wanting to show the little estimation in which political anti-masonry is held, than the result of the charter elections in some of our large places. In the city of Albany, in all the wards in the city, but 102 votes only were given on the popular ticket called antimasonry—these votes were probably given by the cousins, second cousins, elbow cousins, or "jack" cousins of Southwick and Hopkins, the anti-masonick champions in that place. Political Anti-masonry is clean gone—its leaders have killed it, as they always will kill every thing they take hold of to raise themselves. We would not wish to say any thing, however to increase the choler of the antis in our own vicinity,—knowing they feel sick enough of their anti-ism; but we venture to say, they were never more gulled than in joining such a ridiculous standard. The leaders must have supposed the sovereign people were bereft of their senses, to swallow such anti-liberty pills as they would fain force down their throats—surely we thought there was more sense in those old, experienced, broken down veterans; but like the dog to his vomit, or the sow that was washed, they must return to their &c.

From the Frodonia (Chautauque co.) Censor.

More Good News! It will be seen by the extracts which we publish to-day, that the cause of anti-masonry has gone down, down, down, at Rochester and Batavia—the fountain heads from which have flowed all the bitter waters of strife and uncharitableness, that have destroyed the peace and harmony of many a neighbourhood. And it may well be asked what has wrought this change at these places, where, if any where, the people are capable of judging of the merits of the anti-masonick cause. Is it not because they have even there, where their honestly excited feelings would be the slowest to perceive deception, become convinced that they have been made the dupes of political demagogues?

Notwithstanding the signal defeats which the anti-masons have met with throughout the western part of this state, their papers, for the purpose of still longer deluding their supporters, keep up a cry, that their prospects are cheering, their cause never looked brighter; but we have asked where is the case? and Echo answered, where? The roots of the anti-masonick tree are now dead, and can the branches survive it?

From the same.

From the course pursued by the anti-masonick papers since the result of the town elections has been ascertained, it would appear to be impossible to defeat them, or, at least, in such a manner that they will acknowledge it. Their stubbornness reminds us of the tailor's attempt to punish his wife for calling him "pricklouse." He ducked her under water several times, but every time she came up it was "pricklouse," until at last she was so far gone that she could not speak, and then she held her hand out and snapped her fingers. So with these editors, they are determined not to give up, as long as they can make a single sign or move a muscle.

From the Middlebury (Vt.) American.

We have come to the determination, and will act upon it, as long as a single citizen shall stand with us in the gap,—to oppose every attempt to disfranchise persons simply for being Masons; or any movement made to destroy the usefulness of Ministers, or to drive from the church, members who refuse to renounce the institution. If Freemasonry is so very iniquitous as is alleged, enough is already done to ensure its overthrow, if virtue exists in the community. We repeat, if the disclosures which have been made can stand the test of public scrutiny, no more need be said to bring Freemasonry into entire disgrace. If it is alleged in favour of keeping up the excitement, that any lodge among us has been guilty of crime, let anti-masons put a finger on the act, and we pledge ourselves that those who are denounced, will not be the last to assist in bringing the culprits to punishment. What more would anti-masons have? What more do honest men want? If, however, there is no way to break up the institution but by destroying the peace of society, trampling on the rights of individuals, and marching over the ruins of the Church,—we say emphatically, let Freemasonry stand. If there is no way to punish the commission of an atrocious crime, but by embracing the whole body of which the perpetrator was a member,—the dictates of humanity and the precepts of the Gospel alike require, that the offender should go free.

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

PYROTHONIDE.

A French physician has lately introduced into the Materia Medica, a substance produced by the combustion of linen, hemp, or cotton cloth, in the open air. He considers it useful in various inflammatory affections, especially in ophthalmia, or diseases of the eye, and chilblains. To prepare pyrothonide, take a handful of cloth, old or new, place it in a shallow basin, set fire to it, moving it about, so that the basin do not become too hot; after the combustion is finished, throw out the ashes; at the bottom of the vessel will be found a semi-aqueous, semi-oleaginous product, of a reddish brown colour, and possessing a pungent odour. Pour upon this five oz. of cold water, which will dissolve it entirely, forming the solution of pyrothonide, which is used in a more or less diluted state, as may be requisite, for collyria, fomentations, &c.

[Medical Journal.]

TO GILD MANUSCRIPT WRITING.

Dissolve a little gum ammoniac in a small quantity of water, in which a little gum arabick and the juice of garlick have been previously dissolved. Write with this liquid instead of ink, or form characters with it by means of a damel's hair pencil. Let the characters dry, then breathe upon them, and apply leaves of gold to them as for any other kind of gilding. The superfluous gold may be removed by a brush the writing will then appear covered with gold, and may be burnished.

METHOD OF PRESERVING CURRANTS.

When the fruit is ripe, choose those bushes enjoying a southern aspect, and which are most convenient in their shape, and most loaded with fruit, and surround them with thick straw mats, so that they shall be completely sheltered from atmospheric cold and other changes. By this simple method it will be found that the fruit may be preserved quite fresh till after Christmas.

POLISHING STONES.

The Hindoos polish all kinds of stones by means of powdered corundrum, mixed with melted lard. The mixture being allowed to cool, is shaped into oblong pieces, of three or four inches in length. The stone is polished by being sprinkled with water, and at the same time rubbed with three oblong masses; and the polish is increased by masses being used successively with finger grains.

MUSK.

Dr. Davey, by some recent experiments, has proved that when musk, in admixture with quicklime, smells of ammonia, it is impure or adulterated; and further, that, to preserve it well, it should be made perfectly dry; but when it is to be used as a perfume, it should be moistened.

THE NATURALIST.

NATURE AND HABITS OF THE HONEY-BEE.

We have had by us, for several days, a most amusing and useful work, written by Dr. Thacher of Plymouth,—in which the nature and habits of the bees, the manner of preserving them, and all the possibilities of that class of republicans—(for the government of the bees, we are told, is anti-monarchical, though they do acknowledge a queen,) are fully and clearly considered. To the inquisitive experimenter, as well as to the agriculturist, this book will be found exceedingly valuable,—inasmuch as it fairly presents the principal theories of those who have written on the subject of bees, and contains a mass of information which can not be found condensed in any other volume. The directions to the keepers of apiaries are clear and minute, and in giving them, reference is constantly had to the climate and productions of the United States. We make a single extract.

[Boston Daily Advertiser.]

The queen resembles neither of the other bees in structure: she is about eight lines and a half in length, while the males are seven, and the workers six. Her abdomen is longer in proportion and increases much when filled with eggs; her wings so short as scarcely to reach past the third ring, and her colour tends to a deep yellow. The slowness, or even gravity of her march, her stature, and above all, the various homage paid her by the bees, characterise her in a distinguishing manner. "We can scarce believe," says a writer, "what our eyes have witnessed on observing the regard and assiduities of the neuters for the beloved queen." She resides in the interior of the hive, and seldom, if ever, departs from her station, unless when she leads out a new swarm. When any alarm is given by knocking on the hive, the queen advances to the entrance, and some persons have a facility of taking her without injury, and the whole swarm on missing her will follow wherever she is carried. The government of the bees is termed republican, although it resembles more the monarchical, as a single personage, the queen, governs the whole. She is likewise their mother in the strictest sense. Among 20, or 20,000 bees of which a hive frequently consists, the queen is the only one that breeds; and it is to this prerogative that she is indebted for the extreme love and affection which she enjoys from her subjects. This respect and obedience are truly remarkable. She is almost continually attended by a circle of bees, who devote themselves to her service, some present her with honey, others pass their trunk lightly over her body in order to remove from it any thing that may be offensive. When she walks, those that are in her passage, range themselves in a respectful manner to make way for her. They either know or appear to know, that this procedure has an important object in view, that of augmenting the number of their citizens. The queen being the parent of the hive, it is from her alone, that a complete swarm composed of queens, drones and workers, can proceed; and without all these different members of the community, it can not either lay up stores or be preserved in existence. That bees are propagated by means of eggs which are hatched into worms, could not be unknown from times of the most remote antiquity; but no point in the natural history of animals has been more keenly contested than their precise mode of generation.

Forty-six hours after impregnation, the queen begins laying eggs, which will become workers; and provided impregnation takes place within the first twenty days of her existence, thousands are produced uninterruptedly, during the succeeding eleven months. Then she commences laying eggs, which will be drones. A single copulation is sufficient to impregnate all the eggs which a queen will lay in two years, or, perhaps, the whole that she will lay during her life. The laying of a queen is retarded, or altogether interrupted, by cold; and one impregnated in the end of October, has been known to retain her eggs four months and a half, owing to the intervention of winter. This queen, during March and April, laid about 3000 eggs, producing males only, and so very prolific are these insects, that a single queen may be mother of 12,000 bees, or more, in the space of two months, which is laying at the rate of 200 eggs daily. The queen, before depositing an egg, examines whether the cell is clean, and fit to receive it, and also suitable to its future condition; for queens, males and workers, have cells peculiarly adapted to their kind, and the queen by anticipation, seems aware which of these will proceed from the egg she deposits. Those producing workers, are deposited in hexagonal horizontal cells; the cells of the drones are somewhat irregular in their form, but the cells containing the eggs, intended to produce queens, are large, circular and hang perpendicularly in the hive. When the egg is laid, the bees supply the cell with the pollen of flowers, which serves to feed the young worm coming from it. The eggs of all the three kinds of bees, are hatched in three days; a worker remains five days in the vermicular state, a male six and a half, and a queen five. The worker's worm occupies thirty six hours in spinning its silken envelope, or cocoon; in three days, it changes to a nymph; and only on the twentieth day of its existence, does it become a complete, or perfect winged animal. The drones are still longer in attaining their lost metamorphosis, which succeeds in twenty four days after the egg has been laid. But the queen comes to perfection in six days. Food is carried by the bees to the worms as they require it; but when ready to be transformed to a nymph, they are aware that it is no longer necessary; on the contrary, the mouth of the cell is sealed with a covering of the wax, formed of concentric circles from the hedge, convex, if including males, and flat, if including workers. The same cell may successfully bring different workers to maturity; after one has left it, the bees clean the inside, and the mother again lays there; but the cells containing eggs which become queens, are used no more than once.

Immediately on the loss, or removal of the queen, the whole hive is a scene of tumult and disorder: the bees seem to anticipate their own destruction, by the precaution they take to guard against it. Should there be neither eggs nor brood in the combs, they will infallibly perish; their instinctive faculties are lost, they have no object for which their labours are united, they cease to collect honey and prepare wax, and in a short time they disappear and die. But if there be brood in the combs, the industry of the bees continues unabated; for by the proceeding which they follow, they know that their loss will be repaired. Having selected a worm, three days old, or less, they sacrifice three of the contiguous cells, that the cell of the worm, may be formed into one adapted to breed a queen. They next supply it with the necessary food, which is not the common farina, pollen, or bee bread, on which the young workers feed, but a peculiar paste or jelly, of a pungent taste, which is reserved for queens alone. When reached maturity, a queen comes forth, qualified to fulfil every indispensable function on which the preservation of many thousand lives depend. Working bees have therefore the power of effecting the metamorphosis of one of their own species, to avert the effects of a loss, which would prove the utter ruin of the whole colony. The sole function of the queen bee is, to perpetuate her species; but single, and unassisted by the workers, herself and her offspring would perish. Her fecundity is surprising. Swammerdam affirms, that she contains 50,000 eggs; and some authors advance, that she may be the mother of 100,000 bees in one season. In addition to the peculiarities, exhibited in her propagating young, she is marked by others of the most conspicuous description. She is watched and attended to; and to judge from appearances, sheltered and respected by the workers. Groups of them constantly encircle her; they supply her with honey, brush and lick her limbs; whenever she moves, they recede before her; and, according to the united sentiments of all, who have studied the nature of bees, pay her, what would be called real homage, could we allow them the prerogative of understanding. She is the object of the greatest attachment; her presence inspires them with new instincts, and animates them to labour; the permanent existence of a queen, in short, is the only security of the workers.

THE REPOSITORY.

From the London Monthly Magazine.

ROUSSEAU'S DEATH.

The manner of his death has been variously related. Some say that he committed suicide; others, that he was attacked with a fit of epilepsy; others, that he fell a victim to that unconquerable dejection, which for years had been preying on and withering the energies of his mind and body. In this state of doubt we shall, as a matter of course, incline to the charitable side and take as our guide a slight memoir penned a few days after his decease, and widely circulated throughout Paris. According to this narrative, Rousseau had been ailing for some weeks; but it was not until within a day or two of his death that he anticipated the slightest danger. His love of nature—and this, be it said to his honour, was an enthusiastic passion, that neither age nor infirmity could quench—remained with him to the last. He rambled daily to a summer house situated at the bottom of his garden, and there, seated with some favourite book in his hand, would send his thoughts abroad into eternity, on whose threshold he was even then unconsciously standing. A few friends who lived near him, and who, by respecting his infirmities, had, somehow or other, contrived to preserve his good opinion, occasionally called in to see him; and to them only was his approaching change apparent: he himself was alternately sanguine and desponding to the last. On the morning of his dissolution, he had risen sooner than usual, and after passing the earliest parts of the day in pain, grew considerably better towards evening, and requested to be wheeled out in a low garden chair towards his favourite summer house. The day until twelve o'clock had been clouded, but it cleared up at noon, and the freshness of the air, the hum of the insects, and the fragrant perfume of the flowers, as they lifted up their heads after the rain, revived the languid spirits of the invalid. For a few minutes he remained absorbed in thought, in which state he was found by a neighbour who had accidentally called in to pay him a visit. "See," said Rousseau, as he approached, "how beautifully the sun is setting! I know not why it is, but a presentiment has just come over me that I am not doomed to survive it. Yet I should scarcely like to go before it has set, for it will be a satisfaction to me—strange, perhaps, as it may seem to you—that we should both leave the world together." His friend (it is he himself that relates the story) was struck by the singular melancholy of this remark, more especially as the philosopher's countenance bore but too evident an impress of its probable truth. Accordingly he strove with officious kindness to divert the stream of Rousseau's thoughts: he talked to him of indifferent matters, hoping thereby that he would regain his cheerfulness, but was concerned to find that every attempt was vain. Rousseau, at all times an egotist, was now solely occupied in the contemplation of himself and his approaching change. His thoughts were immovably fixed on death, he felt, he repeatedly exclaimed, that he was fast declining; and every now and then, after closing his eyes for a minute or so, would languidly open them again, as if for the purpose of remarking what progress the sun had made towards the west. He remained in this state of stupor for a considerable time, when suddenly he shook it off, gazed about him with nearly all his wonted animation, and after bursting into a feeble rhapsody about his unwearied love for nature, turned full towards the sun, with the devotional aspect of a Parsee. By this time the evening had far advanced, and his friend endeavoured to persuade him to return into the house. But no; his last moments, he was resolved, should be spent in the open air. And they were so. Scarcely had the sun set when the eyes of Rousseau began also to close: his breath grew thicker, and was drawn at longer intervals; he strove to speak, but finding the effort vain, turned towards the friend at his elbow, and pointed with his hand in the direction of the red orb, which just at that moment dropped behind the horizon. This was his last feeble movement; an instant longer, and Rousseau had ceased to live.

SINGULAR EXHIBITION.

A writer in the Universal tells us that he has been a witness to a most singular feat at Madras. An old Bramin has found out the means of sitting upon air. His apparatus is—first, a plank supported by four pegs and forming a kind of sofa; second, a copper pipe, in which he puts a bamboo; and lastly, a crutch covered with leather. His first operations are concealed by a curtain; when it falls the Bramin is perceived sitting in the air, about four feet from the ground, resting only on the extremity of one hand on the crutch; and holding the other in the air. He remains in this position ordinarily only a quarter of an hour; but in compliment to the Governor of Madras, he remained forty minutes. When he wishes to descend, the curtain is raised, and he gets down in secret. There is then a sound heard as of air violently forced from a pipe. He does not exhibit for money, and has refused very tempting offers to proceed to England. [London Spectator.]

Some of our readers may not have sufficient faith to believe in this story of the French editor. We are not, however, of the number, for although we never heard of the experiment before, we will venture to say that we could perform it ourselves. Our solution of the phenomenon is, that the old Bramin is sustained by columns of air, forcibly impelled upwards through the four pegs of his sofa, which are hollow tubes. Any person who has seen the beautiful hydraulick experiments made in Liverpool by Phillipstall and others, will be at no loss to understand us. In those experiments a jet of water was employed which carried aloft on its point an egg, and other things which danced in the air in a very pleasing manner. More weighty substances, as chandeliers with lighted candles, were sustained in the same way, and if the impetus of the jet had been increased, a man might also have been borne aloft by the process. In our opinion this is the principle upon which the Bramin performs his surprising feat, substituting air for water; and the noise of air being violently forced through a pipe, when the operator descends, confirms our theory. We shall further explain our meaning by a more homely illustration. Schoolboys have a very ingenious and simple toy made from a piece of tobacco pipe, a pea, and a pin; the pin from which the head is taken, is fixed into the pea, and then passed into the pipe, upon the top of which it rests. Upon blowing at the bottom of the pipe tub, the pea will dance up and down very whimsically, not falling off in consequence of the shank of the pin. Now if a larger apparatus were employed, and air forced through a tube with the requisite impetus, a man seated upon an inverted cone or bowl might be borne aloft in the air as the Bramin is described to have been.

[London Mercury.]

THE SKETCH-BOOK.

THE JEWS OF YORK.

BY D'ISRAELI.

Among the most interesting passages of history, are those in which we contemplate an oppressed, yet sublime spirit, agitated by the conflict of two terrific passions: Implacable hatred attempting a resolute vengeance, while that impotent vengeance, with dignified and silent horror, sinks into the last expression of despair. In a degenerate nation, we may on such rare occasions, discover among them, a spirit superiour to its companions, and its fortune.

In the ancient and modern history of the Jews, we may find two kindred examples. I refer the reader for the more ancient narrative, to the second book of the Maccabees, chap. 14, v. 37. No feeble and unreflecting painting is presented in the simplicity of the original; I proceed to relate the narrative of the Jews of York.

When Richard the I. ascended the throne, the Jews, to conciliate the royal protection, brought their tributes. Many had hastened from remote parts of England, and appearing at Westminster, the court and the mob imagined that they had leagued to bewitch his Majesty. An edict was issued to forbid their presence at the coronation; but several whose curiosity was greater than their prudence, conceived that they might pass unobserved among the crowd, and ventured to insinuate themselves into the Abbey. Probably their voice and their visage alike betrayed them, for they were soon discovered; they flew diversely in great consternation, while many were dragged out with little remains of life.

A rumour spread rapidly through the city, that in honour of the festival, the Jews were to be massacred. The populace at once eager of royalty and riot, pillaged and burnt their houses, and murdered the devoted Jews. Benedict, a Jew of York, to save his life received baptism; and returning to that city, with his friend Jocenus, the most opulent of the Jews, died of his wounds. Jocenus and his servants narrated the late tragick circumstances to their neighbours, but where they hoped to move sympathy, they excited rage. The people at York soon gathered to imitate the people at London; and their first assault was on the house of the late Benedict, which having some strength and magnitude, contained his family and friends, who found their graves in its ruins. The alarmed Jews hastened to Jocenus, who conducted them to the governor of York Castle, and prevailed on him to afford them an asylum for their persons and effects. In the mean while their habitations were levelled, and their owners murdered; except a few unresisting beings, who unmanly in sustaining honour, were adapted to receive baptism.

The castle had sufficient strength for their defence; but a suspicion arising that the governor, who often went out, intended to betray them, they one day refused him entrance. He complained to the sheriff of the county, and the chiefs of the violent party, who stood deeply indebted to the Jews, uniting with him, orders were issued to attack the castle. The cruel multitude united with the soldiery, felt such a desire of slaughtering those they intended to despoil, that the sheriff, repenting of the order, revoked it, but in vain; Fanaticism and robbery once let loose, will satiate their appetency for blood and plunder. They solicited the aid of the superiour citizens, who, perhaps not owing quite so much money to the Jews, humanely refused it; but having addressed the clergy (the barbarous clergy of those days) were by them animated, conducted, and blest.

The leader of this rabble was a canon regular, whose zeal was so fervent, that he stood by them in his surplice, which he considered as a coat of mail, and reiteratedly exclaimed, "Destroy the enemies of Jesus." This spiritual laconism invigorated the arm of men, who perhaps wanted no other stimulative than the hope of obtaining the immense property of the besieged. It is related of this Canon, that every morning before he went to assist battering the walls, he swallowed a consecrated wafer. One day having approached too near, defended as he conceived by his surplice, this church militant was crushed by a heavy fragment of the wall, rolled from the battlement.

But the avidity of certain plunder prevailed over any reflection, which, on another occasion, the loss of so pious a leader might have raised. Their attacks continued; till at length the Jews perceived they could hold out no longer, and a council was called, to consider what remained to be done in the extremity of danger.

Among the Jews, their elder Rabbin was most respected. It has been customary with this people to invite for this place some foreigner, renowned among them for the depth of his learning, and the sanctity of his manners. At this time the Haham, or elder Rabbin, was a foreigner who had been sent over to instruct them in their laws, and was a person, as we shall observe, of no ordinary qualifications. When the Jewish council was assembled, the Haham rose, and addressed them in this manner—"Men of Israel! the God of our ancestors is omniscient, and there is no one who can say why doest thou this! This day he commands us to die for his law; for that law which we have cherished from the first hour it was given, which we have preserved pure throughout our captivity in all nations, and which for many consolations it has given us, and the eternal hope it communicates, can we do less than die! Posterity shall behold this book of truth, sealed with our blood; and our death, while it displays our sincerity, shall impart confidence to the wanderer of Israel. Death is before our eyes; and we have only to cluse an honourable and an easy one. If we fall into the hands of our enemies, which you know we cannot escape, our death will be ignominious and cruel; for these Christians, who picture the spirit of God in a dove, and confide in the meek Jesus, are athirst for our blood, and prowl around the castle like wolves. It is, therefore, my advice that we elude their tortures; that we ourselves should be our own executioners; and that we voluntarily surrender our lives to our creator. We trace the invisible Jehovah in his acts; God seems to call for us, but let us not be unworthy of that call. Suicide, on occasions like the present, is both rational and lawful, many examples are not wanting among our forefathers; as I advise, men of Israel! they have acted on similar occasions." Having said this, the old man sat down and went.

The assembly was divided in their opinions. Men of fortitude applauded its wisdom, but the pusillanimous murmured that it was a dreadful council.

Again the Rabbin rose, and spoke these few words in a firm and decisive tone. "My children! since we are not unanimous in our opinions, let those who do not approve of my advice, depart from this assembly!"—Some departed, but the greater number attached themselves to their venerable priest. They now employed themselves in consuming their valuables by fire; and every man fearful of trusting to the timid and irresolute hand of the women, first destroyed his wife and children, and then himself. Jocenus and the Rabbin alone remained. Their life was protracted to the last, that they might see every thing performed, according to their orders. Jocenus, being the chief Jew, was distinguished by the last mark of human respect, in receiving his death, from the consecrated hand of the aged Rabbin, who immediately after, performed the melancholy duty on himself.

All this was transacted in the depth of the night. In the morning the walls of the castle were found wrapt in flames, and only a few miserable and pusillanimous beings, unworthy of the sword, were seen on the battlements, pointing to their extinct brethren. When they opened the gates of the castle, these men verified the sage prediction of their late Rabbin; for the multitude, bursting through the solitary courts, found themselves defrauded of their hopes, and in a moment avenged themselves on the feeble wretches, who knew not how to die with honour.

Such is the narrative of the Jews of York, of whom the historian can only cursorily observe, that five hundred destroyed themselves; but it is the philosopher who inquires into the causes, and the manner of these glorious suicides. These are histories which meet the eye of few, yet of infinitely more advantage than those which are read by every one. We instruct ourselves in meditating on these scenes of heroic exertion; and if by such histories we make but a slow progress in chronology, our heart is however expanded with sentiment.

I admire not the stoicism of Cato, more than the fortitude of the Rabbin; or rather we should applaud that of the Rabbin much more; for Cato was familiar with the animating visions of Plato, and was the associate of Cicero and of Cæsar. The Rabbin had probably read only the Pentateuch, and mingled with companions of mean occupations, and meaner minds. Cato was accustomed to the grandeur of the mistress of the universe; and the Rabbin to the littleness of a provincial town. Men, like pictures, may be placed in an obscure and unfavourable light; but the finest picture, in the unilluminated corner, still retains the design and colouring of the master. My Rabbin is a companion for Cato. His history is a tale,

"Which Cato's self, had not disdained to hear."

CHARACTER.

CREVELIER.

In Emerson's "Letters from the Ægean," we find several particulars of the life of the celebrated corsair, Crevelier, whose exploits were, for twenty years, the terror of the Mediterranean, during the latter part of the seventeenth century. There is a savage grandeur in his story, which renders it interesting. "He was a native of the South of France, and his youth, till the age of five and twenty, had been spent in trading from Marseilles to the Morea, and the various ports on the coasts of Turkey. Here he had gained the most accurate information of the situation of the Greeks, and the grinding oppression of their Ottoman masters: he saw, too, their evident discontent and repinings, and the inability of the Turks to keep them in proper subjection, owing to the daring presence of the Knights of Malta, who had driven almost every Moslem from the Cyclades. Crevelier was a man of acute observation, and the most grasping and restless ambition; the memory of the easy dominion obtained by Saffute, and held by his descendants, was still fresh in the minds of the adventurers of Europe; and it was only a few years before that the Marquis de Fleuri, a Marseillaise, with a small force, had attempted the capture of Naxos, and was prevented only by the presence of a fleet of the Venetians, who had made it an article of peace with the Porte that they should maintain a squadron in the Ægean for the protection of the Turkish possessions. Crevelier, fired with the same object, employed his superiour local information regarding the Greeks to secure his success. The Mainotes, the modern inhabitants of ancient Sparta, have been to the present hour the most turbulent and rebellious portion of the population of Greece, nor have the arms of all the Sultans, since Mahomet the Second, succeeded in thoroughly subduing them, or destroying their spirit of impatient independence. It was by their alliance that the adventurous corsair resolved on attempting the conquest of a portion of the Peloponnesus: and, for that purpose, he entered into a treaty with Liberaki, the chief Maina. By his advice, Crevelier passed up the Gulf of Kalokythia, and with 500 men laid seige to a castle upon the shore, which was held by a garrison of Turks. Here he was joined by a party of his allies; but Liberaki, instead of bringing, as he had promised, 5,000 armed followers, appeared before the castle with merely 800 attendants, and even those unprovided with arms or ammunition. Crevelier was not, however, to be daunted by one disappointment,—he united his hand with those of the Greeks, and intrepidly commenced the assault. During five successive days, his efforts to expel the Turks were unavailing, and although he has succeeded in making several breaches in the wall, and in defeating the garrison in every sally which they attempted, still he was almost as far as ever from attaining possession of the fort. Besides, his allies were rather an incumbrance than an aid to him: they were totally deficient in courage and enthusiasm in an open assault, and Crevelier was on the point of abandoning the attempt, and betaking himself again to sea, when, on the morning of the sixth day, a Maltese galley, manned by a body of the Knights, entered the bay, and cast anchor beside him. In passing by Zante they had heard of his expedition into the Morea, and they had hurried to his assistance. But, unfortunately, they only arrived in time to witness his defeat. The Mainotes, alarmed at the appearance of the Knights of St. John, and aware that they would not tolerate their supineness, as the weakness of the French had forced them to do, betook themselves in a body to their mountains, and abandoned the siege to the strangers. The Turks now gained fresh confidence by the sight of the departing host, and issued in a body from the fortress, drove the troops of Crevelier to their ships, and forced the Maltese, after sustaining heavy losses, to re-embark, weigh anchor, and steer from the Gulf. Hugo now saw that the enterprise on which he had staked his fortunes was thwarted, and mad with disappointment, he resolved on abandoning his home and his country, and becoming a corsair amidst the seas that had witnessed his defeat. In the course of a very short time he had collected round him a fleet of twenty sail, manned by Italians, Greeks, Mainotes, and Slavonians, who had joined his flag, and with these he pursued his course of lawless rapine. No corner of the Ægean was safe from his presence, he swept from shore to shore, and passed from isle to isle, with the gloom of a spirit, and the speed of the lightning. One by one the whole circle of the islands became his tributaries, and at stated periods the galleys of Crevelier were seen entering the harbours of the Archipelago, to receive his annual imposts, and on their ready compliance with his demands, returning again in peace to the retreats of their chieftain.

His career, however was unmarked by murder, and his excursions unstained by needless bloodshed. He was in fact, rather a favourite with the Greeks, nor had he in any case proceeded to use violence towards them, save in the solitary instance of the island of Andros. The natives had insulted his officers and refused to contribute the sums which he demanded, but in the silence of midnight, the galleys of Hugo cast anchor beneath their city; he landed sword in hand, and ere morning dawned, had pillaged it from the cliffs to the sea; the houses of the inhabitants, were robbed of their wealth, and the warehouses of the merchants were burst open and emptied by the pirates. Crevelier sailed off with a booty sufficient to have enriched his family for generations: nor did he ever restore a single crown, save the property of one French gentleman, which he returned to him at the request of the Marquis de Nointel, the ambassador to the Porte from the Court of France. For fourteen years he continued to infest the shores of Turkey, nor were the efforts of the Captain Pacha ever able to discover his haunts or destroy his squadron. His favourite retreat was, however, the island of Paros, and it is said that the fortress near Marmora, and the tales of the islanders relating to Crevelier, gave to Lord Byron the idea of Conrad, and the scene of the Pirate's Isle. Amidst all his exploits, his chief d'œuvre was the taking of Petra, one of the principal towns in the island of Metelin, which he accomplished in the year 1676, nor has the unfortunate district yet recovered from the effects of his devastating visit. His followers landed on the shore in the evening, and having marched for the distance of three leagues into the interior, scaled the walls at midnight. The terrified Moslems, awaking from their slumbers, fled in haste to conceal themselves, and abandoned their houses to spoliation and plunder. During three hours, the band of the Corsairs were employed in securing their prey, and at daylight returned to Crevelier, who had remained in the galleys to guard the shores till their arrival. They brought with them a horde of five hundred slaves, and a quantity of plate, rich garments, silken carpets, precious stuffs, gems and money, whose value is stated at a sum beyond calculation or credit. Hugo was about to abandon his lawless pursuits forever, and betake himself to home and retirement, and, as a finishing blow against the detested Ottomans, he resolved on concluding his career by the plunder of a rich caravan, which was expected to pass from Alexandria to Constantinople. His squadron was despatched on the look-out to the various islands in the vicinity of Cyprus, whilst he himself retired with two other galleys to the harbour of Stampalia to await their report, before completing his decisive arrangements for attacking the convoy. But here his career was destined to close: he had on board his vessel, as his valet, a Savoyard whom he had rescued from slavery, and imagined he had attached to him by long years of kindness. One day he had given him a blow in anger, but his resentment soon died away, and he fancied it was forgotten. The wretch had, however, treasured up the wrong, as a miser guards the talisman of his fortunes, nor was an opportunity long wanting to revenge it. Crevelier unconscious of injury, had often entrusted to the miscreant the key of his sainte barbe, or powder-room, and on the day he was about to sail from Stampalia, the Savoyard had neglected to return it to him. He went below, attached a slow match to one of the massy barrels and returning on deck, rowed ashore with one or two of his companions, with a smile on his treacherous lips, and lightness at his vid heart. The corsair was seated in his cabin on the poop, with the two other commanders, when the match communicated. The vessel, bursting into a thousand atoms, was hurled in the air, in the midst of a volcano of flames and blazing timbers, and, when the terrific explosion had subsided, their bodies, and those of two hundred of their murdered companions, were washed by the agitated waves on the shores of the island. The name of Crevelier is still mentioned with awe by the seamen of Mycene and Milo; but admiration rather than terror attaches to his memory; his story I have often heard from the sailors of the Greek navy, and a sketch of his history will be found in the volume of old Robert, the Jesuit, who professed to have met him in the Ægean, and to speak of his exploits from personal knowledge of their author.

MISCELLANY.

From the London Mirror.

A CHAPTER ON KISSING.

BY A PROFESSOR OF THE ART.

"Away with your fictions of flimsy romance,
These tissues of falsehood which folly has wove;
Give me the mild gleam of the soul breathing glance,
And the rapture which dwells in the first kiss of love."

There is no national custom so universally and so justly honoured with esteem and respect, "winning golden opinions from all sorts of people," as kissing. Generally speaking, we discover that a usage which finds favour in the eyes of the vulgar, is despised and detested by the educated, the refined, and the proud; but this elegant practice forms a brilliant exception to a rule otherwise tolerably absolute. Kissing possesses infinite claims to our love, claims which no other custom in the wide world can even pretend to advance. Kissing is an endearing, affectionate, ancient, rational, and national mode of displaying the thousand glowing emotions of the soul;—it is traced back by some as far as the termination of the siege of Troy, for say they, "Upon the return of the Grecian warriors, their wives met them, and joined their lips together with joy." There are some, however, who give the honour of having invented kissing to Rouix, or Rowena, the daughter of Hengist, the Saxon; a Dutch historian tells us, she, "pressed the beaker with her lipkins (little lips,) and saluted the amorous Vortigern with a husgin (little kiss,)" and this latter authority we ourselves feel most inclined to rely on; deeply anxious to secure to our fair countrywomen the honour of having invented this delightful art.

Numberless are the authors who have written and spoken with rapture on English kissing.

"The women of England," says Polydore Virgil, "not only salute their relations with a kiss, but all persons promiscuously; and this ceremony they repeat, gently touching them with their lips, not only with grace, but without the least immodesty. Such, however, as are of the blood-royal do not kiss their inferiours, but offer the back of the hand, as men do, by way of saluting each other."

Erasmus too—the grave, the phlegmatick Erasmus, melts into love and playful thoughts, when he thinks of kisses. "Did you but know, my Faustus," he writes to one of his friends, "the pleasure which England affords, you would fly here on winged feet, and if your gout would not allow you, you would wish yourself a Dædalus. To mention to you one among many things, here are nymphs of the loveliest looks, good humoured, and whom you would prefer even to your favourite Muses. Here also prevails a custom never enough to be commended, that wherever you come, every one receives you with a kiss, and when you take your leave, every one gives you a kiss; when you return, kisses again meet you. If any one leaves you they give you a kiss; if you meet any one, the first salutation is a kiss; in short, wherever you go, kisses every where abound; which, my Faustus, did you once taste how very sweet and how very fragrant they are, you would not, like Solon, wish for ten years exile in England, but would desire to spend there the whole of your life."

Oh what miracles have been wrought by a kiss! Philosophers, stoicks, hermits, and misers have become men of the world, of taste, and of generosity; idiots have become wise; and, truth to tell, wise men idiots—warriors have turned cowards and cowards brave—statesmen have become poets, and political economists sensible men. Oh, wonderful art, which can produce such strange effects! to thee, the magick powers of steam seem commonplace and tedious; the wizard may break his rod in despair, and the king his sceptre, for thou canst effect in a moment what they may vainly labour years to accomplish. Well may the poet celebrate thy praises in words that breathe and thoughts that burn; well may the minstrel fire with sudden inspiration and strike the lute with rapture when he thinks of thee; well might the knight of bygone times brave every danger when thou wert his bright reward; well might Vortigern resign his kingdom, or Mark Antony the world, when it was thee that tempted.

AMUSEMENT.

From the New-England Weekly Review.

Amusement is the natural and inseparable companion of leisure and affluence. Moralists may declaim, cynicks may sneer, bigots may grate their teeth, but the active spirit of man will never be content without amusement. We envy not the feeling of that man who can wrap around him the mantle of indifference, and stalk through life, regardless of those delights which the lavish hand of Nature is every where presenting for his enjoyment. Those principles, however sacred their pretensions, which never permit the smile of festivity to unbend the brow, should be distrusted—nay more, they should be eschewed.

Amidst the charms of social amusement, the anxieties of life release for a time their painful hold upon the thoughts; the feelings go forth from the open heart to mingle with the flowing feelings of those around us; and the spirit is inspired with fresh elasticity and vigor to resume the severer duties of society.

The passions are the main springs, which give impulse and energy to man. For these the most proper food is well-regulated amusement. You may, indeed, enslave them to the drudgery of money-making but they will ever be constrained and unwilling servants, if not permitted now and then to play at large beyond the narrow routine of business. And it well becomes those who would coerce our natural propensities within the most scanty limits, and who set up to reform the manners of the age, to consider well the innate strength of the human passions, and to inquire with caution whether they can manage the leviathan before they attempt to put a ring in his nose.

To the casuist we leave the province of determining what amusements best suit the economy of human nature, and by what chilling formalities self-denial may require that all our enjoyments should be adulterated. We are not the keepers of our neighbours' conscience. Content to direct our own license by the dictates of a conscientious morality, when that share of life's duties, which falls to our department is honestly discharged, we have yet to learn, by what authority another is authorized to say to us: "The insipid flowers on the common of life you may be indulged to crop, but venture not to extend your hand to those fairer, more fragrant, and richer blossoms which Providence has, indeed, placed apparently for the gratification of man; but which we have discovered are pregnant with ruin."

Free to avow ourselves, on all proper occasions, the friends of rational and well-regulated amusement, we can not sit silently by, when the most innocent enjoyments are arraigned and condemned by those sour temperaments, who would mingle their own acidity with the sweet cup of every fellow being's pleasures.

THE GATHERER.

FEVER AGUE.

I visited Kerrund twice, in 1800 and 1810. The first time, the chief of that place, Hedayet Kooli Khan, saw one of the gentlemen of the mission lying in the tent ill of a quatern ague, he begged I would cure him; and on being asked what was his remedy, said he would beat him with sticks till he was well. The invaled declined the experiment, at which the chief was not a little offended, and brought a number of his followers to swear that they had been recovered by his blows. When I last visited this place, Hedayet Kooli was dead. He had left ten sons; the eldest, Mahomed Ali Khan, was chief of the tribe. I asked him if he had inherited his father's knowledge of medicine. "My practice," he said, "is equally successful. I tie them up by the heels when the cold fit is on, and bastinate them most severely, scolding them at the same time, so as to produce heat and terror, instead of a cold fit." "And you succeed." Always. "Have you any patients but your own followers?" "A few: those in the neighbourhood who have any sense send to me when they are ill of the ague." "Can any of your brothers cure fevers?" "No, no!" replied he, quickly; "that is a gift of privilege confined exclusively to the head of the family."

MARRIAGE.

There is an excellent book by Defoe, the author of Robinson Crusoe, called The Complete English Tradesman; and in it an admirable chapter, entitled, "Of the Tradesman's marrying too soon." In this he says, "It was a prudent provision which our ancestors made in the indentures, of tradesmen's apprenticeship. Doubtless our forefathers were better acquainted with the advantages of frugality than we are. Hence we find them very careful to prescribe to their youth such rules and methods of frugality and good husbandry, as they thought would conduce to their prosperity. Among these rules this was one of the chief, viz: "That they should not wed before they had sped. When a young tradesman, says the same author, in Holland or Germany goes a courting, the first question the young woman asks him is, "are you able to pay charges?" That is to say, in English, are you able to keep a wife when you have got her! What a world of misery it would prevent, if the young women in all countries would stick to the wisdom of that question! Marriage is not made of mushrooms, but of good round cakes, is another of the pithy sayings by which our ancestors conveyed the same great rule of prudence.

[Companion of the Almanack.

BEN JONSON INSPIRED BY WINE.

The following curious memoranda, by Ben Jonson, are now preserved at Dulwich College:—
"Mem. I laid the plot of my "Volpone," and wrote most of it, after a present of ten dozen of palm sack from my very good Lord T—: that play I am positive will live to posterity, and be acted—when I and envy be friends—with applause.
"Mem. The first speech in my "Catilina," spoken by Sylla's ghost, was writ after I parted with my friend at the Devil Tavern [near Temple Bar, where Child's Place now stands.] I had drunk well that night, and had brave notions. There is a scene in that play which I think is flat. I resolve to drink no water with my wine.
"Mem. Upon the 20th of May, the King (heaven reward him!) sent me a hundred pounds. At that time I went often to the Devil; and, before I had spent forty pounds of it, wrote my "Alchymist."

"Mem. "The Devil an Ass," "The Tale of a Tub," and some other comedies, which did not succeed, written by me in winter; honest Ralph died, when I and my boys drank bad wine at the Devil. [Athenæum.

TURKISH PROPHECY.

The following is extracted from a book of Prophecies, called Muhamedys, which is held in veneration by the Turks:—"The Turkish emperor shall conquer Rome, and make the pope patriarch of Jerusalem; and he shall, some time after, profess the Mahomedan faith! Christ shall then come, and show the Christians their error in not having accepted the Alcoran; and instruct them that the dove which came down from heaven was not the Holy Ghost, but was Mahomet, who shall be again upon earth thirty years, and confirm the Alcoran by new miracles. After that time the power of the Turks shall decline, till they retire into Desert Arabia, and then there shall be an end of the world. Their overthrow shall be accomplished by a people from the north, called caumico fer, (yellow-haired sons.) The ruin of Constantinople shall happen in sultan Mahomet's time; and then the Turks shall be reduced to so few in number, that sixty Turkish women shall have but one husband among them."

DRESS OF THE GREEK WOMEN

IN THE ISLAND OF MYLO, IN THE LEVANT.

Their head is enveloped in a handkerchief folded somewhat fantastically, so as to form a turban with a kind of elevated cone at the top; and a shawl of no ordinary dimensions being flung around their shoulders, is braced by a girdle at the waist, whilst its superfluous folds are fashioned into a capacious bag behind. The petticoats descended no farther than the knee, which is concealed by a pair of drawers, reaching as low as the half of the leg, and the foot being first swathed in three or four successive pairs of stockings, is thrust into the toe of a fancifully ornamented shoe with an unusually high heel. Four or five gowns and other garments, heaped on with less taste than profusion, complete this singular masquerade, and all are secured at the waist by a velvet stomacher, richly embroidered, and glittering with glided spangles. The hair of the young females is first plaited into long triple bades, and then twisted round the head, interlaced with strings of zechins, mahmondis, and other golden coins, or left to flow gracefully behind them.

THE TOMB OF HAFIZ.

Like the tomb of Saadi, that of Hafiz was said to have been placed on the spot which he frequented while alive; and his grave, it is believed, stands at the foot of a cypress planted by his own hands. It is only six months since this sacred tree had fallen down, after having stood so many years; and though it was sawn off, the trunk is still preserved above ground, to be shown to visitors. The tomb, as to its present structure, is a recent work, and is ascribed to the munificence of Kurream Khan, not more than forty years since. The period at which Hafiz wrote is about four hundred and forty years ago. The original copy of his works, written by his own hands, was kept here, chained to the tomb, until about a century since, when Asheraff, the king of the Affghans, took Ispahan, and afterwards Shiraz, in the reign of Shah Sultan Hussein; and the book of Hafiz was then taken by him to Candahar, where it is now said to be. [Buckingham's Travels in Persia.

THE MISERIES OF WAR.

A female was lying on a bed of green silk; under her head was a pillow of the same material; her right arm had, no doubt, cradled her babe, and her babe, and her left was extended as though for the purpose of keeping her child close to her. A large shell had perforated the tiled roof, and having made its way through three floors, had gone through the foot of the bed, and penetrated some depth into the fourth floor. A piece of this shell had gone through the woman's forehead, carrying away a great part of the head, so that her death, according to the opinion of the medical man who saw her, must have been instantaneous. The lower part of the child's body, from the hips downward, was entirely gone; but, strange to say, its mother's nipple still hung in the left corner of its mouth, and its little right hand still held by its mother's clothes, which, probably, it had grasped at the first noise of the shell.

[Military Career of an officer of 87th Regiment.

AN INKEEPER'S REGRET

Joseph H. Emperour of Germany, travelling incognito, stopped at an inn in the Netherlands, where it being a fair time, and the houses crowded, he readily slept in an out house, after a slender repast of bacon and eggs, for which he paid three shillings and sixpence. A few hours after, some of his Majesty's suite coming up, the landlord appeared very uneasy at not having known the rank of his guest. "Pshaw, man," said one of his attendants, "Joseph is accustomed to such adventures, and will think nothing of it." "Very likely," replied mine host, "but I shall; I can never forgive myself for having an emperor in my house, and letting him off with three and sixpence.

THE RULING PASSION STRONG IN DEATH.

The favourite studies and amusements of the learned La Mothe le Vayer consisted in accounts of the most distant countries. He gave a striking proof of the influence of this master-passion, when death hung upon his lips. Bernier, the celebrated traveller, entering, and drawing the curtains of his bed to take his eternal farewell, the dying man turning to him, with a faint voice, inquired, "Well, my friend, what news from the Great Mogul!"

Beer was first introduced into England in 1492: into Scotland as early as 1482. By the statute of King James I. one full quart of the best beer or ale was to be sold for one penny, and two quarts of small beer for one penny.

In the museum of Stuttgart, is a portrait of the Countess of Salzburg, who, at the age of 50 years, had mustachios, whiskers, and a beard, as long and as black as those of any man.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, MAY 23, 1829.

☞ The Office of the Masonick Record is removed to No. 3 Beaver street.

The anti-masonick members of the legislature of this State have published an address to their constituents. It occupies five newspaper columns, and is made up of the hypocritical cant, silly falsehoods, and absurd charges: which are the common characteristics of all the productions of the faction. We have purposely neglected to notice the farce acted by the authors of this address, in the legislative halls during the last winter;—expecting that something like the production now before us would soon proceed from them, and being willing to hear their own explanation of their mysterious and stubborn silence upon the subject with which they professed to be so minutely acquainted, and which in order to smooth over their moral and political deformities, and make it a prejudice of the people subservient to their personal interests, they had promised their constituents thoroughly and effectually to investigate. We have neither time nor room to day to notice these gentlemen as they should be noticed, nor to enter into a formal examination of the budget of falsehoods and hypocritical gravity which they have addressed to their constituents. We shall take the subject up next week; and in the mean time shall merely observe that we do not believe a set of men more unprincipled in their views than these soi-disant patriots ever disgraced a legislative body.

GREEK SCHOOLS. We received some days since a circular containing a "plan for promoting common school education in Greece, adopted by the Greek School Committee" in the city of New-York. The committee propose to establish—

I. A HIGH SCHOOL, or NATIONAL ACADEMY, at which young men may be trained for superintending Elementary Schools, and for the study of useful professions.

II. A HIGH SCHOOL FOR FEMALES, designed primarily for the instruction of those who may become teachers.

III. Several ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS, as models of the most approved methods of instruction.

The plan is followed by an address of some length, which we should be happy to publish if the space which we are at liberty to devote to such subjects would permit it. The plan is considered simple and practicable, the proposed field being now a free country, and the whole population thirsting for improvement; cheap, as the expense will not exceed ten or twelve thousand dollars annually, for a few years; timely, because "the Greeks, exhausted by a terrible war, with most of the institutions which existed before the revolution destroyed, cannot, for years to come, relieve themselves from that state of ignorance and degradation which threatens its rising race," and "it promises great results, not only upon Greece, but ultimately upon the whole region of the ancient Roman Empire." The committee recommend the formation of committees of correspondence in the different cities and towns; and "especially do they cherish the hope that Associations of Ladies, for the support of the Female High School, and for the general improvement of the sex, will be formed, wherever it is felt, how indispensable are female intelligence and virtue to a nation's glory and felicity." If the encouragement which is confidently anticipated shall be extended to the objects of the committee, it is intended to send out to Greece four or five able instructors in the coming Autumn. Mr. Arthur Tappan, 122 Pearl-street, New-York, is the General Treasurer, and it is desired that all remittances be made to him as soon as convenient; and that the earliest notice of the formation of Auxiliary committees be forwarded to the Rev. M. Bruen, Corresponding Secretary.

The venerable JOHN JAY died at his residence, at Bedford, in Westchester county, on Sunday last, in the 84th year of his age. As Mr. Jay had lived a retired private life for more than twenty years previous to his death, it is possible that many of our readers are but slightly acquainted with his name and character. His career in life, however, is so closely connected with the history of our country, that a knowledge of the one necessarily involves, in some degree, an acquaintance with the other. We have selected an excellent article on the public and private character of Mr. Jay, which we shall publish next week; the necessity of making our columns various is the only reason of its exclusion from our present number.

When the news of Mr. Jay's death was received in New-York, on Wednesday morning last, the Supreme and Superior Courts adjourned for the day, and the members of the Bar resolved to wear crape during the period of thirty days, in testimony of their respect for his public and private worth.

ITEMS.

Greatness. From the creation of the world to the second of May, '29, greatness has been the constant aim of all people, in all nations. Nimrod wanted to make himself great by hunting; Saul, by fighting and prophesying; David, by slinging stones into men's heads; Aristotle, by syllogisms; Socrates, by asking Yankee questions; Caesar, by swimming with his commentaries in his hand, &c. Among the Greeks, the loudest talker and the hardest knocker of heads was the greatest man; the Romans considered silence and surliness one of the materials of greatness; the modern Italians think the finest unavoccing is the nearest approach to greatness; the French once believed that dancing divinely and taking citadels were the very height of greatness; on the other hand, the English placed greatness in knowledge and steadiness—that is to say, the knowledge of cooking a beef steak and the immovable phalanx of a bayonet charge. These ideas of greatness are now known to be all fictitious. Judge Forman's bank scheme is not even great. Real Greatness, after all, is only found in length, breadth, or thickness, and in this quality the Canadian Giant, now at Tammany Hall, is perhaps the greatest man of the age. He is the only true great man we ever saw, and beats every thing ancient or modern.

[N. Y. Enquirer.]

Curiosities of the Post-Office. A letter passed through the post-office on Monday, post marked "Georgetown, D. C. May 9, paid," and superscribed as follows:

"W—— L——, esq.

down at the Locks. If he ant there, send this to Vitoc; he's a droll chicken. Lockport, Niagara co."

On the reverse—

"Just sober enough to but on the seal."

This remarkable epistle, doubtless on account of the importance of the contents, was sealed with three seals. The first bearing the vignette of a dog, with the motto, "when this dog barks, my friendship shall end." Second vignette, a pair of scissors, open, with the motto, "We part to meet again." The other we suppose was thought very witty, but we cannot describe it.

We hope some agent of the Temperance society will set off for Georgetown without delay. [N. Y. Jour. Com.]

Texas. A gentleman who has recently returned from Texas, states that the country is fast filling with Americans, and that several sections of it have been well settled. The state of society is almost entirely pastoral, and an individual's wealth is rated by the number of his horses, mules, and horned cattle. Four lawyers are already settled at San Felipe, Austin's principal establishment, and courts are regularly held there. Several fugitives from the United States have been given up to our authorities, and transgressors against their own laws are rigidly punished.

Eccentric Liberty. Some individual in Massachusetts, who chuses to remain incognito, has sent to the address of our Publick Treasury, a box containing two hundred and fifty Family Prayer Books, with a request that the same may be distributed "among all the members of Government and Courts of Justice." He states that the donation is intended for good and to encourage pure religion. The donor enclosed to the Treasurer, money to pay the expense of transportation, asking him to appropriate the overplus, if any, for the relief of some destitute object. [Raleigh (N. C.) Register.]

To encourage the working of the mines, a decree has been issued by Bolivar, exempting from every kind of military duty, the directors, overseers, miners, runners, and other persons, who may be employed in the construction of buildings, engines, &c. for the miners, whether of metals, or precious stones, or who may be engaged in the business of working them.

Case of Stephenson. Mr. Wilson, the gentleman who was despatched to this country with the necessary documents for the arrest of Rowland Stephenson, has received orders from the Commissioners of Bankruptcy in London, not to pursue the fugitive any farther; they being convinced that he has no property with him. The £1000 reward has been recalled, and all proceedings against him arrested, except those at the instance of the Ex-Sheriff Parkins. [N. Y. Journal of Commerce.]

Berlin, April 4. The celebrated collection of Hebrew books, (among which are 1000 manuscripts) known by the name of the Oppenheim Library, for which no acceptable offer had been made for forty years (during which time it has been at Hamburg,) is now going to Oxford, that university having purchased it for the sum it is said, of $11,000.

The Hon. Wm. C. Rives, of Virginia, has been appointed Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to the Court of France, in the place of James Brown, who has asked permission to return.

Sabbath Laws in Connecticut. A bill has been passed in the Legislature of Connecticut for repealing the eighth section of the Sabbath law of that state, prohibiting labour and recreation on days of publick fasting and thanksgiving on penalty of a fine.

Relicks of other ages. A jar containing an account of the expedition of La Montan, in 1644, from Fort Frontenac, to Contream was recently drawn out of the waters of one of the bays of Lake Ontario, by fishermen.

An unexplained Motive. An Irish paper, in giving an account of a suicide committed by a man named Michael Ryan, who was to have been hung the following morning, at Carlow, says—"No possible motive can be assigned for the rash act."

Ibrahim Pacha, of Egypt has thrown his army into great confusion, by ordering them to cut off their beard.

The Duke of Wellington has lately purchased an estate for £250,000, more than a million of dollars.

ANTI-MASONRY. The Madison Recorder and Observer says, "that Solomon Root, the champion of anti-masonry, in Madison, who has figured so much in the society to which he belongs, to carry anti-masonry into the church, and who was on their assembly ticket last fall, and received a majority of twenty-eight votes in his town, was run for supervisor and lost his election, having a majority of 110 against him."

How fond the Solomons are of anti-masonry.

DIED,

It is our melancholy lot to record the death of Mrs. FRANCES S. WATSON, wife of Winslow C. Watson, esq. of Plattsburgh, N. Y. and daughter of the Hon. Richard Skinner, of Manchester. Vt. She died at her father's residence on the 26th of April, in her 21st year. To intellectual powers of the highest order she united highly engaging manners, and the most amiable and interesting moral qualities. The blighting of hopes so fair and a loveliness so endearing as centered in, and clustered round her, would at any time have been exceedingly afflicting, not only to her family, but to a large circle of friends,—but an interest doubly deep and tender has been given to this painful event by the suddenness of her exit and the affecting circumstances attending it. [Bennington Times.]

MASONICK CALENDAR.

[Regular meetings in the city of Albany, at the Masonick Hall.]

Temple Encampment, 2d Friday in each month.

Temple Chapter, 2d and 4th Tuesday in each month.

Temple Lodge, 1st and 2d Tuesday in each month.

Mount Vernon Lodge, 1st and 3d Thursday in each month.

Masters Lodge, 1st and 3d Wednesday in each month.

ODD FELLOWS' CALENDAR.

[Regular meetings in the city of Albany.]

Hope Lodge, Monday evening in each week, at Montgomery Hall.

Philanthropic Lodge, Wednesday evening in each week, corner of Lodge and State-streets, over Osborn and Grays.

Clinton Lodge, Friday evening in each week, Masonick Hall.

LADIES' MAGAZINE, conducted by Mrs. Sarah J. Hale, and published monthly by Putnam & Hunt, 41, Washington-st. Boston—and by Bourne, at the Depository of Arts, 359 Broadway, New York. & Thomas T. Ash, 130 Chestnut-st. Philadelphia. Each number will contain about 50 pages of original matter, the whole making a beautifully executed octavo volume of 600 pages. Price three dollars per annum, to be paid on delivery of the third number.

The contents of the Ladies' Magazine will be an original miscellany, calculated to improve the taste and foster the talents and virtues of women; at the same time particular regard will be paid to the diffusions of that knowledge of our own country, its scenery and history, and of character and manners of its inhabitants, which Americans of either sex, should be careful to acquire. But no sectional prejudices are admitted to interfere with the spirit of the work, which is intended to be strictly American.

The constantly increasing patronage which this work has received, during the year it has been before the publick, is the best criterion of its merits. The Ladies' Magazine is now circulated in almost every city and state in the Union.

Contents of The Ladies' Magazine, for May, 1829:—Original Miscellany—The Manuscript, No. IV. Lady Aralla Johnson; The Nocturnal Rescue; Recollections, No.

My friend Mary Willie; Leaves from a Scrap Book; Letter from a Mother, to her newly married Daughter; Miss Sedgwick's Novels, Redwood, New England Tale, Hope Leslie, &c.; Fashions; Ladies' Temperance Societies. Original Poetry—"This is not your Rest;" Monticello; The Flower of the Hamlet; Home of Youth; "One hour with Thee;" Birth Days. Literary Notices—Miscellaneous Prose Works of Sir Walter Scott; Memoirs of Mrs. Huntington; Paley's Theology Illustrated; North American Review; Journal of Education; American Monthly Magazine; Edinburgh Review; Quarterly Review; To Readers and Correspondents.

W. C. LITTLE, Agent Albany.

THE WESTERN MONTHLY REVIEW, is published in Cincinnati, Ohio, at the close of every month. Each number will contain 56 octavo pages—making annually a volume of 672 pages. Gentlemen disposed to patronize this work, are requested to enclose Three Dollars to the Publisher, when the numbers will be regularly forwarded according to the directions given.

Contents of The Western Monthly Review, for April, 1829: Schism in the Methodist Church; Inland Trade with New Mexico; The Doctrine of Temperaments; Biography of Dr. Parr; The Philosophy of Human Knowledge; Liberty and Liberal Education; The Mentor; A Universal Language; Discussion between Messrs. Owen and Campbell; American Bible Society.

W. C. LITTLE, Agent Albany.

GROCERIES, &c. The subscriber having taken the stand recently occupied by D. P. Marshall, corner of State and Dean streets, offers to his friends and the publick, a large and general assortment of GROCERIES, consisting of teas, sugars, spices, liquors, and every other article in the line, of the first quality, and on as reasonable terms as can be furnished in the city.

ROLAND ADAMS.

Albany, May 23. 1829. 17 3m.

BOARDING.—Six or eight gentlemen can be accommodated with board and lodging, on reasonable terms, in a central part of the city. Apply at Mrs. Goodwin's, centre west building, Wm. James Row, Howard street. May 18.

POETRY.

THE ICEBERG.

BY J. O. ROCKWELL.

'T was night—our anchored vessel slept
Out on the glassy sea;
And still as heaven the waters kept,
And golden bright—as he,
The setting sun, went sinking slow
Beneath the eternal wave;
And the ocean seemed a pall to throw
Over the monarch's grave.

There was no motion of the air
To raise the sleeper's tress,
And no wave building winds were there,
On ocean's loveliness;
But ocean mingled with the sky
With such an equal hue,
That vainly strove the wildered eye
To part their gold and blue.

And ne'er a ripple of the sea
Came on our steady gaze,
Save when some timorous fish stole out
To bathe in the woven blaze,—
When floating in the light that played
All over the resting main,
He would sink beneath the wave, and dart
To his deep blue home again.

Yet while we gazed that sunny eve
Across the twinkling deep,
A form came ploughing the golden wave,
And rending its holy sleep;
It blushed bright red, while growing on
Our fixed, half fearful gaze,
But it wandered down, with its golden crown,
And its robe of sunny rays.

It seemed like molten silver, thrown
Together in floating flame;
And as we looked, we named it then,
The fount whence all colours came:
There were rainbows furled with a careless grace,
And the brightest red that glows,
The purple amethyst there had place,
And the hues of the full blown rose.

And the vivid green, as the sun-lit grass
Where the pleasant rain hath been;
And the ideal hues that thought-like pass
Through the minds of fanciful men;
They beamed so clear—and that form moved on,
Like one from a burning grave;
And we dared not think it a real thing,
But for the rustling wave.

The sun just lingered in our view,
From the burning edge of ocean,
When by our bark that bright one passed
With a deep disturbing motion:
The far down waters shrank away,
With a gurgling rush upheaving,
And the lifted waves grew wildly pale
The ocean's bosom heaving.

Yet as it passed our bending stern,
In its throne-like glory going,
It crushed on a hidden rock, and turned
Like an empire's overthrowing.
The upturn waves rolled hoar,—and huge
The far thrown undulations
Swelled out in the sun's last lingering smile,
And fell, like battling nations.

THE DEAD MARINER.

BY GEORGE D. PRENTICE.

Sleep on—sleep on—above thy corse
The winds their sabbath keep—
The wave is round thee—and thy breast
Heaves with the heaving deep;
O'er thee mild Eve her beauty flings,
And there the white gull lifts her wings,
And the blue Halcyon loves to lave
Her plumage in thy holy wave.

Sleep on—no willow o'er thee bends
With melancholy air,
No violet springs, nor dewy rose
Its soul of love lays bare;
But there the sea-flower bright and young
Is sweetly o'er thy slumbers flung,
And like a weeping mourner fair,
The pale flag hangs its tresses there.

Sleep on—sleep on—the glittering depths
Of ocean's coral caves
Are thy blight urn—thy requiem,
The music of its waves;—

The purple gems forever burn
In fadeless beauty round thy urn,
And pure and deep as infant love,
The blue sea rolls its waves above.

Sleep on—sleep on—the fearful wrath
Of mingling cloud and deep
May leave its wild and stormy track
Above thy place of sleep.
But when the wave has sunk to rest,
As now, 't will murmur o'er thy breast,
And the bright victims of the sea
Perchance will make their home with thee.

Sleep on—thy corse is far away,
But love bewails thee yet—
For thee the heart-rung sigh is breathed,
And lovely eyes are wet;
And she, thy young and beauteous bride,
Her thoughts are hovering by thy side,
As oft she turns to view with tears
The Eden of departed years.

From Blackwood's Magazine, for April.

THE INDIAN WITH HIS DEAD CHILD.*

BY MRS. HEMANS.

Then the hunter turned away from that scene,
Where the home of his fathers once had been,
And burning thoughts flashed o'er his mind,
Of the white man's faith and love unkind.

Bryant.

In the silence of the midnight,
I journey with the dead;
In the darkness of the forest boughs,
A lonely path I tread.

But my heart is high and fearless,
As by mighty wings upborne;
The mountain eagle hath no plumes
So strong as love and scorn.

I have raised thee from the grave soil,
By the white man's path defiled;
On to the ancestral wilderness
I bear thy dust, my child!

I have asked the ancient deserts
To give my dead a place,
Where the stately footsteps of the free
Alone should leave a trace;

And the rocking pines make answer—
Go, bring us back thine own!
And the streams from all the hunters' hills
Rushed with an echoing tone.

Thou shalt rest by sounding waters,
That yet unamed may roll;
The voices of those chainless ones
With joy shall fill thy soul.

In the silence of the midnight
I journey with the dead,
Where the arrows of my father's bow
Their falcon flight have sped.

I have left the spoiler's dwellings
For evermore behind;
Unmingled with their household sounds,
For me shall sweep the wind.

Alone amidst their hearth fires
I watched my child's decay;
Uncheered I saw the spirit light
From his young eyes fade away.

When his head sank on my bosom,
When the death sleep o'er him fell,
Was there one to say—"A friend is near!"
There was none!—Pale race farewell!

To the forests, to the cedars,
To the warrior and his bow,
Back! back! I bore thee laughing thence,
—I bear the slumbering now!

I bear him unto burial
With the mighty hunters gone;—
I shall hear thee in the forest breeze,—
Thou wilt speak of joy, my son!

In the silence of the midnight
I journey with the dead;
But my heart is strong, my step is fleet,
My father's path I tread.

* "A striking display of Indian character occurred some years since in a town in Maine. An Indian of the Kennebeck tribe, remarkable for his good conduct, received a grant of land from the state, and fixed himself in a new township where a number of families were settled. Though not ill-treated, yet the common prejudice against Indians prevented any sympathy with him. This was shown on the death of his only child, when none of the people came near him. Shortly after he gave up his farm, dug up the body of his child, and carried it with him two hundred miles through the forest, to join the Canadian Indians. [Tudor's Letters on the Eastern States of America.]

SONG.

BY T. CAMPBELL.

'T is now the hour—'t is now the hour
To bow at Beauty's shine;
Now whilst our hearts confess the power
Of woman, wit and wine;
And beaming eyes look on so bright,
Wit springs—wine sparkles in their light.

In such an hour—in such an hour,
In such an hour as this,
While Pleasure's fount throws up a shower
Of social sprinkling bliss,
Why does my bosom heave the sigh
That mars delight?—She is not by!

There was an hour—there was an hour
When I indulged the spell
That Love wound round me with a power
Words vainly try to tell—
Though Love has filled my chequered doom
With fruits and thorns, and light and gloom—

Yet there 's an hour—there 's still an hour
Whose coming sunshine may
Clear from the clouds that hang and lower
My fortune's future day:
That hour of hours beloved will be,
That hour that gives thee back to me!

From the New-York Mercantile Advertiser.

THE FALSE KNIGHT

"To-morrow
I'll to the wars, she to her single sorrow."

A star was o'er the bower,
With beams of mercy laden;—
It might have been the guardian power
Of an unshrouded maiden!

Like a silver arrow flew
The star adown the heaven;
While, as it fell, a deeper blue
To the night arch was given.

A youth came from the bower,
With a maid veiled and weeping;
Why at the bower at such an hour:
All honest hearts are sleeping.

Men have a magnet's charm,
But use it as a fetter;—
The maid should not have sought his arm,
Nor read his perfumed letter.

Soon came the winter's breeze,
And sent the fine leaves sailing;
What 's that like conscience 'mid the trees?
Is it a baby's wailing?

"Bury me," the mother said,
"Deeper from my parents' sighing—
Trample the earth above my head—
Smother that infant's crying."

New-York.

CHARLES EDWARDS.

FINE CUTLERY, &c.—JAMES DICKSON, Cutler and Surgical Instrument Maker, No. 3, Beaver street, (formerly at No. 48 North Market street) Albany, manufactures and repairs all kinds of instruments in the above branches, with neatness, accuracy and despatch, and warranted equal to any article imported, or manufactured in the United States.

Shears, Scissors, Razors and Penknives, ground and finished on improved plan, and warranted to excel any other in use in this city or elsewhere.

Currier's Steels constantly on hand, and warranted a superior article.

Blades inserted in knife-handlers in the most approved style, and most reasonable terms. Locks repaired.

N. B. Country orders punctually attended to.

Albany, Feb. 14, 1829.

3f

ALBANY BRUSH TRUNK AND BANGBOX MANUFACTORY.—NORRIS TARBELL, No. 453 South Market street, (opposite the Connecticut Coffee-House,) keeps constantly on hand, and for sale, the above named articles, at low prices. Those who wish to purchase, will please to call and examine for themselves. Cash paid for clean combed Hogs' Bristles. Albany, March 4, 1829.

BOOK BINDING—Sign of the Golden Ledger, corner of State and North Market streets, Albany. WILLIAM SEYMOUR, came on the above business in all its branches; viz: plain, extra, and super extra—has a fine rate ruling machine, and other necessary implements for manufacturing Blank Books of every description, on the most reasonable terms, of the best workmanship.

An assortment on hand. Subscribers to the American Newspaper Record can have their volumes handsomely bound in boards, with leather backs and corners, at $2 1-2 cents a volume. Feb 14

2m3

THIS PAPER

Is published every Saturday, by E. B. CHILD.

AT NO. 3, BEAVER STREET, ALBANY, N. Y.

TERMS—To city subscribers, Three Dollars a year. To subscribers who receive their papers by mail, Two Dollars and Fifty Cents, IN ADVANCE—otherwise, Three Dollars. JOB PRINTING neatly executed at this office.

AMERICAN MASONICK RECORD

AND ALBANY SATURDAY MAGAZINE.

VOL. III.

ALBANY, N. Y. SATURDAY, MAY 30, 1829.

NO. 18

MASONICK RECORD.

BEAUTIES OF ANTI-MASONRY.

From the Boston Bulletin.

The enjoyment of equal rights and privileges, whether moral, religious, or political, is supposed to be engrafted into the condition of each and every individual, whose lot is cast under a free, republican government. It is guaranteed to this people by the Federal Constitution of these United States; it is that for which our fathers emigrated to these once solitary shores; for which the greatest privations were cheerfully submitted to, that their descendants, to the latest ages, might sit under their own vine and fig-tree, with none to molest or make afraid. But sad experience teaches that the strongest guarantees are insufficient to protect against the united efforts of caprice, folly and ambition; nothing short of the power of an Almighty hand can stay their course. This position is most fully demonstrated, in some of the melancholy effects of the recent unhallowed excitement, which has raged through various parts of the New-England states; and in most cases without even a passing notice from those against whom its venom had been directed. In some few cases, the contagion has spread beyond conception; the intellectual powers of many have become feverish, and like the delirium tremens, the disorder has run to an extreme height, forming in their imaginations, images dire and horrible, portentous of the total prostration of morality, the demolition of the temples of justice, the annihilation of impartial legislation; in a word, the total, and final ruin, of every right, which the foresight, the wisdom, and the benevolence of the great, the wise, and the good, of this western hemisphere, have placed within our reach.

These cursory remarks have been elicited by the perusal of a very slight notice in your paper of Thursday evening last, of the course adopted by the self styled exclusive patriots (alias "Anti-masons") in the town of Randolph, with reference to the revision of the jury box. This town has, for many years, been not less remarkable for its harmonious management of its municipal affairs, than for its industry and enterprise as a manufacturing community; and happy indeed would it be, could its former quiet be restored. But fell discord and cruel persecution have made their appearance, proscribing and laying waste all that is just and good.

Anti-masonry, it is believed, first made its appearance in this town, in the person of an adept in his art, (well trained in the school of the ambitious Southwick) direct from the banks of a branch of White River, state of Vermont, who, under pretension of enlightening the minds of the good people of this place, came loaded with budgets of publications, fresh from the press of his master spirit. These publications were distributed to certain well known, restless, ambitious men, whose whole time was devoted to the promotion of their own selfish purposes, by raising a party opposed to masonry, at the head of which, they themselves should stand as leaders. Their papers were read, their exhortations made, and their inferences drawn, at first in secret conclave, to a select few, of little information, and of a right temper of mind to be easily duped, and rendered efficient members of their party. The subject was recommended by its novelty; their imaginations were wrought to the highest pitch, and pictured to them the phantom of an unlawful combination in masonic lodges, whose reality never existed and in fact never could exist. But the spark was struck, the fire kindled, and spread like the electric fluid through the combustible matter in this vicinity; and nought was wanting but a "renunciation" to confirm all things. Yes, one renunciation, from whom, it mattered not, was to preponderate, though in the opposite scale were deposited the affirmations of every mason in the county.

A man was soon found in B—e, who had long used his loquacious powers for ambitious purposes to no effect, whose standing was somewhat shattered in the estimation of those to whom he was best known, and over whose countenance a gloom had passed, depicting the hopeless condition of the inward man. To him the hobby horse was presented, and he was soon astride; his name was blazoned at the end of a long renunciation, and he became at once the oracle of the party. His unprecedented success, in rising so rapidly to a station so notorious, soon induced another renunciation from M—n. This man, following the above example, likewise published a formal renunciation, but in the hurry of the movement, forgot, or neglected to make known to the world, that for more than twelve months a committee of N. U. lodge had been endeavouring, in conformity with true masonic principles, to effect a reformation of his habits; but it having become a hopeless task, he was expelled from the lodge, months previous to his renunciation. He likewise neglected to make known, whether he was or was not once a member of a church of regular standing, and whether he has, or has not, renounced all connexion with it. However, I shall permit these renunciations to pass for what they are worth; well satisfied that by good judges, they are readily distinguished as base coin.

But the party is formed, and I shall now take some notice of its operations in this town. The first effort of this new combination was to be made at the annual town meeting in March. Every mason was denounced as unfit for an office of trust or profit, and it was determined to displace the whole, the whole consisting of only one man in any office above that of constable. The entire strength of the opposition was brought to a bearing, and their candidate, a man of talents and respectability, who had disdained to take any part with them, was elected by a majority of two votes, in two hundred and eighty; this is what is called in a certain contemptible paper, "Glorious News! Triumphant Majority!" Strange how a straw will tickle! Thus was the strength of the parties present decided.

The next subject brought before the town which required the guardian care of the anti-masons, was the all important duty of revising the jury box. In the performance of their duty in this respect, the select-men were pretended to be shielded from censure, by the appointment of a committee of advisement; this committee, with the selectmen, convened, and it is believed resolved themselves into a secret assemblage. They first determined to take from the box the names of all those who had served on juries, during the past year, and to replace them by those not in the box—a course certainly unobjectionable. Having done this, it was found that the name of every mason, one excepted, was out of the box. This exception was John Wales, a man well known, and acknowledged a perfectly upright and honourable man, as well qualified in point of judgment and general information, for discharging the duties of a jurymen, as any other person in the country. Here was a delicate point, how to rid themselves of him they knew not, but sacrificed he must be; their ingenuity was set in operation, and they actually put in one extra name, more than the town is entitled to by law. The list was thus reported to the town at the April adjournment; and the town was informed that there was one more name on the list than the town was entitled to by the statutes of this Commonwealth: Captain Wales' name was voted out of the jury box, and the list was accepted. Sic transit gloria mundi. The above is a plain statement of facts, an unvarnished tale, that requires no argument; and thus we are to have "those men only to sit in judgment who according to their own declarations make a merit of perjury." Without alluding particularly to various other excesses and irregularities at the above named meetings, and at private caucuses, I shall close by remarking that nothing could have induced me to have stated the above facts, but a sincere desire that the truth might be known; several incorrect statements, and much low blackguard, calculated to gull and deceive, having lately appeared in a certain paper, which I am ready to acknowledge is too low and vulgar for any gentleman to answer. Had the editor the abilities, and a disposition to come out in manly argument, upon the subject in dispute, many, very many, would gladly wield the quill in defence of masonry, among whom I should esteem it an honour to consider myself, even if among the least. But so long as he shall number among his correspondents, characters the most vile; so long as his columns are filled with the most foul assertions and insinuations, without the shadow of truth, so long as he publishes advertisements which it would be blasphemy to repeat, his paper will not be perused, nor his communications answered by any one who has the slightest pretensions to respectability.

He may go on, big in his own imagination, and rest assured, his venomous shafts fall harmless at our feet.
Randolph, April 20, 1829. VERITAS.

NEW DEVICE.

From the Buffalo Journal of May 19.

The leaders of political anti-masonry, conscious that their party is on the decline, have hit on a new plan to gull the people. The city of New-York is to be the theatre of action. It is gravely announced in their papers, that at a meeting in that city, a committee was appointed to address a note to some distinguished mason, whose standing and character would place his testimony above suspicion, and request of him his opinion of the institution of masonry, &c. &c. What these politicians have to do with masonry, is more than the publick fully understand. But no matter; the committee was appointed, and in the performance of their duty, they have addressed a note to CADWALLADER D. COLDEN, requesting his written opinion on the subject of inquiry. It is announced to the world, that he has complied with the request!

Now mark the villany of this whole proceeding. This show is got up for the vilest of purposes, under such a guise as to lull suspicion, was it not known to be a mockery from the beginning. The object is to place Mr. Colden before the publick without the appearance of design, with a cunningly wrought tale in his mouth calculated to arouse once more the jealousies and suspicion of the honest electors—to warp their judgement and puzzle their understanding, so that the delusion may be kept up a little longer. But we undertake to say, from unquestionable authority, that the whole is the result of an arrangement ENTERED INTO THREE MONTHS AGO! It has been the subject of correspondence and treaty during the whole winter, among the managers from one end of the state to the other, and the price of this surrender of masonry, and declaration in favour of political anti-masonry, is the promise of a nomination for governor! These are facts, derived, as we before said, from unquestionable authority, and which cannot be denied.

But why all this parade about it? We answer—because Mr. Colden would not consent to place himself on a level with the common renouncing masons; and because it was necessary to do something to draw attention to his name, or it would lie neglected for that of Solomon Southwick. There are other facts connected with this business of a curious nature. The delay has been occasioned in part, by the vain hope of inducing Stephen Van Rensselaer to forswear himself. Mr. Colden was not exactly the man they wished; but it seems their necessities have driven them to close the bargain. The candidate for governor must come from the east, and they were desirous of having it in their power to take a man before whom Solomon would not dare to stand;—as it is, Mr. C. is obliged to work himself into favour with the party; hence the appointment of a committee, and his grave answer that is to come! The west is to have the honour of a lieutenant, which is to be selected from amongst some of the most promising of the Young Lion's cubs.

With what feelings will the decent part of community look upon this shameless attempt to deceive them; and what must be the standard of publick morals, and how great the chance of purity in our elections, where such impositions are submitted to without an attempt at redress? The exposure of this plot to fore, the publick voice, may drive the managers from their purpose, so far as Mr. Colden is concerned; but they will only relinquish it to adopt some other, equally base. They exist by deception, and when their expedients fail them, and they can no longer impose on the unsuspecting, they will pass away, to be remembered only as a reproach and a by-word.

From the Percy Anecdotes.

JOHN COUSTOS.

Between the years 1740 and 1750, the Freemasons were subject to great persecutions in Portugal. A jeweller of the name of Moutou, was seized and confined in the prison of the inquisition; and a friend of his, John Coustos, a na tive of Switzerland, was arrested. The fact was, that these two persons were the leading freemasons in Lisbon, which constituted their crime. Coustos was confined in a lonely dungeon, whose horrors were heightened by the complaints, the dismal cries and hollow groans of several other prisoners in the adjoining cells. He was frequently brought before the inquisitors, who were anxious to extort from him the secrets of masonry; but refusing to give any information, he was confined in a still deeper and more horrible dungeon. Finding threats, entreaties and remonstrances in vain, Coustos was condemned to the tortures of the holy office.

He was thereupon conveyed to the torture room, where no light appeared but what two candles gave. First they put round his neck an iron collar, which was fastened to the scaffold; they then fixed a ring to each foot; and this being done, they stretched his limbs with all their might. They next tied two ropes round each arm, and two round each thigh; which ropes passed under the scaffold, through holes made for that purpose; and were all drawn tight at the same time, by four men on a signal made for that purpose. These ropes, which were of the size of one's little finger, pierced through his flesh quite to the bone, making the blood gush out at eight different places that were so bound.

Finding that the tortures above described could not extort any discovery from him, they were so inhuman, six weeks after, as to expose him to another kind of torture, more grievous if possible, than the former. They made him stretch his arms in such a manner, that the palms of his hands were turned outward; when by the help of a rope that fastened together at the wrist, and which turned by an engine, they drew them nearer to one another in such a manner, that the back of each hand touched, and stood exactly parallel one on the other; whereby both of his shoulders were dislocated, and a quantity of blood issued from his mouth. This torture was repeated thrice; after which he was again sent to his dungeon, and put into the hands of physicians and surgeons, who, in setting his bones, put him to exquisite pain.

SECRETS OF ANTI-MASONRY. An honest old farmer of our acquaintance, unhappily bewildered by the effusions of Southwick, Weed, Giddins, & Co., as erst the good people of Samaria were bewitched with the sorceries of Simon, lately visited his political friend, (a worthy and influential man in a neighbouring town,) to ask his signature to a paper, designed to get up an anti-masonick meeting. Aware that his friend had been a frequent and prominent candidate for office, and knowing him to have no partiality for masonry, the farmer did not anticipate a refusal; and evinced no little surprise and mortification when the other handed back the paper, saying, "he had no idea of mixing masonry and politics, and chose to be excused." "Indeed! you astonish me," says the farmer—"why, you're the last man I should have expected would refuse; why, 'Squire, we want five or six such men as you and Judge —, to take the lead in this business; you might be first, and Judge — second, and you could have any OFFICE you wish for in the county!'"

[Little Falls People's Friend.

ANTI-MASONRY IN OHIO. A few restless, peace-disturbing, office-seeking beings have been toiling for some time to create anti-masonick parties in some of the lake counties in Ohio; but the thing do n't seem to take well at all, and if it does not take at first, it never will. Its only chance of success consists in taking the people by surprise, and then plying them well with blood-and-murder stories, to keep up the delusion. But unfortunately for the projectors, the people in Ohio have had an opportunity to witness some of the blessed effects of anti-masonry in the western part of this state, and, acting upon the principle that "a burnt child dreads the fire," they seem wisely disposed to profit by the example set before them. [Fred. Censor.

CELEBRATIONS.

The Anniversary Festival of St. John the Baptist, will be celebrated on Wednesday, the 24th of June next, at Humphreysville, Connecticut, by King Hiram's Lodge, No. 12. The several Lodges, Chapters, and Encampments, in this vicinity, are respectfully invited to attend on the occasion, with their appropriate dresses, jewels, &c. The procession escorted by a full band of music, will leave the Lodge Room at 11 o'clock, and proceed to the Church, where a discourse will be delivered by a Rev. Companion, accompanied with other religious exercises; after which the Brethren will partake of a public dinner. By order of the Committee of Arrangements.

T. C. PRATT, Sec'y.

Humphreysville, April 20, 1829.

The annual Festival of St. John will be celebrated in Middlebury, Vermont, on the 24th of June next. Lodge to convene in Masons' Hall, at 9 o'clock, A. M. Masonick brethren in this vicinity are respectfully invited to attend.

M. S. WALLER, Sec'y.

Middlebury, 5th May, A. L. 5829.

Plattsburgh Chapter and Clinton Lodge will celebrate the Anniversary of St. John the Baptist, on the 24th of June next. Timely notice of the arrangements of the committee will be given.

Neighbouring chapters and lodges, and sojourning brethren in this vicinity, are respectfully invited to attend.

A. MCOTTER,
N. P. GREGORY,
F. P. ALLEN,

R. FITZGERALD,
C. ALLEN,
G. W. HICKS.
Committee of Arrangements.

Plattsburgh, May 22, 1829.

The Festival of St. John will be celebrated in Oxford, Massachusetts, the 24th of June next, by Oxford Lodge. A religious discourse may be expected from the Rev. Br. EDWARD TURNER, and a masonick address by Br. LINUS CHILD.

Members of Masonick Associations, generally, are respectfully invited to attend with their appropriate Badges, Jewels and Clothing. The procession will form at half past ten o'clock. By order of the committee of arrangements.

Oxford, May 20, 1829. Wm. SIGOURNEY, Ch'n.

The members of Morning Star Lodge, No. 85, will celebrate the Anniversary of St. John the Baptist on the 24th of June next. An oration will be delivered at the court house in Nashville, at 3 o'clock, by Br. Jesse H. Drake. The members of the fraternity, the relatives and friends of masonry, are respectfully invited to attend. By order.

BENJAMIN H. BLOUNT, Sec'y.

Nashville, N. C., 13th May, 1829.

Notice is hereby given, that the Annual Communication of the Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the state of Vermont, will be holden at Masons' Hall, in Rutland, on Wednesday, the 17th of June next, at 7 o'clock, A. M. Sermon by the Rev. Amos Drury, Grand Chaplain. The officers and members of the G. R. A. Chapter, and others concerned, will take due notice and govern themselves accordingly. By order of the M. E. and Rev. Joel Clapp, G. High Priest.

JOEL GREEN, G. Sec'y.

Rutland, May 23, A. L. 5829.

The seventh Annual Convocation of the Grand Royal Arch Chapter of North Carolina will be held in Fayetteville, on Tuesday, the 24th of June next.

ALEXANDER J. LAWRENCE, G. Sec'y.

May 20, 1829.

ELECTION OF OFFICERS.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

The following are the installed officers of the Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the state of South Carolina, for the present year:—

James Eyland, Grand High Priest; Alexander M'Donald, Deputy Grand High Priest; Edward Smith Courtenay, Grand King; James S. Burgess, Grand Scribe, Moses Holbrook, M. D., Grand Secretary; Edward Sebring, Grand Treasurer; Rev. Joseph Browne, Grand Chaplain; H. G. Street, Grand Marshal; John Roche, Grand Sentinel.

ODD FELLOWS' DEPARTMENT.

The Independent Order of Odd Fellows, in the city of Philadelphia, laid the corner stone of their new hall, now erecting in the district of Kennington in that city, on Monday last. The procession was formed at Commissioners' Hall in Third-street, and proceeded through the principal streets to the site of the new building, and returned again to Commissioners Hall.

CHARACTER.

From the New-York Daily Advertiser.

JOHN JAY.

Among the great men which this country has produced, very few have risen to a degree of eminence and excellence equal to that of this distinguished patriot and statesman. Mr. Jay was a descendant from one of the Huguenot families, which fled from France at the revocation of the edict of Nantz, and sought a refuge in the colony of New York from the persecutions which followed that iniquitous and sanguinary measure. Previously to the commencement of the Revolutionary struggle, he was settled in the practice of law in this city, where he soon rose to great distinction and reputation. Upon the breaking out in hostilities, he took a most decided and active part on behalf of the country; and during the whole controversy, he occupied various publick important stations, one of which was President of the Continental Congress, and in all of which, he was one of the most efficient and influential agents in carrying on the war, and conducting the affairs of the States, that were ever called to the national councils. Possessing great firmness and forecast, as well as wisdom, integrity, and talents, he never hesitated, even during the darkest periods of the war of Independence, at pursuing what he considered the path of duty, with the utmost zeal, activity, and resolution. As early as the year 1775, he was placed upon a committee, appointed for the express purposes of holding secret correspondence with the friends of the United States in Great Britain, and other parts of the world. From that time till 1779, he was employed in the service of his country in various stations, in all of which he maintained a most exalted character for disinterested patriotism, profound talents, and the purest integrity and virtue. In 1779 he was appointed Minister to Spain. At that time it was an object of the highest importance with the government of Spain, to obtain an agreement from the U. States, that Spain should hold the exclusive right to the navigation of the Mississippi. To force Mr. Jay to come to this point, they threw every embarrassment in his way, and endeavoured to render his situation at Madrid as irksome and vexatious as possible, while at the same time, in the midst of his difficulties, he was informed, that if he would accede to their terms respecting the Mississippi, he should be relieved to the full extent of his wishes. This Mr. Jay resisted with great firmness; and for this patriotic devotion to the interests of his country, congress afterwards expressed their highest approbation. Mr. Jay remained in Europe until the year 1782 when Mr. Oswald, a British subject then in France, received information, that he was about to be commissioned to treat for, and conclude a peace with any commissioners appointed by the American Colonies or Plantations. This order was shown to the American Commissioners and to the French Minister, the Count de Vergennes. The latter, and Dr. Franklin were inclined to accept the commission as sufficient; but Mr. Jay refused to treat in any other character than as the Representative of the Thirteen Independent States. During the negotiation, and in forming the treaty of peace, Mr. Jay's conduct was distinguished by great firmness, and the most unshaken regard to the interests and honour of his country. In the course of the negotiations he declared he would never set his hand to a bad treaty, nor to one which did not secure the fisheries to his country.

When the Constitution of the United States, prepared by the Convention of 1787, was submitted to the states for their adoption, great anxiety prevailed concerning the result throughout the Confederation, and particularly as it regarded the state of New-York. Previously to the meeting of the state Conventions, the great work called the Federalist was undertaken and accomplished by the joint labours of John Jay, Alexander Hamilton, and James Madison. It originally appeared in a series of essays in a newspaper; but was afterwards collected and published in volumes; and has long been considered as the ablest exhibition of the principles and provisions of the new form of government that has ever appeared. It is esteemed, and probably always will be, as a standard work, for the use of politicians and statesmen, in all generations.

When the new government was organized, Mr. Jay was nominated by general Washington, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States—a place which he filled, and the duties of which he performed, with the highest honour to himself, and the greatest benefit to the country. This office Mr. Jay held until the year 1794, when he was appointed by general Washington, Minister Extraordinary to Great Britain. At that time the relations between the two nations were involved in extreme difficulty, arising in a great measure from the principles and proceedings of the French revolutionary government. Mr. Jay succeeded in forming a treaty with the British government, from which, although it met with violent opposition from one of the political parties in the country, proved highly beneficial to the United States.

After his return to the United States, Mr. Jay was for several years governor of this, his native state, where his administration was marked with the purest integrity, and with a strict regard to the interests of the state.

After he left the chief magistracy of the state, Mr. Jay relinquished all public employment; and for more than twenty years past, he has resided on his estate in Westchester county, in strict retirement, and in the full enjoyment of domestic peace and happiness. Here his mind has been engaged on subjects of infinitely greater importance than the turmoils of politics and the rise and fall of nations. Deeply imbued from early life with the principles of the christian religion, and viewing them as the source of all that is desirable in this life, and of all that we hope for in the life to come, that great subject has engrossed his thoughts, and occupied his attention for many years past, to a degree rarely found to exist among politicians and statesmen. After the death of his venerable friend and fellow patriot, of the same age, the Hon. Elias Boudinot, another descendant from the Huguenots, Mr. Jay was appointed President of the American Bible Society—an institution in which he took the deepest interest, and for whose prosperity he laboured and prayed with the most fervent and unceasing devotion. About a year before his death, in consequence of his great age and growing infirmities, he resigned that office, and was succeeded by the present worthy and dignified incumbent, the Hon. Richard Varick.

During his retirement, the duties of piety towards God, have been mingled with those of the parent and friend; and the delightful retreat of Bedford, for a quarter of a century, has beheld this aged patriot, bending in deep humility and prostration of spirit, before the cross of his divine master—the great REDEEMER of men.

THE GATHERER.

DUTCH MAIL.

While I was at Nottingham I fell in with a plain elderly man, an ancient reader of the Leicester Herald, a paper which I published for some years in the halcyon days of my youth. Its reputation secured me many a hearty shake by the hand, accompanied by the watery eye of warm feeling, as I passed through the midland counties. I abandoned it in 1795 for the Monthly Magazine, and exchanged Leicester for London. This ancient reader hearing that I was in Nottingham, came to me with a certain paper in his hand, to call me to account for the wearisome hours which an article in it had cost him and his friends. I looked at it, and saw it headed "Dutch Mail," and it professed to be a column of original Dutch, which this honest man had been labouring to translate, for he said he had not met with any other specimen of Dutch. The sight of it brought the following circumstance to my recollection:—On the evening before one of the publications my men and a boy were frolicking in the printing-office and they overturned two or three columns of the paper. The chief point was to get ready in some way for the Nottingham and Derby coaches, which, at four in the morning, required 400 or 500 papers. After every exertion we were short nearly a column, but there stood in the galley a tempting column of pi. Now, unlettered reader, mark—pi is a jumble of odd letters, gathered from the floor, &c., of a printing office, but set on end in any manner, to distribute at leisure in their proper places. Some letters are topsy-turvy, often ten or twelve consonants come together, and then as many vowels, with as whimsical a juxtaposition of stops. I suddenly bethought me that this might be called Dutch, and, after writing a head "Dutch Mail," I subjoined a statement, that "just as our paper was going to press, the Dutch mail had arrived, but, that as we had not time to make a translation, we had inserted its intelligence in the original." I then overcame the scruples of my overseer, and the pi was made up to the extent wanted, and off it went as original Dutch into Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire! In a few hours other matter, in plain English, supplied its place for our local publication. Of course all the linguists, schoolmasters, high bred village politicians, and correspondents of the Ladies Diary, set their wits to work to translate my Dutch, and I once had a collection of letters containing speculations on the subject, or demanding a literal translation of that which appeared to be so intricate. How the Dutch could read it was incomprehensible! My Nottingham quidnunc was one of this number, and it appeared that, at times, for above four and thirty years, he had bestowed on it his anxious attentions. I told him the story—and he left me, vowing that, as I had deceived him, he would never believe any newspaper again!

[Sir Richard Philip's Personal Tour.

From the Memoirs of General Miller, Second Edition.

SOUTH AMERICAN MANNERS.

In the Pampas, where a scarcity of food is unknown to the poorest, that calculating avarice which, in its fears for to-morrow, would look with apathy on the wants of the stranger, can have but a limited sway. Kind offices are, therefore, more freely and disinterestedly conferred than in less abundant regions. In addition to this, the dearth of society in a thinly-sprinkled population renders the presence of a traveller on their isolated haciendas a source of gratification. If his appearance afford no ground for mistrust, and his manners are not disagreeable, his being a stranger is a sufficient passport to a kind and hearty welcome. Whether he be rich or poor is not a subject of inquiry, and makes no difference in the reception.

The South Americans are gay, and fond of dancing, musick, and singing. There are few, whether wealthy or otherwise, who are not proficient in one or other of these accomplishments. In the warmer latitudes, people carry on not only their usual occupations, but their amusements, chiefly in the open air; and as singing constitutes one of the principal sources of the latter, the continued exercise of the voice harmonizes and strengthens it. Perhaps no opera, in Europe, could afford, to a natural and unsophisticated ear, so rich a treat as that which may be enjoyed in Cuzco, Arequipa, and other cities, where the ancient Peruvian airs are sung in the rich and melodious tones of the natives.

The South Americans possess great intellectual quickness, and a retentive memory. The following may be cited as an extraordinary instance of the latter faculty. An old man, a native of La Paz, in Upper Peru, and of unmixed Indian blood, who kept an inn at Curicavi, between Valparaiso and Santiago, could repeat nearly the whole of Robertson's "History of Charles the Fifth," and was better acquainted with the History of England than most Englishmen. He spoke of Queen Boadicea, and was as familiar with the history of the civil wars between the houses of York and Lancaster as if they had occurred in his country, and in his own times. He had been brought up by the jesuits. He had made two voyages to Canton, and was known by the name of "the emperor of China," in consequence frequently of amusing his guests with long stories about the celestial empire.

The Peruvians have great natural talents for painting and sculpture. They generally produce striking likenesses, but being uninstructed in the principles of these arts, their pictures have no other merit. There is, however, a female figure, done in 1711, by a native of Quito, which is considered as one of the finest paintings in a very good collection belonging to Mynheer Vandermarlin, of Brussels.

THE IDLER.

There were many newspapers in the room, but there was nothing in them. There was a clock, but it did not seem to go; at least, so he thought, but after looking at it for a very long time he found it did go, but it went very slowly. Then he looked at his watch, and that went as slow as the clock. Then he took up the newspapers again one after the other very deliberately. He read the sporting intelligence and the fashionable news. But he did not read very attentively, as he afterwards discovered. Then he looked at the clock again, and was almost angry at the imperturbable monotony of its face. Then he took out his pocket-book to amuse himself by reading his memorandums, but they were very few; and very unintelligible. Then he rose up from his seat, and went to the window; and looked at the people in the street; he thought they looked very stupid, and wondered what they could all find to do with themselves. He looked at the carriages, and saw none with coronets, except now and then a hackney-coach. Then he began to pick his teeth, and that reminded him of eating; and then he rang the bell, which presently brought a waiter; and he took that opportunity of drawing out the word "waiter" in such lengthened tone, as if resolved to make one word last as long as possible.

[Rank and Talent.

CAPUCHIN INTERMENT.

A gentleman, who had resided many years abroad, and particularly amongst the Italian Catholics, once described to me the manner in which the Capuchins inter the brethren of their order. These defunct freres are embalmed, arrayed in their peculiar habits, as when living; and in the vaults of their monastick churches or chapels, ranged upright in niches formed for this purpose. On certain days, particularly on the Feast of All Souls, the doors of these cemeteries are opened to the public, who, as a religious duty, flock in to view these singular and affecting relics of mortality. The bodies undergo but little alteration in appearance for centuries; but Mr. M. being tempted to touch the very long nose of one old fellow, who looked "a leathern Pharaoh, grinning in the dark," it disappeared in a shower of dust beneath his fingers.

SUGAR MADE FROM RAGS.

The compiler of a Catechism of Chemistry up to the latest date, says "It is a remarkable fact, that a pound of rags may be converted into more than a pound of sugar, merely by the action of sulphuric acid. When shreds of linen are triturated (stirred) in a glass mortar with sulphuric acid, they yield a gummy matter on evaporation; and if this matter be boiled for some time dilute sulphuric acid, we obtain a crystallizable sugar."—Now is the time to look up all your old rags, &c.

RETENTIVE MEMORY.

The historian, Fuller, in 1607, had a most retentive memory; he could repeat 500 strange, unconnected words, after twice hearing them; and a sermon verbatim, after reading it once. He undertook, after passing from Temple Bar to the farthest part of Cheapside and back again, to mention all the signs over the shops on both sides of the streets, repeated them backwards and forwards, and performed the task with great exactness.

BOARDING.

In Ireland, when a man marries, who cannot afford to treat his friends to whiskey upon the occasion, they take the door of his house off the hinges, lay him upon it, and carry him thus upon their shoulders all day. In the evening he is allowed to return to his deserted bride. This custom is called "boarding," and is so frequent, as I myself can attest from personal observation, as to attract but little attention from the commonalty, and no thing like a mob.

EVE'S TOMB.

About two miles northward of Djidda is shown the tomb of Howa (Eve), the mother of mankind; it is, as I was informed, a rude structure of stone, about four feet in length, two or three feet in height, and as many in breadth; thus resembling the tomb of Noah, seen in the valley of Bekaa, in Syria.

[Burckhardt's Travels in Arabia.

THE HIMALAYA MOUNTAINS.

This vast accumulation of sublime peaks, the pinnacles of our globe, is so extensive, that a plane, resting on elevations 21,000 feet, may be stretched in one direction as far as the Hingtoo Cosh, for upwards of 1,000 miles, above which rise loftier summits, increasing in height to nearly 6,000 feet more.

THE LEGENDARY.

From the Edinburgh Literary Journal.

THE TIGER'S CAVE.

AN ADVENTURE AMONG THE MOUNTAINS OF QUITO.

[Translated from the Danish of Enquist, and the German of Döring, by one of the Authors of the "Old Volume," "Tales and Legends," &c.]

On leaving the Indian village, we continued to wind round Chimborazo's wide base; but its snow-crowned head no longer shone above us in clear brilliancy, for a dense fog was gathering gradually around it. Our guides looked anxiously towards it, and announced their apprehensions of a violent storm. We soon found that their fears were well-founded. The fog rapidly covered and obscured the whole of the mountain; the atmosphere was suffocating, and yet so humid that the steel work of our watches was covered with rust, and the watches stopped. The river beside which we were travelling, rushed down with still greater impetuosity; and from the clefts of the rocks which lay on the left of our path, were suddenly precipitated small rivulets, that bore the roots of trees, and innumerable serpents along with them. These rivulets often came down so suddenly and violently that we had great difficulty in preserving our footing. The thunder at length began to roll, and resounded through the mountainous passes with the most terrific grandeur. Then came the vivid lightning,—flash followed flash—above, around, beneath,—every where a sea of fire. We sought a momentary shelter in the cleft of the rocks, whilst one of our guides hastened forward to seek a more secure asylum. In a short time he returned, and informed us that he discovered a spacious cavern, which would afford us sufficient protection from the elements. We proceeded thither immediately, and, with great difficulty, and not a little danger, at last got into it.

The noise and raging of the storm continued with so much violence, that we could not hear the sound of our voices. I had placed myself near the entrance of the cave, and could observe, through the opening which was straight and narrow, the singular scene without. The highest cedar trees were struck down, or bent like reeds: monkeys and parrots lay strewn upon the ground, killed by the falling branches; the water had collected in the path we had just passed, and hurried along it like a mountain stream. From every thing I saw, I thought it extremely probable that we should be obliged to pass some days in the cavern. When the storm, however, had somewhat abated, our guides ventured out in order to ascertain if it were possible to continue our journey. The cave in which we had taken refuge was so extremely dark, that if we moved a few paces from the entrance, we could not see an inch before us; and we were debating as to the propriety of leaving even before the Indians came back, when we suddenly heard a singular groaning or growling at the further end of the cavern, which instantly fixed all our attention. Wharton and myself listened anxiously, but our daring and inconsiderate young friend Lincoln, together with my huntsman, crept about upon their hands and knees, and endeavoured to discover, by groping, from whence the sound proceeded. They had not advanced far into the cavern before we heard them utter an exclamation of surprise; and they returned to us, each carrying in his arms an animal singularly marked, and about the size of a cat, seemingly of great strength and power, and furnished with immense fangs. The eyes were of a green colour; strong claws were upon their feet; and a blood-red tongue hung out of their mouths. Wharton had scarcely glanced at them, when he exclaimed in consternation, "Good God! we have come into the den of a"—He was interrupted by a fearful cry of dismay from our guides, who came rushing precipitately towards us, calling out, "a tiger! a tiger!" and at the same time, with extraordinary rapidity, they climbed up a cedar tree which stood at the entrance of the cave, and hid themselves among the branches.

After the first sensation of horror and surprise, which rendered me motionless for a moment, had subsided, I grasped my fire arms.

Wharton had already regained his composure and self-possession; and he called to us to assist him instantly in blocking up the mouth of the cave with an immense stone which fortunately lay near it. The sense of approaching danger augmented our strength; for we now distinctly heard the growl of the ferocious animal, and we were lost beyond redemption if it reached the entrance before we could get it closed. Ere this was done, we could distinctly see the tiger bounding towards the spot, and stooping in order to creep into his den by the narrow opening. At this fearful moment our exertions were successful, and the great stone kept the wild beast at bay. There was a small open space, however, left between the top of the entrance and the stones, through which we could see the head of the animal, illuminated by its glowing eyes, which it rolled, glaring with fury upon us. Its frightful roaring, too, penetrated to the depths of the cavern, and was answered by the hoarse growling of the cubs, which Lincoln and Frank had now tossed from them. Our ferocious enemy attempted first to remove the stone with his powerful claws, and then push it with his head from its place; and these efforts proving abortive, served only to increase his wrath. He uttered a tremendous piercing howl, and his flaming eyes darted light into the darkness of our retreat.

"Now is the time to fire at him," said Wharton, with his usual calmness; "aim at his eyes; the ball will go through his brain, and we shall then have a chance to get rid of him."

Frank seized his double-barrelled gun, and Lincoln his pistols, the former placed the muzzle within a few inches of the tiger, and Lincoln did the same. At Wharton's command, they both drew the triggers at the same moment, but no shot followed. The tiger, who seemed aware that the flash indicated an attack upon him, sprang growling from the entrance; but feeling himself unhurt, immediately turned back again; and stationed himself in his former place. The powder in both places was wet; they therefore proceeded to draw the useless loading, whilst Wharton and myself hastened to seek our powder flask. It was so extremely dark, that we were obliged to grope about the cave; and at last, coming in contact with the cubs, we heard a nestling noise, as if they were playing with some metal substance, which we soon discovered was the canister we were looking for. Most unfortunately, however, the animals had pushed off the lid with their claws, and the powder had been strewn over the damp earth, and rendered entirely useless. This horrible discovery excited the highest consternation.

"All is now over," said Wharton, "We have only to choose whether we shall die of hunger together with these animals who are shut up along with us, or open the entrance to the blood-thirsty monster without, and so make a quicker end of the matter."

So saying, he placed himself close beside the stone, which for the moment defended us, and looked undauntedly upon the lightning eyes of the tiger. Lincoln raved and swore; and Frank took a piece of strong cord from his pocket and hastened to the other end of the cave—I knew not with what design. We soon, however, heard a low stifled groaning; and the tiger, who had heard it also, became more restless and disturbed than ever. He went backwards and forwards before the entrance of the cave in the most wild and impetuous manner, then stood still, and stretching out his neck in the direction of the forest, broke forth into a deafening howl. Our two Indian guides took advantage of this opportunity to discharge several arrows from the tree. He was struck more than once, but the light weapons bounded back harmless from his thick skin. At length, however, one of them struck him near the eye, and the arrow remained sticking in the wound. He now broke anew into the wildest fury, sprang at the tree, and tore it with his claws, as if he would have dragged it to the ground. But, having at length succeeded in getting rid of the arrow, he became more calm, and laid himself down as before in front of the cave.

Frank now returned from the lower end of the den, and a glance showed us what he had been doing. In each hand, and dangling from the end of a string, were the two cubs. He had strangled them: and before we were aware what he intended, he threw them through the opening to the tiger. No sooner did the animal perceive them than he gazed earnestly upon them, and began to examine them closely, turning them cautiously from side to side. As soon as he became aware that they were dead, he uttered so fearful a howl of sorrow, that we were obliged to put our hands to our ears. When I upbraided my huntsman for the cruel action he had so rashly committed, I perceived by his blunt and abrupt answers, that he also had lost all hope of rescue from our impending fate, and that under these circumstances, the ties between master and servant were dissolved. For my own part, without knowing why, I could not help believing that some unexpected assistance would rescue us from so horrible a fate. Alas! I little anticipated the sacrifices that my rescue was to cost.

The thunder had now ceased, and the storm had sunk to a gentle gale; the songs of birds were again heard in the neighbouring forest, and the sunbeams sparkled in the drops that hung from the leaves. We saw through the aperture how all nature was reviving after the wild war of elements which had so recently taken place; but the contrast only made our situation the more horrible. We were in a grave from which there was no deliverance; and a monster, worse than the fabled Cerberus, kept watch over us. The tiger had laid himself down beside his whelps. He was a beautiful animal, of great size and strength, and his limbs being stretched out at their full length, displayed his immense power of muscle. A double row of great teeth stood far enough apart to show his large red tongue from which the white foam fell in large drops. All at once a horrid roar was heard at a distance, and the tiger immediately rose and answered it with a mournful howl. At the same instant our Indians uttered a shriek which announced that some new danger threatened us. A few moments confirmed our worst fears, for another tiger not quite so large as the former, came rapidly towards the spot where we were.

"This enemy will prove more cruel than the other," said Wharton; "for this is the female, and she knows no pity for those who deprive her of her young."

The howls which the tigress gave, when she had examined the bodies of her cubs, surpassed every thing of horrible that we had yet heard; and the tiger mingled his mournful cries with her's. Suddenly her roaring was lowered to a hoarse growling and we saw her anxiously stretch out her head, extend her wide and smoking nostrils, and look as if she were determined to discover immediately the murderers of her young. Her eyes quickly fell upon us, and she made a spring forward with the intention of penetrating to our place of refuge. Perhaps she might have been enabled, by her immense strength, to push away the stone, had we not, with all our united power, held it against her. When she found that all her efforts were fruitless, she approached the tiger who lay stretched beside his cubs, and he rose and joined in her hollow roarings. They stood together as if in consultation, and then suddenly went off at a rapid pace and disappeared from our sight. Their howling died away in the distance, and then entirely ceased. We now began to entertain better hopes of our condition; but Wharton shook his head. "Do not flatter yourselves," said he, "with the belief that these animals will let us escape out of their sight till they have revenge. The hours we have to live are numbered."

Nevertheless there still appeared a chance of our rescue, for to our surprise, we saw both our Indians standing before the entrance; and heard them call to us to seize the only possibility of our yet saving ourselves by instant flight, for the tigers had only gone round the height to seek another inlet to the cave with which they were no doubt acquainted. In the greatest haste the stone was pushed aside, and we stepped forth from what we considered a living grave. Wharton was the last who left it; he was unwilling to lose his double-barrelled gun, and stopped to take it up; the rest of us thought only of making our escape. We now heard once more the roaring of tigers, though at a distance; and following the example of our guides, we precipitately struck into a side path. From the numbers of roots and branches of trees with which the storm had strewed our way, and the slipperiness of the road, our flight was slow and difficult. Wharton though an active seaman, had a heavy step, and had great difficulty in keeping pace with us, and we were often obliged to slacken our own on his account.

We had proceeded thus for about a quarter of an hour when we found that our way led along the edge of a rocky cliff, with innumerable fissures. We had just entered upon it, when suddenly the Indians, who were before us, uttered one of their piercing shrieks, and we immediately became aware that the tigers were in pursuit of us. Urged by despair, we rushed towards one of the breaks, or gulfs in our way, over which was thrown a bridge of reeds, that sprang up and down at every step, and could be trode with safety by the light foot of the Indians alone. Deep in the hollow below rushed an impetuous stream, and a thousand pointed and jagged rocks threatened destruction on every side. Lincoln, my huntsman, and myself, passed over the chasm in safety; but Wharton was still in the middle of the waving bridge, and endeavouring to steady himself, when both the tigers were seen to issue from the adjoining forest; and the moment they descried us, they bounded towards us with dreadful roarings. Meanwhile, Wharton had nearly gained the safe side of the gulf, and we were all clambering up the rocky cliff except Lincoln, who remained at the reedy bridge to assist his friend to step upon firm ground. Wharton, though the ferocious animals were close upon him, never lost his courage or presence of mind. As soon as he had gained the edge of the cliff, he knelt down and with his sword divided the fastenings by which the bridge was attached to the rock. He expected that an effectual barrier would thus be put to the farther progress of our pursuers; but he was mistaken; for he had scarcely accomplished his task, when the tigress, without a moments pause, rushed towards the chasm, and attempted to bound over it. It was a fearful sight to see the mighty animal suspended for a moment, in the air, above the abyss; but the scene passed like a flash of lightning. Her strength was not equal to the distance; she fell into the gulf, and before she reached the bottom was torn into a thousand pieces by the jagged points of the rocks. Her fate did not in the least dismay her companion: he followed her with an immense spring and reached the opposite side, but only with his fore claws; and thus he clung to the edge of the precipice, endeavouring to gain a footing. The Indians again uttered a wild shriek, as if all hope had been lost. But Wharton, who was nearest the edge of the rock, advanced courageously towards the tiger, and struck his sword into the animal's breast. Enraged beyond all measure, the wild beast collected all his strength, and with a violent effort, fixing one of his legs upon the edge of the cliff, he seized Wharton by the thigh. The heroick man still preserved his fortitude; he grasped the trunk of a tree with his left hand, to steady and support himself, while with his right he wrenched, and violently turned the sword that was still in the breast of the tiger. All this was the work of an instant. The Indians, Frank, and myself, hastened to his assistance; but Lincoln who was already at his side had seized Wharton's gun, which lay near him on the ground, and struck so powerful a blow with the butt end upon the head of the tiger, that the animal stunned and overpowered, let go his hold and fell back into the abyss. All would have been well had it ended thus; but the unfortunate Lincoln had not calculated upon the force of the blow; he staggered forward, reeled upon the edge of the precipice, extended his hand to seize upon any thing to save himself—but in vain. His foot slipped; for an instant he hovered over the gulf, and then was plunged into it to rise no more!

Of all poverty that of the mind is most deplorable.

Knowledge directeth practice, but yet practice increaseth knowledge.

MISCELLANY.

ANECDOTES OF A DIANA MONKEY.

BY MRS. BOWDICH.

An old ship companion of mine was a native of the Gold Coast, and was of the Diana species. He had been purchased by the cook of the vessel in which I sailed from Africa, and was considered his exclusive property. Jack's place then was close to the caboose; but as his education progressed, he was gradually allowed an increase of liberty, till at last he enjoyed the range of the whole ship, except the cabin. I had embarked with more than a mere womanly aversion to monkeys, it was absolute antipathy; and although I often laughed at Jack's freaks, still I kept out of his way, till a circumstance brought with it a closer acquaintance, and cured me of my dislike. Our latitude was three degrees south, and we only proceeded by occasional tornadoes, the intervals of which were filled up by dead calms and bright weather; when these occurred during the day, the helm was frequently lashed, and all the watch went below. On one of these occasions I was sitting alone on the deck, and reading intently, when, in an instant, something jumped upon my shoulders, twisted its tale round my neck, and screamed close to my ears. My immediate conviction that it was Jack scarcely relieved me: but there was no help; I dared not cry for assistance, because I was afraid of him, and dared not obey the next impulse, which was to thump him off, for the same reason, I therefore became civil from necessity, and from that moment Jack and I entered into an alliance. He gradually loosened his hold, looked at my face, examined my hands and rings with the most minute attention, and soon found the biscuit which lay by my side. When I liked him well enough to profit by his friendship, he became a constant source of amusement. Like all other nautical monkeys, he was fond of pulling off the men's caps as they slept, and throwing them into the sea; of knocking over the parrots' cages to drink the water as it trickled along the deck, regardless of the occasional gripe he received; of taking the dried herbs out of the tin mugs in which the men were making tea of them; of dexterously picking out the pieces of biscuit which were toasting between the bars of the grate; of stealing the carpenter's tools; in short, of teasing every thing and every body; but he was also a first-rate equestrian. Whenever the pigs were let out to take a run on deck, he took his station behind a cask, whence he leaped on the back of one of his steeds as it passed. Of course the speed was increased, and the nails he stuck in to keep himself on, produced a squeaking; but Jack was never thrown, and became so fond of the exercise, that he was obliged to be shut up whenever the pigs were at liberty. Confinement was the worst punishment he could receive, and whenever threatened with that, or any other, he would cling to me for protection. At night, when about to be sent to bed in an empty hencoop, he generally hid himself under my shawl, and at last never suffered any one but myself to put him to rest. He was particularly jealous of the other monkeys on board, who were all smaller than himself, and put two out of his way. The first feat of the kind was performed in my presence: he began by holding out his paw, and making a squeaking noise, which the other evidently considered as an invitation; the poor little thing crouched to him most humbly; but Jack seized him by the neck, hopped off to the side of the vessel, and threw him into the sea. We cast out a rope immediately, but the monkey was too frightened to cling to it, and we were going too fast to save him by any other means. Of course, Jack was flogged and scolded, at which he was very penitent; but the deceitful rogue, at the end of three days, sent another victim to the same destiny. But his spite against his own race was manifested at another time in a very original way. The men had been painting the ship's side with a streak of white, and upon being summoned to dinner, left their brushes and paint on deck. Unknown to Jack, I was seated behind the companion door, and saw the whole transaction; he called a little black monkey to him, who, like the others, immediately crouched to his superiour, when he seized him by the nape of the neck with one paw, took the brush, dripping with paint, with the other, and covered him with white from head to foot. Both the man at the helm and myself burst into a laugh, upon which Jack dropped his victim and scampered up the rigging. The unhappy little beast began licking himself, but I called the steward, who washed him so well with turpentine, that all injury was prevented; but during our bustle Jack was peeping with his black nose through the bars of the main top, apparently enjoying the confusion. For three days he persisted in remaining aloft; no one could catch him, he darted with such rapidity from rope to rope; at length, impelled by hunger, he dropped unexpectedly from some height on my knees, as if for refuge, and as he had thus confided in me, I could not deliver him up to punishment.

The only way in which I could controul his tricks was by showing him to the panther on board, which excited his fears very strongly. I used to hold him up by his tail, and the instant he saw the panther he would become perfectly stiff, shut his eyes, and pretend to be dead. When I moved away, he would relax his limbs, and open one eye very cautiously; but if he caught a glimpse of the panther's cage, the eyes were quickly closed, and he resumed the rigidity of death. After four months' sojourn together, I quitted Jack off the Scilly Islands, and understood that I was very much regretted: he unceasingly watched for me in the morning, and searched for me in every direction, even venturing into the cabin; nor was he reconciled to my departure when my servants left the vessel at Gravesend.

From the New-York Morning Courier.

BATHE YOUR BODY.

A man gets up in the morning, washes his hands and face, pronounces himself clean, and eats his breakfast with great complacency. And clean he would be, were his body composed exclusively of hands and face. Day after day, he performs this partial ablution, and conscience never whispers to him that he is misusing the other members of his body most abominably. His head aches—his feet swell—he feels unaccountably uncomfortable—and yet he never dreams that all this is caused by an obstruction of the pores. He cannot understand that health and good looks depend materially upon general and habitual cleanliness.

Cleanliness is not a negative but a positive virtue—a man that keeps a clean body cannot but have a clean conscience. Great rascals are always filthy in their persons. Be it understood however, that we do not mean to call all unclean men great rascals, else, before we are a day older, we shall see some foul subscriber stop his paper in imitation of our fat patron. We never yet knew a neat man to be guilty of a dirty action—his ideas, like his body, are pure and uncontaminated.

Much abused and slandered Grimalkin! for this do we honour thee! What though a tread on thy tail produces a visitation from thy claw, even on the leg of thy best friend—it is but the out-breaking of the old Adam within thee, it is in thy feline nature, and human nature is very like unto it. But more of this hereafter, when we shall undertake the vindication of thy character, and prove thee to possess the soul of chivalry. Thy cleanliness is our present theme. The proverb tells the sluggard to go to the ant, to consider her ways and be wise. From the little bee we learn industry—from the dog, fidelity—and from the fox, cunning. And shall the cat be excluded from the list of our tutors? Look at her in the morning, as she sits demurely perched up in the window—see how gracefully she moves that pliant paw, cleansing her body corporate, and so intent upon her task that the very mouse runs past her unheeded. With what consciousness of having done well, does she come purring up to you, wagging that tail which is not to be trodden on. Pat her on the head, and if you have not washed your body, feel ashamed that you are taught cleanliness by a cat!

What is it that makes the Turks such graceful and handsome men, and the Turkish women so exquisitely lovely? Nothing in the world but their daily use of the bath—and we verily believe that the truth and honour for which the Turk is proverbially celebrated have more connexion with his cleanliness of body than nine persons out of ten would imagine. So much for the moral effect of bathing. Its physical effect has heretofore been our theme; we need not therefore repeat our observations on that portion of the subject.

DOMESTICK HABITS OF NAPOLEON.

At nine o'clock the Emperor came out of his sleeping apartments, dressed for the whole day. First the officers on duty were admitted, and received their orders for the day. Then the grandes entrees and the officers of the household not on duty were introduced; and if any one had any particular communication to make, he staid till the publick audience was concluded. At half after nine o'clock Napoleon breakfasted, on a small mahogany table with one leg, and covered with a napkin. The prefect of the palace stood close by this table, with his hat under his arm. The breakfast rarely lasted beyond eight minutes. Sometimes, however, men of science or literature, or distinguished artists, were admitted at this time, with whom Napoleon is represented to have conversed in an easy and lively style. Amongst these were M. Monge, Costaz, Denon, Bertholet, Corvisart, David, Gerard, Isabey, Talma, and Fontaine. Dinner was served at six o'clock; the emperor and the empress dined alone on the common days of the week, but on Sunday all the imperial family attended, upon which occasion Napoleon, the empress, and Madame Mere had arm-chairs, and the rest chairs without arms. There was only one course. The emperor drank no wine but Cham-bertin, and that usually mixed with water. Dinner lasted in general from fifteen to twenty minutes. All this time the prefect of the palace had to superintend the affair en grand, and to answer any questions put to him. In the drawing-room a page presented to the emperor a waiter with a cup and a sugar-stand. Le chef d'office poured out the coffee; the empress took the cup from the emperor; the page and the chief d'office retired; the prefect waited till the empress had poured the coffee into the saucer and given it to Napoleon. After this the emperor went to his papers again, and the empress played at cards. Sometimes he would come and talk a little while with the people of the household in the apartments of the empress, but not often, and he had never staid long. Upon his retiring, the officers on duty attended the audience du coucher, and received their orders for the morrow. This was the ordinary economy of the emperor's time, when not with the army.

Napoleon read the English newspapers every day in French, and M. de Bausset says the translation was rigorously exact. One day in January, 1811, the emperor gave some of these extracts to de B., and ordered him to read them aloud during dinner. The prefect got on pretty well, till he stumbled at some uncouth epithets, with which he was puzzled how to deal, especially in the presence of the empress, and a room full of domesticks. He blew his nose, and skipped the words—"No!" said Napoleon, "read out! you will find many more." "I should be wanting—" "Read, I tell you," repeated the emperor, "read every thing!" At last de B. ran upon "tyrant or despot," which he commuted for "emperor." Napoleon caught the paper out of his hands, read the real phrase aloud, and then ordered M. de B. to continue. These translations used to be made by Maret, Duke of Bassano.

MISERIES OF WEALTH.

Who is so hard hearted as not to pity the rich man?

Who is dogged in the streets, and knocked down at midnight? The rich man. Whose house is broken into by robbers? The rich man's. Who has his pocket cut out, and his coat spoiled in a crowd? The rich man. Who is in doubt whether people are not laughing at him, in their sleeves, when they are eating his dinner? The rich man. Who adds to his trouble by every story which he adds to his house, the rich man—for the higher he ascends, the more motley the atmosphere. A bank breaks, and who is first? The rich stock-holder and depositor. War blows his horn, and who trembles? Death approaches; and who fears to look him in the face? Why, the rich man—and yet all the world envies the rich. Depend upon it, reader, the length of your face will always be proportioned to the length of your purse. If you live in a two story house, be thankful, and covet not the loftier mansion of your neighbour. You but dishonour yourself, and insult your destiny, by fretting and repining.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, MAY 30, 1829.

The Office of the Masonick Record is removed to No. 3 Beaver street.

New subscribers can be furnished with the Record from the beginning of the present volume.

The GRAND LODGE of this state will convene at the Masonick Hall, in the city of New-York, on Wednesday next.

The proceedings of a convention of freemasons from the several lodges and chapters in the counties of Cayuga and Onondaga, held at the Masonick Hall in the village of Skaneateles, came to hand this morning. The Hon. Daniel Sen nett was chairman, and James M. Allen, esq. and Doct. H. D. Eldredge, secretaries. The resolutions and address breathe a spirit of independence and freedom worthy of the highly respectable convention from which they proceed. The proceedings will be given at large in our next

The Bank of Columbia, at Hudson, and the Middle District Bank, at Poughkeepsie, have stopped payment. Their bills are now selling in this city at 25 cents on the dollar.

ADDRESS OF THE ANTI-MASONICK MEMBERS OF THE LEGISLATURE TO THEIR CONSTITUENTS. We briefly alluded to this document last week, since when we have given it a more attentive perusal. It is really a curious affair, five columns in length, a column and a half of which is occupied by grave, threadbare and common-place speculations upon the prosperity of the country, canal policy and canal stock, and the remainder by a general and wholesale summary of stale anti-masonick falsehoods and misrepresentations, so coupled with political reflections, as to operate, if they can operate at all, as much against the reigning political party of the state and nation, and all honest members of the opposite party, as against the masonick institution. We are not politicians, but truly it appears to us, that these gentlemen—a majority of whom were political nonentities, and the remainder despised by the people as shufflers and political adventurers, until the Morgan excitement brushed up their characters—display a singular, and withal an amusing degree of impudence, in preferring claims to credit for the prosperous condition of the country, the stability of its republican institutions, and the immense benefits arising from canals and other internal improvements. We think it would puzzle any one, not even excepting the gentlemen themselves, to point out one work of great publick utility with which any of them was ever connected, beneficially to the state or the country. Their petty political career has been marked by selfishness, and the most malignant and persecuting envy; and their pretensions to disinterestedness and publick spirit are beyond measure ridiculous. The publick prosperity, forsooth! where would the "publick prosperity" have been by this time, had these political charlatans succeeded in their attempt to make a governor of Solomon Southwick? where would the "publick prosperity" be, were all publick officers as inert and inefficient in the discharge of their duties as these anti-masonick legislators were, during the last session, in promoting the ostensible objects for which they were elected? They were here for more than four months, and did literally nothing, except to make up two electioneering pamphlets from old stories, and procure an extra number of copies to be printed at the expense of the state, for the purpose of circulating them among their constituents in order to keep up the excitement and promote their own private and selfish views. They did not produce one fact or one argument with which the people were not acquainted many months previous to the meeting of the legislature; they did not show that they were better acquainted with the circumstances of Morgan's abduction than any newspaper reader is; they did not recommend any measure to the legislature which had not been acted upon a year before; nor was any measure adopted that would not have been adopted had these men staid at home, instead of coming to Albany to idle away the session in smiling at the credulity of the multitude, and printing electioneering pamphlets at the publick expense; and, finally, to fill their pockets with the people's money, as a reward for their matchless imposture. And these men have the effrontery gravely to lecture their constituents on the "prosperous condition of the country," "our republican institutions," "canal policy," and the dangerous tendency of freemasonry! What marvellous modesty!

The portion of the address probably intended by its authors as the death warrant of masonry and all political creeds excepting their own, is a mere recapitulation of the common newspaper slang about "alarming conspiracies," "the silence of the press," "kidnapping," "murder," "masonick obligations," &c. The words "democracy" and "republican" are thrown in at all convenient opportunities, as salvos against the readers suspicions; and a mock seriousness, which is preserved throughout, is intended to be passed off as an evidence of honesty. The stuff about masonry has been often enough refuted, and we do not believe the people will be deceived by the hollow professions of democracy. When these men talk of their usefulness and their patriotism, let the reader examine their conduct and their characters; let him recollect that he who led the victorious republican armies of the Revolution, and who so wisely guided the destinies of the nation during the first eight years of its existence, was "a mason of high degree;" let him recollect that the great author of the canal policy in this state, who fostered and encouraged the present system of internal improvements, with all his energies and all his abilities, to the latest moment of his life, was the "General Grand High Priest of the United States;" and that to the abilities and the patriotism of the party against which the shafts of the motley faction of anti-masonry are directed, are we indebted for the protection and prosecution of those measures which are so rapidly advancing the glory of the people.

Those of our readers who are not already acquainted with the manœuvring between Mr. Colden and the anti-masonick party, will learn something of it from the following extract and another on our first page. We recommend them both to their attention. We do not regret this movement on the part of the anti-masons, nor on the part of Mr. Colden. We fully believe the letter of the latter will have a contrary effect from what it was intended to have. In a political point of view it lacks the indiscriminate abuse which alone can please the anti-masonick party; in a moral view it is pointless and worthless. The only weight or influence it can possess, then, it must derive from the value which may be given to Mr. Colden's opinion. And pray what is Mr. Colden's opinion worth when compared to that of thousands of eminently superiour men who have lived and died in the entertainment of an opposite belief? Mr. Colden denies that the masonick institution is now or ever was, to his knowledge, connected with politics in this country, but surmises something about its morality and its religion. If freemasonry is an immoral and irreligious institution, why did Mr. Colden encourage it with the little influence he possessed, during the most active years of his life? Why did not his sensitive discrimination ere this astonish the world with the wonderful discovery? Why, he did not wish to create an excitement! and so he became one of the active supporters of this same very "immoral" and "irreligious" institution! What an easy accommodating conscience the gentleman must have had! What a worthy citizen he must have been, not only to not oppose but to encourage what he esteemed to be a manifold evil, lest he should create an excitement! This lover of peace and silence, however, is more courageous in his dotage, and seems nothing loth to contribute his mite towards sustaining an "excitement" after it is "created." But enough. Let the reader analyze the political features of this "new device," and mete out his own measure of contempt to its authors and pity to their weak and sophisticated tool.

From the Buffalo Journal of May 26.

MR. COLDEN. This gentleman, as had been promised, has made his "Answer" to the farcical queries proposed to him by the New-York Committee. The object of this parade we explained in our last, and the manner in which the subject is approached, shows conclusively the presence of design and concert throughout the whole proceeding. But we think the sage committee and their political associates, will find little in the address on which to congratulate themselves. Mr. Colden, to be sure, condemns the Masonick institution—he thinks it useless, nay, worse than useless; but he has failed of preferring those sweeping charges against it which now only will accord with the avowed sentiments of political anti-masons, and by which they are striving to mislead the public judgement. On the strong points dwelt upon by the intemperate editors, Mr. Colden has shown himself entirely too conscientious. He has deprived them of some of their favourite arguments, why opposition to masonry should be made a political question, and thereby has secured for himself but feeble praise. With many of the sentiments advanced in the address, we fully accord; they are such as all considerate men entertain, and have not scrupled to express. It is only the object which it is expected to answer, that we feel called upon to condemn. Mr. Colden's opinion of masonry, in the abstract, is not of a pin's consequence to any body, did he not to the expression of that opinion, by the aid of factitious circumstances, seek to influence unwarrantably the opinions of others—not on masonry, but on politics, for which he deserves, as he doubtless will receive, the full measure of contempt of every honest man, and of every fair politician.

Mr. Colden is unkind to his new associates, in not speaking bluntly to the point, according to the doctrines inculcated in the political schools. There, it is common language to hear the whole masonick fraternity stigmatized as murderers, assassins, robbers, &c. &c.; and for proof, the public are always cited to the case of William Morgan. But Mr. Colden, with an inexcusable shamefacedness, contents himself with saying—

"I cannot mention the deplorable event to which I have referred [the alleged murder of Morgan,] without exculpating, so far as any thing I can say will do it, the masonick fraternity from any participation in that outrage. For a long time I did not believe that Morgan had been put to death. But I find myself obliged to yield to the force of evidence. I yet entertain the most entire confidence that the fraternity did not participate in this crime. On the contrary, I do not doubt but that all the guilt of that transaction, is confined to those infatuated men who assailed and slew him. The rest of the craft, I am entirely convinced, are as innocent of the blood of Morgan as I am. I fully believe that they hold the perpetrators in just abhorrence; they would rejoice if the guilty were discovered, and would aid in bringing the murderers to condign punishment.

"I do not believe that those who committed this crime had any intention to take the man's life when they first assailed him. Under the influence of an enthusiasm which the forms and mysteries of masonry are so likely to excite in weak minds, they thought it would be meritorious to inflict some punishment for what they considered his delinquency. But they proceeded from step to step until they found they had involved themselves in a responsibility that would be ruinous, if Morgan should be left to call them to account. A frantick interpretation of their masonick obligations, and their fears, assisted, probably, by corporal stimulants, led them to stain their hands with the blood of their victim."

Here at once falls the main prop of political anti-masonry, it Mr. Colden's opinion is authority. To be sure, this is about the only opinion he has positively expressed in his whole address. The balance is mainly composed of insinuations and doubts. Take the following as a sample—

"If Masonry separates the members of the craft from their fellow-citizens; if Masons are led to believe that their duty towards each other is different from what it is to the members of the community not connected with them; if a Mason is bound to shield another from the general operation of the laws, or if he be subjected to any penalties beyond those denounced by the legislature; nay, if even a feeble minded man is made to believe that by becoming a Mason, he enlists in an isolated corps, the members of which may claim privileges through their brethren, and must perform duties which do not belong to other citizens, it cannot be a fit institution in our country, where no man in the discharge of his duties to the community, should act from fear, favour, or affection."

Now, why did not Mr. Colden keep on with his ifs and his doubts, and apply them to the Christian religion, to Mahomedanism, or to Judaism, as well as to Masonry?

There would be equally as good ground to base a political difference of opinion on either of those questions, as the one cited. But hear him again:

"Masonry disclaims all interference in political matters. If, in this country, she has taken any part in the contentions of politicians, it has only been of late. While I was connected with the society, I had every reason to believe that she observed the forbearance she avows. But it must be obvious, that the whole machinery of the institution is peculiarly adapted to political intrigue; and though, in our country, its influence may not have been perceived by any party, yet we see that in a sister republic, so far from its being considered the duty of the fraternity to keep apart from politics, the parties whose dissensions distract the commonwealth, are arranged under different Masonick denominations. Scotch Masons, and York Masons, in that country no less designate Masons of different sects, than they do partisans of different politics. If lodges may be converted into secret political clubs, they ought to be feared in a free country."

This is positively too bad—masonry not a political machine, and this declaration from one by whom they expected to prove every thing? Solomon Southwick can beat this all to pieces. Mr. Colden will have to go back into the ranks, and receive another lesson. But says Mr. C. "if lodges may be converted into secret political clubs, they ought to be feared in a free country"! Wisdom's self could not say more than this. Did it never occur to Mr. C. that if and if did not prove any thing—and that if the public should take it into their heads to pronounce him wanting in common sense or common honesty, that they could prove it by his own writings? Really, we feel inclined to pity Mr. C. for the stupidity of his present performance. It says too much, to leave any doubt of his intention in appearing before the world in such a garb—but not enough to justify the measure, at this late day. It is true, he makes a case of conscience of it, and says "he should be sorry to end his life, leaving it to be believed that he had lived and died the advocate of an institution of which he entertained such views"! What views? All that his answer contains is based on doubts and surmises, and conclusions drawn from imaginary cases. To such a thing there is nothing due intrinsically, and his friends can not, in extenuation, claim even necessity for the act. It stands out in the political life of Mr. C. as the most prominent feature in it, and may be noted as a beacon to deter silly old men from the commission of the like folly.

THE PARISIAN DANCERS. Messieurs Vestris and Achille, of the celebrated company of Parisian dancers, who have delighted our citizens for a few evenings during the past week, will, we understand, take a benefit at the Theatre on Monday evening next. They will be assisted by Mesdames Vestris and Achille, and from having witnessed their unrivalled performances, we feel assured that any expectations which may be formed will be fully realized. This is the first time our city has been visited by a company of this description, and we think the lovers of fine dancing fairly owe them a generous reception.

At the court of common pleas which sat in Canandaigua, Ontario county, last week, Eli Bruce was sentenced to two years and four months imprisonment in the county jail, for his participation in the abduction of William Morgan. John Whitney was tried for a participation in the same offence; found guilty, and sentenced to one year and three months' imprisonment. In the case of Gillis, the jury did not agree; a new trial will of course be had.

Molasses. It may be interesting to the publick, and particularly to our brother Yankees, to know in what manner the price is made up which they pay for Cuba molasses. They will see from the following statement, that the cost of the article at the places from which it is imported, is less than half the amount required for casks to put it in.

Expenses of casks, per gallon	7 cts.
Freight	4
Duty	10
Leakage	2½
Small charges	½
Original cost	3

27 cts.

The value of Muscovado sugar in some of the West India Islands is from 3 to 4 cents per lb. and in others from 4 to 5 cts. according to the quality. [N. Y. Jour. Com.]

A wicked dun. A man lately attempted to kill himself (in England) by dashing his forehead against the pavement. On being questioned as to his motives, he said he was urged to the act by seeing Satan coming towards him with a torch in each hand, attempting to thrust large bills of debts into his pockets. Had his wits been about him, he would have taken away the torch from old Nicholas, and ignited the accounts. It is bad enough to be dunned, but to be dunned by such a personage must be intolerable. [N. Y. Eng. & Courier.]

MARRIED,

In New-York, on the 20th inst. by the Rev. Dr. Knox, Mr. ANDREW E. BROWN, of Albany, to Miss ELIZABETH S. daughter of Mr. W. E. NIXON, of the former place.

DIED,

In the village of Sandy Hill, on the 7th inst. Mrs. EMERINE WRIGHT, aged 24 years, wife of Mr. James Wright, editor of the Herald.

STOVES, FRANKLINS, &c.—HEERMANS, RATHBONE, & Co. No 47, State-street, Albany, offer at wholesale or retail the most perfect and extensive assortment of STOVES ever before offered in this city; comprising the latest and most approved patterns of Cooking Stoves, Franklins, Box, Oven, and Hall Stoves, together with Russia, English and Philadelphia Sheet Iron, Brass Andirons, Shovel and Tonge, Tin Plate, Stove Pipe, Clay Furnaces, &c. &c.; all of which they will sell on the most reasonable terms. Albany May, 1839. 18m2

AMMON RASEY respectfully informs his old customers, his friends, and the publick in general, that in consequence of his old stand, No. 528, being torn down for the purpose of rebuilding, he has removed his PORTER JNT READING ROOM to No. 570 South Market street, a few doors below the Old Corner, where he will at all times be happy to wait upon those who may favour him with a call. He has fitted up his new establishment in the best manner possible for the reception of company, and every exertion will be made on his part to render it an agreeable and pleasant resort. May 18. 18d

GROCERIES, &c. The subscriber having taken the stand recently occupied by D. P. Marshall, corner of State and Dean streets, offers to his friends and the publick, a large and general assortment of GROCERIES, consisting of teas, sugars, spices, liquors, and every other article in the line, of the first quality, and on as reasonable terms as can be furnished in the city. ROLAND ADAMS. Albany, May 23, 1839. 17 3m.

ALBANY BRUSH TRUNK AND RANDBOX MANUFACTORY.—NORRIS TARBELL, No. 453 South Market street, opposite the Connecticut Coffee House, keeps constantly on hand and for sale, the above named articles, at low prices. Those who wish to purchase, will please to call and examine for themselves. Cash paid for clean combed Hogs' Bristles. Albany, March 4, 1839.

ALBANY TYPE FOUNDRY.—The subscribers, successors to R. STARR & Co. in the above foundry, continue the business in its various branches, and are prepared to execute orders for the following type, at the regular prices, on a credit of six months, or at a discount of 7 1/2 per cent, for cash, viz:
Roman and Italics—Twenty, Fourteen, Ten, Eight, Seven, Five and Four line pica, Canon, Double pica, Double Great primer, Double English, Double Small Pica, Great primer, English, pica, Small pica, Long primer, Bourgeois, Brevier, Minion, Nonpareil, pearl.
Two line letters—pica, Small pica, Long primer, Bourgeois, Brevier, Minion, Nonpareil, yearl.
Full face capitals—Small Pica, Long primer, Bourgeois, Brevier, Minion.
Antiques—Ten and Eight line pica roman, Five line Pica italic, Four line Pica, Double Great primer, Double Small pica, Great Primer, and Pica, with lower case; and Long Primer, Brevier and Nonpareil.
Italians—Five line Pica, Double Small Pica, Two line Brevier, and Two line Nonpareil.
Tuscan—Double Small Pica.
Black—Five line Pica, Double Small Pica, Great Primer Pica Long Primer.
Open Blacks—Five line Pica, Double Small Pica, Great Primer.
Shaded letters—Six line Pica ornamented, Two line Brevier and Two line Nonpareil double shade; Two line Nonpareil meridian shade Double Great Primer, Two line Brevier, Two line Nonpareil, and One line Brevier, single shade; Two line Minion and Two line Pearl italic single shade; Double Small Pica roman, and One line Brevier italic Antique shaded.
Script—English, on inclined body, (cast on a new plan.)
Greek—Pica.
Borders and Flowers—From Six line Pica to Pearl, all cast in copper matrices.

Checks—Canon and Double English, plain and opened. Fractions and Leaders of all sizes, from English to Pearl. English, Pica and Long Primer piece Fractions; Spanish and French Accents, and Accented Vowels, Figure Vowels, Superior Figures, Dashes, and Astronomical and other Signs, of various sizes; Long Primer Space Rules. Also, Leads ten to pica, and thicker; Quotations; Brass Rules, &c. and Ornaments and Cuts, in great variety.

Printing materials of every description, and of the first quality, at the lowest prices—Cases, Stands, (an improved pattern,) Gallies, Composing sticks, Chases of all sizes, improved newspaper Chases, in two parts Ball, stocks and skins, Bodkins, Furniture, &c. and, Proust's and Johnson's printing ink, constantly on hand. Presses of all kinds furnished at the manufacturers' prices. Wells' Improved presses will be kept constantly on hand, and may be examined at the foundry.

Large additions in the variety of type have been made since the specimen of this foundry was published, of which specimens are now nearly completed, and will soon be sent to printers, the purchase of which are cut by the senior partner of this firm, whose reputation as a superior letter-cutter is well established; and the whole business being under our immediate superintendence, no pains is spared to make our types in every way worthy the attention of printers. An important improvement in the composition of the type-metal has also been made—copper and some other ingredients being added, which render it both harder and tougher, and of a finer grain. Type cast at this foundry are warranted to be as solid as any cast in the country, and they will not settle in height from the pressure in using. Particular care is also taken to have the type well dressed, and the fonts regularly put up.

Old type is received in exchange for new, at 10 cents per lb. Or, by mail, or left at the foundry, No. 8 Liberty-st. will receive prompt attention. STARR & LITTLE. The type upon which this paper is printed was cast at the above foundry.

POETRY.

From Blackwood's Magazine, for April.

THE RECALL.

BY MRS. HEMANS.

Alas! the kind, the playful, and the gay,
They who have gladdened their domestic board,
And cheered the winter hearth—do they return?
Joanna Baillie.

Come home!—there is a sorrowing breath
In music since ye went;
And the early flower-scents wander by
With mournful memories blent:
The sounds of every household voice
Are grown more sad and deep,
And the sweet word—Brother—wakes a wish
To turn aside and weep.

O ye beloved, come home!—the hour
Of many a greeting tone,
The time of hearth light and of song
Returns—and ye are gone!
And darkly, heavily it falls
On the forsaken room,
Burdening the heart with tenderness,
That deepens midst the gloom.

Where finds it you, our wandering ones?
With all your boyhood's glee
Untamed, beneath the desert's palm,
Or on the lone mid-sea?
Mid stormy hills of battles old,
Or where dark rivers foam?
Oh! Life is dim where ye are not—
Back, ye beloved! come home!

Come with the leaves and winds of spring,
And swift birds o'er the main!
Our love is grown too sorrowful,
Bring us its youth again!
Bring the glad tones to music back—
—Still, still your home is fair;
The spirit of your sunny life
Alone is wanting there!

FORGET ME NOT.

THE SAILOR'S SONG.

Forget me not, when midst the wind's careering
I pour my song of tenderness to thee,
When o'er the waves my joyous bark is steering,
Forget not me!

Forget me not, when million stars are beaming,
And the fair moon is shining tranquilly,
In thought's sweet visions when thy heart is dreaming,
Forget not me!

Forget me not, when all those stars are melting
In the morn's light—and the sun's rays we see,
Where late night's lamps in the firmament were belting,
Forget not me!

Forget me not, when the storm-spirits waking,
Make war on men, and tempests furiously,
Pillars of earth and dome of heaven are shaking,
Forget not me!

Forget me not, when into fury dashing,
The swarthy billows furrow the deep sea,
When all the elements are fiercely clashing,
Forget not me!

Forget me not, in twilight—morn or even,
When on the waves the stars sink smilingly;
I think of thee—as saints converse with heaven,
Forget not me!

THE MARINER'S GRAVE.

BY J. MALCOLM.

The winds had ceased—the morning wave
Gave up its dead unto the shore,
To sleep within a calmer grave,
Where storms can reach no more.
Unfelt by harm the summer day,
And winter night may glide away;
And suns and seasons vainly roll
Above this dark and final goal.

The stranger, of a land unknown;
His name, his place of birth untold;
He rests where no recording stone
His story may unfold.
Where but the hollow sounding surge
Howls to the wind his ceaseless dirge;
And sea-fowl, over his grave that sail,
Shriek forth a wild funeral wail.

Perchance, a husband and a sire!
For him his long expectant mate
Hath fondly trimmed her evening fire,

And kept her vigils late;
And taught her babes, with pious care,
To bear upon their infant prayer,
At rise of dawn and fall of day,
Their absent father, far away.

Perchance, while ocean's wastes he ranged,
And native shades, in dreams were near,
And love's rewarding hour—he changed
The bridal for the bier!
While she, the widowed and unwed,—
The pale betrothed of the dead!
Lone watched his bark that from the main
Ne'er reared her cloud of sail again.

But where he sleeps no mourners grieve,
No tribute to his tomb is given,—
No sighs, except the sighs of woe,
No tears, but those of heaven!
Yet more sublime than grandeur's tomb,
That towers beneath a temple's dome,
Is his—the nameless stranger's grave,
Here, by the dirge-resounding wave.

From the Modern Welsh Harper.

BRIDAL SERENADE.

Wilt thou not waken, bride of May,
While flowers are fresh, and the sweet bells chime?
Listen and learn from my roundelay,
How all life's pilot-boats sailed one day,—
A match with Time.

Love sat on a lotus leaf afloat,
And saw old Time in his loaded boat;
Slowly he crossed life's narrow tide,—
While Love sat clapping his wings, and cried,
"Who will pass Time?"

Patience came first, but soon was gone,
With helm and sail, to help Time on;
Care and Grief could not lend an oar,
And Prudence said, while she stayed on shore,
"I wait for Time!"

Hope filled with flowers her cork-tree bark,
And lighted its helm with a glow-worm spark;
Then Love, when he saw her bark fly fast,
Said, "Lingering Time will soon be past!
Hope outspeeds Time!"

Wit went next, old Time to pass,
With his diamond oar and his boat of glass;
A feathery dart from his store he drew,
And shouted, while far and swift it flew,
"O, Mirth kills time!"

But Time sent the feathery arrows back;
Hope's bark of armarants lost its track;
Then Love bade his butterfly pilots move,
And laughing said, "They shall see how Love
Can conquer Time."

His gossamer sails he spread with speed,
But Time has wings when Time has need;
Swiftly he crossed life's sparkling tide,
And only Memory stayed to chide
Upspitting Time.

From the Ladies' Magazine.

THE FLOWER OF THE HAMLET.

Oh wail ye the beautiful one—
Lament for the youthful and gay,
She is gone, she is gone to her lonely tomb,
While white may-flowers are full in their bloom,
And sweet-briar shedding its early perfume,
The flower of the hamlet is withered for aye—

'Twas sorrow that blanched her cheek,
And clouded her gentle brow,
And she faded, the fragile, the meek,
She is free from all suffering now—

Green woven garlands we bring
To twine on her burial stone—
And low plaintive madrigals sing
In love to the beautiful one.

EVERALLIN.

From the same.

BIRTH DAYS.

Why should we count our life by years,
Since years are short, and pass away?
Or, why by fortune's smiles or tears,
Since tears are vain and smiles decay?
O! count by virtues—these shall last
When life's lame-footed race is o'er;
And these, when earthly joys are past,
May cheer us on a brighter shore.

Who are the old? not they whose cares
Have white locks o'er their temples spread;
"Wisdom alone is man's gray hairs,"
And these may crown the youthful head.

From the Musical Bijou.

MY GENTLE LUTE.

BY S. ROVER.

My gentle lute, alone with thee
I wake thy saddest tone;
It seems as if thou mourn'st with me
For hours of gladness gone.
If haply 'mongst thy waiting strings
My fingers lightly fall,
Some visions of the past it brings,
Of days we can't recall.

My gentle lute, how oft have we,
Beneath the moonlight ray,
To beauty's ear breathed harmony,
In many a love-taught lay:
But she who loved, and he who sung
Are changed, my lute, and thou,
That oft to lays of love hast rung,
Must tell of sorrow now.

Some happier hand, in future hours,
May wake thy liveliest string,
And wreath thee o'er, my lute, with flowers.
As I did in my spring.
But yield till then, before we part,
Thy saddest tone to me,
And let thy mourning master's heart
An echo find in thee.

FRANKLIN LETTER FOUNDRY. The proprietors of this Foundry, offer on liberal terms, the following articles, viz:—
Roman and Italic. Fourteen, Twelve, Ten, Eight, Seven, Six, Five, and Four Lines Pica, plain, Canon, Meridian, Double Great Primer, Double English, Double Small Pica, Great Primer, English Pica, Small Pica, Long Primer, Bourgeois, Brevier, Minion, Nonpareil Pearl.

Two Line Letter. Minion, and all larger. Nonpareil, Pearl.
Full Face. English and Pica, Small Pica, Long Primer, Bourgeois Brevier, Minion.

Borders and Flowers of every kind.
Antiques. Ten and Six Lines, Four Lines Pica, Double Great Primer, English and Pica, Long Primer, Brevier, Minion, Nonpareil.

Blacks. Four Lines Pica, Double Great Primer, Double Small Pica, Great Primer, English and Pica, Small Pica, Long Primer.
Open Blacks. Great Primer, Double Great Primer, and Four Lines Pica.

Italians. Seven Lines Pica, Five Lines Pica.
Tuscan. Eight Lines Pica, Four Lines Pica.

Shaded Letter. Eight Lines Pica, Four Lines Pica, Double Great Primer, Two Lines Brevier, Two Lines Nonpareil, Eight Lines Pica Ornamented, Six Lines Pica, Ornamented.

Leads. Six to pica and thicker, Seven to pica, Eight to pica.
Quotations: Space Rules, from one to eight ems, Long Primer, Astronomical, and other signs; Spanish and French Accents; Fractions; Composing Sticks from twenty to four inches in length; Cases, Chases; Slice, Brass, and common Galleys; Iron and Mahogany Furniture; Proust's ink; Skins; parchment; points Presses also furnished.

Several new fonts of letter have been cut; and it has been the aim of the proprietors to combine the beauty of the modern, with the clearness and durability of the ancient style of typography, and to produce types at once handsome, legible, and useful. Specimens of these will be sent to printers. The greatest care has been taken in the composition of the metal with which all their fonts of letter are cast.

All orders, either by letter or otherwise, left at their Counting Room No 41, State-street, or at their Foundry, Eagle-street, south of State street, will receive prompt attention. A. W. KINSLEY & Co. Albany, Feb. 14, 1829. 3d

FINE CUTLERY, &c.—JAMES DICKSON, Cutler and Surgical Instrument Maker, No. 3 Beaver street, (formerly at No. 98 North Market street) Albany, manufactures and repairs all kinds of instruments in the above branches, with neatness, accuracy and despatch, and warranted equal to any article imported, or manufactured in the United States.

Shears, Scissors, Razors and Penknives, ground and finished on an improved plan, and warranted to excel any other in use in this city or elsewhere.

Currier's Steels constantly on hand, and warranted a superior article.

Blades inserted in knife-handles in the most approved style, and most reasonable terms. Locks repaired.
N. B. Country orders punctually attended to.
Albany, Feb. 14, 1829. 3d

BOOK BINDING Sign of the Golden Ledger, corner of State and North Market-streets, Albany. WILLIAM SEYMOUR, carries on the above business in all its branches; viz: plain, extra, and super-extra—has a first rate ruling machine, and other necessary implements for manufacturing Blank Books of every description, on the most reasonable terms, of the best workmanship.

An assortment on hand. Subscribers to the American Masonic Record can have their volumes handsomely bound in boards, with leather backs and corners, at 62 1/2 cents a volume. Feb 14 3m3

THIS PAPER

Is published every Saturday, by E. B. CHILD.

AT NO. 3, BEAVER STREET, ALBANY, N. Y.

TERMS—To city subscribers, Three Dollars a year. To subscribers who receive their papers by mail, Two Dollars and Fifty Cents, IN ADVANCE—otherwise, Three Dollars.
JOB PRINTING neatly executed at this office.

AMERICAN MASONICK RECORD

AND ALBANY SATURDAY MAGAZINE.

VOL. III.

ALBANY, N. Y. SATURDAY, JUNE 6, 1829.

NO. 19.

MASONICK RECORD.

CAYUGA AND ONONDAGA PROTEST.

At a Convention of Delegates from several Masonick bodies in the counties of Cayuga and Onondaga, held at the Masonick Hall, in the village of Skaneateles, on Tuesday the 5th day of May, 1829; the Hon. DANIEL SENNETT, was called to the chair, and JAMES M. ALLEN, Esq. and Doctor H. D. ELDRIDGE, were appointed Secretaries.

A communication from a number of Masons in the county of Ontario, recommending the surrender of charters, by the different Masonick bodies, and also an Address of a Convention of Masonick Delegates in the county of Monroe, recommending the same measures having been duly discussed and considered, it was on motion,

Resolved, that Henry Newton, Warren Hecox, Charles Barber, Elijah Baily and Richard R. Davis of Onondaga, and Orange Rude, Ira Hopkins, Benjamin Wright, Abijah Keeler and Ira S. Woolley of Cayuga, be a committee to report resolutions for the consideration of this Convention. The committee having retired a short time reported the following preamble and resolutions, which were adopted.

WHEREAS certain Masonick bodies in the western part of this state by a Convention of Delegates have resolved to surrender their charters, and recommended to other lodges to follow their example, and whereas the members of this Convention having duly considered the said recommendation, and believing that the course recommended by the said Convention will not be attended by the beneficial effects contemplated: And although we duly appreciate and respect the opinion of our brethren, and have the most perfect confidence in the purity of their motives, yet we cannot perceive any substantial benefit either to the Masonick fraternity, or to the publick resulting from a compliance with their advice; on the contrary, we deem it to be our imperious duty, to express to our Masonick brethren, and the publick generally, our disapprobation of the measures by them recommended. Therefore,

Resolved, that in the opinion of this Convention it would be inexpedient and improper to take measures for the surrender of Masonick charters, and that our brethren be respectfully advised to adopt no measures in relation to that subject.

Resolved, that we entertain a high respect for the opinions and character of the Masons composing the Convention at Rochester, and that we deeply regret that the state of publick feeling in that section of the state should have rendered necessary a measure, which appears to have been extorted by the violence of political partizans in direct violation of the rights of freemen, guaranteed by the constitution of our country.

Resolved, that Elijah Baily, Ira S. Woolley, Henry Newton, Sanford C. Parker, Richard R. Davis, Daniel G. Perry, William V. R. Lansing and Henry Follett, be a committee to draft a suitable address for publication expressive of the sentiments of this Convention. The committee reported the following address which was read and ordered to be published together with the proceedings of this Convention.

ADDRESS.

That an honest exposition of our feelings and opinions in regard to Masonry, and the agitation of the publick mind towards us as Masons, would receive a more candid and impartial consideration now, than at any other period of the present excitement, is the principal cause which has induced us to appear before the publick at this time. Facts and observations plainly declare, that the publick feeling is becoming more charitably inclined towards us as individuals, and as Masons; and, we cherish the hope, that the causes which have arrayed publick indignation against us, will soon cease to exist, and we be left in quiet possession of our Masonick attachments and privileges.

We regret that there are some bad men within the pale of the fraternity, and it is an evil from which no human institution can claim an entire exemption; but we are consoled by the reflection that Masonry does not make them so, and that, if they paid due attention to the principles of the institution, it would make them moral and virtuous.

We deeply deplore that an event should have taken place, which has enlisted so many of our worthy and honest citizens against us; we feel it a calamity of no ordinary nature; we wish it could have been otherwise, but in deference to their respectable standing in community, we have no disposition to accuse them of dishonesty or want of principle.

But, when time and circumstances, shall have convinced them that Masonry can never be arrayed against the established orders of civil or ecclesiastical government: that it shrinks from the blaze of faction, and the sanguinary conflicts of revolutions; that no plots, conspiracies, or political intrigues can rest in its bosom; that in most ages of the world, men and divines, distinguished for piety, talents and the most amiable and friendly virtues, have associated themselves in its bonds, acknowledged its blessings on social life, its moral influence on the human heart, and its charity and benevolence to all mankind—then they will grant us this respect and confidence. And we would enjoin upon them a candid consideration of the question, whether an association of men, differing in rank, age, education, political views and religious sentiments, would be in the least degree, favourable for the organizing of factions, conspiracies, &c.—we believe a suitable attention bestowed upon that question, would induce them to answer in the negative. But, to those who are arrayed against us from sinister or political motives, the same deference is not due; nor can we ascribe their conduct to the same honourable motives. But, even of them, we would ask, to view us as men whose interest, happiness and welfare are deeply interwoven with theirs. And to reflect, that the ties of kindred, the happiness of social life, and the common interests of our country require them to pursue towards us a more tolerant and dispassionate course; for violent inflammatory language, and strong appeals to the passions of men are never permanently successful. They may for a time, array against us a blind credulous zeal, or awaken an ignorant hostility: but when the tumult of passionate excitement is over, and the waves of angry contention subside, reason and judgement will resume their office, and the consequences will be far different from that which was designed by the enemies, or feared by the friends of Masonry. Of this fact, their disappointed expectations, blasted hopes, and waning popularity must afford them a melancholy proof.

In regard to the abduction of Morgan, we declare to the world, that it was a transaction not sanctioned by any law or principle of Masonry. And we cordially unite in the general sentiment of the publick, that it was an outrage of no ordinary character; and we sincerely deplore that a transaction so fraught with crime and mystery, could not be brought before the publick in a manner satisfactory to the general sentiment, and the perpetrators of the deed receive that punishment which the magnitude of their guilt would legally require.

We totally disclaim any knowledge of that transaction at the time or previous to its taking place; we deny the charges alleged against us of taking part with the accused, or of using any direct or indirect means, to prevent the affair from receiving judicial investigation: nor shall we ever stand opposed to any just or legal methods of dispelling the darkness of that transaction and bringing it to publick view. For we would ask, where could be the wisdom of that policy which dictates a course directly opposed to our interest and reputation; for if those criminally concerned in the abduction of Morgan, were brought to the bar of justice, the obloquy of crime and conspiracy, would be naturally transferred from the innocent, and fixed upon those that deserve the weight and measure of it.

The time has now arrived which calls upon us as men and freemen, to declare our sentiments to the world, and by those we must stand or fall.

To be consistent with our principles, and to express our devotion and attachment which we sincerely feel for the venerable institution of masonry, we openly avow to the world, that we cannot recede one step from those principles and usages which the authority of our country has invested in our masonick charters. We confess our feelings are strongly interwoven with those ties which have for so many ages united the fraternity in the most cordial and endearing friendship. We venerate masonry for its antiquity, we admire it for its moral principles, and we love it for its charity and benevolence.

Among many other important considerations against absenting ourselves from masonick meetings, is the conviction that they are schools of morality and virtue, and it may not be improper upon this occasion, briefly to recite some of the principal duties constantly inculcated in them. Brotherly love, relief and truth, are the fundamental tenets of masonry. By the exercise of the first, we are taught to regard the whole human species as one family; the high and the low, the rich and the poor, who, as created by one Almighty Parent, and inhabitants of the same planet, are to aid, support, and protect each other. On this principle, masonry unites men of every country, sect and opinion. To relieve the distressed is another important duty incumbent upon all men; but is more particularly enjoined on the members of our fraternity. Truth is a divine attribute, the foundation of virtue, and by its dictates we are taught to regulate our conduct. By frequent injunctions, and by the most impressive symbols we are constantly required to practice the cardinal and lesser virtues—by temperance, to restrain our affections and passions—by fortitude, to undergo pains, perils and danger, when prudence renders them expedient—by prudence, to regulate our lives and conduct by the dictates of reason, and wisely to judge and determine of all things relative to our present and future happiness—and by justice we are taught the standard or boundary of right, and are enabled to render to every man his just due, without distinction, and we are strictly enjoined never to deviate from the minutest principles thereof. We have pledged ourselves by the most sacred obligations to maintain its order, and to keep its principles inviolate. And, should we from base and corrupt motives stain its altars with treachery, detamation and falsehood; we should feel that that the ignominy of reproach, the infamy of depravity, and the scorn of mankind would pursue us to the very last hour of existence.

From these, and many other considerations, we are resolved to hold on to our charters, frequent our lodges at appointed times, and transact our affairs with the confidence of men, who consider it no crime, no dishonour, and no sacrifice of moral principle, for so doing.

What unfortunate and discouraging circumstances could have induced so many of our western brethren to resign their charters and privileges as masons, we know not: we are not acquainted with the extent of their private afflictions or persecutions; but we trust that their motives were those of peace, and from the conviction that upon the resignation of their charters, the gauntlet of opposition would be withdrawn, and harmony and order once more shed its blessings on that agitated part of the country. But has this desirable object been realized? Was the act met by the opposition with that spirit which manifested a desire for conciliation and friendship? No—we believe not. Then the grounds we have taken are just and defensible; and we shall maintain them by all legal and honourable methods.

The fate of republics in former ages should remind us, that we are not free from that spirit which has always been hostile to the liberties and rights of man. And since this evidently is the case, we believe it the duty of every individual in community who claims a right of suffrage and protection from the civil institutions of our country, to regard with a vigilant eye, those events which manifest a disposition to weaken the force of that power, which holds the balance of justice and the rights of our fellow citizens.

We pledge ourselves to keep an eye to those events, and unite our endeavours with the friends of order and equal rights, to foil every attempt which depraved politicians and factious demagogues may make, in subverting the order of our government, and of infusing the poison of despotic principles into the minds of the weak and unwary.

However much our detractors may have accused us of being opposed to liberty and religion, a reference to the history of our Revolution would give them just views upon the subject. The heroes, statesmen and divines of that interesting period will bear unequivocal testimony to facts, which set at naught their charges and accusations.

Who was that illustrious statesman and warrior that crushed the haughty power of Britain in America, and gained for us the rich inheritance of liberty and freedom? Who was that enlightened politician and philosopher, that penned our National Constitution—the admiration and wonder of the world? and who were a host that wrote, fought, and bled at that momentous period? The annals of masonry will tell you. Go to her record and you will find their names standing in bold relief before you.

From this would it appear to any unprejudiced mind that masonry is opposed to the rights and liberties of man? or that it is at war with religion, or any of the social and moral virtues of the heart?—We answer no.

However much the true character of masonry may have been vilified, or its members persecuted, it has silently found its way through the lapse of ages unadulterated and unchanged; it has come to us in its primitive purity, though like our religion, it has retired from the din of factions and revolutions, nevertheless, it revived in proportion as government became tranquil and settled.

And shall it besaid, that this proud monument of antiquity, this boast of the learned, the wise, and the good of all ages, must be destroyed, to gratify the spirit of disorder and political intrigue? Shall it be recorded for the scorn of future ages, that we, in passive submission to the threats and denunciations of a few infatuated and disappointed politicians, forsake our masonic temples, demolish our altars, and destroy our constitutions? Must we turn apostates and traitors; openly denounce and vilify its principles and practice, as heathenish, anti-christian, and unhallowed in the sight of heaven? Shall we, after advocating the purity of its principles and the extent of its charity and benevolence, call it the school of infidelity, the nursery of faction, and a covert for crime and debauchery? No: we never can sacrifice our feelings, our veracity, and that sense of character which honour and virtue teaches us to venerate, to a principle so base, to an act so degrading.

DANIEL SENNETT, Ch'n.

J. M. ALLEN, } Secretaries.
H. D. ELDRIDGE, }

MORNING STAR LODGE, 290.
BILDAD BEACH, AUSTIN GODARD.
SANFORD C. PARKER, MYRON L. MILLS.
RICHARD R. DAVIS,

SYLVAN LODGE AND JOHN BAPTIST CHAPTER.
DAVID G. PERRY, EBENEZER SMITH.
JOHN LOCKE,

PHILANTHROPICK LODGE.
BENJAMIN D. SNIFFIN, PARDON AUSTIN.
EBN'R COLEMAN,

JAMESVILLE LODGE.
ELIJAH BAILEY, ISAAC N. BREWSTER.

BRUTUS LODGE.
JOHN DUNSTON, JOSEPH BACON.
ELIAS CADY, E. B. FELLOWS.

LIBERTY LODGE.
S. MOTT, I. HOPKINS,

YATES LODGE OF PERFECTION.
JS. SELKRIGG, JOHN RICHARDS.

MOUNT MORIAH LODGE.
ELAM NORTON, ALPHEUS BOUTELL.
OLIVER CUMMINGS,

SYRACUSE LODGE.
OLIVER TEALL, JONAS WHITNEY.
RUSSEL HEBBARD,

VILLAGE LODGE.
NODIAH KELLOGG, ISAAC LEWIS, 2d.
STEPHEN HORTON,

AMBER ROYAL ARCH CHAPTER.
WILLIAM V. R. LANSING, C. W. CROSS.
JOHN SHARP, JOHN F. CLARK.

CORINTHIAN LODGE.
CH'S BARBER, SILAS AMES.
AMASA CHAPMAN, OLIVER I. WEST.
JOHN H. PARKER, L. S. CHERRY.

FARMERS' LODGE.
S. COX, IRA B. WHITING.
D. ROUNDY,

VICTORY LODGE.
WILLIAM BLANCHARD.

FREEDOM LODGE.
B. WRIGHT, LYMAN TREAT.
JOSEPH W. DURHAM, ABRAHAM TEACHOUT.
MOSES SNYDER,

SKANEATELES CHAPTER.
WARREN HECOX, WILLIAM GIBBS.

ERIE CANAL LODGE.
RIAHARD RUDE, HENRY FOLLETT.
ORANGE RUDE, IRA S. WOOLEY.

CICERO LODGE.
BENJAMIN FRENCH, ASA EASTWOOD.

HIRAM LODGE.
ABIJAH KEELER.

SAINT PAUL'S LODGE.
W. G. SIMPSON, JOHN C. WATKINS.

VISITING BRETHREN.

ELI GODARD, SETH HALL.
NATHAN KELSEY, JOHN SHEPHERD.
DANIEL GOULD, NOAH D. CALDWELL.
DORASTUS LAWRENCE, JESSE C. COPP.
H. H. GRIDLEY, BURTON HAWLEY.

CELEBRATIONS.

The Festival of St. John the Baptist, will be celebrated at Hinesburgh, Vermont, on the 24th of June next, by Patriot Lodge, No. 63. The several lodges comprising the Fifth Masonick District, are respectfully invited to attend, as well as the Brethren universally. Patriot Lodge will convene precisely at 10 o'clock, A. M.

Wm. L. VARNEY, Sec'y.

May 28, 1829.

At a regular communication of Clinton Lodge, No. 92, held at their lodge Room, in Coshocton, Ohio, April 15th, A. L. 5829, it was resolved to celebrate the festival of St. John the Baptist, on 24th of June next. The neighbouring lodges, and members of the fraternity generally, are respectfully invited to attend. By order,

A. McGOWAN, Sec'y.

Coshocton, May 6, 1829.

A stated communication of the Grand Lodge of Delaware, in the State of Delaware, will be held at Wilmington, on Saturday, the 27th day of June, at 10 o'clock, A. M. The subordinate lodges are requested to attend by their representatives.

Wm. T. READ, G. Sec'y.

May 29, 1829.

EXPULSION.

The Masters, Wardens, and Brethren of all the lodges subordinate to the Most Worshipful Grand Lodge of the State of Alabama, and the fraternity at large, are hereby required to take notice, that on the 6th day of April last, RICHARD H. CHADDUC was arraigned before Franklin Lodge, No. 20, (in the town of Havana, Greene county,) for gross unmasonic conduct; and being found guilty, was expelled for ever from all the rights, benefits and privileges of Freemasonry. All masonic intercourse with the said Chadduc is henceforth imperatively forbidden.

JOHN G. AIKIN, G. Sec'y.

Tuscaloosa, Alabama, May 15, 1829.

ELECTION OF OFFICERS.

STATE OF NEW-YORK.

Officers of St. Paul's Lodge, in the village of Bowman's Creek, Montgomery county, elected December 3, 5828:—

Thomas Johnson, Master; Simon D. Kittle, Senior Warden; Henry Rury, Junior Warden; Robert Bowman, Treasurer; Williard R. Wheeler, Secretary; Daniel Dunkle, Senior Deacon; Stephen Myers, Junior Deacon; Seth Wetmore and William S. Frisbee, Stewards; Elisha Hodge, Tyler.

Officers of Westport Royal Arch Chapter, No. 127, in Westport, Essex county, for the present year:—

Joseph Cook, High Priest; Alexander McKenzie, King; Thomas Douglass, Scribe; Ira Henderson, Captain of the Host; Elijah Newell, Principal Sojourner; Simeon Guilford, Royal Arch Captain; Alanson Barber, Diodorus Holcomb, and Aaron Ismon, Masters of Vails; P. R. Halstead, Secretary; C. B. Hatch, Treasurer.

ODD FELLOWS' DEPARTMENT.

The corner stone of a hall about to be erected, by the Independent order of Odd Fellows, for the district of Kensington and adjoining neighbourhood, in the city of Philadelphia, was laid on the 25th ult., attended by a numerous procession of the "Brethren of the order." An address was delivered in handsome style, by a member, in which a view of the rise and progress in this city, was taken, from its commencement here in 1821, with but seven members, and in the short space of seven years and five months, it now exceeds fifteen hundred contributing members, who have, besides attending to the many calls of their fellow citizens, during the inclemency of the past winter, expended within the last twelve months, upwards of six thousand dollars, in beneficial and benevolent services to its members. We understand there is erecting a hall, for their accommodation in the city, located in Fifth-street, below Walnut.

[Philadelphia Mechanics' Free Press.

MEDICAL.

From the Edinburgh Medical and Surgical Journal January, 1829.

SINGULAR CASE OF INSANITY.

CAUSED DIRECTLY BY A FALL ON THE HEAD.

A teacher of gymnastics fell from the top of a steep high stair, head foremost, and pitched upon his head on a stone floor, where he lay for a few minutes stunned. Next day his physician, Dr. Hausbrand, found him a-bed, in full possession of his senses, and complaining only of a pain in the head, on which no farther injury could be detected except a few superficial excoriations. He had passed a good night, the pulse and respiration were natural, and the functions of the brain were quite unaffected. This prosperous state continued two nights and a day, when matters suddenly took a different turn, without any fresh cause, and in the course of an hour he lost his reason so completely that he spoke unintelligibly, got out of bed, insisted on leaving the house, stared right before him, would not answer questions, and did every thing confusedly and hurriedly. It was impossible to fix his attention on any thing, or rather he was constantly as it were absent in mind. Bloody serum at the same time issued from the right ear. In twenty-four hours more he became speechless, at least could not articulate, but from time to time uttered involuntary and unintelligible cries, and in reply to frequently repeated questions answered yes, without any regard to its meaning. The tongue appeared to have lost its voluntary movements. Being placed in the warm bath, he at first evidently relished it; but on a bucket of cold water being dashed over his head, he screamed out and sprang from the bath, nor could any entreaty subsequently persuade him to enter it again, nay, whenever it was talked of, although in every other particular he was completely unconscious of what went on around him, he became greatly alarmed, and calling out no! no! endeavoured to make his escape. For three days this singular state continued, during which time he never expressed a want, though he ate and drank when food or drink was placed before him. He had no sign of bodily illness; but nevertheless his expression of countenance was that of an idiot. At night he slept well and composedly; in the day time he lay passive in bed like one in the deepest brown study. He allowed himself to be undressed without resistance, yet without giving any aid, or to be led up and down the room, but seemed to be perfectly a passive machine, and to have no will of his own whatever. Leeches, cold cloths, and blisters were applied without any advantage. After this state had lasted three days, a fit of epilepsy suddenly took place, for which he was bled, without any relief; and the fits recurred frequently for three days. Still his stupid moodiness continued. At the end of that period, tartar emetick was ordered on account of some gastrick symptoms; and after the operation of this remedy the epileptick fits became much milder. Next day, after the operation of another emetick, they ceased entirely, and the patient for the first time attended to what was going on around him, attempted to speak, and dressed himself. The emetick system was continued an entire fortnight, so as to excite vomiting three or four times a-day; and during this period he recovered entirely, but with the following singular phenomena.

When he first tried to speak, although he evidently had an accurate conception of what he wished to say, he could not find the correct expression, or even a single proper word; but when any one spoke the sentence articulately to him, he repeated it, and with evident satisfaction. He had exactly the appearance of a person who struggled to make himself understood in a foreign language which he spoke but imperfectly. In fact he had lost, not the power of speech, but the knowledge of languages; and, what was very remarkable, the languages which he formerly spoke most fluently he had now forgot most completely. A Pole by birth, he spoke

Polish most fluently before, and had been in the daily practice of conversing with his countrymen in that tongue; but now he understood much better his German friends than his Polish countrymen. Much less could he speak Polish, while, nevertheless, he spoke a little German, though not without help. With the Latin tongue he seemed still better acquainted; that is, he had not forgotten it so entirely. With Greek it was different; he had forgotten it as completely as the Polish. He could read Latin or Greek authors with whose works he was formerly acquainted; but he could not translate Greek at all, or Latin without assistance. Every day, however, his command of language increased rapidly; so that passages in Latin and Greek, which were unintelligible one day, he could easily translate the next.

His former facility in understanding various languages returned in the following order: First, he recovered his command of German, then he regained his knowledge of Latin, next that of Greek; and in the last place he recovered his command of Polish. It was also remarkable, that in no other respect was any weakness of memory observed, or diminution of judgement, or of any other faculty of the mind. The discharge from the ear bore no relation to its progress; for both when his illness was at its height, and during convalescence, it occasionally ceased for twenty-four hours without any injurious effect. It is added in the narrative, that for some years before, this man was of a gloomy disposition of mind, had a timid look and yellow complexion, and often thought himself sick, but that now his expression is clear, and his temper of mind cheerful.

MANNERS AND CUSTOMS.

SWISS MANNERS AND CUSTOMS.

The village of Cuscha in Switzerland, situated on an almost inaccessible rock above the Luciensteig, and near the naked height of Falkniss, is remarkable for its picturesque site, but still more for the simplicity of its inhabitants. The village consists of only 13 houses, inhabited by no more than two families, which avoid as much as possible intermarrying with strangers, so that this delightful little district may be said to form a republic of itself. Its constitution is entirely patriarchal: any disputes arising among the people being settled by the oldest of the two families, usually called the Achni (grandsire), who is moreover supported in his judicial power by the authorities of Mayenfild, to the parish and jurisdiction of which they belong; nevertheless the people care very little for the laws of this town except in criminal matters. On Sundays they all go to that town to assist at the divine worship, from which neither rain nor snow can keep them. But there may be some little worldliness entering into this strict attention to their religious duty, for they always take their surplus butter, cheese, whey, calves, &c. with them, which they exchange in the town for other necessities, seldom for money. They find ready purchasers, not only account of their well known honesty, but perhaps also on account of their persisting to this day to sell their goods at the same value as they were sold by their ancestors 200 years ago.

The oldest and nearest relations console the sick, and assist in preparing them for eternity; and, in case of urgent danger, even baptize the infant children of the community. A corpse when laid out is covered up with a white sheet, and, with a fir branch placed in its hand, remains in the house for the space of twenty-four hours. When this time is expired, it is placed on a bier, or if in winter, on a sledge, and taken to the churchyard of Mayenfild, where they bury it without further ceremony.

The parents marry their children almost as soon as they have attained the age of puberty, which is generally at eighteen. They are very hospitable to strangers whom chance or curiosity brings among them; but while the housewife is busy in preparing refreshments for the guest, the husband never loses sight of him, for fear of his casting the poison of seduction in their little colony. If, however, it does happen that one of the fair mountaineers is seduced by one of the gay young men of the town in their walks to church, the father immediately expels her from under his roof, and either places her as a servant with some inhabitant of the valley, or endeavours to find a husband for her. In general, however, both the purity of manners and honesty of these people are such, that Zschöcke and Lehmann affirm, that, "if there be yet a place where true Swiss may be met with, if there still exist any pure descendants of the old and virtuous confederates of the Alps, they will be found at Cuscha."

The sheep-shooting, a barbarous practice, is still prevalent in the valley of Bergell. A shepherd places a large and fine sheep at a certain distance, from which he allows every one, for the consideration of five or six batzen (7d. or 8d.), to fire at the poor beast. While this is going on, the young men are either betting on the success or failure of the different marksmen, or are engaged in dancing with the lasses of the village to the sound of a tambourine or clarinet. The owner of the sheep loses only when the animal is killed by an early shot, or throw from a sling; but this is not often the case, and the by-standers find many opportunities to laugh at the misses which take place, and which they do with great good will. The conqueror, on the other hand, receives a flower-wreath from the hands of the prettiest girl of the place; he is proclaimed the king of the marksmen, and, preceded by a clarinet, conducted home amidst the songs and shouts of the multitude. On the following Sunday, the young men take him with the same ceremonies to the village-green, where the lasses are waiting for them, and a rural ball is opened by his majesty of the rifle. The festival terminates in a grand dinner, in which the sheep which has given occasion for so much amusement, also figures as the principal dish.

The Flagelledi (freedom from the flail) is a festival of the month of August. When the harvest is in, the wealthy farmer engages from six to twenty men, who continue thrashing for about as many days, whilst two or three young women keep winnowing the corn, in proportion as it is freed from the ear. When all the corn has been thrashed, the men form a circle, in the middle of which the girls, with wreaths of flowers on their heads, take their station, and keep beating the well-swept floor with their flails, alternately in slow and quick time, till the young women by throwing their wreaths on the flails, symbolically release them from further labour. Upon which each man lays hold of a fair partner, and a dance begins on the very area of their previous toil, succeeded by a plentiful repast, cheered by good Valteline wine, which on those occasions always flows abundantly.

THE GATHERER.

BE SHORT.

Some people have a round about way of getting at things, which is as wasteful of time as it is trying to the patience. I wish the printers would notice it in the paper, and advise every body, on all manner of subjects, to be short. I shall be so.

What can be more vexatious, when you are just going about your ordinary business, and perhaps in a hurry too, than for some idle fellow to take you by the button to say "only a word," and detain you half an hour in durance vile, listening to a story without a beginning, middle, point, or end, in which every little particular is intermingled with interminable digression, silly comment, and tiresome inanity. Take such a one by the ears, and tell him be short, under the penalty of losing them.

My neighbour, Lewis Longyarn, has cost me more than two cows are worth, within six months, by this very species of ill manners, and yet he thinks himself one of the cleverest chaps in the lane, and laughs through all his stories, as if there was a spice of wit in them. He accosted me to-day, as I was going to dinner—and this is an important business with me, for I am an old man, and my working days are nearly over. "Good morning uncle Oliver, I've a word to say to you." "Well be short, I'm called to dinner." "O yes, I'll be short;" but, egad, before the fellow had explained how the pig had got into the cellar and overturned his milk pans, the pudding was as cold as a stone, and worthy dame Dorothy almost uttered a complaint.

Short speeches, short stories, short courtships—a wise man will always be short, in these things. I never knew a short sermon that was not liked for it—a short story that had not more pith in it—a short courtship that was not more fortunate than a long one. I showed a lad, who had been running after his sweetheart two years old cousin Jeremiah's long purse, which measured half a yard, and had but a single six-pence at the bottom—he borrowed it to take down to Charlotte, and they both took the hint from it, and got married at once.

But the fashion of the times is contagious—tell all the story-tellers, and speech makers, tell all manner of people how pleasant a thing it is to be short.

OLIVER OAKWOOD.

KROUT CLUB.

Perhaps it is not generally known that there exists in the city of N. York, a society of bon vivans, cycled the 'KROUT Club,' the members of which are mostly if not all, of Dutch origin or extraction, lineal descendants of the old Knickerbacker stock. Once a year—or as much oftener as they please—they 'hold a solemn feast,' in honour of the customs of their forefathers. On such occasions the festive board is loaded with every dainty which the season affords; but the most prominent and characteristic viands are sour kROUT, smoked goose, &c. &c. The presiding officer at these banquets, who is honoured with the title of king, is generally clothed in a regal robe, made of cabbage leaves, while his royal brows are encircled with a diadem of the same materials. By virtue of his office and prerogative, he is exempt from every duty, even that of thinking—the least degree of activity, except that of mastication, being considered incompatible with the kingly station. His reign, however, is generally short, as he who devours the most kROUT at one sitting always succeeds him in office, and presides at the next festival; at the conclusion of which he, in turn, is succeeded by some greater gourmand than himself.

SUNFLOWER OIL.

Elkanah Watson, Esq. in a late Keeseville paper, recommends to farmers the cultivation of the sunflower, from the seeds of which may be extracted a superior oil, useful as a substitute for sweet oil and painter's oil. Mr. Watson suggests the smut mill for removing the hull or outer coat of the seed, and a separation then in the fanning mill; so as to extract the oil with greater facility and economy. Immense crops of sunflowers, with scarcely any trouble, may beautify rough and useless portions of hill sides and enrich the farmers.

Trifling disquisitions are preferable to serious altercations, with insignificant people, on subjects of great importance. That preposterous kind of ambition which desires magnis inimicitis clarescere, men of real genius should be careful to disappoint. With how few can you contend on equal terms? Whatever be the merits or issue of the contest, your adversaries are sure to be raised above their natural level into notice, but to crush millions of pismires adds nothing to the grandeur of the elephant. [Parr.

The following letter from a gentleman to the Judge of Probate, requesting him to grant him a letter of administration on the estate of his deceased father, is equal to the famous debate of the first Legislature of Ohio concerning the Abhergoynes.

Letter. 'Sir, my father died some days hence leaving a widow and three scorpions besides me. He died insolent; leaving me his executioner. As I understand you are a Judge of Reprobates, I wish you to send me a letter of condemnation.

[Western Courier.

The best thing to be done when adversity pinches is, not to sit down and cry, but to rise up and work.

No man ever did a purposed injury to another, without doing greater to himself.

THE SKETCH-BOOK.

HYDROPHOBIA.

The following sketch is taken from the Military Memoirs of Four Brothers. The circumstances related were witnessed by the writer at Dublin, in 1816.

About three months ago, a large French dog, belonging to one of the officers, was observed to grow uncommonly surly, and attempted to bite at every dog he met in the streets: this change of temper in the animal was attributed by his master (who was very fond of him) to his having eaten a quantity of meat which had been given to him highly seasoned with pepper, &c. However, towards the evening of the day on which the change in the animal was perceived, he became at intervals quite outrageous, and bit his master and two more officers who happened to be in the room: notwithstanding, his master was inclined to think it was done more in rude play than any thing else; consequently, no measure was taken to secure him. That evening I saw the dog, and thought him uncommonly ruffled; when I attempted to caress him, and was patting him on the back, he turned at me, and savagely growled, although he used to know me well. The next day he was more violent, and furiously bit at several dogs who crossed his way; still, unfortunately, no measure was taken to secure him, his master supposing nothing was the matter with him. On the evening of the second day, the dog was lying in his master's room, perfectly tranquil, when this unfortunate young man (who has fallen the victim) entered; he remained in it some time before the dog took any notice of him; however, he suddenly made a spring at him, seized him by the shoulder, and pulled him to the ground, and tore the arm down to the shoulder, and was with difficulty taken off him. A sergeant of the regiment happened to enter the room on duty, about this time; the dog seized him by the leg, and tore away a considerable portion of flesh; he bit also two soldiers, one by the nose and the other on the hand. Still the animal was suffered to be at large, and even slept in his master's room by his bedside, and licked his face repeatedly. The following morning the master of the dog began to feel some alarm, and asked me to go with him to look at him. I advised him to have him shot: he agreed. As we were going to the spot where he lay, he bolted up, snapping at every thing which came in his way. He passed close by me; I called him, but he did not notice me. He ran through the streets of Dublin; bit a number of dogs and a child: he attempted to seize a man, who fortunately had a hammer in his hand, with which he struck him on the head and killed him. The tongue of the dog was immediately cut out upon the spot by a physician, who on examination pronounced the animal to have been in an advanced stage of hydrophobia. None of the officers or soldiers who had been bitten knew the decision of the physician; nor did they know of any ill effects having arisen to those who had been bitten. However, the child died; and three dogs which had been bitten died in about six weeks, exhibiting symptoms of hydrophobia. All this was kept secret, therefore, no cause of alarm from report could have excited hydrophobic feelings in the unfortunate young man who has fallen a sacrifice; on the contrary, he was in high spirits, and applied for leave of absence to go and see his friends in Worcestershire, as he had some intentions of being married. He obtained leave, thinking it might divert his attention, and he left us with the same flow of spirits. During his absence, all was forgotten; and those remaining who had suffered (though not quite so severely) recovered their cheerful habits. The period of leave granted to my poor friend having expired, he set out from his father's house a few days ago, in perfect health to rejoin his regiment. [This he told me a few hours before he died.] When he got to Birmingham, he said he had a curious taste in his mouth, which made him not relish his breakfast as usual. However, it gave him no alarm, nor did he again think of it till he got to Shrewsbury, when he found he had a great distrelsh to both eatables and drinkables when put before him, although he felt an inclination to eat and drink when not before him. He could not account for this, but observed he felt no alarm, until he called for porter, feeling thirsty. When it was brought, he put it to his mouth, but the moment he took a mouthful, he dashed the glass from his lips, and spit the porter over the table, and I believe the passengers rose up and said he was mad. This extraordinary feeling of not being able to eat and drink, though he wished to do so, caused him some uneasiness, though he was willing to believe it was the effect of a sore throat, and comforted himself under this idea. He proceeded by the coach to Holyhead, ruminating what could be the cause of this sensation, when the coach passed a small lake of water, the surface of which, being ruffled by the wind, he immediately shuddered at the sight, and with a kind of horror he could not describe, hid his face with his hands; for the first time the dreadful idea of hydrophobia struck him. When he arrived at Holyhead, he wished to wash before dinner, and called for water; when it was brought to him, and in the act of putting it towards his face, he screamed violently, threw the water about the room, and was convulsed for some time: the servant left the room alarmed. He then tried to clean his teeth, but could not get the brush into his mouth, on account of the water remaining upon it. The packet by this time was ready to sail, and he embarked. Poor fellow! while he was relating his sad tale to me, we were sitting together by the fire side, he having just landed from Holyhead, which place he sailed from the night before; consequently, this was the third day only since his attack at Shrewsbury. He had been on shore about two hours, and had ordered a coach and drove up to the royal barracks. Before he began to tell me, on his arrival, of the symptoms he had experienced on his journey, he greeted me on our first meeting with, "How are you, my dear fellow! Here I am at last returned, but I fear with hydrophobia!" I affected to laugh at it, but was much shocked, and replied it could only be imaginary: he said, it could not be so, for he thought he should have died coming on shore in the boat; he was so much affected at the sight of the water that they were obliged to cover him, in order that he might not see it. He also observed, that if he had remained on board one day longer he felt convinced he should have died mad. I was still inclined to think there might be a good deal of imagination in my friend, and endeavoured to persuade him to believe so; although I cannot describe the poignancy of my feelings at hearing him relate what he had suffered at intervals since he left Shrewsbury. In the course of our conversation, some dogs began to bark in the barrack yard: he sprang up suddenly from his chair, looking over my shoulder, and said in a hurried manner, "Dogs!" If I were to live a thousand years, I should never forget that moment; something struck me so forcibly that the poor sufferer would die, that I was afraid to meet his eyes, fearing he might discern signs of alarm in me, from emotion. He was in the act of peeling an orange, which we had persuaded him to try to eat, as he had taken nothing since he rejected the porter at Shrewsbury. When he had taken off the rind, he put a small piece into his mouth; but as soon as he felt the liquid, he became greatly convulsed, spit out the orange, and gave an inward scream. When he recovered himself, he burst into a fit of laughter, and said, "There! was not that like the bark of a dog?" A physician arrived soon after, who is eminent in Dublin. As soon as he entered the room, the poor fellow apologised to him for having given him the trouble to come, as he thought he had symptoms of hydrophobia, but believed it was only the effect of a sore throat, therefore would given him no further trouble. He appeared to catch at any thing which might give hopes of life. We were very anxious to learn the decision of the physician, on his leaving the room: upon inquiry, he pronounced his death to be inevitable. It is unnecessary to describe the state of our minds on receiving this melancholy news:—to know that our brother officer, with whom we were conversing, to all external appearance in perfect health and apparent spirits, was to be numbered with the dead in a few hours, was deeply distressing. The doctor added, that he was in an advanced stage of hydrophobia, that bleeding him copiously, in order that he might die easy, was the only thing that could now be done for him. I remained with him some time, conversing about various things (though completely forced on my part), as his spirits remained good. On leaving him, I asked him when he intended to dine at the mess; he replied, he could not dine with us that day, but he thought he should be able to do so in a day or two, when his sore throat was better. After he was bled he felt relieved, thought he should sleep well, and hoped to be able to drink water by the next morning. Some time after, in the course of the evening, he appeared at intervals rather wild and confused, and told an officer to get out of his way, or he would bite him. Afterwards, he became more tranquil, and sent his compliments to one of the married ladies of the regiment for a prayer-book; but begged it might not be mentioned, or he should be laughed at. About midnight he became very violent, so that three men could scarcely hold him: he afterwards recovered a little, and fell into a kind of slumber, which was disturbed by his springing up now and then, and crying out, "Do you hear the dogs?" in a quick and hurried voice: he also imagined at times that he barked like a dog. He requested he might be left alone, about one o'clock in the morning, his servant only remaining in the room, when, in about ten minutes, he looked up at the man, quite calm and collected, and said, "he regretted that his mother and sisters were not with him." He then prayed a short time, turned himself round, burying his face in the pillow, and expired without a groan.—Such was the melancholy end of one of the finest young men in his majesty's service.

THE TRAVELLER.

From Burckhardt's Travels in Arabia, just published.

DESCRIPTION OF MEKKA.

Mekka may be styled a handsome town; its streets are in general broader than those of eastern cities; the houses lofty, and built of stone; and the numerous windows that face the streets give them a more lively and European aspect than those of Egypt or Syria, where the houses present but few windows towards the exterior. Mekka (like Djidda) contains many houses three stories high; few at Mekka are white-washed; but the dark grey colour of the stone is much preferable to the glaring white that offends the eye in Djidda. In most towns of the Levant the narrowness of a street contributes to its coldness; and in countries where wheel-carriages are not used, a space that allows two loaded camels to pass each other is deemed sufficient. At Mekka, however, it was necessary to leave the passages wide, for the innumerable visitors who here crowd together; and it is in the houses adopted for the reception of pilgrims and other sojourners, that the windows are so contrived as to command a view of the streets.

The city is open on every side; but the neighbouring mountains, if properly defended, would form a barrier of considerable strength against an enemy. In former times it had three walls to protect its extremities; one was built across the valley; at the street of Mala; another at the quarter of Shebeyka; and the third at the valley opening into the Mesfale. These walls were repaired in A. H. 916 and 928, and in a century after some traces of them still remained.

The only publick place in the body of the town is the ample square of the great mosque; no trees or gardens cheer the eye; and the scene is enlivened only during the Hadj by the great number of well-stored shops which are found in every quarter. Except four or five large houses belonging to the Sheriff, two medreses or colleges (now converted into corn magazines,) and the mosque, with some buildings and schools attached to it, Mekka cannot boast of any publick edifices, and in this respect is, perhaps, more deficient than any other eastern city of the same size. Neither khans, for the accommodation of travellers, or for the deposit of merchandize, nor places of grandees, nor mosques which adorn every quarter of other towns in the East, are here to be seen; and we may perhaps attribute this want of splendid buildings to the veneration which its inhabitants entertain for their temple; this prevents them from constructing any edifice which might possibly pretend to rival it.

The houses have windows looking towards the street; of these many project from the wall, and have their frame work elaborately carved, or gaudily painted. Before them hang blinds made of slight reeds, which exclude flies and gnats while they admit fresh air. Every house has its terrace, the floor of which (composed of a preparation from lime stone) is built with a slight inclination, so that the rain water runs off through gutters into the street; for the rains here are so irregular that it is not worth while to collect the water of them into cisterns, as is done in Syria. The terraces are concealed from view by slight parapet walls; for, throughout the east, it is reckoned discreditable that a man should appear upon the terrace, whence he might be accused of looking at women in the neighbouring houses, as the females pass much of their time on the terraces, employed in various domestic occupations, such as drying corn, hanging up linen, &c. The Europeans of Aleppo alone enjoy the privilege of frequenting their terraces, which are often beautifully built of stone; here they resort during the summer evenings, and often to sup and pass the night. All the houses of the Mekkawys, except those of the principal and richest inhabitants, are constructed for the accommodation of lodgers, being divided into many apartments, separated from each other, and each consisting of a sitting-room and a small kitchen. Since the pilgrimage, which has begun to decline, (this happened before the Wahaby conquest,) many of the Mekkawys, no longer deriving profit from the letting of their lodgings, found themselves unable to afford the expense of repairs; and thus numerous buildings in the outskirts have fallen completely into ruin, and the town itself exhibits in every street houses rapidly decaying. I saw only one of recent construction; it was in the quarter of El Shebeyka, belonged to a Sherif, and cost as report said, one hundred and fifty purses; such a house might have been built at Cairo for sixty purses.

The streets are all unpaved; and in summer time the sand and dust in them are as great a nuisance as the mud is in the rainy season, during which they are scarcely passable after a shower; for in the interior of the town the water does not run off, but remains till it is dried up. It may be ascribed to the destructive rains, which, though of shorter duration than in other tropical countries, fall with considerable violence, that no ancient buildings are found in Mekka. The mosque itself has undergone so many repairs under different sultans, that it may be called a modern structure; and of the houses, I do not think there exists one older than four centuries; it is not, therefore, in this place, that the traveller must look for interesting specimens of architecture, or such beautiful remains of Saracenic structures as are still admired in Syria, Egypt, Barbary, and Spain. In this respect the ancient and far famed Mekka is surpassed by the smallest provincial towns of Syria or Egypt. The same may be said with respect to Medina, and I suspect that the towns of Yemen are generally poor in architectural remains.

Mekka is deficient in those regulations of police which are customary in Eastern cities. The streets are totally dark at night, no lamps of any kind being lighted; its different quarters are without gates, differing in this respect also from most eastern towns, where each quarter is regularly shut up after the last evening prayers. The town may therefore be crossed at any time of the night, and the same attention is not paid here to the security of merchants, as well as of husbands, (on whose account principally, the quarters are closed,) as in Syrian or Egyptian towns of equal magnitude. The dirt and sweepings of the houses are cast into the streets, where they soon become dust or mud according to the season. The same custom seems to have prevailed equally in ancient times; for I did not perceive in the skirts of the town any of those heaps of rubbish which are usually found near the large towns of Turkey.

With respect to water, the most important of all supplies, and that which always forms the first object of inquiry among Asiatics, Mekka is not much better provided than Djidda; there are but few cisterns for collecting rain, and the well-water is so brackish that it is used only for culinary purposes, except during the time of the pilgrimage, when the lowest class of hadjys drink it. The famous well of Zemzem, in the great mosque, is indeed sufficiently copious to supply the whole town; but, however holy, its water is heavy to the taste and impedes digestion; the poorer classes besides have not permission to fill their water-skins with it at pleasure. The best water in Mekka is brought by a conduit from the vicinity of Arafat, six or seven hours distant. The present government, instead of constructing similar works, neglects even the repairs and requisite cleansing of this aqueduct. It is wholly built of stone; and all those parts of it which appear above ground, are covered with a thick layer of stone and cement. I heard that it had not been cleaned during the last fifty years; the consequence of this negligence is, that the most of the water is lost in its passage to the city through apertures, or slowly forces its way through the obstructing sediment, though it flows in a full stream into the head of the aqueduct at Arafat. The supply which it affords in ordinary times is barely sufficient for the use of the inhabitants, and during the pilgrimage sweet water becomes an absolute scarcity; a small skin of water (two of which skins a person may carry) being then often sold for one shilling—a very high price among Arabs.

There are two places in the interior of Mekka where the aqueduct runs above ground; there the water is let off into small channels or fountains, at which some slaves of the Sherif are stationed to exact a toll from persons filling their water-skins. In the time of the Hadj, these fountains are surrounded day and night by crowds of people quarrelling and fighting for access to the water. During the late siege, the Wahabys cut off the supply of water from the aqueduct; and it was not till some time after, that the injury which this structure then received, was partially repaired.

There is a small spring which oozes from under the rocks behind the great palace of the Sherif, called Beit el Sad; it is said to afford the best water in this country, but the supply is very scanty. The spring is enclosed, and appropriated wholly to the Sherif's family.

Beggars, and infirm or indigent hadjys, often entreat the passengers in the streets of Mekka for a draught of sweet water; they particularly surround the waterstands, which are seen in every corner, and where, for two paras in the time of the Hadj, and for one para, at other times, as much water may be obtained as will fill a jar.

HISTORICAL.

EPITOME OF THE CRUSADES.

The first crusade to the Holy Land was undertaken by numerous Christian princes, who gained Jerusalem after it had been in possession of the Saracens four hundred and nine years. Godfrey, of Boulogne, was then chosen king by his companions in arms; but he had not long enjoyed his new dignity, before he had occasion to march out against a great army of Turks and Saracens, whom he overthrew, and killed one hundred thousand of their men, besides taking much spoil. Shortly after this victory, a pestilence happened, of which multitudes died; and the contagion reaching Godfrey, the first Christian King of Jerusalem, he also expired, on the 18th of July, 1100, having scarcely reigned a full year.

Godfrey's successors, the Baldwins, defeated the Turks in many engagements. In the reign of Baldwin III., however, the Christians lost Edessa, a circumstance which affected Pope Eugenius III. to such a degree, that he prevailed on Conrad III., Emperor of Germany, to relieve his brethren in Syria. In the year 1146, therefore, Conrad marched through Greece, and soon afterwards encountered the Turkish army, which he routed; he then proceeded to Iconium, the principal seat of the Turks in Lesser Asia; but, for want of provisions and health, was compelled to relinquish his design of taking that city, and to return home. Much about the same period, Lewis VIII., of France, made an expedition to the Holy Land, but was wholly unsuccessful in his attempts against the enemy. Notwithstanding these failures, King Baldwin, relying on his own strength, gained possession of Ascalon, and defeated the Turks in numerous actions. Previous to his death, which was caused by poison, in 1163, he was the victorious sovereign of Jerusalem and the greatest part of Syria.

During the reign of Baldwin IV., Saladin, Sultan of Egypt, invaded Palestine, and took several towns, notwithstanding the valour of the Christians. In the succeeding reign of King Guy, however, the Christians, still unfortunate, received a decisive blow, which tended to the decline of their independence in the Holy Land; for, among other places of importance, Saladin made a capture of Jerusalem, and took its king prisoner. When the conqueror entered the holy city, he profaned every sacred place, save the Temple of the Sepulchre, (which the Christians redeemed with an immense sum of money,) and drove the Latin Christians from their abodes, who were only allowed to carry what they could hastily collect on their backs, either to Tripoly, Antioch, or Tyre, the only three places which then remained in the Christians' possession. All the monuments were demolished, except those of our Saviour, King Godfrey, and Baldwin I. The city was yielded to the captors on the 2nd of October, 1187, after the Christians had possessed it about eighty-nine years.

These calamitous transactions in Palestine greatly alarmed all Europe, and several princes speedily resolved to oppose the career of the oppressors, and to leave no means untried of regaining the kingdom of Jerusalem. In furtherance of this design, the Emperor Frederick marched into Palestine with a powerful army, and defeated the Turks near Melitena; he afterwards met them near Comogena, where he also routed them, but was unhappily killed in the action. Some time after this, King Philip, of France, and Richard I., of England, engaged in a crusade for the relief of the Christians. Philip arrived first, and proceeded to Ptolemais, which King Guy, having obtained his liberty, was then besieging. King Richard, in his passage, was driven with his fleet upon the coast of Cyprus, but was not permitted to land; this so highly offended him, that he landed his whole army by force, and soon over-ran the island. He was at length opposed by the king of Cyprus, whom he took prisoner, and carried in chains to Ptolemais, where he was welcomed with great rejoicings by the besiegers, who stood in much need of assistance. It would be superfluous to relate here the particulars of the siege; let it suffice to say, that after a general assault had been given, a breach was made, so that the assailants were enabled to enter the city, which Saladin surrendered to them upon articles, on the 12th of July, 1191. King Richard here obtained the title of Cœur de Lion, for having taken down Duke Leopold's standard, that was first fixed in the breach, and placed his own in its stead.

After the taking of Ptolemais, King Philip and many other princes returned home, leaving King Richard in Palestine, to prosecute the war in concert with Guy, whom Richard, in a short time afterwards, persuaded to accept of the crown of Cyprus, in lieu of his pretences to Jerusalem. By these crafty means, Richard caused himself to be proclaimed King of Jerusalem; but while he was preparing to besiege that city, he received news that the French were about to invade England. He was therefore compelled to conclude a peace with Saladin, not very advantageous to Christendom, and to return to Europe. But meeting with bad weather, he was driven on the coast of Histria; and, while endeavouring to travel through the country in the habit of a templar, was taken prisoner by Duke Leopold, of Austria, who became his enemy at the siege of Ptolemais. The duke sold him for forty thousand pounds to the emperor, Henry VI., who soon afterwards had a hundred thousand pounds for his ransom.

About the same period, Sultan Saladin, the most formidable enemy the Christians ever encountered, effected an event which caused Pope Celestine to prevail on the emperor, Henry VI., of Germany, to make a new expedition against the Turks, who were in consequence defeated; but the emperor's general, the Duke of Saxony, being killed, and the emperor himself dying soon afterwards, the Germans returned home without accomplishing the object of their expedition. They had no sooner departed than the Turks, in revenge, nearly drove the Christians from the Holy Land, and took all the strong towns which the Crusaders had gained, excepting Tyre and Ptolemais. In 1199, a fleet was fitted out at the instigation of Pope Innocent III. against the infidels. On this occasion, the Christians, notwithstanding their strenuous exertions, failed of taking Jerusalem, though several other important places were delivered to them.

In the year 1828, Frederick, Emperor of Germany, set out from Brundisium to Palestine, took Jerusalem, which the enemy had left in a desolate condition, and caused himself to be proclaimed king. But, after this conquest, he was obliged to return to his own country, where his presence was required. The Turks immediately assembled a prodigious army for regaining the Holy City, which they ultimately took, putting the German garrison to the sword, in the year 1234; since which time, the Christian powers, weary of these useless expeditions, have made no considerable effort to possess it.

The Christians were entirely driven from Palestine and Syria in the year 1291, about one hundred and ninety-two years after the capture of Jerusalem by Godfrey of Boulogne.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, JUNE 6, 1829.

☞ The Office of the Masonick Record is removed to No. 3 Beaver street.

☞ New subscribers can be furnished with the Record from the beginning of the present volume.

☞ The Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the state of Massachusetts will hold its annual communication in Masons' Hall, in Boston, on Tuesday next.

☞ The Grand Annual Communication of the Grand Lodge of the state of New-Hampshire will commence in Concord, on Tuesday next.

The Annual Communication of the Grand Royal Arch Chapter of the state of New-Hampshire will commence on Thursday next.

☞ The Patterson Bank, located in Patterson, New-Jersey, has stopped payment. Its bills have been selling in New-York during the present week, at half their nominal value.

A friend at Guverneur, St. Lawrence co., in a letter to the editor, dated May 27, speaking of anti-masonry, says:—"Lately we have had but little on the subject here, unless it is introduced by masons, jacks, or bats, and when it is called up, a difference is plainly visible in the aspect of the leaders. Shortly after town meeting they got up an anti-masonick meeting of the two towns, Guverneur and Fowler, at which time two masons renounced the institution—one was Rev. Mr. Stowell, who, when he commenced preaching was a Methodist. After a little while, he renounced Methodism and joined the Baptists;—was licensed, and at length ordained a minister of that persuasion. Since he renounced masonry he has also renounced the Baptist principles, and is now a Presbyterian preacher—so that enough is told of him. The other was Mr. Hebard. I have but little doubt that his renunciation was in consequence of disappointment about some little petty office, say collector of this town—he may have some other motive, but he don't look as though he felt exactly easy of late. There are a few more that I am in hope, or rather did hope, would renounce; but I fear they have all gone that will go about this vicinity."

ISAAC MURPHY. The following is an extract of a letter to the editor, dated Pittsburgh, May 26, 1829. The reader will probably recollect that Murphy was the object of anti-masonick sympathy some weeks since, and that his murder was charged upon the masonick institution with as much confidence and seeming truth as that of Morgan is at the present moment. The avidity with which every thing that can in any manner agitate the publick mind, is seized upon by anti-masons, is one of the best possible comments upon their character.

"Please inform your readers that Isaac Murphy has written to one of his friends in this quarter that he is practicing law in some part of the western country—his friend does not however tell where! Murphy says his absence from this place was owing to a temporary derangement! If so, why not return in his lucid intervals and clear up his character?—It is all fudge! You published the correct account of the matter some weeks since."

We copy the following pretty thing from the Craftsman. It is copied literally from the original. Squire Gardner hails from Newfane, Niagara county; and it is said he is one of the leading and most intelligent anti-masons in that quarter. Be this as it may, however, he rode into office on the popular hobby, very much to the credit (as the reader will discover) of "the Young lion of the West." The county should vote the 'Squire a pistareen to buy one of Cobb's Spelling Books.

"Benja Gardner Esq to the county of Niagary to any Constable in the said county you are hereby commanded in the name of the people of the State of Newyork to take a coopers adds and broad ax one brace believed to be at the house of of John Danaels you are commanded to search the said Daniels house ane if foand to also pring before me the body of the defendant to answer to the people of the stat of Newyork how and whenc you came by the propperty here of fail not given under my hand this the 23 of of Aprael 1829 Benja Gardner j p"

The Steam Frigate FULTON THE FIRST, which had been moored at the Navy Yard, at Brooklyn, for several years, and used as a receiving ship, was destroyed by explosion, about three o'clock, P. M., on Thursday last. It is supposed that the fire was communicated accidentally to the magazine, containing three barrels of damaged powder, and which was visited by the gunner a few minutes previous to the accident, for the purpose of procuring ammunition to load the evening gun. One hundred and forty-three men belonged to the Fulton at the time of the explosion; twenty-eight of whom were fortunately on shore. Of the remainder, as far as ascertained, twenty-three were instantly killed, and twenty-two wounded—one of whom has since died; seventy remain to be accounted for. At the moment of the accident, the officers and their guests were in the ward room seated at dinner. Commodore Chauncey, who had been on board the frigate for several hours, on a visit of inspection, left her a few moments before the accident.

The anti-masons in Pennsylvania, wherever they can muster two in a place, (which is not always an easy matter) are talking of a state convention. We have no objections to their having one, and wish them just the same success as attended that which was held in this state. Have they any speech maker? If not we bespeak the job for Solomon Southwick.

A work in three volumes, entitled Specimens of American Poetry, is just issued from the Boston press. We have not seen it. It is spoken of well by some and indifferently by others.

A new work by Paulding, entitled Tales of the Good Woman, is highly commended.

FROM EUROPE. English papers to the 2d May have been received at New-York. They contain very little of interest—the following are the principal items.

The Plymouth Herald says it is confidently reported, that the government of Great Britain, joined by that of France and Austria, will inform Russia that they will not remain silent spectators, and see Turkey become a conquered country. If Russia still perseveres, it is more than probable that a higher tone will be used, and perhaps the torch war, lit in the east, may spread its flames throughout Europe.

Westminster Abbey was discovered to be on fire on the 29th of April, but no material injury was done; it was presumed to have been the work of some incendiary.

Kean has experienced a paralytick shock from which he can never so far recover as to appear on the stage again. He was in Ireland, at the Royal Hotel, Dublin.

Trade continued depressed in the various manufacturing towns.

An extensive forgery has been committed by a clerk in the Custom House, London.

The tax on British spirits the last year amounted to four millions, on tea three millions, and on candles half a million.

Fresh prosecutions are going on in Naples, for political offences, and several persons have been sentenced to death.

PORTUGAL. It is stated in a London paper of the 29th April, that the Marquis of Barbacena has received peremptory orders to return to Brazil with the young Queen of Portugal. The Queen was to leave Laleham on the 27th, for London, to receive a silver sceptre, with a copy of the constitutional charter from the Portuguese in the British capital. Count Palmella has left England for France, where he will live as a private individual. Lord Strangford is supposed to be on his way home.

A London paper of the 23d of April contains the following extract from Lisbon, dated 4th of April:—"We are assured that in an assembly of magistrates, held at Juchoz, who sat several hours in deliberation, Don Miguel himself became the accuser of his sister, whom he charged with conspiracy against his person, and the system established by him. The magistrates are said to have been so weak as to decide that proceedings should be commenced against the Princess, and the magistrate Calherios is charged to make a report thereon."

It is confidently stated that Lord Beresford is to proceed to Portugal as ambassador extraordinary from England, to endeavour to effect an arrangement between the two brothers, Don Pedro and Don Miguel.

An article from Falmouth says that the young Queen of Portugal was expected to sail for that port, for Rio Janerio, early in May.

COBB'S ABRIDGEMENT OF WALKER'S DICTIONARY. This work has been compiled apparently with great care. The errors and discrepancies which have crept into larger editions are corrected and avoided, so that it is believed by those who have examined it, that the orthography and pronunciation are more correct than in other school dictionaries. Several instances of improvement might be adduced, which render this work valuable. [N. York Statesman].

ITEMS.

Cats in demand. The Philadelphia, U. S. Gazette contains an advertisement for ten dozen young cats, wanted for shipping. A friend of ours drowned his cat the other day, in consequence of her having become familiarly acquainted with his milk-pan. Just as if cats could live without sustenance! Although our cats, like our poets, are not appreciated properly in their own country, we rejoice that their value is duly considered abroad. Ten dozen Yankee cats will keep all the rats of England in order.

[N. Y. Courier & Enquirer]

Look forward. A man has no business to walk forward while he is looking backward. It is an insult to the whole street—a sort of general defiance. It is as much as to say, "keep out of my way, for I am coming." Such a man is no better than "houtis humani generis," and should be knocked down incontinently. There are but two men living who are entitled to walk forward and look backward—our friend the SULTAN, and SOLOMON SOUTHWICK. [Ibid]

A Factotum Wanted. The London Times lately contained a notice to the following effect:—"An Editor, one whose principles are church and state, is wanted for an old established provincial paper. He will be required to report proceedings at public meetings, read proofs, to superintend the printing department, and to fill up his leisure hours in the counting house!" We wonder the advertiser did not add, to rock a cradle, to take charge of a turnip-field, and mend umbrellas."

A Miracle! Solomon Southwick's last paper does not contain one indecent, or blasphemous sentence, and there are only four that are scurrilous. Wonders will never cease. [Nob.]

Ridiculous Bigotry. The two following paragraphs may be fairly allowed to offset each other:

A bill is before the Illinois Legislature, prohibiting the disturbance of the publick peace on the Sabbath, "by begging money or any other thing" for the support of Missionary, Bible, and other religious societies, on pain of incurring a forfeiture of not less than five, nor more than ten dollars!

In consequence of the invitation given to Mr. Rayner, the Universalist preacher, to pray for the House, the Congregational and Baptist Clergymen in Hartford have refused to pray for the legislature. These gentlemen must set a high value upon their prayers. [New Haven Register].

A new and very elegant mode of decorating the walls of rooms, instead of papering them, has been adopted in Paris. It consists of glass stained by a peculiar process with landscapes or historical subjects. It is the invention of a retired officer; and in that country, where novelty is so much encouraged, and glass is so cheap, the inventor is likely to be well remunerated.

According to the usual mode of reckoning Popes, his Holiness, the lately deceased Pope Leo XII. is the two hundred and fifty-second since Peter the Apostle; of these, 208 were natives of Italy, 14 were Frenchmen, 11 Greeks, 6 Syrians and Dalmatians, 6 Germans, 3 Spaniards, 2 North Africans, and 1 Englishman.

Safety Blanket. Mr. Caleb Pierce, of Salem, has invented a fire screen, which he has exhibited in Boston, to the satisfaction of every one, who has seen it. It is merely a canvass sheet to cover the roof or the sides of a building exposed to the fire. The sheet on the upper edge, is provided with a canvass tube into which water is thrown by the engine hose, and as the water percolates through it keeps the canvass so wet as to resist the effects of fire.

The anti-masons at Lockport, got another prostration at the recent charter election. We have a charter election, here, in a few days, when it is probable they will run a ticket. Very well: we believe they will come off second-best, notwithstanding the acres written over by the Doctor Treacle, scribbler for the Buffalo Patriot.

[Buffalo Republican.]

The hon. Cadwallader D. Colden, formerly a member of the Senate of this state, has come out for anti-masonry, and addressed a tiresome letter to a committee in New-York explaining his views. Mr. Colden desires to be governor—it is said. If it be so, and he is to come in under the auspices of anti-masonry, he is a "poor man on a poor travel."

[Ibid.]

It is reported, that an ingenious hatter in anticipation of Mr. Colden's running for governor, is bringing out the "Colden hat"—consulting with a paddy on the propriety of giving it an original air—"By the tiles which grows in the bog of Kincaid, sure ye'll slouch it all round—that's the air for sich a hat."

[Ibid.]

The "Spartan Band." The many names and colours the political anti-masons have assumed, beat all natur. They now come out and style themselves the "Spartan Band." Spartan Banditti, would be more appropriate, we should suppose, seeing they war against the peace and good order of society, and rob reputation, while they would prevent freemen from enjoying civil and religious privileges in common with themselves.

[Northern Phoenix.]

The antis have just found out another degree, which they style the "Check degree." They were initiated to the art and mystery of this degree by the Republicans at the town elections this spring. Last fall it was revealed them, but they just begin to understand. The next degree we believe is the "put-down degree" which will be shown next fall.

[Ibid.]

ANTI-MASONRY IN PORTUGAL. The Boston Bulletin mentions a circular lately handed about in Lisbon, with the view of inflaming the royalists against the masons; the following is the closing portion of this document, whose sentiments we hope may not be rashly adopted by the Anti's on this side of the water:

"Let the Queen Donna Carlotta de Bourbon govern, and deal death at one blow to the republican monster of Freemasonry. The gallows and the triangles must work conjointly and with energy, and fires must be kindled in every quarter of Portugal, to reduce to ashes the bodies and property of these vile monsters. Then, and then only, may we exclaim safely and triumphantly,

Long live the absolute King!
Long live our holy religion!
Long live our beloved Queen!
Long live all true royalists!
Death and destruction to all Freemasons!"

Renunciations. The opinion now entertained of political anti-masonry, may be inferred from this. When old Captain Brighten, was asked by another anti-mason to sign a paper renouncing political anti-masonry, "No—no!" said the veteran, vehemently: "Though I have been an anti-mason, I'll be d—d if I ever own it publicly!" [Roch. Republican.]

Two Pigeons came passengers in the packet Amethyst, from Liverpool to Boston. They picked out their hammocks in the rigging, and were fed by the contributions of the sailors. It is supposed in Boston that they flew away from England to escape the civil war which Lord Eldon predicted, if Catholic emancipation was granted.

[N. Y. Eng.]

ANOTHER RENOUNCER. C. D. Colden of New-York, who was a very high Mason for a long period, says in his renunciation that he "never knew a 'very great Mason' who was not a very great fool." He evidently judges others by himself. He also says he was a Mason for 40 years! If he knew any evil of Masonry, he deserves a coating of tar and feathers for not revealing it 40 years ago.

He has the honesty, however, to exculpate Masons, as a body, from all knowledge of the Morgan business, and avows a belief that Masons generally (excepting those immediately concerned) were as innocent of the outrage as himself. And although a high Mason for 40 years, he solemnly avers that to his knowledge, Masonry never mingled in politics. Hence, the anti-masons can no longer charge Masonry with the above offences, without virtually belying their new recruit.

[Rochester Republican.]

The city and county of New-York contains about 200,000 people—a tenth of the population of this state. Yet in that vast multitude sufficient Antimasons cannot be found to support a single weekly paper! So much for the "rapid spread of Antimasonry" with which the political jugglers in this quarter are endeavouring to keep up the courage of their followers!!

[Ib.]

A late number of the anti-masonic paper at New-York contained a notice requesting its subscribers to meet at a certain place, to consider whether under all circumstances, it was advisable to continue the publication.

P. S. We have since learned that the above paper is "defunct and dead!" The political cause it advocated will soon share the same fate—Southwick, Colden & Co. to the contrary notwithstanding.

ANTIMASONRY. A drunken fellow by the name of Leonard, who was long since discarded from the society of decent men, has been wandering about the neighbourhood of Randolph in this state, selling steam-grammars, at retail, and antimasonic nonsense by the acre. A short time since, he put up a handbill in East Randolph, proposing to "deliver and act out" a lecture on Masonry, explaining all the ceremonies, as performed in "the old established lodges," and calling himself "the first mason in New England, and the second in the United States of America, who openly disclosed to his fellowcitizens the secrets of the long hidden art of what has, for centuries been known and received among different kingdoms, empires, states, tongues, nations, people and languages, by the high sounding title of Ancient Masonry." To his handbill announcing this important and disinterested labour of love, is appended a certificate signed by nobody, and naming no particular lodge, purporting that the said Leonard has been regularly honoured with three degrees of freemasonry. The lecture was gratuitous—but "gentlemen who are able and willing," were given to understand that they might "contribute whatever their benevolent feelings lead them to bestow." The smallest favours, doubtless, were thankfully received. Truly this is a glorious mode of sponging upon the credulous yeomen, and raising the wind in order to pay grog scores from tavern to tavern.

[Boston Bulletin, May 26.]

ABORIGINAL CUSTOMS. The Cherokee Phoenix has the following account of the subdivision of the Indian tribes into clans and the peculiar usages to which that subdivision gives rise. These clans have hitherto in many authors been confounded with the tribes:

INDIAN CLANS. Most of our readers probably know what is meant by Indian clans. It is no more than a division of an Indian tribe into large families. We believe this custom is universal with the North American Indians. Among the Cherokees are seven clans, such as Wolf, Deer, Paint, &c. This simple division of the Cherokees formed the ground-work by which marriages were regulated, and murder punished. A Cherokee could marry into any of the clans except two, that to which his father belongs, for all that clan are his fathers and aunts, and that to which his mother belongs, for all of that clan are his mothers and sisters, a child invariably inheriting the clan of its mother. This custom, which originated time immemorial, was observed with the greatest strictness. No law could be guarded and enforced with equal caution. In times past, the penalty annexed to it was not less than death. But it has scarcely, perhaps never been violated, except within a few years. Now it is invaded with impunity, though not to an equal extent with other customs of the Cherokees.

But it was the mutual law of clans, as connected with murder, which rendered the custom savage and barbarous. We speak of what it was once, not as it is now; for the Cherokees, after experiencing sad effects from it, determined to, and did about twenty years ago, in a solemn council abolish it. From that time, murder has been considered a governmental crime. Previous to that, the following were too palpably true, viz:

The Cherokees, as a nation, had nothing to do with murder.

Murder was punished upon the principle of retaliation. It belonged to the clan of the murdered to revenge his death.

If the murderer fled, his brother or nearest relative, was liable to suffer in his stead.

If a man killed his brother, he was amenable to no law or clan.

If the murderer (this, however, is known only by tradition,) was not as respectable as the murdered, his relative, or a man of his clan of a more respectable standing, was liable to suffer.

To kill, under any circumstance whatever, was considered murder, and punished accordingly.

Our readers will say, "those were savage laws indeed." They were; and the Cherokees were then to be pitied, for the above were not mere inoperative laws, but most rigorously executed. But we can now say with pleasure, that they are all repealed, and are remembered only as vestiges of ignorance and barbarism.

[Cherokee Phoenix, Feb. 18.]

MARRIED,

In Fort Ann, Washington county, on the 27th ult. by Rev. Mr. Miner, SOLOMON COWEN, esq. of Hartford, to Miss ELECTA T. BUSH, of Fort Ann.

At Brattleboro, Vt. on the 22d ult. by the Rev. Mr. M'Gee, Mr. THOMAS M. BURT, of Warwick, Orange co. N. Y. to Miss LYDIA BUTTS, of South Hadley, Ms.

DIED,

At his residence in Youngstown, Niagara county, on the 28th inst. Col. WILLIAM KING, a meritorious officer in the late war, and recently a member of the legislature of this state. He was buried on the 29th inst. with military honours, under the direction of the commandant of Fort Niagara. His funeral was attended by a large assemblage of afflicted relatives and friends.

Col. KING was in the expedition at Little York, under Pike, commanding the troops of 15th regt., and at Four mile creek, where he received a wound, and highly distinguished himself.

In this city, on the 27th ult. Mrs. MARY SICKLES, aged 89 years.

On the 3d inst. aged 81 years, Mrs. ANNA STAATS, widow of the late William Staats.

CONTENTS THE IRISH SHIELD FOR MAY.

History of Ireland, Chapter VI. Ossianick Fragments, No. II. (The Castle of Enniskillen.) Literary and Biographical Notices of Irish Authors and Artists, No. VII. (George Farquhar.) Ancient Architecture of Ireland, No. II. Discursive Remarks on Painting and Sculpture, No. I. A Biographical Sketch of Rubens. (Translated from a late French Periodical.) Publick Edifices of Dublin, No. II. (The Four Courts.) Desultory Strictures on the Drama, No. I. (Racine and Lee.) Original Patch Work—Personifications in Poetry, Beauty, A Roman Dandy, A Roman Belle, To Discover the Secrets of a Woman's Heart, Elocution, The Vicar of Bray, Oliver Goldsmith, A Historian, The Voice, Justice, Origin of Making Glass, Game of Chess, Garrick, Milton's Italian Sonnets, The New-York Stage, (Park Theatre.) The Association of the Friends of Ireland in New-York, Catholic Emancipation, Bishop England, Our History of Ireland. Original Poetry—The Modest Lily of Manour Hamilton, The Sigh, Sonnet to a Rose, The Winter of the Mind, The Harp of Erin, The Triumph of Love.

Published monthly by CALEB BARTLET, No. 76 Bowery, New-York. Terms, $3.50 a year in advance.

JOB PRINTING,

Of every description, neatly and expeditiously executed on moderate terms, at the office of the American Masonick Record and Albany Saturday Magazine, No. 3, Beaver-street, one door west of South Market-street, Albany.

STOVES, FRANKLINS, &c.—HEERMANS, RATHBONE, & Co. No. 47, State-street, Albany, offer at wholesale or retail the most perfect and extensive assortment of STOVES ever before offered in this city; comprising the latest and most approved patterns of Cooking Stoves, Franklins, Boilers, Ovens, and Hall Stoves, together with Russian, English and Philadelphia Sheet Iron, Brass Andirons, Shovel and Tongs, Tin Plates, Stove Pipe, Clay Furnaces, &c. &c.; all of which they will sell on the most reasonable terms.

Albany May, 1829.

18m2

AMMON RASEY respectfully informs his old customers, his friends, and the publick in general, that in consequence of his old stand, No. 5-8, being torn down for the purpose of rebuilding, he has removed his PORTER AND READING ROOM to No. 570 South Market-street, a few doors below the Old Corner, where he will at all times be happy to wait upon those who may favour him with a call.

He has fitted up his new establishment in the best manner possible for the reception of company, and every exertion will be made on his part to render it an agreeable and pleasant resort.

May 18.

18tf

GROCERIES, &c. The subscriber having taken the stand recently occupied by D. P. Marshall, corner of State and Dean streets, of first to his friends and the publick, a large and general assortment of GROCERIES, consisting of teas, sugars, spices, liquors, and every other article in the line, of the first quality, and on as reasonable terms as can be furnished in the city.

ROLAND ADAMS.

Albany, May 23, 1829.

173m.

ALBANY BRUSH TRUNK AND BANNBOX MANUFACTORY.—NORRIS TARBELL, No. 453 South Market street, opposite the Connecticut Coffee-House, keeps constantly on hand and for sale, the above named articles, at low prices. Those who wish to purchase, will please to call and examine for themselves. Cash paid for clean combed Hogs' Bristles.

Albany, March 4, 1829.

FINE CUTLERY, &c.—JAMES DICKSON, Cutler and Surgical Instrument Maker, No. 3, Beaver street, (formerly at No. 18 North Market street) Albany, manufactures and repairs all kinds of instruments in the above branches, with neatness, accuracy and dispatch, and warranted equal to any article imported, or manufactured in the United States.

Shavers, Scissors, Razors and Penknives, ground and finished on an improved plan, and warranted to excel any other in use in this city or elsewhere.

Carrier's Steels constantly on hand, and warranted a superior article.

Blades inserted in knife-handlers in the most approved style, and on as reasonable terms. Locks repaired.

N. B. Country orders punctually attended to.

Albany, Feb. 14, 1829.

3tf

BOOK BINDING. Sign of the Golden Ledger, corner of State and North Market-streets, Albany. WILLIAM FEYMOU, carries on the above business in all its branches; viz: plain, extra, and super extra—has a first rate ruling machine, and other necessary implements for manufacturing Blank Books of every description, on the most reasonable terms, of the best workmanship.

An assortment on hand. Subscribers to the American Masonick Record can have their volumes handsomely bound in boards, with leather backs and corners, at 2 1/2 cents a volume. Feb 14

3m3

POETRY.

From Willis' American Monthly Magazine for May.

THE RED ROVER.

BY J. O. ROCKWELL.

A battle-gun on the mighty sea—
A tone to shake the main!
Slow rolls it on the sleeping sky,
And thunders back again!
The bannery blaze that lighted from
The cannon's mouth is o'er,
And the smoke, like incense, goes away
To slumber on the shore.

The setting sun looks goldenly
Upon the ocean's breast,
And the waters leap like living things
To meet their burning guest:
But where the melancholy North
Uprises blue and steep,
A snow white sail is coming forth,
And dancing o'er the deep.

And ever as a moving surge
Its form before her flings,
She stoops and rises gracefully,
As one of living wings;
But as she clears that shadowy lele,
And sails towards the sun;
That crimson belt that girdles her
Is seen—the fearful one!

And now each sailor's eye is bent
Towards that threatening form,
Which neareth to them as a pent
And sudden coming storm.
And every cannon teems with death,
And every flag unfurled,
As they would waste in but a breath
The strength of half the world!

The hungry waves are climbing up
The ship's o'er leaning deck,
And for the hardy seaman's form
They seem to look and beck.
The sun is gone; the twilight sky
Is prodigal of cloud,
And the war star glimmers fitfully
Beyond its misty shroud.

But where was he—the Rover,
Who had had such fearful reign?
When the thunder's tone was over,
He was travelling on the main;
And the moon came out—the stars were bright
And gemmed the whole blue sky—
And he went up his way that night
As "One not born to die."

From Posthumous Poems of Percy Bysshe Shelley.

THE PINE FOREST OF THE CASCINE NEAR PISA.

We wandered to the Pine Forest
That skirts the Ocean's foam,
The lightest wind was in its nest,
The tempest in its home.

The whispering waves were half asleep,
The clouds were gone to play,
And on the woods, and on the deep,
The smile of heaven lay.

It seemed as if the day were one
Sent from beyond the skies,
Which shed to earth above the sun
A light of Paradise.

We paused amid the Pines, that stood
The giants of the waste;
Tortured by storms to shapes as rude,
With stems like serpents, interlaced.

How calm it was—the silence there
By such a chain was bound,
That even the busy woodpecker
Made stiller by her sound.

The inviolable quietness;
The breath of peace we drew,
With its soft motion made not less
The calm that round us grew.

It seemed that from the remotest seat
Of the white mountain's waste,
To the bright flowers beneath our feet,
A magic circle traced;—

A spirit interfused around,
A thinking, silent life,

To momentary peace it bound
Our mortal nature's strife.

For still it seemed the centre of
The magic circle there—
Was one whose being filled with love
The breathless atmosphere.

Were not the crocusses that grew
Under that ilex tree,
As beautiful in scent, in hue,
As ever fed the bee?

We stood beside the pools that lie
Under the forest bough,
And each seemed like a sky
Gulphed in a world below;—

A purple firmament of light,
Which in the dark earth lay,
More boundless than the depth of night,
And clearer than the day.

In which the massy forests grew,
As in the upper air,
More perfect both in shape and hue
Than any moving there.

Like one beloved, the scene had lent
To the dark water's breast
Its very leaf and lineament
With that clear truth expressed.

There lay fair glades and neighbouring lawn,
And through the dark green crowd
The white sun twinkled like the dawn
Under a speckled cloud.

Sweet views which in our world above
Can never well be seen,
Were imaged by the water's love
Of that fair forest green.

And all was interfused beneath
With an Elysium air,
An atmosphere without a breath.
A Silence sleeping there.

From the "Rivals of Este and other poems, by James G. Brooks and Mary E. Brooks."

PLEDGE TO THE DYING YEAR.

Fill to the brim! one pledge to the past
As it sinks on the shadowy bier;
Fill to the brim! 'tis the saddest and last
We pour to the grave of the year!
Wake, the light phantoms of beauty that won us
To linger awhile in those bowers;
And flash the bright day-beams of beauty upon us,
That gilded life's earlier hours.

Here's to the love—though it flitted away,
We can never, no, never forget!
Through the gathering darkness of many a day,
One pledge will we pour to it yet.
Oh, frail is the vision, that witching and tender,
And bright on the wanderer broke,
When Irem's own beauty in shadowless splendour,
Along the wild desert awoke.

Fill to the brim! one pledge to the glow
Of the heart in its purity warm!
Ere sorrow had sullied the fountain below,
Or darkness enveloped the form;
Fill to that life tide! oh warm was its rushing
Through Adens of arrowy light,
And yet like the wave in the wilderness gushing
'Twill gladden the wine cup to-night.

Fill to the past! from its dim distant sphere
Wild voices in melody come;
The strains of the by-gone, deep echoing here,
We pledge to their shadowy tomb;
And like the bright orb, that in sinking flings back
One gleam o'er the cloud-covered dome,
May the dreams of the past, on futurity track
The hope of a holier home!

From Mr. J. Robinson's Translations of the German Lyric Poets.

HOPE.

BY SCHILLER.

Man is found on the airy vision to brood
Of brighter and happier days;
And is ever chasing some fleeting good,
Which with flattering illusion betrays;
The changing world no novelty brings,
Yet man still hopes for better things.

Hope in the cradled infant smiles,
She plays round the frolicsome boy,
The youth with her magic enchantment beguiles,
Nor can age her power destroy;

For when in the grave he wearied lies,
Hope sits on the grave, and points to the skies.

Nor is this the fair dream, unsubstantial and vain,
Of a head with wild fancies elate,
The heart from within echoes loudly again,
We are born for a happier state;
And what that voice would bid us believe,
The hoping soul will never deceive.

(From the Massachusetts Journal.)

TO SPRING.

"My time is past, my time is past."—F. Melton.

Once—long ago, thou gorgeous spring,
Thy green woods echoed my welcoming,
And I joined, in heart, each wild bird's wing,
And soared away:—

"My time is past."

Then all was sunshine, light and bloom,
I did not dream of the cursed doom,
That has buried my hopes in the deep, deep tomb,
To sleep for aye:—

"My time is past."

Alike the snow-wreathed winter wind,
The spring-flower chaplet, gaily twined
To this worn heart and wearied mind,
This withered clay:—

"My time is past."

Pass on! pass on!—sweet scented breeze,
Whisper of spring with the tall fresh trees,
O! come not in mockery to lips like these,
Pale in decay:—

"My time is past."—

F. P.

ALBANY TYPE FOUNDRY—The subscribers, successors to R. STARR & Co. in the above foundry, continue the business in its various branches, and are prepared to execute orders for the following type, at the regular prices, on a credit of six months, or at a discount of 7 1/2 per cent. for cash, viz:

Roman and Italics—Twenty, Fourteen, Ten, Eight, Seven, Five and Four lines pica, Canon, Double paragon, Double Great primer, Double English, Double Small Pica, Great primer, English, pica, Small pica, Long primer, Bourgeois, Brevier, Minion, Nonpareil, pearl. Two line letters—pica, Small pica, Long primer, Bourgeois, Brevier, Minion, Nonpareil, pearl.

Full face capitals—Small Pica, Long primer, Bourgeois, Brevier, Minion. Antiques—Ten and Eight lines pica roman, Five line Pica Italic, Four line Pica, Double Great primer, Double Small pica, Great primer, and Pica, with lower case; and Long Primer, Brevier and Nonpareil. Italians—Five line Pica, Double Small Pica, Two line Brevier, and Two line Nonpareil.

Tuscan—Double Small Pica. Black—Five line Pica, Double Small Pica, Great Primer Pica, Long Primer.

Open Blacks—Five line Pica, Double Small Pica, Great Primer. Shaded letters—Six line Pica ornamented, Two line Brevier and Two line Nonpareil double shade; Two line Nonpareil meridian shade; Double Great Primer, Two line Brevier, Two line Nonpareil, and One line Brevier, single shade; Two line Minion and Two line Pearl italic single shade; Double Small Pica roman, and One line Brevier italic antique shaded.

Script—English, on inclined body, (cast on a new plan.)

Greek—Pica.

Borders and Flowers—From Six line Pica to Pearl, all cast in copper matrices.

Checks—Canon and Double English, plain and opened.

Fractions and Leaders of all sizes, from English to Pearl, English, Pica and Long Primer piece Fractions; Spanish and French Accents, and Accented Vowels, Figure Vowels, Superior Figures, Dashes, and Astronomical and other Signs, of various sizes; Long Primer Space Rules, &c. and Ornaments and Cuts, in great variety.

Printing materials of every description, and of the first quality, at the lowest prices—Cases, Stands, (an improved pattern,) Gallies, Composing sticks, Chases of all sizes, improved newspaper Chases, in two parts Ball, stocks and skins, Bodkins, Furniture, &c. and, Front's and Johnson's printing ink, constantly on hand. Presses of all kinds finished at the manufacturers' prices. Wells' Improved presses will be kept constantly on hand, and may be examined at the foundry.

Large additions in the variety of type have been made since the specimen of this foundry was published of which specimens are now not only completed, and will soon be sent to printers, the punches of which are cut by the senior partner of this firm, whose reputation as a superior letter-cutter is well established; and the whole business being under our immediate superintendence, no pains is spared to make our types in every way worthy the attention of printers. An important improvement in the composition of the type metal has also been made—copper and some other ingredients being added, which render it both harder and tougher, and of a finer grain. Type cast at this foundry are warranted to be as solid as any cast in the country, and that they will not settle in height from the pressure in using. Particular care is also taken to have the type well dressed, and the foundry regularly put up.

Old type is received in exchange for new, at 10 cents per lb. Orders, by mail, or left at the foundry, No. 8 Liberty-st., will receive prompt attention. STARR & LITTLE. The type upon which this paper is printed was cast at the above foundry.

THIS PAPER

Is published every Saturday, by E. B. CHILD.

AT NO. 3, BEAVER STREET, ALBANY, N. Y.

TERMS—To city subscribers, Three Dollars a year. To subscribers who receive their papers by mail, Two Dollars and Fifty Cents, IN ADVANCE—otherwise, Three Dollars. JOB PRINTING neatly executed at this office.

AMERICAN MASONICK RECORD

AND ALBANY SATURDAY MAGAZINE.

VOL. III.

ALBANY, N. Y. SATURDAY, JUNE 13, 1829.

NO. 20.

MASONICK RECORD.

GRAND LODGE.

The Rt. W. Grand Lodge of the state of New-York held its annual communication at the Grand Lodge Room, at Masonick Hall in the city of New-York, on Wednesday the fifth instant; the session continued until Friday afternoon. The following officers were elected:—

The M. W. Stephen Van Rensselaer, Grand Master.
The Rt. W. Mordecai Myers, Deputy Grand Master.
The Rt. W. Ezra S. Cozier, Senior Grand Warden.
The Rt. W. Welcome Esleeck, Junior Grand Warden.
The Rt. W. James Herring, Grand Secretary.
The Rt. W. James Van Benschoten, Grand Treasurer.
The Rt. W. and Rev. John Read, of Poughkeepsie,
The Rt. W. and Rev. Peter A. Overbagh, of Ulster county,
The Rt. W. and Rev. A. R. Martin, of Richmond county,
The Rt. W. and Rev. E. M. Johnson of Brooklyn,

Grand
Chaplains.

GRAND ENCAMPMENT.

At the annual communication of the Grand Encampment of Knights Templars for the state of New-York, held at St. John's Hall in the city of New-York, on Friday, the 5th instant, the following Grand officers were elected for the ensuing year:—

Ezra S. Cozier, of Utica, Grand Master.
James Herring, of the city of New-York, Deputy Grand Master.
Ambrose L. Jordan, of Hudson, Grand Generalissimo.
Adriel Ely, of Watertown, Jefferson county, Grand Captain General.
Levi Beardsley, of Cherry Valley, Otsego county, Grand Senior Warden.
Welcome Esleeck of Albany, Grand Junior Warden.
Richard Pennell, of the city of New-York, Grand Recorder.
Rev. Joseph Prentiss, of Catskill, Greene county, Grand Prelate.

The cry of the ignorant lovers of the marvellous, which denounces all masons because some wicked ones are supposed to have committed murder, begins to wax more faint. The people who go round the country like pedlars, selling the pretended secrets of masonry at twenty five cents a head, turning every barn and school house into a sort of puppet show, in which a soi disant mason is to officiate as manager, find their business gradually diminishing. Those who consider masonry and its persecutors equally unworthy of the credit of convulsing a great nation, will be glad to hear, in addition to these facts, that the President of the United States, the Secretary of War, and other of the great dignitaries of the nation have recently countenanced the masonick fraternity by attending the ceremony of laying the corner stone of the first lock of the Ohio and Chesapeake canal, by the Grand Master of Masons in the District of Columbia.

The following, which shows the disposition of the Chief Magistrate to discountenance the persecution of a whole order for the faults of a few individuals, will be read with interest.

[Boston Commercial Gazette.]

From the National Intelligencer.

CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO CANAL.

CEREMONY OF LAYING THE CORNER STONE OF THE FIRST LOCK.

The active contractors for the 8th section of this great national undertaking, having got the first Lock on the line ready for construction, invited the GRAND MASTER of Masons in the District of Columbia to lay the corner stone thereof, on Friday last, the 29th ult. The Grand Lodge accordingly assembled in Potomac Lodge Room, in Georgetown, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon, and accompanied by a considerable number of other Masonick brethren, proceeded in cavalcade, to the 8th section of the Canal, about seven miles above Georgetown. Here they were soon after joined by the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, (Past Grand Master of the State of Tennessee, who had been invited by the Grand Master of the District to honour the ceremonies with his presence,) attended by the Secretary of War, the Postmaster General, and the Mayor of Georgetown. The company having assembled at the lock-house (a neat stone edifice erected on the high ground, for the residence of the lock keeper) and partaken of some refreshment, the procession was formed and proceeded to the scene of operation—the PRESIDENT and other official gentlemen immediately in advance of the GRAND MASTER, the contractors and officers of the work, and other citizens in the rear, and the whole moving to the fine music of the Marine Band, whose inspiring strains “through dale and thicket rung.”

On reaching the entrance of the lock, the masonick procession was reversed in its order, and then advanced to the spot where the ponderous corner stone was suspended, the PRESIDENT in front of the whole. The assemblage being arranged on the extensive floor of the lock, the GRAND MASTER laid the stone in its bed, with all the customary ceremonies of his ancient institution, which were rendered the more interesting from the fact that the gavel, or mallet, which he made use of was the same used by general WASHINGTON in laying the corner stone of the Capitol. Within a cavity in the stone were placed a set of the gold and silver coins of the United States, a copy of each of the District newspapers, and a silver plate, bearing on one side the following inscription:

“The Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, commenced on the 4th of July, 1828, by John Quincy Adams, then President of the United States. This, the first Corner Stone of a Lock of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, laid the 29th day of May, A. D. 1829, A. L. 5829, by the R. W. Win. Hewitt, Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of Freemasons of the District of Columbia. Andrew Jackson, President of the United States.”

ON THE REVERSE.

“Officers of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company:

Charles Fenton Mercer, President,	Benj. Wright, Engineer in Chief,
Phineas Jannney,	Nathan S. Roberts, Members of the
Joseph Kent,	and
Peter Lenox,	John Martineau, Engineers.
Frederick May,	Robert Leekie, Insp'r of Masonry,
Walter Smith, and	Daniel Van Slyke, Eg. of the work,
Andrew Stewart,	Theophilus Williams, Ass't Eng.
Clement Smith, Treasurer,	Walter W. Fenton & Co. Contractors.
John P. Inglo, Clerk,	James A. Baker, Architect.”

Having completed the ceremonies, and pronounced a benediction on the work, the GRAND MASTER offered to the PRESIDENT of the United States the opportunity of expressing any thing which he might desire to say on the occasion. The President returned his thanks for the opportunity afforded, and briefly expressed his convictions of the public importance of the great work of which the corner stone just laid was a constituent part, and of the successful progress of which such abundant proofs were on every hand exhibited—the deep interest which he felt in it—his sincere wishes for its complete accomplishment, and his fervent hope that the prayer just uttered by the worshipful GRAND MASTER for its success might be fully realized.

The procession then returned to the house, where refreshments had been profusely provided by the liberal contractors, and, after resting and refreshing themselves a short time, the President and his attendants, and the Masonick Fraternity, re-entered their carriages and returned to the city. A number of citizens, attracted thither by the occasion, took the opportunity of being introduced to the PRESIDENT, whose presence, indeed was unexpected to most of them, and, therefore, as well as considering the excessive heat of the day, and the badness of the route for carriages, was the more gratifying.

Many of our citizens who had never visited any part of the work since its commencement, embraced this opportunity of doing so, and accordingly left their carriages, and walked up the line of the canal, for two or three miles to observe the progress which had been made on the different sections as they passed. The magnitude of the excavations, and the height, the beauty and solidity of the extensive walls which face the Potomac in those places where it washes the fort of the river embankment, appeared to surprise as well as gratify, all who now, for the first time, witnessed what had been done within the brief space since the work was commenced—especially when they understood that the line for forty or fifty miles, exhibited similar and even greater proofs of the vigour with which the work has been pressed forward by the company and its agents. The pleasure of viewing this magnificent work, with the additional attraction which the beautiful and romantick scenery of the Potomac presents at every step, will soon render a ride up the Canal one of the most delightful excursions which any portion of the Union can offer.

An engagement of the President and Directors of the company, on a different part of the Canal, prevented their presence at the laying of the corner stone at the 8th section. The attendance of the President of the company was prevented also by other duties, which the subjoined letter from him will explain:

WASHINGTON, May 28, 1829.

DEAR SIR: The indispensable necessity I am under of preparing, in a very short time, of materials yet to be collected and arranged, the annual report to be submitted to the Stockholders of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, in general meeting on Monday next, denies to me the pleasure of being present at the Masonick ceremonial of laying the corner stone of the first lock begun on the canal, at one o'clock to-morrow.

Be so good as to communicate this apology for my necessary absence on an occasion so interesting, and my thanks to your brother Masons for the dignity which they are about to impart to it.

I am very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. F. MERCER.

DANIEL VAN SLYKE, Esq.

From the Nantucket Inquirer.

FASHION AND ANTI-MASONRY.

Every body knows the progress of Fashion, and how ludicrous those appear who live far from the seat of Miss Bon ton, when they assume modes of dress which have long been discarded by the original inventors. Let a person travel from the head quarters of the fickle goddess, and by the time he arrives at a distance of two or three hundred miles he imagines by the dress of the people, (unless the difference between the cut and make of city and country tailors precludes the inference) that he has made a retrogression of two or three years in existence; but the grotesque figure of the honest boor is generally so unlike the primness of the city dandy, that he is not long deceived. He finds that the fantastick fashion which had long since fallen into disrepute in his native city, is spreading like an infection over the outskirts of the republic. He contemplates upon it, after it has passed away, with mingled emotions; in doubts whether the whimsical inventors or the servile imitators deserve the greater share of ridicule.

Thus it has been with anti-masonry—it raged and spread like an epidemic, and made as great havoc in domestic and social happiness, as the plagues of Egypt. The ignorant and deluded rallied round the Le Roy standard, like the beau monde round an artificial domina imported from a foreign court. The abettors of this ignis fatuus hoped to acquire notoriety by joining in the hue and cry against freemasonry, and to ride into stations of honour and profit over the backs of prostrate superiors. And to give a kind of sanction to the unhallowed scheme, a few priests, who have a much higher regard for a benefice than for truth or conscience, were enlisted in the campaign. This artifice was quite ingenious, for it is well known that there are thousands who have no sentiment of their own, and never form an opinion on any subject till it can be derived from what they consider an unerring source—from their ministers.

But what is the present condition of this anomalous fabric? The principal pillars that supported the anti-masonick, anti-benevolent, and anti-humane edifice, are already crumbling in the dust; and those that are now endeavouring to erect, in regions quite distant from the original head quarters of anti-masonry, what may be compared to porches.

kitchens, and out-houses to the ignoble temple, will find themselves but illly accommodated, when they discover that the main body of the building has sunk beneath the influence of reason and common sense.

Some of the good people of Pennsylvania have lately had an anti-masonick convention in the city of Lancaster; but their report has no more connexion with the principles of freemasonry, than paganism has with christianity. They undoubtedly calculate to furnish an elegant piazza to Solomon's house; but if it stands, it must stand alone.

From the Rutland (Vt.) Herald.

The following is an extract from a note prefixed to a sermon preached by Rev. Amos Drury, chaplain of the Grand Chapter of Vermont, which has just been published. Mr. Drury has for a number of years, till within a short time, been pastor of the congregational church in West Rutland. During this time we have been personally acquainted with him; and no man in our acquaintance possesses to a more eminent degree the ardent piety of a christian, blended with the expansive benevolence of the philanthropist. We pretend to no knowledge of the institution of speculative freemasonry, further than we are witness to its acts and to the characters of men who belong to and uphold it. But the testimony of such a man as Mr. Drury respecting the institution, goes further with us than that of a hundred, yea, a thousand, of those who, in renouncing their connexion with it, perjure themselves by their own evidence. Mr. D. says:

"If any are of the opinion that I regard the anti-masonick excitement as just, and that I dare not stand out in opposition to it, in defence of the principles of speculative freemasonry, they labour under a very great mistake. And I am willing to say openly and publicly that I do esteem the principles of masonry as worthy the attention of any man; and that there is nothing in the obligations of the institution, nor in the ceremonies, which is inconsistent with christian and ministerial character. And while I have for years absented myself almost wholly from the communications of the fraternity, on purpose to ease the feelings of those whose minds were prejudiced against it, I do still feel myself bound to assert that I regard the anti-masonick excitement which is now agitating many portions of the civil and christian community, as one of the greatest curses that ever visited our land."

From the (Cooperstown) Freeman's Journal

During the sitting of the Northern Associated Presbytery last week, at Westford Otsego county, an application was made from the church at Harpersfield, Delaware county, for the dismission of the Rev. Stephen Fenn from the pastoral charge thereof, which produced the unanimous adoption of a resolution in the words following:

"Resolved that the differences of opinion in regard to masonry are not viewed by us as a sufficient reason why there should be a dissolution of the relation between Pastor and Church."

The publick may put such a construction upon the above proceeding as they choose, but when they are informed that the Rev. Mr. Fenn is a mason, we think the conclusion must be inevitable, that it was sought to immolate him in the same spirit which at the west has broken up churches and destroyed the social harmony of society.

CELEBRATIONS.

The anniversary meeting of the W. Grand Lodge of the state of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations will be held at Friendship Hall, in Chepachet, Rhode Island, on Wednesday, the 24th June inst. The Grand Lodge will assemble at 10 o'clock, A. M. The members of the Grand Lodge, proxies of lodges, members of subordinate lodges, and all others concerned, are requested to take notice, and give their attendance accordingly.

By order, R. HUMPHREY, G. Sec'y.

Providence, June 6th, 1829.

The publick are respectfully informed, that the corner stone of the Evangelick Lutheran church, in Williamsport, Maryland, will be laid on Wednesday, 24th June. The committee are happy to add, that the masonick fraternity have kindly consented to officiate in character on that occasion.

BENJAMIN CROW,

JOHN BAKER,
JACOB WOLF,
Building Committee.

Williamsport, May 22, 1829.

The festival of St. John the Baptist will be celebrated by St. John's Lodge, Post Mill Village, in Thetford, on the 24th of June, inst. Procession will form from the masonick hall, at 11 o'clock, and proceed to the church, where the publick exercises will be performed.

The members of the neighbouring lodges are respectfully invited to attend with suitable badges and clothing. By order of the lodge, PRES. WEST, jr. Sec'y.

Thetford, June 1, 1829.

The anniversary of St. John the Baptist will be observed by Hiram Lodge, No. 21, at Winchester, Virginia, on the 24th inst.; when it is expected that the exercises will correspond with the dignity of the occasion. The neighbouring lodges and transient brethren are respectfully invited to attend.

B. BUSHNELL, Sec'y.

Winchester, June 5, 1829.

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

EXPERIMENTS WITH PRUSSICK ACID.

A great number of experiments with prussick acid was made a few weeks since in New-York, by Mr. Henderson, a medical student. This gentleman states, that having great doubts on the subject of the reports which had been given of the power of hydrocyanick (prussick) acid, he procured a quantity of two sorts—the pure, as it is made in the greatest possible strength, and the medicinal acid, as made by Garden of London, which is of about one-seventh the strength of the pure acid. Mr. Henderson first rubbed three drops of the pure acid upon his naked arm, the effect of which was to make him stagger considerably, so as to keep with great difficulty from falling. An intense pain of the head succeeded, with a difficulty of sight; but this was not of long duration, and a strong taste of bitter almonds remained in the mouth for two hours. At the end of that time he recovered, and was as well as if nothing had happened. On the following day he swallowed eight drops of the acid as it is used in medicine, and increased the dose within the space of three days, to sixteen drops at each dose, twice a-day; but his head and sight became so violently affected, that he relinquished his experiments, &c. upon himself, and was several days before he completely recovered. He then tried the effect of the pure acid upon animals. A cat, upon whose nose he had rubbed four drops, walked a distance of eight or ten yards without the slightest appearance of being at all affected; but it then suddenly stopped, leaped into the air, and fell down dead. He then held a pen, the feather of which had been dipped into the acid, in an iron cage in which two rats were confined, so as to irritate them, and cause them to snap at the feather; they had no sooner done so, than they fell as if they had been shot. A large dog of the Newfoundland species was killed within three minutes by four drops of the acid being poured into its nostrils; whilst another dog of similar size and breed had a drachm of the common acid, such as is used in medicine, and with which several persons have recently destroyed themselves in England, poured down its throat without effect. Whether this difference was to be attributed to the change which the acid undergoes by dilution, or to a difference of nervous sensibility in the animals, Mr. Henderson does not state,—probably to both. He mentions, indeed, that whilst he has seen one man take six drops of the medicinal acid four times a-day without apparent effect, another from merely smelling at the bottle in which it was contained, has been compelled to keep his bed for several hours. Upon frogs and other cold-blooded animals the acid had very little effect. Two frogs, upon the soft part of which he had rubbed a considerable quantity of the pure acid, suffered for a time as if from intoxication, and then recovered and hopped away. Upon insects of various kinds the effects were very curious. On the first application of the acid they curled up their legs, and were to all appearance dead; but in the course of a few hours, many of them, after exuding a black fluid, recovered life and strength. Mr. Henderson, in the paper from which this account is given, gives several cases of remarkable cures in stomach complaints, and in indigestion generally, from the use of the prussick acid; but he states that its effects are so different in different persons, that it can never be prescribed with safety by the physician who has not been well acquainted with the constitution and previous habits of his patient:—to use his own words, "it is a medicine to be prescribed only to a physician by a physician."

COMPOUND EYES OF INSECTS.

Mr. Carpenter, in the March number of the Technological Repository, states the result of microscopick observations made by him, to ascertain the truth of the existence of numerous eyes in some insects. Among the subjects experimented on by Mr. Carpenter, and which amounted to upwards of 200, the most familiar were, the boat-fly, dragon-fly, gnat, bee, wasp, ichneumon, bombardier, assassin, cock-chaffer, peach-fly, earwig, grass-hopper, locust, cricket, and cock-roach. Mr. Carpenter represents himself as fully convinced that the whole of these insects did really possess numerous and distinct eyes, varying in number, according to the species of insect; in some upwards of forty, in others a thousand, and upwards of thirty thousand in some species! The eyes of the libellula, Mr. Carpenter says, are, on account of their size, peculiarly well adapted for examination under the microscope. They are a couple of protuberances immovably fixed in the head, and divided into a number of hexagonal cells, each of which contains a complete eye. The external parts of these eyes are so perfectly smooth, and so well polished, that when viewed as opaque objects, they will, like so many mirrors, reflect the images of all surrounding objects: each of these protuberances, in its natural state, is a body cut into a number of faces, like an artificial multiplying glass, but with this superiority in the workmanship, that as in that glass every face is plane here every one is convex; they are also much more numerous, and are contained in a much smaller space. Each of the eyes is an hexagon, varying in its size according to its situation in the head; and each of them is a distinct convex lens, and has a similar effect in forming the image of an object placed before it. Other creatures are obliged to turn their eyes towards the object, but insects have eyes directed thereto on whatever side it may appear.

The Editor of the "Repository" confirms the statements and conclusions of Mr. Carpenter, after inspecting the preparations of that observer, and from experiments made by himself, on the compound eyes of the French cray-fish, the lobster, and the common domestick or house-fly.

THE GATHERER.

SUPERSTITIONS OF THE SWISS.

There is, perhaps, no canton of Switzerland where superstition has cast deeper roots than in that of the Grisons. Like the peasantry of Germany, they scrupulously consult the signs of the almanack before they undertake any thing they consider of importance; such as sowing, planting, reaping, cutting of trees, bleeding, cupping, vaccinating, &c. But the most important season for them to dive into futurity is Christmas Eve, and they employ an endless variety of devices to obtain this interesting result. This is especially the case with such damsels as have passed the ominous limit of their twenty-fifth birth day, without having met with a husband, and who are now naturally anxious to ascertain whether and in what manner this supreme felicity is to fall to their lot during the ensuing year. For this purpose they put heaps of salt or bran in such places as are inaccessible to light; they bawl up the chimney; throw their slipper backwards; draw cards; open their psalter at random by means of a pin; pour melted lead or the white of an egg into water; pull a piece of wood from the fire; walk about the village green, or even the church yard; and from the peculiar appearances they observe, foretell all they wish to know. A woman must be excessively ugly to renounce the hope of being ultimately relieved from that state of single blessedness which seems so irksome to these simple people; and a quarter of a century of annual disappointment does not cool their conjugal ardour, and make them renounce these fooleries.

The surest and best omen, however is to see their future suitor in a dream. To effect this, the expectant, without uttering a word, fetches salt, flour and water, from three different houses, and at midnight, makes from these ingredients a small cake, which she eats before going to bed. This cake being very highly salted, and the heated imagination of the person rendering the blood feverish, it is natural that she should feel thirsty the next morning, and express a desire to drink before she goes to work. The first young man who then offers her drink is the person destined by heaven to marry her; and from that moment all little tricks of rustic coquetry are set in motion to bring about the execution of the celestial decree, and often with success.

When a person hears the cuckoo sing for the first time, and asks him if he shall enjoy long life, the bird's next note being long or short, is considered as a reply to the important question.

The ignes fatui are, among the Grisons, less an object of terror than of pity, as they suppose them to be the souls of infants who have died without baptism. They never see one, without endeavouring to sooth the pain of the supposed sufferer by the recital of a few pater.

TAILORS.

There is nothing upon earth that is of so much utility to men in general as fine clothes. A splendid page, a magnificent house, may draw the gaze of idle passers, and excite an occasional inquiry. But who, that has entered taverns and coffee-houses, has not perceived that the ratio of civility and attention from the waiter is regulated by the dress of his various customers? A stranger, elegantly and fashionable attired, will find little difficulty in obtaining deference, politeness, and even credit, in every shop he enters; whereas the stranger, in more homely, or less moodish garb, is really nobody. In truth, the gentleman is distinguished in the crowd only by the cut of his trousers, and he carries his patent of nobility in his coat-lap. And to whom does he owe this index of his identity, but to his despised and much calumniated tailor?

There is not a metamorphosis on all the pages of Ovid so wonderful as that which the great magician of the shears and thimble is capable of effecting. If there be most unpleasant disproportion in the turn of your limbs—any awkwardness or deformity in your figure, the enchantment of this mighty wizard instantly communicates symmetry and elegance. The incongruous and unseemly furrows of your shape become smooth and harmonized; and the total want of all shape is immediately supplied by the beautiful adulations of the coat, and the graceful fall of the pantaloons. And all this is by the potency of your tailor. His necromantic skill, unlike that of too many practitioners of supernatural arts, is exercised only for the benefit of the world: and whilst Circe transformed the companions of Ulysses into brute beasts, the benevolent enchanter of our day transforms brute beasts into handsome and attractive men. Nay, had Olympus been furnished with a tailor, Brotheus would have had no necessity to burn himself to death for the purpose of escaping ridicule from the gods on account of his deformity.

But he who is most indebted to this manufacturer of elegant forms, is the lover; and the base ingratitude of this sort of person is dreadfully enormous. After he has riveted the gaze of his mistress upon his charming figure, drawn forth sighs of admiration for his remarkable elegance, excited the most tender perturbations by the grace of his movements, and finally acquired a complete surrender of her heart by the striking interest of his attitude when kneeling at her feet, he ignorantly and presumptuously ascribes this to his own intrinsic qualities, without ever remembering that the abilities of his tailor are the sole source of all his success. The very being, who has endowed such a man with all his attractions, rests contented with the payment of his bills, (if he be fortunate enough to obtain that;) whilst the other, by the power of fascinations so procured, obtains a lovely wife and twenty thousand pounds. Sic vos non vobis, &c.

Such is the skill of that wonderful being, the tailor, that his transformations are not more extraordinary than sudden. The time which is occupied in thus new moulding the human frame is really trivial compared with the stupendous change which is literally wrought. It is true, the soul may remain the same, but a new body is actually given to it by the interposition of vestimentary talent: and this is what we have always believed to be the genuine meaning of the metempsychosis of Pythagoras.

It is not, therefore, without the most cogent reasons that we assert our opinion, that the distich of

Pope, "Worth makes the man," or the title appended by Colley Cibber to one of his dramas, "Love makes the man," ought henceforth to yield, in point of truth, to the irrefragable principle which we here solemnly advance, "that it is the tailor makes the man."

SAGACITY OF THE DOG.

From The Shepherd's Calendar, by James Hogg.

One young man, in particular, who was I believe overtaken by justice for his first offence, stated, that after he had folded the sheep by moonlight, and selected his number from the flock of his former master, he took them out and set away with them towards Edinburgh. But before he had got them quite off the farm, his conscience smote him, as he said, (but more likely, a dread of that which soon followed) and he quitted the sheep, letting them go again to the hill. He called his dog off them, and mounting his pony, rode away. At that time, he said his dog was capering and playing around him, as if glad of having got free of a troublesome business; and he regarded him no more, till, after having rode about three miles, he thought again and again that he heard something coming up behind him. Halting, at length, to ascertain what it was, in a few minutes his dog came up with the stolen drove, driving them at a furious rate to keep pace with his master. The sheep were all smoking, and hanging out their tongues, and the driver was fully as warm as they. The young man was now exceedingly troubled; for the sheep having been brought so far from home, he dreaded there would be a pursuit, and he could not get them home again before day. Resolving, at all events, to keep his hands clear of them, he corrected his dog in great wrath, left the sheep once more, and taking his dog with him, rode off a second time. He had not ridden above a mile, till he perceived that his dog had again given him the slip; and suspecting for what purpose, he was terribly alarmed as well as chagrined; for the day light approached, and he durst not make a noise calling on his dog, for fear of alarming the neighbourhood, in a place where both he and his dog were known. He resolved therefore to abandon the animal to himself, and take a road across the country which he was sure his dog did not know, and could not follow. He took that road, but, being on horseback, he could not get across the enclosed fields. He at length came to a gate, which he closed behind him, and went about a half a mile farther, to a farmhouse, where both his sister and sweetheart lived; and at that place he remained till after breakfast time. The people of this house were all examined on the trial, and no one had either seen sheep or heard them mentioned, save one man, who came up to the young man as he was standing at the stable-door, and told him that his dog had the sheep safe enough down at the Crooked Yett, and he needed not hurry himself. He answered that the sheep were not his—they were young Mr. Thompson's, who had left them to his charge; and he was in search of a man to drive them, which made him come off his road. After this discovery it was impossible to get quit of them; so he went down and took possession of the stolen property once more, carried them on, and disposed of them; and, finally, the transaction cost him his life. The dog, for the last four or five miles that he had brought the sheep, could have no other guide to the road his master had gone, but the smell of his pony's feet.

INSENSIBILITY TO PAIN

The following extraordinary circumstance is given, on the authority of Mr. Leonard Knapp, in "The Journal of a Naturalist." A travelling man one winter's evening, laid himself down upon the platform of a lime-kiln, placing his feet, probably benumbed with cold, upon the heap of stones newly put on to burn through the night. Sleep overcame him in this situation, the fire gradually rising and increasing, until it ignited the stones upon which his feet were placed. Lulled by the warmth, he still slept; and, though the fire increased until it burned one foot (which probably was extended over a vent hole) and part of the leg above the ankle entirely off, consuming that part so effectually that no fragment of it was ever discovered, the wretched being slept on! and in this state was found by the kiln-man in the morning. Insensible to any pain, and ignorant of his misfortune, he attempted to rise and pursue his journey, but missing his shoe requested to have it found; and when he was raised, putting his burnt limb to the ground to support his body, the extremity of his leg-bone, the tibia, crumbled into fragments, having been calcined into lime. Still he expressed no sense of pain, and probably experienced none, from the gradual operation of the fire, and his own torpidity, during the hours his foot was consuming. This poor drover survived his misfortunes in the hospital about a fortnight; but the fire having extended to the other parts of his body, recovery was hopeless.

PUZZLING IRONS.

An expert hand will take off nine puzzling rings in six minutes. I have in my possession one with thirty-six rings, which was made for a gentleman who vainly hoped he could disengage them in a comparatively short time. He did, I believe, persevere till he had taken off half the number, (for it remains with me in that state) after working at it at intervals, for about six or eight weeks, when he was obliged to give it up. Any one unacquainted with the power of numbers could scarcely be made to believe that, if nine rings can be taken off in six minutes, four times that number would require nearly 3058 years and a half, working twelve hours in the day, without intermission, or that the average time required for taking off each ring would be about eighty five years. [Mechanicks' Magazine.]

MADE DISHES.

Instead of "Do let me send you some more of this mock turtle"—"Another patty"—"Sir, some of this trifle,"—"I must insist upon your trying this nice melon," the language of hospitality should rather run thus:—"Shall I send you a fit of the cholick, Sir?" "Pray let me have the pleasure of giving you a pain in your stomach." "Sir, let me help you to a little gentle bilious head-ache." "Ma'am, you surely cannot refuse a touch of inflammation in the bowels."

If you feed on rich sauces drink deep of strong wine,
In the morn go to bed, and not till night dine;
And the order of nature thus turn to your turvey!
You'll quickly contract palsy, jaundice, and scurvy!!!

[Dr. Kitchener's Housekeeper's Oracle.]

INFANTILE COURAGE.

Two bulls, of equal bravery, although by no means equally matched in size and strength, happening to meet near the front of a Laird's house, in the highlands of Scotland, began a fierce battle, the noise of which soon drew to the window, the lady of the mansion. To her infinite terror, she beheld her only son, a boy of between five and six years of age, belabouring with a stiff cudgel, the stouter of the belligerents. "Dugald! Dugald! what are you about?" exclaimed the affrighted mother. "Helping the little bull," was the gallant young hero's reply.

CONCEALED COURTESY.

In 1792, Sunday Concerts were the fashion among the nobility; they were continued to preposterous hours. At Lord Hampden's, where an immense crowd of noble personages were collected, the first concert of the season was kept until half past four in the morning. At its conclusion, his Lordship asked Hackwood (a well known eccentric violinist,) to stay for supper. "Thank you, my Lord," said Hackwood, taking out his watch, "I cannot, for I think my wife is waiting breakfast for me."

TELEGRAPHICK COURTSHIP.

Last week the young girl who manages the signals at one of the telegraphick stations, Bidson, we believe, had the following query put to her by signal:—"How d'ye do, my dear?" To this she immediately replied, adopting the same mode of communication, "Mind your own business, sir, and don't be ogling the girls."

THE LEGENDARY.

THE WIFE OF SEVEN HUSBANDS.

A LEGEND OF ANCIENT LONDON.

In the beginning of the reign of Edward the First, of long-legged memory, there lived upon Corne-Hills, over against the spot where the water-tonne was a few years afterwards built, a certain blithe and buxome widow, very wealthy, and as fair withal as she was wealthy; she was only in her twenty-eighth year, of a tall and stately shape and bearing, and with commanding and yet right modest features; her face was oval, her hair and eyes of bright black; her forehead high; her eyebrows arched, almost into semi-circles; her nose slightly aquiline; her cheeks high coloured, and yet delicately so; her lips small, and prettily bent; her teeth white and regular; her chin rather forward and dimpled; and her complexion dark though not swarthy; so that upon the whole she had rather a Jewish cast of countenance.

Mistress Alice was a very handsome woman, and, as has been before said, very wealthy, for her father always petted her, and although he had two other children, sons, he quarrelled with them both and turned them out of doors, and very solemnly vowed he would disinherit them, and there is little doubt he would have kept his vow, but that they prevented him, the eldest, by being drowned in the Fleet river, and the other by getting murdered in an affray with the city watch. At the old man's death, therefore, he left all his property, real and personal, to his "deare daughter Alice," who was then twenty-one years old, and had lately been married for the first time in her life. She has been already introduced to the reader as a widow, and if he was tempted to be surprised at her being so young a one, what will he think when he reads that she was a widow for the fifth time?—ay, and was now on the eve of being married to her sixth husband—this was Master Simon Shard a draper of Corne-hill, who had a well-filled purse, a rather corpulent figure, a round and ruddy face, and was about two and thirty years of age. It is said he had been enamoured of the fair Alice previously to her three last marriages, but that he had not had courage enough to break his mind to her till some time after the death of her fourth husband, and when he did so he found she was engaged to his immediate forerunner, at whose death he again pressed his suite—was accepted, and they were married. After living for about six months on the most seemingly loving and comfortable terms, Master Shard was found dead in his bed, without any previous illness or indisposition: this was very strange, at least strange it will probably seem to the reader, though it was not so to Mrs. Alice's neighbours, for wonderful to relate, all her other husbands had died in the same way, and under the same circumstances. There had been from time to time many various opinions afloat upon this subject, and they had become more prevalent, stronger, and of longer lasting upon the successive deaths of each of her husbands. The most moderate had merely observed, that "for certain Mrs. Alice was a very unlucky, or a very lucky woman," according to the speaker's appreciation of wedlock: others looked wiser, and seemed to think a good deal, but very little, generally contenting themselves with observing, "That it really was very odd;" but again there were others, who—especially on the death of Mr. Shard's predecessor—declared that "such things were clean out of the common run of nature, and that either Mrs. Alice, or some one not to be named among Christians, must have bewitched her husbands," (and here the speaker and listeners, especially if females, would devoutly cross themselves) "or else some thing or other" (also it seemed not to be named among Christians) "had carried them off in a very odd way, to say the least of it;" and to this cautious and mysterious opinion the generality of the last mentioned gossips with additional self-crossing, assented. Still, however, Mrs. Alice's conduct was so, not only unobjectionable, but praiseworthy; she was so pious and charitable a woman, so good a neighbour, so kind a friend, and in short so publicly and privately fulfilled all the domestick relations of life, in so exemplary a manner, that even the tongues of those who secretly envied her wealth, her beauty and may be her luck, had not as yet dared to wag in open scandal against her: but a sixth occurrence of so extraordinary an event, it would seem gave sudden loose to their hitherto confined scruples and tongues: or, perhaps the reason why they more freely vented their suspicions or their spite on the present occasion might be that Master Shard had been a man of great influence in the city—his connexions stood high in the eyes of men, and he had a cousin who was sheriff at the time of his death, and who declared when he heard it, "by cock's marrow, he would see into the matter that very moment," and accordingly next morning, for he was just going to sit down to dinner when he made the above declaration, he presented himself with a posse comitatus at Mrs. Alice's door—and then the neighbourhood, as with one voice, spoke out against her; for their long held opinion of her (at least they said it had been long held) now found the countenance of power—her piety had been hypocrisy, and they had thought so all along—her charity ostentation,—her goodness and kindness, even those that had benefitted by them, now found some hole to pick in, and in plain and pithy English they called her a murderess.

While this was going on without Mrs. Alice's doors, another kind of scene was taking place within. The sheriff had been readily admitted, and was followed not only by the posse of the county, but by a posse of the tenure (to use, I believe, a strictly lawful phrase), consisting of all sorts of people, who either had or thought they had, or thought they should like to have some concern in the business. They found the widow by the bedside of her departed husband: she not only did not fly from but courted investigation, and accordingly the body was investigated, but not the slightest sign of violence was found upon it; no trace of steel or poison—all was as tight and as unaccountable as it ought to have been. There were some present who pretended to a great knowledge of human nature, and who strictly watched Mrs. Alice during the whole transaction, and their evidence went still further to clear her from the imputation it was sought to affix upon her: for they said her conduct was thoroughly natural—undisturbed between indignation at the charge brought against her, and grief for the cause thereof; and yet there was no overacting in her grief, it seemed just what she would be likely to feel for the loss of such a husband, and to be rather sorrow for the spell that appeared to be upon her, than for the man himself. The sheriff and his friends therefore, whatever they might have thought or wished, found themselves forced to declare her guiltless; and after partaking of a slight refectation, consisting of boiled beef, suet puddings, sausages and ale, left the widow to her solitude. His declaration of her guiltlessness was soon known among her neighbours, almost all of whom without delay or difficulty returned to their former good opinion of her, greatly pitying her for the trouble she had been put to, and much wondering how folks should be so spiteful as tell such wicked stories. In a few days orders were given for the burial of the late Master Shard in Mrs. Alice's family vault, which was in St. Michael's church, and which vault, though one of considerable extent, Mrs. Alice seemed in a fair way of filling choak full with her husbands.

St. Michael's church stood at the period of this tale, and for aught the teller knows to the contrary, stands to this day at the eastern end of Cornhill, and about midway between this church and Mrs. Alice's house there was a pot-house or tavern, known by the sign of the "Sevenne Starres;" in the tap-room of this tavern, upon the afternoon when Master Shard was to be carried to his long home, there was assembled a very merry company of some dozen worthy citizens who were getting full of good things and gratitude towards the giver of the feast, Master Martyn Lessomour, a young merchant, whose safe return from a long and successful voyage in the Mediterranean they were met to celebrate. Master Lessomour was not yet thirty, though hard upon it; tall, strongly and well-built; his face was handsome and manly, and his large blue eyes looked like mirrors of his frank heart; his complexion was naturally fair, but exposure to sun and storm had given it a healthy tan, as they had also yet more bleached his light hair, which he wore long and curling down his neck and shoulders; in short he was altogether a comely young man to look upon, and the rogue knew it too, for it was particularly observed of him that his carriage, which was at all times free and easy, would assume a little bit of a swagger when he either met in the streets, or passed under windows where were sitting any young and pretty city damsels. In his merry moods he was playful as a month-old kitten, as very a galliard as the best among them; but when business required it, he was as staid and sober as if an idle jest or an extra cup of canary had never passed his lips, so that he was equally well thought of among the grave and the gay; some of the oldest and wealthiest of the citizens would nod to him in passing, and some even went so far as to declare upon 'Change, "they believed young Master Lessomour would be a man well to do in the world, if," for they generally added a reservation, "if he only took care of himself and had good luck." They might indeed have been a little influenced in the formation of this good opinion, by the fact of his being the only heir and great favourite of a very rich and very old uncle. On the afternoon in question, he and his boon companions were at the height of their merriment, when one who was sitting in the bay window, that jutted out into the street, observed the funeral of Master Shard approaching, and gave notice thereof to the others. The passing of a dead body being a solemn event, and they being orthodox Christians (according to the orthodoxy of those times) merriment was therefore suspended, and I will not undertake to say there was not a share of curiosity mixed up with this religious feeling for they rose, one and all, and huddled into the window recess, in order to have a fair view of the funeral procession, which as matters went then—a days was a very sumptuous one. Most of the party present being acquainted with the circumstances of the case, at once recognized whose funeral it was, and the ignorant and anxious ears of Master Lessomour were greedily drinking in sundry marvellous tales of the rich widow of Corne-Hille, when she herself passed immediately by the window, looking becomingly downcast and sorrowful.

"Be she what she may," exclaimed my young merchant, "by the pillars of St. Hercules, she is a lovely wench, and steps out like an emperatrice."

"A witch, Master Martyn," replied one, the oldest of his companions, "a wicked witch is she, take an honest man's word for it, who should know something about such things."

"He is married to a shrew," said another, in an audible under tone, which produced a hearty laugh against the former speaker: in this, however, Master Lessomour did not join, nor with his companions who resumed their places round the well stored table, but drawing a stool into the window recess, and taking a tankard of ale with him, he sat him down, intending, he said, to have another glimpse of the fair widow as she should return from the church, meanwhile, he requested the company to tell him something more about her as they seemed to know so much, and he nothing, having been so long away from home—and accordingly, Master Andrew (he who had boasted of his knowledge of such things, and was indeed reputed the most garrulous gossip in the parish) with the assistance and interruption of his companions, when they thought he had not made enough of a good point, went through a relation of Mrs. Alice's life and adventures; and, which relation, divested of a considerable share of fiction with which Master Andrew had laden it, and put together, it is humbly hoped in something of a more coherent manner, corresponded very nearly with that which has already been laid before the reader. During all this while, Martyn Lessomour spoke not a word, and, when at length the narration was ended, he slapped his hand lustily on the window-sill, and cried out, "By the seven stars, and they are ruling ones now," casting up his eyes to the sign over the door, "but it is a strange tale—and whether true or false I will soon know—for if the mind of man hold good within me four-and-twenty ty hours, I will some how or other scrape knowledge with this said witching widow."

At this observation, there was a general outcry, some declaring he would not do as he said, others that he could not; and some presuming on long intimacy with him, or on their greater advance in years, vowed he should not.

"And we'll see that, my merry masters, in an eye-twinkle," cried Lessomour, "for here comes the dame back as if to my wish;" and with that, to the no small wonderment of his friends, he started from his seat, and clapping his cap upon one side of his head, hurried out of the door, and posted himself on the middle of the path, whereon Dame Alice with a few attendants was returning: he staid there, till she came within two or three paces of him, and then drew back to make way for her—she looked up, and their eyes met, and, bowing as gracefully as he could, which was not indifferently, he drew back still further. Mrs. Alice turned with the intent to cross the road, but some horsemen riding at the moment prevented her from doing so; whereupon Master Lessomour, stepping to her side, said, "Fair dame, will you let a stranger do his poor duty here, and see you safe over." She curtsied, and accepted the arm he offered her; and after escorting her across the road, where they again exchanged courtesies, he left her, and joined his companions, who from the window had beheld with astonishment his bold gallantry. They conspired to attack him with a good deal of bantering and railery upon his exploit; but he was in such high spirits at the good success of it, and so well pleased with the way in which he had acquitted himself, that he fairly turned the tables upon them; or if literally speaking, he did not do that, they pretty nearly did it for themselves; for in the course of two hours there was not one of the party, with the exception of Master Lessomour, who was too merry to get drunk, except Master Andrews, on whom liquor had no more effect than on a sponge, only making him heavy: with these exceptions, there was not one who did not turn himself under the table.

Martyn dreamed all night of the lovely widow, and rose next morning at the first break of dawn, and betimes to visit the widow. In due time they were married and lived very happily.

It chanced, however, that, as they were sitting together silently one evening upon a low stool or settle (in shape something like a modern settee, only with quaintly carved frame and elbows,) gazing upon the dying embers of a wood-fire, that had been piled up between the brazen dogs on the brick hearth, that Mrs. Alice fetched a sigh.

"Why dost sigh, sweetheart?" said her husband; "art not happy?"

"I knew not that I sighed, dear Martyn," she said. "Certes, it was not for lack of happiness, for I am right happy."

"I am glad to hear thee say so, and think thou sayest sooth—if I may at all judge from mine own heart—for I am happier than I ever yet have been."

"And so, in truth, am I, Martyn—for I am happy now; and, indeed, I never knew happiness till I knew thee."

"Nay, now thou art snrely cajoling me, sweetest. Meanest thou, thou wert never happy ere now?"

"I say, till I knew thee, never—never!" As she said this with great stress on the word never, Martyn, whose arm was girdling her, felt her shudder strongly, and he shook too.

(Conclusion next week.)

MISCELLANY.

For the Masonick Record and Saturday Magazine.

A RAMBLE.

'Twas a sunny day in the merry month of June, that I strayed into the park with a book in my hand, to enjoy the coolness of the shades. I seated myself on a cushion of soft grass, by the side of a bubbling brook, overhung by the branches of the maple and wild cherry. A refreshing coolness was afforded by the zephyrs, which played along the rivulet, bearing on their wings the odour of flowers, while above, one of nature's songsters was tuning his throat to innocent melody.

"What a delightful place," thought I—"Surely here, for a season, at least, one may enjoy unalloyed happiness. All around whispers peace, and every sense is furnished with its source of gratification."

While I was thus congratulating myself on my change of situation, a swarm of mosquitoes had singled me out as their game, and flew around me humming and buzzing, as if sounding their war cry. They paid no kind of regard to my ease, or my rights as a peaceable citizen, but straightway made a fierce attack, and I soon felt their bills piercing my skin in a manner any thing but comfortable. It may well be imagined, that this was no small drawback on my enjoyment. However, I always like to turn an inconvenience to the most advantage—so I fell to philosophizing, and thought I discovered that 'tis the case in life, that there is no situation so pleasant, but is subject to evils—liable to be disturbed by mosquitoes.

The situation of a man in power appears to the great majority of mankind a very enviable one. The idea of rising above our fellows, of hearing our deeds echoed from the trump of Fame, and perceiving the multitude bow obsequious to our dictation, is certainly rather agreeable in the perspective—but could we know the perplexities that never fail to accompany exalted stations, and view the inmost thoughts of the great, and feel the heart-burnings, jealousies, and animosities that rankle in their bosoms, we would acknowledge that there is a tormenting swarm of mosquitoes about them.

The rich man, too, is envied—and certain it is, he enjoys advantages that may be turned to good account. He has at his command the most refined sources of pleasure. He can gratify his curiosity and add to his information by travel. He can open to himself the treasures of literature, and enjoy the society of the most intelligent. But how few, comparatively, improve duly these advantages. On the contrary, do we not see them harassed continually by a never satisfied desire to amass! so that instead of stopping to enjoy the fruits of their exertions, they continue to toil on as though existence depended upon it. How many are tormented by that worst of all mosquitoes, ennui—a kind of misery occasioned by the mere circumstance of having nothing to do. And however strange it may appear, to those who have always felt the spur of necessity, this evil is worse than absolute want; for the latter is real, and may be removed by industry; while ennui has its seat in the imagination, and consequently defies a remedy. This is the sting that drives so many of the rich to the bottle for relief, and thus, since they know not on what to employ their faculties, they very sagely destroy them. Add to these, the numerous bodily infirmities induced by a life of inactivity, and the constant fear of losing possessions, and 'twould almost seem, that it were preferable to live in a humbler sphere, rather than be annoyed by these grievous mosquitoes.

Professional men are generally supposed to enjoy life with less toil or inquietude, than falls to the lot of others, and as respects the exertion of their physical powers, they do indeed live in a state of greater ease, than what are called the labouring classes. But the long and arduous course of study, requisite previous to entering on the practice of a profession, the ill health frequently induced thereby, the danger of no success at last, the difficulty of procuring advantageous situations, the fickleness of a support depending solely on popularity—these are the mosquitoes, that haunt the professional man, and serve to balance the advantages he enjoys.

The bachelor frequently chuckles at the idea of bearing the bite of fewer mosquitoes, than the double man; but his is the enjoyment of a coward. He dares not enter society, and play his part like a man, from a dread of its burthens. The mosquito, that buzzes busiest around him, is the prospect of a barren and unfriended old age.

'Tis true that the married man is sometimes sorely annoyed by a mosquito, in the shape of a scolding wife; but yet the bite is well repaid, by having objects on which to rest his affections and his hopes, when he shall have nothing left to hope for himself here.

Upon the whole, I believe it will be found that there are mosquitoes, humming around every situation in life; and that the best way to brush them off, is to accustom ourselves to look upon the fair side of things, endeavour to find out the advantages, rather than the evils, that surround us, and take care never to become discontented by indulging in unavailing regrets. Q.

From the American Manufacturer.

AFFECTED ROMANCE.

The season of pleasant sunshine, and flowers and musick—of "love, roses and lettuce" has arrived. The earth—more tardy than usual in changing the garb of winter—has now begun to assume quite a respectable appearance. We strolled out of the city, the other day, and were gratified to find the latent vegetation of the old trees bursting into life and beauty; and the hills, donning again their green mantles, which have suffered nothing from the rude buffetings of the past winter. The streams are leaping down the rocks lightly and gracefully as ever, and the birds are answering their wild musick, in notes as pleasant and as meaningless. The very skies look warm and inviting—nothing of that awful purity which they put on in the nights of winter—dazzling, gorgeous and magnificent, but cold and forbidding as the icebergs of the North. The hues of the clouds themselves have become richer and deeper. We have always loved to look upon the clouds—those old, and ever-varying, yet indistinct, tulle curtains of Heaven—now glorious with the hues of sunset—and anon darkened with the presence of the thunder, flinging down upon us their great shadows, as if the wing of some dark angel was sweeping between us and the sun. Not that we are fond of the storm—of the thunder-storm in particular, for we always shudder when we hear its first growl among the hills—but when it does come, with its terrible visitation of lightning, streaming in upon the almost palpable darkness, and flashing over pale faces and motionless forms—then it is that the sensation of fear is lost in an all absorbing admiration of that Power, which is thus manifesting itself to an unbelieving world.

It is fashionable to talk of nature in a mystical and dreamy style—as if its fountains of gladness and exceeding beauty were not open to all—as if the same sun, the same flowers and the same musick, were not among the gifts, held in common—things which are never property, apportioned or set apart. There is a great deal of affected romance in the world—and people talk prettily of flowers, and streams and moonlight because it is fashionable to do so—not from any exquisite delicacy of feeling, or a more clear and peculiar perception of the beautiful. Romance and sentimentality may perhaps, be pardonable in the country, where a few aberrations from the prose path of existence, might be excused, and very rationally accounted for. But for a city lady—a receiver of compliments, and a worshipper of fashion, to talk of the charms of the country—as if she really preferred the tame and quiet solitudes of nature to the bustling routine of fashionable life, is altogether too much for credulity itself. She would sigh amid the flowers, and within hearing of the waterfall, for the gayety and splendour of the city, as sincerely as Dr. Johnson did, when, surrounded by the beautiful scenery of nature, he gave his preference to the noise and crowd of Fleet-street.

From the New-York Morning Courier.

FALLING IN LOVE.

"Falling in Love!" Oh thou birth and death of bliss, thou Alpha and Omega of human enjoyment, thou very quintessence of contradiction—where and what art thou, that we always arrive at thee by a fall.

"Falling in Love!" Reader didst thou never ponder upon the expression with all its deep signification? It is motion then. Love never comes to us—motion downward too. Where is the dream of the poet and the matin creed of existence, which thrones the little god in the Heavens above, and elevates his worshipper to the same glorious height? All evaporated, gentle reader—all gone —sleeping with the thousand bright fancies that hover round the porch of being, but leave us to tread its stony path alone.

A fall! We must move very swift, for we often reach the bottom before aware we have left the top. Strange might be added, but no—It is less strange for chips of humanity to go down than up. Ah! unfortunate wight, born to be thwarted, crouching at the bottom of the golden wheel, never flatter thyself that no lower gulph gapes for thee! prudence bows in impotence, and calculation fails to insure you against Falling in Love.

Falling! why not walking, creeping, climbing—then one might look about a little; but a fall! oh, ye powers—who can tell the finis of a fall! what bumps and scratches and battering and bruising; eternal scars and cureless wounds, broken limbs, and bended head, to say nothing of mental damages—Heaven save us from falling in love! Year after year have we trod the paths of life with cautious steps and palpitating heart, turning a deaf ear to the syren song, and a closed eye to the sparkling snare, till as a youngster maliciously observed the other day, we shall soon be so blind and deaf in reality as to be not worth catching. But alack! is age a safeguard? look at the grey headed falling daily. Is wisdom! see statesmen and soldiers—what tactics can apply, or what wisdom avoid undefined, unlocated love, only known by its effects. What confusion! only imagine one of your star-gazing, eagle-eyed sons of fire stopped in his career by this immeasurable unmentionable abyss, vortex, whirlpool—this land and water trap. His Mars eclipsed by Venus—aircastles vanishing—schemes frustrated—thought uproar, and every beautiful theory of independence playing Scylla and Charybdis round; what pity 'tis this viewless point could not be made visible, and pity 'tis gentle reader, that people cannot walk in Love. Then all this confusion might be avoided—no loggerheads cracking together in their descent, Sapphos no more be driven to desperation, and Antonys might retreat in time to save a crown.

"Falling in Love!" Mademoiselle, they say has facilities for remounting; keep thy wisdom, fair one, it is more than equalled by thy lordly compeer. Nevertheless, Reader, for our own special case, we have a dreadful presentiment, that once fairly in, we never could get out; perchance terror and mighty mystery which envelopes the whole affair may magnify the danger—indeed we have at times had strong thoughts of courting the worst, plunging in over head and ears, and daring fate—but alas! fate's frown in the shape of Love, is not to be trifled with, reader. Snares are yawning round us, thousands are gone, are going, and forever will go, down. And should we once get in, and then, indeed, be fairly unable to get out again. Ah! Heaven save us from "Falling in Love!"

From General Miller's Memoirs.

GAMING.

Gambling, the besetting sin of the indolent in many countries, is ruinously general throughout South America. In England, and other European states, it is pretty much limited to the unemployed of the upper classes, who find a never ending supply of dupes to knead. In South America the passion taints all ages, both sexes, and every rank. The dregs of society yield to the fascination as blindly as the high born and wealthy of the old or of the new world. It speaks much in favour of the revolution, that this vice is sensibly diminishing in Peru, and to the unfortunate Montezugo belongs the honour of having been the first to attempt its eradication. A noted gambler was once as much an object of admiration in South America as a six-bottle nian was in England fifty years ago. The houses of the great were converted into nightly hells, where the priesthood were amongst the most regular and adventurous attendants. Those places are now more innocently enlivened by musick and dancing. Buena Vista, a seat of the late Marquess of Montemira, six leagues from Lima, was the Sunday rendezvous of every fashionable of the capital who had a few doubloons to risk on the turn of a card. On one occasion, a fortunate player, the celebrated Baquijano, was under the necessity of sending for a bullock car to convey his winnings, amounting to above thirty thousand dollars: a mule thus laden with specie was a common occurrence. Chorillos, a fishing town, three leagues south of Lima, is a fashionable watering place for a limited season. Here immense sums are won and lost; but political and literary coteries, formerly unknown, daily lessen the numbers of the votaries of fortune.

So strong was this ruling passion, that when the patriot army has been closely pursued by the royalists, and pay has been issued to lighten the military chest, the officers, upon halting, would spread their ponchos on the ground, and play until it was time to resume the march; and this was frequently done even on the eve of a battle. Soldiers on piquet often gambled within sight of an enemy's advanced post.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, JUNE 13, 1829.

☞ The Office of the Masonick Record is removed to No. 3 Beaver street.

☞ New subscribers can be furnished with the Record from the beginning of the present volume.

☞ The address of the members of the Masonick Institution in Geneva, opposed to the surrender of charters, and the measures recommended in a circular from several members of the masonick fraternity in the county of Ontario, will be published next week.

We thank "Q." and "Frances" for their correspondence, and desire its continuance.

The Narrative of the Anti-Masonick Excitement, noticed in the Record some time last winter, will be published in Batavia, on Monday next. It forms a duodecimo volume of more than 250 pages, and the price is one dollar. The author is Henry Brown, esq., a lawyer of fine abilities, and an honourable man. We have been politely furnished with a copy; and though we have given it but a hasty and imperfect glance, we think it will prove highly interesting to those who desire to review the "Rise and Fall" of the excitement. Mr. Brown has written without bias, and given what he considers a strictly impartial account of his subject; and those who desire a true history of the "Morgan affair" can not do better than peruse his "Narrative."

Many of the particulars related by Mr. Brown materially illustrate the more prominent facts, with which every one is acquainted; and we shall take an early opportunity to give them a more attentive perusal.

LITERARY. We are indebted to Mr. Wilmer for a regular weekly list of all the new publications which issue from the English press. Our list of May 16, received by the Pacific, contains the titles of twenty-nine new works, published within the week ending that day, and one hundred and forty works preparing for publication. We select a few of the titles of each. Works Published—Raleigh's (Sir W.) Works, 8 vols. 8vo., edited by Oldys; Sargent's Life of Archbishop Cranmer; Taylor's Survey of German Poetry, vol. 2; Tales of Field and Flood, by J. Malcolm. Works Announced—Byron's Life, by Moore; Barrington's Historick Anecdotes; Beatrice, a Tale, by Mrs. Hoffman; Book of the Boudoir, by Lady Morgan; Douglas's Travels, &c. on the Columbia River; Devereux, a Novel, by the author of Pelham; Everest's Journey through Norway, Lapland, and part of Sweden; Edgeworth's Taking for Granted, a Novel; Forest Scenes in the Wilds of America, Fugitive Pieces and Reminiscences of Lord Byron; Hood's Comic Melodies, with music; Hall's (captain Basil) Travels in the United States; History of the Campaigns of the British Armies in Spain and Portugal, by the author of Cyril Thornton; Humboldt's Lectures on Physical Geography; Haigh's Sketches of Buenos Ayres; Lockhart's Life of Cervantes; Life of Heber; M'Taggart's Three Years in Canada; My Landlady and her Lodgers, by the author of Annals of the Parish; Tales of the Wars of our Times, by the author of The Story of a Life, &c.; The Anniversary, lately an Annual, to be published in monthly numbers, with costly engravings; The New Forest, a Novel, by the author of Zillah; The Venetian Bracelet by L. E. L.

The fertility of the English Press is really calculated to move an American's wonder. A letter from London says: Horace Smith makes six volumes a year; Bulwer, the author of Pelham, &c. six more; Theodore Hook writes ten pages a day, "and Banim spins his Irish yarns faster than a rope-maker can his hempen ones!" Dr. Channing is very popular in England; and "Cooper is beset by all the minor critics of the day." It is said that Colburn asserts "that he has cleared fifty thousand pounds sterling the past year, by his publications," and no one doubts him! Murray has sold 32,000 copies of lord Byron's works the past year; and thirteen thousand pounds were laid out upon one of the Annuals alone, and eleven upon another.

Mr. Wilmer has obligingly forwarded us the second number of the COURT JOURNAL, a new weekly paper published by Mr. Colburn, London, and designed for the amusement of English nobility. We shall look over it, and if we find any thing worthy the perusal of our readers, we shall extract it. The first article in the Court Journal is entitled "Thoughts on Aristocracy."

The project of an anti-masonick state convention, in Vermont, has been relinquished; and the half a score of fortune hunters who invented it, are returning to their senses. "Ganging back agen" is the anti-masonick order of the day, in every quarter.

The patriot Phelps has again mounted the throne of the Ontario Phoenix. In his last paper he says Mr. Colden is a New-Jersey General! This is the latest discovery that we are acquainted with.

There is at present connected with the THEATRE a more efficient company than has graced its boards for a long time. Jefferson alone is worth a score of ordinary drivellers; and the company generally is such as should ensure the house a generous support. Messrs. Duffy and Forest are too well known to the liberal portions of our citizens to need eulogy, and there are others who are worthy of particular marks of favour. The repeated attempts to sustain the drama in this city have heretofore met with little encouragement, and the seasons have closed in a manner by no means creditable to the community. Let the energy and industry of the present managers meet with a better spirit. A. B.

The New-York papers received by the Mail this morning contain European news as late as May 16th, received by the packet ship Pacific, which arrived at that port on Thursday.

The London papers state that a coolness has arisen between the King and the Duke of Wellington, on the subject of the Russian and Turkish War. His Grace, it is said, wishes to put a stop to the ambitious projects of the Czar, and that he has proposed, in the first instance, firmly to remonstrate with Nicholas; and, if that should fail, to declare war against him. To neither of these propositions, it is asserted, the King will agree. That, in short, he has determined neither to declare war against the Emperor, nor to risk one by any decided remonstrance. The London Morning Herald affects to disbelieve the story; but the Morning Journal replies that it has "the very highest authority" for saying that the statement is "substantially correct." The Duke of Wellington holds no private conferences with the King and it is supposed he cannot long be Premier. "And as for Mr. Peel," adds the Journal, "his retirement is settled. We wish him all peace and every happiness in those shades where neither the smiles of the court, nor the reproaches of the people, can penetrate to his annoyance."

The Chronicle speaks of a report which it does not credit, that the Duke of Wellington was anxious to transfer the Premiership to a distinguished statesman, whose liberal opinions are well known, and who, for the last three years, has been a friend of the Duke.

Mr. O'Connell presented himself at the House of Commons on the evening of the 15th. He had previously taken the oath, required by the late act of Parliament, in the Court of King's Bench. The Speaker, having taken the chair, requested any new members that might be present, to come forward and take the necessary oaths. Mr. O'Connell then came forward and the rolls containing the usual oaths being presented to him, some conversation took place between him and the Clerk, the purport of which was stated to the Speaker by the Clerk. The Speaker then said to the House that the gentleman proposed taking the oaths required by a law which had passed since his election. The Speaker decided that Mr. O'Connell must take the oaths which were required when he was elected, and accordingly directed him to withdraw for the present. Mr. O'Connell then bowed to the Speaker and retired under the gallery.

A long debate ensued in the House. A motion finally prevailed to postpone until the 18th the consideration of the question, whether Mr. O'Connell should be heard from the table or the Bar. The question on that day, it was agreed should take precedence of all other business.

In alluding to this subject the Morning Chronicle says:—"How such a construction as that indicated by the Speaker should have entered his head, is to us astonishing."

LATEST FROM LISBON. Captain Mason, at Boston, on Tuesday evening, from Lisbon, which place he left on the 14th May, informs that no papers could be obtained by himself or consignee, as their publication had been suppressed by the tyrant Miguel; the inhabitants of the city were in great confusion, the prisons filled with victims to satisfy his blood-thirsty vengeance, and executions were constantly taking place. He understood that fifty of the first citizens of Oporto were to be hung at that place about the time he sailed, and that the wives and children of many who formerly lived in splendour, were seen begging for bread in the streets!

From the Buffalo Journal.

